I want to assure my hon. Friends that this is a Bill and a policy that we can and should support, not because it is perfect—it is far from perfect—but because it goes a long way towards implementing an education model that helps parents and non-profit and charitable groups to establish independent-type schools within the state sector without fees. It is the very model that has formed the basis of Conservative education policy in recent years, and which we believe will lead to higher standards and a higher quality of education in our schools.

To push that principle a stage further, new clause 19 proposes that where parents of 100 or more children of school age in a local authority area make representations to a local authority for a new school, the local authority must—not may—publish a notice under clause 7 inviting proposals for a new school. That would add to parent power and, as in the American model, make involvement in the community real and effective.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): My hon. Friend talks about parent consultation. Where a school changes status to, say, a trust school, is he equally in favour of parents being formally consulted through a ballot? We all know that "consultation" is a weasel word that can often be skewed in the wrong way.

Mr. Gibb: I hate to disagree with my hon. Friend, but I think that those are matters for the governing body of a school. I would be opposed to any formal intervention that required a ballot.

Ian Stewart (Eccles) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Gibb: I am going to make some progress, if I may.

Our amendments Nos. 105, 106 and 107 would make it easier for a foundation school to become a trust school and easier for a trust school to enable the foundation to appoint the majority of governors of a foundation school. The amendments would prevent the local authority from stopping or delaying the proposals by referring them to the adjudicator. It would simply be a matter for the governing body of the school. We want to make it as easy as possible for governing bodies of schools to create trust schools. The amendments would prevent local authorities hostile to the whole concept of trust schools from being able to scupper the proposals.

The amendments contrast sharply with new clauses 25 and 26, tabled by the Liberals. New clause 26 would prevent a trust school from having a majority of its governors from the trust. Being able to appoint a majority of governors is a key component of the reforms in the Bill. Without that possibility, it is unlikely that any charitable trust or group of parents would want to establish such schools, as the Liberals well understand; that is why they tabled the new clause. They are fundamentally opposed to reform on the model established by the Bill. For them, localism extends only as far as the local council, not down to the level of the local school, which they want to remain under the direct day-to-day control of local councillors.

Similarly, new clause 25 is a reflection of the Liberals' hostility to the reforms. It would require the school commissioner to establish a list of potential trustees—a bureaucratic and unnecessary impediment.

Sarah Teather: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is not keener on that new clause. It would make it easier for schools to become trust schools, because instead of having to go through the whole bureaucratic process of checking the guidance themselves, they would have a ready-made list.

Mr. Gibb: I do not accept that. As we witnessed in Committee, all the Liberal amendments are designed to thwart the reforms.

Paragraph 13 of the Government's draft guidance, entitled "Decision Makers Guidance on Acquisition of Trusts", sets out detailed guidelines that schools should follow, including unacceptable types of industry, which the funders of a charitable trust should avoid. They include, as the Secretary of State said, tobacco, gambling, adult entertainment and alcohol. That guidance should be enough for the hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), who tabled new clause 48, which would establish a register of approved institutions.

There comes a point when one has to rely on the good judgment of people in decision-making positions. No governing body will acquire a trust funded by Ann Summers. Governors are as keen as, if not keener than the hon. Member for Bury, North to protect and enhance the reputation of their school. With all the other protections that the Bill contains about the character of individual charitable trustees, enhanced by Government amendment No. 46 and the specific requirements of Government amendments Nos. 43 and 44 that the purpose of a foundation must be the advancement of education, I believe that new clause 48 over-eggs the pudding and is designed mainly to thwart the reforms.

Thwarting the reforms is the main purpose of rebel new clauses 16 and 17, which seek a ballot before any school can become a foundation school. Doubtless the hon. Members whose names are attached to those new clauses will argue that their proposals simply the follow the model that the previous Conservative Government used for grant-maintained schools—and they would be right. However, most Conservative Members now believe that the requirement for a full-scale ballot before a school could become a grant-maintained school was probably a mistake.

Mr. Marsden: Does the hon. Gentleman's reluctance to accept the principle of the ballot have anything to do with the fact that, outside London and the south-east, few ballots for grant-maintained schools were won?

Mr. Gibb: That is not true. I oppose the ballot because in the case of grant-maintained schools, it led to the politicisation of the process, with local left-wing groups and others who opposed the concept mobilising to prevent the change.

The prospect of fighting such a campaign will put off many, or at least some, potential governors, especially people who become governors simply because they are interested in running a school and providing education and have no interest in politics or engaging in a political campaign with the hon. Member for Bury, North.

Despite such hurdles, some 668 schools became grant maintained, but that was out of approximately 3,500 secondary schools. In 1998, grant-maintained schools became foundation schools. Their results, compared with those of community schools, show how much more successful they are. In 2004-05, 38 per cent. of pupils in community schools achieved five or more GCSEs at grades A* to C, including English and maths, compared with 44 per cent. in foundation schools, 49 per cent. in voluntary-aided schools and 66 per cent. in city technology colleges. That answers a question that the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) asked earlier.

The amendments try to place in front of foundation schools the same hurdles that applied to grant-maintained schools to frustrate the policy direction of the Bill. If the new clauses are pressed to a vote, I urge hon. Members of all parties to reject them.

Frank Dobson: When the old Etonian Leader of the Opposition goes around saying that he wishes to hand power to parents, why is he not willing to give them the power to vote for or against a trust?

Mr. Gibb: Because the ballots would not be used for that. They would be used by people such as the right hon. Gentleman, who will set out to oppose any initiatives, even those of parents, which clause 3 allows. He will be out there, campaigning against those parents.

We are worried about some of the comments that the Secretary of State made about ballots. In his "Dear Colleague" letter, which someone helpfully sent me, he stated:

"We have also ensured that when a school decides to join a Trust it has to consult its parents, through a ballot if necessary".

The Minister for Schools repeated that on the "Today" programme this morning. Nothing in the Bill provides for that, the draft guidance contains nothing about it and there is no wording to that effect in the draft regulations. I was reassured by the Secretary of State's comments, in response to my intervention, that he will not include that wording in the guidance, and that he will not refer to an indicative ballot in the regulations.

I was also reassured that it is not the Government's intention that a consultation process would be regarded as inadequate simply on the ground that an indicative ballot of parents had not taken place, thus presenting grounds for a local authority to refer the proposal to a schools adjudicator. If it had been the Government's intention to make reference to an indicative ballot in either the guidance or the regulations, it would have been very damaging to the successful implementation of the proposals.

5.30 pm

Helen Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gibb: I will not give way to the hon. Lady. I am just coming to the end of my speech.

Ian Stewart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gibb: I am sorry, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Our amendments and new clauses are designed to make the structural changes in the Bill more effective. Unlike the amendments tabled by the Liberals and the Labour left, they are supportive amendments designed to take the Bill back towards the original vision of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State. They are designed to increase the quality of the education offered in our schools, and I urge hon. Members to support new clause 53 if the Government refuse to accept it.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), and I want to engage with some of his arguments. After sitting on these Benches for nine years, I want to make one last effort to impress by speaking to these amendments and new clauses. After all, we now have a new Chief Whip.

I want to speak to a series of radical, reforming and modernising amendments tabled in the very best traditions of new Labour. After all, new Labour started around the principle of one person, one vote. I remember helping to organise the Prime Minister's internal election campaign in Yorkshire, when he stood for the leadership, and that was very much one of our principles. What is so wrong with one parent, one vote? That is the principle behind new clauses 16, 17 and 23, and I urge those on my Front Bench to resist the forces of conservatism. They must not be hidebound by the past; they must reach out to the future and involve parents in the fullest possible way.

New clause 16 would allow for a ballot in the case of a community school moving to a foundation school. New clause 17 would allow for a ballot when a local authority proposed to establish a foundation school. New clause 23, tabled in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett), deals with the situation in which a foundation school might want to revert to being a community school. In the interests of parental choice and freedom, that should surely be a possibility, and a ballot would be a means of legitimising the process.

I have listened carefully to the arguments against ballots, and some of them have shocked me. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said recently in The Sunday Times:

"The governors have to make a decision. The school decides whether to be a trust. If it does, there has to be consultation with parents. But turning that into a ballot strikes us as unnecessary."

My right hon. Friend has a proud tradition of advocating democracy in trade unions. Let us therefore imagine that quote, but with the following words substituted: "The union executive has to make a decision. The union executive decides whether there is to be a strike. If it does, there has to be consultation with members. But turning that into a ballot strikes us as unnecessary." I am a great admirer of my right hon. Friend—he is a rising star and I am sure that he has further to rise—but when he put forward his argument for rejecting ballots, it was not his finest hour.

Alan Johnson: The rule books of most unions—including mine—state that there must be a ballot of members before a strike can take place. My union rule book also gives a great deal of discretion to the executive to decide on other measures. Indeed, an argument is taking place at the moment in one trade union in the higher education sector about whether the executive should put a pay offer to a ballot or agree to it. It is up to the executive to decide in all those circumstances. My hon. Friend is right in regard to strike action, but wrong in regard to many other aspects of trade union law.

Mr. Grogan: I thank my right hon. Friend for that clarification. I think that a school's decision to become a foundation is a fundamental one. It is interesting to consider some of the other arguments. It has been stated that a ballot would be too expensive, and the Minister for Schools has said that it would be unnecessary bureaucracy. A consultation will involve a good deal of expense, possibly more than a one parent, one vote ballot.

Ann Winterton: I assure the hon. Gentleman that a consultation costs nothing if not many people are consulted. The recent so-called consultation about the future of a school in my constituency, to which I referred earlier, was almost meaningless. However, while I disagree with him on that point, I assure him that I agree with some of his other points.

Mr. Grogan: I thank the hon. Lady for that. Clearly, these radical, reforming, modernising ideas are spreading like wildfire across the House, even as we speak.

Ministers have said that there might be ballots in certain circumstances. In some cases, they would simply be inappropriate. However, where there was a significant body of opinion, according to one Minister, there might be a case for a ballot. There is a real possibility of sheer confusion, with governing bodies not knowing whether they are meant to hold a ballot. Will Ministers have guidelines as to how they should hold a ballot, if they decide to hold one? It could be very confusing. Surely it would be much simpler to have ballots in all cases.

Some people say that such a proposal is designed as a hindrance to the creation of trusts. I must admit that, with the two Front Benches thinking as they do, it is likely that the Bill will carry the House tomorrow, and that there will be trusts. However, the question is: should trusts ultimately be set up by perhaps three or four governors, on a wet December evening, after having engaged in some form of consultation? Would not it be more legitimate to have one parent, one vote?

Barbara Keeley: On that point, I used to be responsible for education in Trafford, which was a complicated authority because it retained grammar schools and had difficult structures. I have been involved in ballots previously in relation to grant- maintained schools and so on. My experience in education suggests to me that the most important thing in such consultations is to involve all those who need to be involved in the change of status of a school—other local schools, schools in other local authority areas and, often, dioceses, learning and skills councils and further education colleges. Just consulting parents, and even a small group of parents, and letting them decide, is not appropriate, as far too many other stakeholders are involved. I believe that these things ought to be settled locally, as there are so many different situations pertaining up and down the country. I think that it is wrong—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Lady has gone beyond the bounds of an intervention.

Mr. Grogan: Many of those stakeholders are, of course, represented on the governing body, which will come to a decision as to whether to make a trust proposal. Clearly, the consultation can be wider. Ultimately, however, the simplest way to decide matters of controversy in our democracy is one person, one vote. A general election is not a hindrance to forming a Government; it is a way of stopping a Government being formed by tanks rolling down Whitehall.

Paul Farrelly: I warmly welcome my hon. Friend's amendment, which is a good start. In relation to the necessity of ballots in grammar schools, should their lordships wish to build on his good start—if the amendment carries the House—would he welcome extending a secondary school's ballot to parents of primary feeder schools? That would make the provisions relating to foundations symmetrical with those relating to the removal of grammar schools.

Mr. Grogan: I am delighted that my hon. Friend thinks that I have made a good start. Should Ministers want to hold discussions behind the Speaker's Chair about how to improve these proposals, I would be delighted. Now, however, I want to address the Opposition's argument against ballots.

It is in the finest traditions of the Conservative party over 300 years to try to think of arguments against democracy. It said that we have made a mistake. In the ballots that it held under the Education Reform Act 1988, however, it was interesting how many people voted. On average, in the first two years, 67.5 per cent. voted, and by 1995, 84 per cent. voted. I understand that about 2,000 ballots took place, and more of those rejected the proposals, but a substantial number supported the creation of grant- maintained schools. I think it a little tortuous to suggest that local left-wing elements would take over our democracy. It would be equally ridiculous for Conservative Front-Benchers to suggest that there should not be union ballots for that reason.

Helen Jones: The argument from the Conservative Front Bench seemed to be that parents would be so overwhelmed by all the various types of propaganda that they would be incapable of deciding for themselves. That is an insult to most parents.

Mr. Grogan: I agree. The beauty of one person, one vote is that it does not give the loudest voice the final say, whether that loudest voice be a left-wing element or two or three governors promoting a pet scheme. The beauty of one person, one vote is that everyone, whoever they are, can assess the arguments and—in the privacy of a booth, at home or by means of a postal vote—can vote in the way that they think best. That is a tremendous thing.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend has put his finger on the heart of the debate. He says that democracy is important. I believe—and I think my hon. Friend shares my view—that democracy has been the greatest force for progress that the world has ever known.

Does my hon. Friend consider it perverse that a Labour Secretary of State—a Labour Secretary of State!—should propose the establishment of a commissar—sorry, commissioner—who would be able to override the decision of a properly and fully elected local authority? Does he not find that perverse and anti-democratic, as I do?

Mr. Grogan: I do find it sad. I have probably taken up too much of the House's time—[Hon. Members: "More! More!"]—but I want to make one final point.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Grogan: I want to make this final point. Others may have an opportunity to speak later.

I think that this debate is about the whole nature of public service reform. Both Front Benches seem to argue that public service reform is entirely about involving private interests and different providers in public service. That is a very consumerist view of public service reform. I think there is a view of public service reform that favours the involvement of local people as citizens in deciding models of public service. We are suggesting a modest way of giving all parents the chance to vote—one parent, one vote—when a trust school is proposed. I urge Members on both sides of the House to back our proposals, and I give notice that if the possibility arises, I shall press new clause 16 to a vote.

Sarah Teather: It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan), who made an excellent and funny speech. I shall take up some of his points, but I want to focus on new clause 25, amendment No. 15 and new clause 26, tabled by me and my Liberal Democrat colleagues. They contain what are key aspects of principle for us, relating to accountability and the vetting of trusts. Had there been more time, we would have wanted to press all three proposals to the vote in order to test the opinion of the House. However, we are particularly anxious to test the House's opinion on new clause 26.

As the Secretary of State said earlier, new clause 25—like new clause 48, tabled by the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor)—proposes the establishment of a central register for those eligible to act as trusts, from which schools may then choose. The system would ensure that all on the register had met the basic standards in the guidance mentioned by the Secretary of State earlier in the debate. We like to think of it as an A-list for candidates. It would conform with the basic set of principles—perhaps diversity could be included—but, as is the case with the local party, schools would be able to choose from the list, while feeling confident that it met those basic standards. It would not set new standards. It would include the standards laid down in the Secretary of State's guidance, but we want to link those standards with legislation.

Unlike the Secretary of State and those on the Conservative Front Bench, we believe that our proposal would make the system easier and simpler, and would remove a burden from schools. Surely if schools know that the basic checks have already been carried out, they can choose between the different ethoi—or whatever the plural of "ethos" is—in the trusts on offer, rather than having to establish whether a particular trust has a particular background. Someone on the trust could have a background in pornography or selling alcohol, or in any of the other examples laid out in the guidance. We are simply trying to establish a safeguard that would make it a lot easier for such schools to know what they are dealing with. The Government should be interested in building confidence in the system and in letting schools know that such checks have already been done.

5.45 pm

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): I am not actually sure whether the hon. Lady is speaking in favour of trusts or against them; perhaps she can clarify that point at some stage. Has she considered what is likely to happen in constituencies such as mine? A local company might wish to partner up with a particular school but not with schools in other areas, so it would not want to go on a central register.

Sarah Teather: There is no reason why such a company should not meet the basic standards, or why someone should not check centrally that those standards are being met to enable the school in question to know what they are dealing with. That would take the load off the school, which would not then be required to carry out such checks.

The point is that all the safeguards laid out earlier by the Secretary of State are contained in guidance—they are not written into the Bill. As I understand it, the concession that he gave earlier concerning Ofsted would also not be included in the Bill; rather, guidance would simply be issued. So despite all the concessions that have been made, there are still no such safeguards in the Bill or in regulations. The regulatory framework remains that given to charities under the Charity Commission. As the hon. Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter) pointed out earlier, that is hardly a body with a great record of efficiency. People do fall through the net.

Anyone setting up a charity to work with children or vulnerable adults is required to go through a Criminal Records Bureau check. However, as the Daily Mirror highlighted earlier this year, a charity that was set up in the name of a convicted paedophile fell through the net and did not get picked up by the Charity Commission. What kind of CRB check will be required for trust bodies? Will it be the standard check or an enhanced one? Of course, such issues were picked up following the Soham tragedy, which showed that those on the periphery of education are subject to the standard check, rather than an enhanced one. When the Minister winds up, I hope that he will say whether these trusts will be subject to the standard CRB check or an enhanced one. That is an important factor to be considered.

Of course, in many other fields where we expect there to be a test of character, such a test is written into the relevant legislation. For example, a considerable test of character is included in the legislation governing those who ask for a personal licence to sell alcohol. However, there is no such character test in the Bill before us for those who will run our schools. That is not adequate.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sarah Teather: I give way first to the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier).

Meg Hillier: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way. She is making some interesting points. Does she think that locally elected councillors should be CRB checked?

Sarah Teather: That depends on the extent to which they are involved with children. Perhaps we can debate that issue on another occasion—I suspect that it is slightly outside the remit of the point that I am trying to make.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sarah Teather: I will give way to the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) and then I will make some progress.

Mr. Andrew Turner: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way. The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) has rather made my point. Of course, local councillors may serve on governing bodies and trusts may appoint people to governing bodies. But it is the governors and trustees who are appointed to the governing bodies who—if they work with children—have to be CRB checked, not the people who make the appointments.

Sarah Teather: I suspect that the Minister will have to clarify this issue, because my understanding is that governors do have to be CRB checked, regardless of whether or not they are local councillors. I will allow the Minister, with the help of his civil servants, to answer that question.

I turn to amendment No. 15, which goes to the heart of the relationship between central Government and local government. In my view, this issue has very little to do with education—we could be discussing it in the context of almost any Bill that the Government introduce. For me, the proper place for taking decisions about the provision of local services is at the locally elected, locally accountable tier of government level closest to the area where the service is delivered: that is, local government. I cannot understand why we are going through the process of attempting to fetter and describe the Secretary of State's veto when it should surely be a point of principle with which the Government agree.

In the 10-year plan for what used to be the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister—I have entirely lost track of what it is called now—one of the stated objectives was to encourage more devolution and delegation to the front line, giving local leaders responsibility, accountability and the opportunity to design services around the needs of local people. Is not that precisely what we are dealing with here, giving the local authority the right to decide what provision is best for local people?

The real question is what the Government believe local government is for. Is it an arm of the central Government's public service delivery or is it a separate, discrete, autonomous and directly elected tier of government able to take its own decisions, accountable to the community, free to pursue policies that are relevant to a local area and free to disagree with the central Government? Is not the central point about democracy and devolution the fact that a locally elected tier of government should be able to make political choices that are different from those of the central Government?

Mr. Turner: The hon. Lady seems to be defending the White Paper as originally presented, which gave the local authority the power to decide in a competition. That power has been removed only because some people insisted on the local authority being able to enter the competition, so it obviously cannot be the judge as well.

Sarah Teather: I am making the point that authorities should be allowed to decide whether a community school is the best provision for the local area. I think that that is perfectly sensible and I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has attempted to change the point.

Surely it is nonsense to suggest that the Secretary of State knows all of the local circumstances better than the local authority. If the Secretary of State assumes that he does, it profoundly changes the relationship between central and local government. New clause 33 attempts to describe when the veto will be used, but it is the Secretary of State who will describe when the Secretary of State will veto a decision, so it does not represent much of a step forward. I simply think that the Secretary of State should not be meddling at all.

Finally, new clause 26 is designed to prevent a trust from appointing a majority of the governing body. Specifically, it is intended to prevent trusts from appointing governors that would outnumber elected parent governors on the governing body. In the light of all the spin we have heard about parent power and about giving parents choice, it seems nonsensical to pursue a policy that would reduce the elected component of parents on the governing body. Simply saying that a school would have to set up a council is not enough: welcome as councils may be, they are advisory, and having an advisory role is a sop in exchange for taking away the power to vote on and take decisions. Accountability should go to the heart of our own democracy, and we elected politicians should view it as precious and try to preserve it. I would therefore like to test the House's opinion on the new clause, which is very much a point of principle for us.

The Conservatives have tabled a range of amendments, but I am left rather confused about their position: they say that we should trust parents, but they will not accept ballots; they say that they believe in parent power, but they want to reduce the influence of elected parent governors on the governing body; and they say that they believe in localism, but they do not trust local government. There is a disjunction between one part of their rhetoric and another, which makes it difficult to understand.

We will support new clause 16, proposed by the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan), precisely because we support the principle of giving parents choice and power—

Ms Angela C. Smith rose—

Sarah Teather: I am finishing my speech now.

I am surprised that the Government will resist that new clause.

Mr. Marsden: I am pleased to speak to new clause 35, tabled by myself and my hon. Friends, and to comment on some other amendments dealing with federations.

I shall explain from the outset the genesis of our concern about putting some clear definition of the schools commissioner's role directly in the Bill. It started when I and my Select Committee colleagues became worried about the initially narrow way of envisaging the role and the extent to which the schools commissioner would be accountable in discharging it. When the former Secretary of State came before the Select Committee, we pressed her quite hard on the narrowness of the role of acting as a cheerleader for trusts and asked her how it was possible for the schools commissioner to be both poacher and gamekeeper at the same time, if I may put it that way.

As was made clear and as the Government have continued to make clear, the position of the schools commissioner is that of a career civil servant. In proposing the new clause today, my hon. Friends and I are concerned to get more movement in the direction of the schools commissioner being not just a civil servant, but having a far wider and more independent remit to oversee educational provision. We believe that it should include overall monitoring of admissions policies.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Does my hon. Friend not accept that the guidance that has been issued about the schools commissioner goes a long way towards addressing his concerns? Will he clarify what exactly is missing from the guidance?

Mr. Marsden: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. The letter that was issued on 2 May to members of the Select Committee on Education and Skills did indeed give some clarification about the schools commissioner's role. Indeed, the Secretary of State has said further helpful things in connection with the schools commissioner's role in fair admissions for children with special educational needs, but we need to tease out further things from the Government: other hon. Members have already alluded to an important principle about the extent to which we rely on letters and guidance, as opposed to regulation and things stated in the Bill.

Nothing lasts for ever. As I have said on a previous occasion, not even Labour Governments last for ever, and it is therefore important that we should tease out to the maximum extent whether the schools commissioner will have the role of promoting co-operation and fair access, not of being merely a cheerleader for the trusts. I say that advisedly, because concern has been expressed not just by me, my colleagues on the Select Committee and those hon. Members who support the new clause, but by other organisations in commenting on the Bill.

The Association of Teachers and Lecturers said in its initial response that the role of the schools commissioner, as originally defined, was far too narrow and could be used simply to promote trust schools, and it still has that concern. It is also important that the schools commissioner has a strategic role in overseeing admissions policies across the whole local authority area—again, something that the letter of 2 May does not make absolutely specific. So my hon. Friends and I will be looking for further guidance and clarification from Ministers—picking up the Secretary of State's welcome words earlier—about how the schools commissioner will carry out that broader remit. That is important, particularly in the context of the collaboration issue.

Many of the concerns that Labour Members have expressed about the Bill's structure and the direction of travel have been caused by doubts about whether trust schools might act in an atomised fashion—in fact, in the sort of fashion that the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) so enthusiastically endorsed only a few moments ago. Welcome clarifications of the Bill's direction of travel have been provided by the Secretary of State and, indeed, by the letter that his predecessor sent to the Chairman of the Select Committee. However, it would be helpful to Labour Members, especially those who have continuing concerns about the collaboration issue, if Ministers were able to give more chapter and verse about how the schools commissioner will operate in that respect, and how he or she will be answerable to Parliament and to the Select Committee. However, I accept that we have already seen significant movement on that.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to federation and said that the amendments on that subject were either too drastic or over-prescriptive. Again, the issue is direction of travel. Many Labour Members and organisations involved have been concerned about what force lies behind attempts to get trust schools to collaborate, not just with other trust schools, but with other schools in their local authority. That is why I welcomed the comments by my right hon. Friend earlier. However, we have to consider delivery. The Association of School and College Leaders said in its response to the Bill that it was concerned that trust schools would reinforce a hierarchy of schools, instead of the focus being on making every school a good school.

The Government need to provide stronger incentives to encourage collaboration and partnership work. After all, we have models for that in previous education legislation and in the excellence in cities programme. The whole specialist schools programme is predicated on the principle of sharing and spreading good practice across local authorities. The Institute of Education regrets the fact that the Government have not made federation the chosen model for trust schools, which they could have done on the face of the Bill, given the rhetoric about encouraging federation and collaboration. If Ministers will not accept prescriptive amendments on federation, my hon. Friends and I hope for stronger assurances that further attention will be paid to how the collaborative process will work. The issue goes beyond the narrow confines of the Bill and is a question of—if hon. Members will excuse the pun—trust in trusts. We need to trust trusts not to operate as rogue elephants but as central providers across a local authority area and to do so in conjunction with the new and expanded role for local authorities.

I welcome some of the reassurances that have been given, but I want to see further progress. I also want further detail, because—as always—the devil is in the detail, on how the assurances about co-operation and collaboration will operate in practice.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): I wish to speak briefly to new clause 64, which I tabled, and other amendments. I hope to be brief because I sat through 55 hours of the Bill in Committee and listened to debates on numerous amendments—some 500 were tabled, but only a handful were accepted. I do not need to detain the House at any great length, partly because I am confident that new clause 64 will not be accepted either. However, I throw bouquets to Ministers in the hope that one of them may be picked up.

The Secretary of State spent more than an hour trying to reassure Labour Members about the Bill. It is in everybody's interests, certainly of Front Benchers on both sides of the House, to claim more for the Bill than it contains. It is in the interests of the Prime Minister, because he wants to show that he can still bring in something radical, that he is not a lame duck and that he believes in the state being the enabler, not the provider. It is in the interests of those who oppose him on the left of the Labour party. I accept that they have strong principles on this issue, but they also want to burnish their belief that the Prime Minister is some kind of closet Tory—I do not think that he is. It is also in the interests of my Front Bench colleagues to claim more for the Bill than it contains because they want to set out their stall as a constructive Opposition—an understandable and correct point of view.

The truth is, as everybody knows, that the Bill will not make much difference to the educational establishment in this country. Indeed, the Secretary of State assured us that these radical new schools—which according to some opponents of the Bill will allow middle class parents to opt out of the system—will remain in the local authority family. Numerous clauses in the Bill will enhance the powers of local authorities, the Secretary of State and local adjudicators. It is nonsense to suggest that the new schools will be anything like the grant-maintained model, and I see no reason why anybody has anything to fear from them. A fair number of schools may take up the offer to change status, but given that some 63 per cent. of schools are already community schools, the Bill will not amount to an historic change. My Front-Bench colleagues have made the point, and I agree, that this Bill is not an historic change like the education legislation in 1944 or 1988, but we still need to have this debate.

The speech by the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) was excellent and he put his finger on the issue. It is in the interest of those who support more schools having independent status not to have ballots. If we are honest about it, we do not want ballots because they favour the forces of conservatism. People do not like change. Those who were opposed to grant-maintained schools on any basis whipped up sentiment against them, but parents could be persuaded because they are conservative and do not want change. That is why the Secretary of State does not want ballots and why my party does not favour them. We recognise that we made a huge error in introducing ballots for grant-maintained status, because it led to the politicisation of the system. It was only because of opposition in the House of Lords, which certainly represents the forces of conservatism—radical Conservatives like me are always worried about it—that we introduced ballots.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): Does not the hon. Gentleman think that if parents perceived that their children would benefit from a change in the status of their school, they would vote accordingly?

Mr. Leigh: Yes, I must not exaggerate my argument. Nearly 20 per cent. of schools became grant-maintained after the arguments had been set out. No doubt if we had ballots, some would be won by the governors and those who support the new model. However, the trouble with introducing the equivalent of grant-maintained schools is that people will say that they will be given special treatment and funding, as well as other benefits and advantages that are not available to other schools. If all schools were first foundation schools and then grant-maintained, it would be difficult to argue against them on the basis that they were taking more resources than they were entitled to. The one accurate argument that the Labour Opposition had against grant-maintained schools, and it was true—although denied at the time—was that they were given better funding arrangements in certain circumstances. That was unfair, but the simple way to overcome that argument would be to make all schools grant-maintained. Deep down, that is where the Government are coming from and I suspect that the Prime Minister has been frustrated by the lack of progress in state education.

Despite our differences, all hon. Members should be very frustrated about what is going on. We know about the independent report from the National Audit Office that says that 23 per cent. of schools are underperforming. That affects 1 million kids. We all know that something radical needs to be done, so why deny the elementary truth that the Prime Minister has cottoned on to—that there must be radical change in our education structure? That is what lay behind the White Paper and the excellent notion that local authorities should be commissioners and not providers. It is a pity that we have not managed to sail along more with the Prime Minister in the direction that he wanted.

The Minister for Schools (Jim Knight): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's flow, but does he accept that the NAO figure of 23 per cent. includes schools that have been described in this debate as "coasting"? Will he confirm that it would be inaccurate for the House to believe that 23 per cent. of schools were failing?

Mr. Leigh: I do confirm that, and am sorry to have given the opposite impression, but is not a school that is merely coasting still failing its students? I think that it is. We want all schools to be excellent, although that may not be possible in the real world. However, it is a matter of serious interest if 1 million children are in coasting or under-performing schools. Presumably, that is what prompted the Education White Paper, and why the Prime Minister felt that we needed these radical proposals. It is a pity that he cannot use his massive parliamentary majority to get his way in this matter.

I have tabled my amendments because the Bill places all sorts of obstacles in the way of schools. For example, a school that decides to become a new foundation school has to publish a proposal, then consult the LEA and other schools, parents and teachers in the area, and then consult any national faith group that provides the school. If the proposed foundation school does not have a religious character, it must consult the trust or foundation that provides the school. If proposals affect the provision of full-time 14 to 19 education, the Learning and Skills Council must be consulted. Local MPs must also be consulted, as must local district, parish and community councils. The school must also consult any other person considered to be appropriate by the governing body, and any other interested party. Special schools must consult the local NHS primary care trust. All proposals must be published, in a newspaper and at all the school's main entrances, and they must also be sent to the LEA and the Secretary of State. The list of requirements goes on and on.

Ian Stewart: What is the hon. Gentleman's problem with democracy?

Mr. Leigh: I have no problem with democracy, but the requirements amount to a fig leaf for the Government. They want to reassure their supporters that there is no need to worry, as comparatively few schools will go down that route. Already, 63 per cent. of schools are community based. It is possible that another 100, 200, 300 or even 500 schools will choose to become one of the new foundation schools, but what difference will that make, when there are more than 20,000 schools in this country?

That is the reality. I am not afraid of democracy, but I want the debate to be honest. So far this afternoon, the debate in this Chamber has not been honest.

Mr. Andrew Turner: My hon. Friend asks what difference 500 schools choosing foundation status would make, but the fact is that a very small number of schools can make a considerable difference to how even this Government try to reorganise our education system. It is clear that Lord Adonis has recognised that from day one.

Introducing this Bill is not the seminal act by this Government. The seminal act was when they passed the Education Act 2002. Section 2 of that Act allowed innovation and deregulation, and gave the Secretary of State the power to suspend any statutory requirement in response to the wishes of a governing body or LEA. That is—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That has been a long intervention.

Mr. Leigh: But it was an excellent intervention, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Lord Adonis is one of my heroes, and he faces an uphill struggle. However, I may have been unfair to the Government. I may have listened too much to what has been said in this Chamber, when I should have paid more attention to the subtext. Perhaps representing foundation schools as beacons and gradually giving them more independence will do the trick and cause good practice to spread. Even so, all sorts of problems remain with the model proposed.

Paul Farrelly: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is extremely important for the future of children's education that trusts and trustees should be properly vetted? Is not consultation an integral part of that? The debate has focused on secondary schools and large academies, but the Bill reaches down to the smallest village school. It is very important that no Tom, Dick or Harry—or Roman Abramovich—is able to take over a school without being properly vetted. That is another argument in favour of ballots, as local parents know what is going on in their area.

6.15 pm

Mr. Leigh: The hon. Gentleman identifies a fundamental difference of opinion between us, which leads me on to my final point. Last Friday, I attended a debate at the Harvard Business School. Professors spoke about educational problems in America and described precisely the same problems that have been identified this afternoon. In America, one option is known as the Edmonton model, by which schools are given complete independence to do as they like. The other model gives much more control to school boards. Under that model, outsiders have to be vetted carefully in exactly the way set out by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly).

In its wisdom, the Harvard Business School has determined that structure makes much less difference than the quality of a given head teacher. That may be the only element of my speech to find general agreement around the House. So why are we so obsessed with structure, when we know that it makes very little difference?

If we agree that the quality of the head teacher is crucial to a school's success, why do we lack the confidence to give head teachers the power to run their schools as they want? They are the professionals: why do we in this Chamber think that we must always second-guess them? Why can we never trust the people who have been trained, at such expense, to run our schools?

Helen Jones: A school's head teacher is crucial to its success, but he or she will not get every decision right. No human being does, so is that not why we need a series of checks and balances in the system? That includes giving parents a right to have a say, as it is their children's future at stake. If there is to be a fundamental change in a school's character, parents should be consulted. That is what I would want if my son's school were involved, and I am sure that the same is true for other parents.

Mr. Leigh: Of course that is right, and it is why I want head teachers to be subject to governing bodies. I should be happy for those bodies to be elected by the parents of children attending the school, but I should also like the head teacher who reports to that governing body to have maximum freedom. I do not see why that statement should be regarded as too radical, or simply wrong.

The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) is right: head teachers are human and they will make mistakes, but we should let them. However, if a school does not deliver what parents want, those parents have some power. If a school's success depends on students wanting to attend it—and I hope that we still believe in allowing money to follow the pupil—people will vote with their feet and the school will have to reform its ways. That is what real consumer choice is all about. It does not lie in this Chamber but in the millions of decisions that ordinary citizens make.

Ms Angela C. Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that head teachers already have considerable freedom in how they run their schools? That was started by the previous Conservative Government, but it has been continued by this Labour Government. Does he agree that the Bill offers head teachers new freedoms to bring in external partners to help them and the governors improve their schools still further?

Mr. Leigh: That is the hon. Lady's third or fourth intervention, and all have been excellent and very loyal to the Bill. I wish her well, but she asks a question that is not my business. I am in favour of anything that gives head teachers more independence or more power to bring in external partners, and I approve of anything that gives them power to federate. I have no problem with any of that but, to get the Bill through the House, the Government have given more power to the Secretary of State rather than less. That is something that we should be worried about.

Annette Brooke: The hon. Gentleman and I both had the honour of attending the Harvard Business School lecture. He might also have pointed out that leadership at district level was identified as the most important factor. The role of the local education authority is critical in the Bill.

Mr. Leigh: It all goes to show that one's views of a lecture are always subjective; one's innate prejudices affect one's approach. I thought that the lecturers presented two arguments: the Edmonton argument, to which I referred, of complete independence for schools, and the argument that local school boards should have a lot of control in achieving collaboration. At the end of the day, however, there was no overwhelming evidence that changing structures changed very much. I think that that is what the lecturers said, but if I am wrong I apologise to the hon. Lady and to them, although I am sure that they will not mind if I misquote them—they are very unlikely to read these words in any case.

In Committee and on Report, I have tried to set out my alternative structure for education. I realise that the Government will not pick up on it, but as my hon. Friends work out their education policy over the next 18 months, I hope that they might move towards a policy of all schools becoming independent charitable trusts, to fulfil the Prime Minister's vision that all state schools should be genuinely independent.

We need not get bogged down by whether we are in favour of or against grammar schools; I am not interested in that. All I am interested in is that schools be allowed to hire and fire, select and deselect and run their budgets as they please. That does not mean that there will be a rush of new super-selective schools. Many people, not just the middle classes but people stuck in working-class ghettoes, favour diversity. To refer again to the US, where voucher schemes are being introduced in many states, it is often black parents in poor neighbourhoods who favour education credits and vouchers as a means of escaping from the ghetto.

I realise that I have not yet persuaded my Front-Bench colleagues to adopt education credits but I live in hope that that day will come, because it is an obvious and inescapable way of breaking down the social apartheid in education. Why does this country alone among European countries have such a large private education sector? It does not exist in France, Germany, Italy or Spain, so does not that lead Labour Members to question the economic rationale? Private education is not illegal in France, Spain or Germany, so why do as many as 50 per cent. of parents in some of our boroughs feel that the only way to obtain a decent education for their kids is either to get a chit from the parish priest so that the child can go to a faith school or to pay for independent schools?

Why do the conservatives sitting on the Labour Benches below the Gangway believe that so many parents want to opt out of state education or want to escape from community schools to faith schools? What is the reason? Education is failing in this country because we do not have sufficient trust and faith in the ability of head teachers to run schools as they want. All my amendments were tabled in the hope of achieving that. None of them will be accepted, but one day I believe that we shall win that crusade.

Mr. Chaytor: I support new clause 16, proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) in favour of ballots, and I want briefly to speak in support of the three amendments tabled in my name.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a powerful case in his opening statement for the Bill as it now stands. I shall support it on Third Reading because it is in much better shape than we were led to believe would be the case when the White Paper was published. Its long-term and short-term effects will actually be slightly less than its most fervent advocates hoped and its fiercest opponents feared. It will not be earth-shattering legislation but it has many important provisions, especially on school discipline, the reform of the curriculum, school travel and school meals, quite apart from the changes in governance and structure, which will be beneficial.

I shall support new clause 16 because I tabled an amendment on similar lines in Committee; it was not put to the vote, but the arguments were valid. However, I approach the question of ballots from a slightly different point of view. I start from the Education Reform Act 1988. It is interesting that a number of Conservative speakers, including Front-Bench Members, now accept that their ballot system, introduced under that Act, was a mistake. But had that legislation not included provision for ballots, what would have been the position of the Labour Opposition at the time? Would we have accepted that it was entirely legitimate for a simple majority in a governing body to opt out of the local authority, with the huge additional resources that went with that, without further consultation with parents? Of course not.

We thought that the ballot process in the 1988 Act was necessary. We participated in many ballots across the country and ensured that fierce local debate took place. We also ensured that when the result of the ballot had been announced it settled the issue, because the ballot conferred legitimacy.

I take a slightly different view because I do not fully accept the argument that new clause 16 would reduce the number of schools that will opt for trust status. The advantage of a ballot is that it would encourage much better-informed debate about the implications of transfer to trust status. The hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), who made an interesting speech, pointed out that people are naturally conservative and reluctant to change. That is a reasonable generalisation when the status quo is acceptable, but when it is not, and when parents are conscious of difficulties in respect of their children's education or the capacity of their school, they are very open to alternative ways forward. That is why the use of a ballot would provide far better-informed local debate and would not necessarily result in a reduced number of schools taking that route.

In the short term, I do not think there will be a huge wave of new trust schools. I am not opposed to the concept. We already have foundation schools, although few people seemed to know that they existed before the White Paper was published, and nobody has ever argued that we should abolish them, so I can see no great objection to having more of them, if it is the outcome of serious local debate and there is general agreement that they are a useful way forward.

It has been argued that the ballot is a distraction or somehow not legitimate, and that other forms of consultation are preferable. Of course, it is important that there are other forms of consultation and that the ballot is not free-standing. My reading of new clause 16 is that the ballot would be a precondition for transfer to trust status but that it would not inevitably result in such a move, precisely because there would be other forms of consultation. The local authority would have the right to be consulted and to refer the matter to the adjudicator and neighbouring schools would also have the right to be consulted.

It is important that we maintain the basic principle of one parent, one vote, but that there is also another set of procedures for consultation. As I said in Committee, in response to Conservative amendments that would have allowed 50 parents to demand that a new school be built, I am not at all in favour of small numbers of parents, who may not be representative, sidetracking or hijacking normal democratic procedures. However, where such proper procedures are built into the system, they give greater weight to decisions.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to one of my proposals, new clause 44, which provides that before a decision on trust status is taken, there should at least be a parents' meeting. He expressed interest in that suggestion, so I hope that he might accept the new clause when he responds to the debate. However, it seems ironic and illogical that at precisely the moment at which we are relieving governing bodies of the burden of holding an annual parents' meeting—because we know that the experience of annual parents' meetings has been less than satisfactory and that the attendance is almost derisory—we are arguing that an annual parents' meeting is a better means of resolving the issues than a ballot. I see the parents' meeting as another part of a package of measures that would make up the consultation procedure. That package would include a ballot and consultation with the local authority and neighbouring schools.

6.30 pm

Ms Angela C. Smith: One of the most controversial and difficult decisions that a school governing body ever has to take is the decision to close a school. That is also a situation in which parents become conservative and resistant to change. Does my hon. Friend recommend ballots in those situations as well? Is that not the logical conclusion of his argument?

Mr. Chaytor: In the case of school closure, it is entirely reasonable that a ballot should be part of the overall decision-making process. We are not talking about school closures at the moment, but, yes, I agree. Denying parents a vote on an issue of central importance will inevitably lead to greater division and a lower level of legitimacy for the final decision. The weakness in the argument that schools or governing bodies may choose to have a ballot, but it will not be mandatory, is that we then face the prospect of a series of different kinds of ballot being held according to different kinds of rules. If we have a democracy, everybody should play by the same rules. We cannot have school A holding a ballot with a particular definition of the electorate and according to a particular procedure, and school B, a mile down the road, doing things differently. That would be a recipe for chaos and would lead to challenges. It would be a huge job creation programme for the schools adjudicator's office. There will be hundreds of appeals to the adjudicator if we do not ensure that consensus is at the heart of the process and if we allow a comparatively small number of people on a small governing body to have the final say—perhaps by a tiny majority.

Sir Peter Soulsby: Does my hon. Friend agree that many of us already have experience of consultation without ballots in the context of the establishment of academies in our constituencies? I know from my own experience that that so-called consultation involved professional consultants, a lot of money and a professional selling job. I hope that he would agree that that sort of consultation is based on no real understanding of the issues and no real say for parents, and that there is really no alternative to proper information, proper debate and a vote.

Mr. Chaytor: That is the heart of my argument: the ballot process ensures that the decision is made on the basis of the best possible information. It ensures that everything is on the table and that, after the decision has been taken, nobody can say that they were not consulted or that the arguments were not presented properly.

New clause 38 deals with the question of the Secretary of State's veto and simply requires that the Secretary of State has to have regard to standards as the key criterion before giving his or her approval. New clause 33 deals with many of the concerns that Labour Members, in particular, had about the Secretary of State's role and veto. The model put forward of local authorities in different categories being able to make their own bids for new community schools is absolutely right. As I think was said earlier, we hope that, as time goes by, more local authorities will move out of the lowest categories, so logically there should be less need for the Secretary of State to exercise the veto. I am therefore comparatively happy that the Secretary of State has responded to those concerns.

I want to say a word or two about new clause 48, which relates to the register. Having listened to what was said earlier, I am not sure that there is very much difference between a register that is compiled in advance and a website compiled retrospectively. The two sides are moving very close together. However, just as the ballot ultimately serves to legitimise the policy and to protect those who argue the case for it, the register serves to legitimise the policy by giving a guarantee—as far as the Government can give that guarantee—that a trust on the register is a suitable trust. The register also protects the Government.

I ask the Minister to think of the tabloid hysteria in the week before this year's municipal elections. What would happen if, in the week before next year's municipal elections or the general election in three or perhaps four years' time, we had similar tabloid hysteria because one individual in one trust that had not been properly vetted in advance by the Department, but had nevertheless formed a relationship with a school, had been involved in one of the activities that the guidance proscribes? I am talking about tobacco, gambling and various other things. If we found ourselves in that situation, not only would the trust policy be undermined, because it would be seen to have led to inappropriate people becoming involved in schools, but the Government would be undermined. The argument for the register is that it protects the Government as well as the policy.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: My intervention relates to ballots. Will my hon. Friend explain why, in the context of the decision, he is giving so much weight to local parents who currently have children at the school? They may have a child at that school for only three, four or five months. Why do their views outweigh the desires of the wider community, including child care partnerships, the local authority and parish councils?

Mr. Chaytor: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Obviously, there are limitations with any electorate. The reason for being part of that electorate can be greater or lesser. However, although some parents at the school may not have a long-term interest in it—having said that, parents of children in year 11 may have children about to join the school in year 7—the same argument could equally apply to the governing body. There will be people on the governing body who may no longer be governors in three or six months' time. We have to accept that, whoever is given the job of taking the decision, there will be some difficulties and anomalies of the kind that she has identified.

Margaret Moran: Will my hon. Friend explain how the parents of children in schools in my constituency that feed into South Luton high school, which has been a failing school for many years, can have the influence that they want to improve that school, either as a trust school or as an academy? Surely those parents have a right to influence the decision. Their children will be going to that school and those children's future education is at stake.

Mr. Chaytor: I entirely agree, but it then becomes a matter for the governing bodies of the feeder primary schools to decide whether they wish to hold a ballot and provide that level of consultation with parents. My argument is that no one group should have a veto or supreme power. The issue is about getting the right checks and balances between the rights and responsibilities of parents, school governors and the local authority, and of parents and governors in neighbouring schools. I return to my point that, as I read new clause 16, the ballot is a precondition for the move to trust status, but does not automatically lead to trust status, because that decision will be dependent on the wider forms of consultation, as well.

Paul Farrelly: I am glad that my hon. Friend supports the new clause in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan), which will be put to a vote later. I have carefully read the new clauses tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) and they are excellent. They are well drafted and make powerful points. They have attracted a great many signatures from Labour Members. Which out of new clause 38, new clause 44, new clause 48 and the consequential amendment No. 96 does he intend to push to a vote later tonight?

Mr. Chaytor: None of them, for the reasons that I gave earlier.

Let me make my final point on new clause 16. When a school has been in difficulties, we must assume that its governing body has not been entirely effective—I do not want to make any stronger criticism than that. We know that many governing bodies throughout the land, of both primary and secondary schools, are not entirely effective. Is it not completely illogical that the decision about a transfer to trust status should be put in the hands of the people who were responsible for the decline of the school in the first place? We must return to the point that no one group of people should either have a veto, or be solely responsible for taking the decision. Such a decision could have an impact on many people and, perhaps, throughout a whole local authority because other schools would have to be involved. We must consider current parents and future parents with children coming through from primary schools. All voices must be heard, but a requirement to hold a ballot of parents in the school that is most directly and immediately involved should be paramount.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): It was a pleasant and unusual experience to speak on Second Reading, because I was able to support an education White Paper that had been put forward by a Labour Government and vote in favour of a Bill that largely, although not entirely, lived up to the expectations of that White Paper. It was certainly most unusual to find myself voting in a parliamentary majority of well over 300 for an education Bill because, regrettably, education has probably been one of the most divisive political topics that the House has contemplated over many years. I could not help reflecting on how much the Ministers who embarked on the process of public service reform in various areas during the late 1980s and early 1990s would have wished for such an emerging consensus on the principles that we were progressing. We would no doubt have got a lot further by now if we had not had many years of dispute and—when the Labour party first got back into office—retreat, before getting back more or less to where we started.

Despite the consensus, when the Bill went into Committee I was worried about how much the Government would retreat from what they had put forward. Of course, I welcome parliamentary discussion of a Bill's details. I always welcome it when Governments of any complexion make concessions in response to arguments that have persuaded them, but the process for this Bill was most unusual. Governments are normally most inclined to make changes to legislation when their usual parliamentary majority is squeezed, and they thus feel under pressure and in need of restoring support. However, the proposals that the Prime Minister wished to get through the House of Commons were supported by an overwhelming majority, but the Government were obliged to enter into horse-trading with, and to make concessions to, a significant minority of their Back Benchers, most of whom opposed the principles of reform as a whole.

After considering the amendments, I share the judgment of my right hon. and hon. Friends who speak from the Front Bench that the Government have not retreated too far and the essential virtues of the Bill remain, so I will continue to support it. However, new clause 33 shrieks of compromise and is a long way away from the Prime Minister's stated preference, which I take to be that set out in the White Paper—that local authorities should steadily move towards encompassing more of a commissioning role and stop thinking of themselves solely as the providers of services. But there we are—the proposal looks workable and no doubt the guidance and regulations could be amended by a future Government if it turns out to give rise to practical problems, so I am quite content.

As I have agreed with everything that has been said by Conservative Members, I will confine myself to making the point that induced me to participate in the debate. I urge the Minister and his colleagues to continue until the end of the Bill's legislative process to resist strongly the arguments in favour of ballots that are supposed to determine the extent of progress. I like to look forward on these subjects, so I will try not to burden the House too much with my past experience—but I think that I was one of the Ministers who were right in the middle of what I regard as the experiment of balloting on such changes that took place in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The experience was unhappy and divisive and did this country's education system no service, so I really do not think that we should go back to it.

Ian Stewart: Why is it that Members who argue against balloting do not have the eyes to see, or the ears to hear, that what was divisive was the principle of the proposals in the first place?

6.45 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It turned out that balloting was used as an excuse to try to wreck the principles underlying the reform, as I shall briefly explain. I will not repeat the principles on which the majority consensus in the House agrees. We are looking for a better form of localism in so far as structure is relevant to improving the quality of service, although I agree with all those who have expressed reservations about whether structural reform in itself can guarantee success. There are more important factors, but such reform is an important contributor nevertheless. We are moving back towards a situation in which we are striving to give people who deliver services at the local level more autonomy, discretion and control over what they can provide. We are trying to determine whether we can introduce a greater diversity of providers and have some competition among them, because we think that the process will thus become more consumer-oriented and, in the case of education, that parents will get used to the feeling that they are able to exercise more choice and real influence over the schools that they choose when they get into the education system.

Kenneth Baker—now my noble Friend Lord Baker—embarked us on such a process in 1988. However, that was part of a whole package of reform. We had grant-maintained schools and city technology colleges. In the health service we had NHS trusts and GP fundholding practices. We also had housing action trusts. All those things followed the same underlying principles of localising and moving towards more local discretion and a greater diversity of supply. We did not have ballots for most of those proposals—when we started out, we were not advocating local ballots for any of them. We had ballots on housing action trusts and grant-maintained schools, but my recollection is that that was not the intention of the Government in whom I served when we first put the proposals forward. I recall that we were defeated in both cases by the House of Lords, which insisted that when setting up housing action trusts, which took the management of housing out of local authority control—they achieved great improvements in many cases—or allowing schools to take up grant-maintained status, the matter should be subject to a ballot.

I am sure that the arguments that then appealed to their lordships were very similar to the reasonable-sounding arguments that have been put forward by the hon. Members for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) and for Selby (Mr. Grogan). The arguments are, "We're all democrats. Why can't we have an intelligent local discussion? If the reforms are so attractive, surely you'll find that the proposals will be carried forward by the people who will benefit from them. What are you frightened of?" Their lordships were attracted by that democratic appeal—such appeals usually attract them on any argument except that concerning their own status and composition—and we were rather unsure whether we had an adequate majority to overturn them, so away we went with ballots built into the proposals.

I have been involved in many such proposals at various stages. It was always my intention that NHS trusts should eventually become the norm in the health service, as they have. It was always my intention that grant-maintained schools should be the norm. However, we never imposed them and no one is suggesting that they should be imposed now. The whole point of introducing changes to the structure was that local people—governors and head teachers, in the case of schools—should put forward the proposals and volunteer for the change. The likelihood of success is increased enormously if that happens. The people who opted for NHS trust status, the GPs who wanted fundholding practices, and the governors and head teachers who opted for grant-maintained status were thereby committing themselves to making a success of the changes that they were introducing. They chose to do that not at the behest of the Conservative party or Whitehall, but because they believed that they could demonstrate to their communities that they could produce a better service if they did.

That is the basis on which we proceeded. NHS trusts spread like mad, and they were the norm when the Labour party came to power, which is why the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson) could not abolish NHS trust status when he was Secretary of State. If we had been in power for longer, GP fundholding would have become the norm. It would not have been reversed, so the Government would not have been obliged to return to it, as they are currently doing.

There were hundreds of grant-maintained schools, but they did not become the norm. All those ballots were bitter political and ideological battles. There were about 10 such schools when I assumed responsibility for education. By the time I had finished there were more than 100, and I could probably list all their names. We fought a battle from trench to trench across the country as those ballots took place. We should not be under any illusion. I heard the charm in the voices of left-wing members of the Labour party who asked what was wrong with a ballot—but head teachers and governing bodies required great courage to subject themselves to the ordeal, and it left some of them badly knocked about. Local authorities, including Conservative ones, defended their institutional interests by devoting large amounts of money and a great deal of officer time and effort to campaign against the proposals. They were supported by the teaching trade unions, which contributed a great deal of money. Local Labour organisations were wheeled into action to distribute leaflets, and everything became a political battle, in which we could not even agree on the facts.

In my county—but not in my constituency—the local authority mounted an elaborate and successful case. Contrary to the general argument that grant-maintained schools were unfairly financed, it persuaded parents that such schools would lose money, so there would be less money per pupil. There was a predictable effect on parents, who were not initially hostile, and had been attracted to the proposal when it was first made by the head teacher and governors, whom they knew.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) said, the public are instinctively conservative; that is one reason why we make such slow progress on these subjects. The secret of referendums and local ballots is that people always vote against change. Parents are naturally cautious about change, but they are prepared to listen to head teachers and governors explaining that they will do better under the proposals. However, they may discover that they have wished on their community a ferocious political battle, and there may be welter of warnings and even threats. Staff who make a commitment to support grant-maintained status worry about what will happen if they lose the ballot and find themselves back in the employ of the local authority, which expended a great deal of effort resisting change.

In some cases that battle was bitter and extreme, and we lost most of the ballots—[Interruption.] I am delighted to be told that we won most of them; we obviously began to improve as time went on, and subsequent Ministers assumed those responsibilities. Personally, however, I lost quite a lot. Whether those battles were won or lost, the process politicised and poisoned the atmosphere in schools, and it took a long time to recover. If anyone tries to seduce us with arguments about gentle local democracy giving more legitimacy to change, they are defying our experience in the early 1990s.

Mr. Andrew Turner rose—

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way to my hon. Friend, who was very much involved at that time.

Mr. Turner: I apologise for the vehemence with which I tried to set the record straight a moment ago. I do not feel particularly strongly about ballots, but is it not a regrettable fact that areas where people were confident were more likely to benefit from grant-maintained status? Areas that were likely to bamboozled by the forces of conservatism, whether those were represented by the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) or others, lost out.

Mr. Clarke: Yes, with the inevitable result that we tended to do better in middle-class, articulate areas that were familiar with arguments about management. However, as we all agree in the House, the need for educational reform is often strongest in deprived areas where people are not used to being involved.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): The right hon. and learned Gentleman has taken us on a historic tour of the battles over grant-maintained schools. Perhaps he can now bring that experience to bear on the new clause.

Mr. Clarke: I am not the only Member who, as well as discussing where we are now, enjoys reminiscing. You are quite right, Madam Deputy Speaker, to say that I have done enough of that—but it explains my belief that we should not go any further than the Government have gone with their highly elaborate and bureaucratic consultation. We should not allow arguments about ballots to make further progress, and the House of Lords should not be seduced by such arguments.

I agree with my hon. Friends the Members for Gainsborough and for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) that there is a danger that we will elevate all those things and give them symbolic significance, which they probably do not deserve. Nevertheless, this is an important step. We have experimented with city technology colleges, grant-maintained schools and city academies, and some of them have made substantial advances that they would not otherwise have achieved.

They also have a much wider effect on the education system as a whole, as they provide an example of what can be achieved and they help to spread best practice. I trust that that will happen in this case.

I hope that the spirit of consensus will be restored once the Bill completes its legislative passage. In a few years' time, people will wonder what the fuss was about, compared with 1988—to which I am forbidden to return. In 10 years' time, people will marvel that the House continued to resist the idea that parents could be trusted with much more control and influence. The provision of education services by a much wider diversity of providers will come to be regarded as the norm. I hope that this particular debate will be seen as the last thrashing about by a part of the House that has done absolutely nothing to contribute to educational reform or change. It is a small minority, whose members do not realise the urgency of reform or understand its importance for our society.

Helen Jones: After years of being referred to on my home turf as the hammer of the Trots, it is a pleasure to be referred to as a left winger by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). If my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) were in the Chamber, she would be similarly amused.

I wish to speak in support of new clause 16, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan), and to touch on a couple of new clauses that stand in my name. Some of the arguments against allowing parents to conduct a ballot on a major change in their child's school are extremely flawed. My hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) asked why parents should hold a ballot. The answer is set out in the White Paper, in which the Government say that they want a to move to a position where "the system as a whole is increasingly driven by parents and by choice."

If we want to give people a choice, we must accept the risk that they will make choices that we do not like. That is what democracy is about. Some of the suggestions that we have heard apply to any election. It was suggested, for example, that it is unfair to hold ballots, because a great deal of information is sent to people. Contentious views are expressed, and the process became politicised. So be it—we must trust parents to sift the information and make a decision. We trust them to do so in a general election, so why not trust them in a ballot on their school?

It was suggested, too, that parents of children who would soon leave the school would not have long-term interests in its future. That was answered very well by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor), who said that that is true of all electorates. I invite my hon. Friends and Opposition Members who subscribe to that view to apply it to the electorate voting in a general election. "You may not survive for the whole of this Parliament. You might pop your clogs very soon. You won't have a vested interest, so we'll not allow you to vote." One can say that about every electorate in every election.

New clause 16 does not preclude further ballots taking place. It does not preclude involving parents at feeder schools. It does not preclude other consultations. It states that if we are serious about parents being at the heart of the system and if we are serious about choice, we must allow them to make that choice. Some in the Chamber have come close to saying this afternoon—the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe almost said it in these terms—that they did not like ballots because they did not produce the results that they wanted. That is not a tenable position in a democracy, and it is a very dangerous road for politicians of any stripe to go down.

If the Government are convinced that trusts will be popular with parents and that that is the right way to go, let us have the argument and let parents have a say. There is nothing to fear from a real debate. If we do not accept the new clauses and amendments, let us consider the choice that we are offering to the parent of a child at a school whose nature and ethos is to change radically. I think of how I as a parent would react.

There are a number of reasons why a parent may disagree with the school's decision to become a trust. The parent may believe strongly in community schools, or may object to the people who will be coming in to run the trust, perhaps because the parent objects to their business values or does not like their religious ethos. There could be any number of reasons. That leaves the parent with the choice of leaving their child in a school with whose ethos they fundamentally disagree, or disrupting the child's education by moving them. We give them that choice without letting them have any real say in a ballot on the school's future. That is not a tenable position.

We must tell parents that we trust them to read the information, consider the contending arguments and have their say in a ballot. If we do not, we are implicitly saying that we do not think parents are bright enough to determine the outcome or to decide among all the contending groups. That is nonsensical.

Ann Winterton: In spite of her opposition to the grant-maintained school example, does the hon. Lady agree that ballots in the schools that became grant-maintained strengthened those schools because they had a head teacher who gave a lead—[Interruption.] More money, possibly, but that was not the only reason. Does she agree that those schools had a head teacher who was go-ahead, and a supportive and excellent governing body, who knew that they were supported by the body of parents?

Helen Jones: In any school the support of parents is needed. The school will not work properly if it cannot carry the parents with it. I take strong exception to what was said earlier. The implication was that because parents in working class communities voted against grant-maintained schools, they were not au fait with the arguments. In my experience, they were. They simply had a particular view of how they wanted the schools in their community to be organised.

Tom Levitt: I hope that those listening to the debate are not unintentionally misled by something that my hon. Friend just said. She spoke about parents perhaps being concerned about the religious ethos or the business values of a trust, but the trust cannot be a religious organisation and must be a charity, so that would not arise. Similarly, she spoke about the ballot making a decision. That is not what new clause 16 says, and I do not think it is what my hon. Friend intended.

Helen Jones: I think that my hon. Friend misunderstands the position on trusts. He is right that the trust will be a charity, but it quite possible for it to be a charity and to have behind it a business organisation or a religious organisation. One of my great concerns about the setting up of trusts has been all along—I said it on Second Reading—that there are fundamentalist organisations waiting in the wings to set up charitable arms in order to run trust schools. As a parent I have a right to say whether I think that is appropriate for my child, and every other parent has a right to have their say on that as well.

Ms Diana R. Johnson: My hon. Friend mentioned general elections and local authority elections, where the electorate is clearly defined by the electoral register. My concern about ballots is that they involve the parents of children who currently attend the school. The school belongs to the community, not just the present parents. I worry about how it would be possible to ballot opinion in the community effectively.

Helen Jones: The point was well made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North. Clearly, there is a register of parents whose children attend a particular school. That does not preclude consultation with other members of the community. If my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson) is concerned about making sure that the community is involved in trust schools, I hope she will support the amendments to increase the percentage that a local authority can nominate to trust schools. One cannot argue both ways, though one can try.

I shall deal briefly with amendment No. 7 in my name. I have attempted to clarify what we mean by diversity. Clause 2 presents a problem. Local authorities have a duty to promote diversity. Those on the Front Bench say that it is not their intention to force trusts on anybody. I accept their assurance on that, but if we define diversity only in terms of structures, we have a problem when it comes to making decisions on new schools. My amendment, which I think accords with what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said earlier, enables a local authority to discharge its duty to promote diversity in secondary schools by encouraging a range of specialist provision in those schools. I think that is the right way to go.

We have heard repeatedly in the debate that what makes a good school is the head and the teachers in that school, rather than the structure, and that what makes for diversity and gives real choices to our young people are the different kinds of specialism on offer and the different kinds of ethos of a school, not simply the structure under which it is set up. If it is true, as my right hon. Friend said earlier from the Front Bench—if I understood him correctly—that the Government want diversity to be seen in those terms, why will they not write that into the Bill? My amendment seems uncontentious and in accord with what the Secretary of State said. He touched on the regulations that would be introduced, but that requires a leap of faith, because we have not seen them.

I hope that when the Minister sums up, we will hear from him about how the Government intend to draft the regulations on diversity. It is vital that when we talk about a range of schools, we are talking about a range of options on offer to our young people—specialisms in languages, arts and so on. We must allow them a real choice. There can be many different structures but still no real choice. Choice and diversity are not the same thing, though they are often confused.

Paul Farrelly: On choice, I hope that my hon. Friend will also speak to amendments Nos. 9, 10 and 11, which are in her name. It seems odd that a school that has all that choice can choose to have a majority of trustees from a foundation, but it cannot choose to have more than 20 per cent. LEA-appointed governors. My hon. Friend's amendment does not state that that figure must be 50 per cent. It states that the number should not exceed 50 per cent., so it gives more choice than a restriction to 20 per cent.

Helen Jones: I will come on to that matter in a moment.

I may wish to test the opinion of the House on the amendment on diversity—I understand that a vote would happen tomorrow—depending on the response from Ministers, whom I hope will reassure me that the Government will take diversity into account.

Amendments Nos. 9 to 11 relate to the maximum percentage of members on a foundation nominated by a local authority. We heard earlier that the Government will resist those amendments because they believe that trusts should be treated in the same way as companies that include a local authority. I contend that that is exactly the wrong model to apply to a school, because if a school is to succeed, it needs to be involved in a partnership. If we want a partnership, we should give people the opportunity to form real partnerships, where those from trusts, the local authority and others have the chance to be equally represented, which may well be a model that many schools want to adopt.

If that is not possible, it will raise a number of problems. The Government have said that they want trusts to be part of the local family of schools, but much of what is now done in schools and much of what we want to do in the future depends on co-operation between different bodies. The 14-to-19 agenda, "Every Child Matters", the youth service White Paper and the extended schools programme depend not only on schools themselves, but on interaction between schools and other services run by local authorities.

It may well be that some schools think it appropriate to have a more equal partnership on their governing bodies. I think that we should allow them to make that choice, if they so wish. That is particularly true in the case of local authorities, which may want to federate all their schools into one foundation. Are we saying that if that were to happen, local authority nominees can hold only 20 per cent. of the positions? In my view, that would be a disincentive to taking such an approach, rather than an incentive.

The Select Committee also pointed out that when local authorities have to hand over their schools to another body to run, it is difficult for them to take long-term decisions on investment, because they have received no assurance that they will have a stake in those schools in the future. I think that it would be much better for local authorities to have that stake, which would encourage them to undertake long-term financial planning.

I support the amendments on ballots and hope that I will hear more from Ministers about my other amendments. Some of the comments that we have heard today are worrying in a democracy, particularly when we are discussing ballots. If one is a democratic politician, one needs to trust the electorate and to accept that people will sometimes make decisions that one does not like and with which one disagrees. That is democracy, and when the amendment on ballots is moved tonight, I hope that my hon. Friends will bear those points in mind.

Mr. Rob Wilson: It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones), or perhaps she should be styled, "Hammer of the Trots." I could have done with her help earlier in the week, because I have had a nasty stomach bug myself, which was probably brought on by 55 hours in Standing Committee. Seriously, it is always a pleasure to follow such a passionate debater, and she always makes a great contribution to education debates.

I want to discuss new clauses 61 and 62 and amendment No. 111, which stand in my name. On new clause 61, like Conservative Front Benchers, I am keen to hold the Government to their original White Paper promises. I hope that Labour Members remember the White Paper—I see that quite a few of them would like to forget it—which states that the schools commissioner will "act as a national champion for the development of trust schools and to work with potential trusts."

The Government clearly saw the schools commissioner's role as promoting trust schools and acting as their champion. In my view, that is a worthy endeavour and one that I fully support, particularly if one considers the educational forces ranged against the success and spread of trust schools. Indeed, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) has outlined some of the forces that are ranged against the success and spread of trust schools.

Evidence taken by the Education and Skills Committee on the White Paper demonstrated to me the considerable clout of the educational establishment. Its knee-jerk response is to oppose anything that might weaken its iron grip on what happens in schools or that increases its accountability to parents and children. I was thoroughly disheartened by some of the witnesses, who utterly failed to have an open mind about the progress and change that the White Paper and Bill could bring. Many of them simply see trust schools and the commissioner's role as a threat to the status quo, which would be a reasonable or even worthy position, if the status quo had not failed so many of our children. My hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) has pointed out that 23 per cent. of schools are failing, which involves 1 million children, and that a similar percentage of schools are coasting.

The local education authorities and unions that we saw in the Education and Skills Committee were a particular disappointment, and it is likely that both will do all in their power to block progress to reforming and widening choice and diversity. We must not allow them to prevail, which is why I included a section in the Select Committee minority report on the White Paper calling on the Government to allow the schools commissioner to promote trust schools. As hon. Members will see from new clause 62, I believe that we must go further against the powerful educational forces ranged against the success of trust schools.

7.15 pm

I have not changed my view on the schools commissioner, and I am delighted that Conservative Front Benchers are thinking along similar lines. However, we may need to do more in government than appoint a single champion if trust schools are to succeed. I am therefore delighted that Conservative Front Benchers have tabled new clauses 21, 56, 57 and 58, which support the original thrust of the White Paper and should have been introduced by the Government. They would support and encourage a state-run independent school system. That was Lord Adonis's original vision, which the Prime Minister clearly endorsed in the foreword to the White Paper:

"Our aim is the creation of a system of independent non-fee paying state schools".

That vision should not have been watered down, as the original approach in the White Paper would quickly have destroyed the appalling comprehensive system with which this country has been saddled for far too long. The watering down will mean that it will take longer to change that system, but I hope that the result will be the same. I also hope that Conservative Front Benchers push some of the new clauses to a vote tonight.

As I have said, we might require more than a champion to ensure that trust schools take root and flourish, as the odds are stacked against them. New clause 62 attempts to redress the balance with the LEAs and unions, which will do all that they can to stop trust schools succeeding and multiplying. The opposition from those groups could be formal or informal, like the opposition to grant-maintained schools. For example, we all know how some governing bodies are heavily influenced by LEA appointees—councillors and others who have similar objectives and motives.

If there are schools that are coasting or that are providing unsatisfactory education to pupils, why should not the Secretary of State order governing bodies to acquire foundation status? That process would not have to be undertaken in one school at a time. After bedding in, if the trusts are working, the Secretary of State may want to cut a swathe through underperforming schools. Trust schools would then largely replace bog standard comprehensive schools, and schools independent of the LEA would largely replace community schools. I want to see trust schools perform as it is hoped they will. There is every prospect that they will perform well, and we should therefore encourage and support them on their way.

Anne Snelgrove: Does the hon. Gentleman consider that the schools in the Reading authority—Kendrick, St. John's, Caversham, All Saints and Churchend—that received outstanding Ofsted reports in the 2005-06 school year are bog standard? I do not think so. His LEA has worked very hard to improve all those schools in order to reach that level.

Mr. Wilson: I think that the hon. Lady should do her homework, as reciting grammar schools in support of her case is probably not the most intelligent thing for a Labour Member to do. I will certainly encourage and support schools in my constituency in setting up trust schools and improving choice and diversity among schools open to all pupils. Clause 56 will stop poor performing and backward-looking LEAs such as Reading from using surplus places as an excuse to prevent good schools from expanding or new schools coming into an area.

Finally, I turn to my amendment No. 111. New clause 33 sets out the conditions that an LEA must meet if the Secretary of State is not to veto its proposals for a new community school. Councils have the right to enter competitions to open a new community school, but they have to earn that right. Even those modest proposals are being opposed by the Local Government Association, along with Labour rebels and unions. I would rather that the Government had stuck to their original White Paper commitment that LEAs will be "commissioners rather than providers of education."

That splitting of responsibility, which gives LEAs a role to champion parents and promote choice, was right when the White Paper was launched, and it is right now. I know that Labour attack dogs have needed to be thrown a bone, but weakening the commissioner-provider split in responsibility was not the right one to throw. The Secretary of State should accept new clause 57, which would restore the Bill to the position of the White Paper, but he has already said that he will reject it. The only saving grace is that the Secretary of State will have a veto, which at least tries to retain the integrity of Lord Adonis' original thinking—after all, that is the essence of the Bill. I certainly cannot foresee any circumstances in which a new community school will be agreed by a Conservative Secretary of State—nor, I hope, a Labour one.

If the Government were to accept my amendment, which would reinforce their new clause 33, that would go some way towards ensuring that there is little likelihood of a new community school being set up. That would allow LEAs to focus on their tasks of promoting choice and diversity, mapping out what is needed in their area, ensuring that sufficient places are available, focusing efforts on school improvement partners, and running the competitions for new and replacement schools. Schools could then manage and run themselves while LEAs got on with less influential administration matters, which would mean that they were unable to damage our children's educational prospects as they have previously.

I believe that that is what the Government ultimately want to achieve, but cannot say so as it will upset too many of their core supporters, not least a sizeable number of Labour MPs. However, the Government do want an end to a bog standard comprehensive education system, just as much as Conservative Members do. That is what they want, and that is what they will ultimately get.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Wilson: I am just finishing.

However, the Government may wish to dress it up for the rebels and the educational establishment.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman clearly does not intend to give way.

Mr. Wilson: I wish the Bill every success.

Jon Trickett: I want to remind the House of precisely what happens when a community school becomes a trust and why it is so important that we agree to the new clauses on ballots, particularly new clause 23, which stands in my name.

When a governing body decides that a community school should become a trust, it is effectively a one-way street with no way back; it remains an irreversible decision in perpetuity. That is spelled out in clause 17. When a governing body decides that a community school should become a trust school—or a foundation school, as it is described in the Bill—the school that is established is removed from the local authority family in terms of admissions. As a result, a marketplace will begin to exist. That is the fundamental philosophical underpinning of the Bill. Parents and children will be turned into consumers as opposed to citizens in an active democracy.

The foundation school will determine its own ethos and, to some extent, curriculum. That again means moving away from the local authority family. Competition will develop between schools for those parents who are more mobile than others. A marketplace will come into existence and some schools will be seen to be successful while others fail. A discourse will come about whereby we begin to talk about mergers and acquisitions, profitable schools, failing schools and bankrupt schools. The language and practices of the stock exchange and the marketplace will enter into our state education provision. That is Labour Members' fundamental objection to this operation. It will be a socially, ethnically and religiously divisive process whereby some schools and some generations of children, particularly from working class communities, will be left in schools that are destined to perish. I should have thought that that was anathema to any Labour education principle.

The assets—property, buildings, land and playing fields—that lay within the remit of the local authority will be removed from it and go into the foundation. It may interest Members who have not studied the Bill to know that local authority duties are covered in six lines which simply say that the local authority will promote diversity and parental choice, while 27 pages are to do with assets, property and buildings. That tells one about the priorities that lie behind the Bill. Frankly, it is about asset disposal and a form of privatisation. That is a further reason why I believe that why we should support amendments that weaken it and reject it on Third Reading.

As I said, the process of moving from a community school or comprehensive to a foundation school is a one-way street with no way back. Indeed, the Bill expressly forbids the possibility that a trust, once established, can ever revert to being a community school. The Secretary of State accepted that in his impressive maiden speech in that role. Let us reflect on that irreversible process and how it is produced. How will a community school become a trust, or foundation, school? In the final analysis, it will be done by a simple majority vote of those governors present. I could have asked the Secretary of State what he thinks is the quorum for a governing body of a comprehensive, but I did not want to set him that test in case he did not know the answer. In fact, a third of the governing body comprises a quorum. It is therefore possible—almost probable—that in a governing body of, say, 24 people, with a quorum of eight, five governors could dispose of a comprehensive school that has served the community for 10, 20 or 30 years.

I accept that the Bill provides for obligations to consult but, ultimately, the decision is for the governing body, by simple majority. It is wholly inappropriate to allow five members out of a governing body of 24 to make an irreversible decision to put land and property outwith local authority use and take on an admissions policy in perpetuity to determine the ethos and character of the school. The least that we can ask from the Secretary of State is for a parental ballot so that it can be determined whether the 2,000 or probably more parents with children at the school want that irreversible process to begin. With all deference to the Secretary of State, five members of my hypothetical governing body could not outweigh the votes of thousands of parents.

7.30 pm

What arguments have been used this afternoon against holding such a ballot? The Opposition's arguments have been a disgrace. I do not know if all my hon. Friends were present to hear it said that, if a ballot were held, groups of left-wing people might come together and argue the case. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), who is no longer in his place, developed another argument, which was that most parents would vote for the status quo, not many ballots would be won and we should not therefore hold them. There was an anarchist slogan, "If voting changed anything, they'd abolish it." That argument has been reversed this afternoon. It was argued that, because parents would vote for a community school in a proper, organic relationship with its community rather than an ideological experiment in education, ballots should not be held. That argument is in Hansard for all to see.

Mr. Gibb: Of course, 1,100 ballots were won for the grant-maintained system. We oppose ballots for foundation schools because they will drive away many potential funders of trusts who do not want to engage in a highly politicised local campaign. They simply want to benefit schools and raise the standard of education.

Jon Trickett: The hon. Gentleman had another argument. He claimed that a ballot was divisive and would politicise the process. I shall deal with that shortly. However, if the substance of his argument is that we should be afraid of giving parents a choice in case the vested private interest, charitable interest or religious sect that may take over their school will be horrified at the prospect, that is fallacious. If those interests are so afraid of parents expressing a view about their appropriateness to govern the school, why on earth should we, as legislators, have any faith in their capacity to manage a school?

Mr. Gibb: I have every confidence that the ballots would be won. That is why 1,100 ballots were won in the process towards grant-maintained status. We are worried that the people who fund the charitable trusts do not want to engage in a campaign. It is not that they fear the result, but that they do not want to go through the process of having to engage in a highly politicised campaign that will drive away many charitable trusts.

Jon Trickett: If I understand the hon. Gentleman correctly, we should either keep those organisations in the dark, in some obscure room, so that a ballot can take place, or there cannot be a ballot because they have to be brought into the full light of day. If those private interests, sometimes backed by profit-making organisations, are so afraid of the light of day and holding a debate about their character and what they will bring to the school, why should we have any confidence in their capacity to govern the school?

Ian Stewart: My hon. Friend should not to listen to the siren voices on the other side of the Chamber who claim a great victory for 1,100 ballots for grant-maintained schools. There were many thousands of schools and the only reason why 1,100 voted for grant-maintained status was the previous Conservative Government's use of a money bribe.

Jon Trickett: My hon. Friend makes the point and I do not need to add to it.

Other arguments have been presented against democracy and the ballots. It has been claimed that democracy is divisive, expensive and, worst of all, bureaucratic. I am ashamed to say that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State fell—I am sure by accident—into using some of those arguments. I am sure that he has a stronger case than the one that we heard. However, all those arguments were used against working men having the vote in the 19th century and against women having it in the 20th century. None of them stacks up in the 21st century, which must be about democracy, citizenship and devolution of power.

Helen Jones: One of the arguments against giving women the vote was that they were incapable of understanding the issues. That is exactly the argument that has been used about parents today.

Jon Trickett: Indeed. The same arguments were used to refute arguments in this place for the abolition of slavery.

Paul Farrelly: I am not sitting with my hon. Friend because I do not want to be called left-wing, which I have been labelled for the first time tonight. Labour Members have dealt with the objections about parents and the ballot. If the new clauses are viewed as establishing the principle of the ballot, it is clearly open to the Government to table amendments in the other place. However, worries have been expressed about the composition of governing bodies, and especially about whether parents are elected or co-opted governors. The Secretary of State has introduced a safeguard of 33 per cent., but when local authorities and properly independent governors are limited to 20 per cent, the safeguard may not be enough, especially in a case in which a trust in a failing school tries to cling on and manipulate matters so as not to admit failure. A ballot is an important safeguard of making the right choice in the first place.

Jon Trickett: Of course. My hon. Friend makes an important point. The three new clauses on ballots allow the Secretary of State to draw up regulations. If he was minded to accept the overwhelming arguments in favour of democracy, it is in his power to say so in his reply or reflect upon it and have amendments tabled in another place.

I feel that a spirit haunts the Chamber—that of the late, great right honourable Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). I can imagine the expression on his face when he realised that there was another case of Members of both Front Benches agreeing. His face was a picture whenever that happened. He would say that when Members of both Front Benches worked together. When their views coalesce around the idea of refusing democratic principles, one has to worry.

"Something is rotten in the state of Denmark"

Meg Hillier: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Jon Trickett: I shall not give way to a Member who has just come in.

All the arguments for citizens rather than consumers and for strategic planning rather than marketised distribution of services are arguments for a modern, social democratic state.

I urge all my hon. Friends to use their informed judgment on this matter. Many of them have sat here for hours making loyal interventions, but I would ask them to think about the arguments that have been made. The case against ballots has not been made. For once, for God's sake, vote with your conscience.

Tom Levitt: The conventions of the House quite rightly allow that, in a debate on Report, those who have tabled amendments are called to speak first in the Back-Bench debate. I am sure that that is the only reason why we are four hours into the debate before the first speaker who is not supporting any of the amendments has been called. I accept that convention, but I think that it is worth putting that on record.

Jon Trickett: I tabled new clauses 17 and 23, and that is why I was called to speak.

Tom Levitt: That was exactly my point. I was not arguing against the convention. It is quite right that the people who have tabled amendments should speak first. I was simply explaining why it had taken four hours to call someone who had not tabled an amendment. So I am not getting at my hon. Friend —not yet.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the intervention made on him by the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) was pretty fatuous. The hon. Gentleman said that the trust backers would not want a ballot because they would not want to be involved in a campaign. But trusts do not have to have funds. In fact, we do not anticipate that they would have them, so that argument does not arise.

Equally, the scenario that my hon. Friend described for half his speech about five governors making an irrevocable decision about the future of a school could not arise either. One of the things that many Labour Members have been doing—either front of house or backstage—over the past few weeks is to try to get back into the Bill greater authority and responsibility for the local education authorities. And one provision that we have got back into it is that the local authority would have to decide whether the consultation had been legitimate and genuine. I cannot imagine any local authority in the country accepting as legitimate or genuine the scenario that my hon. Friend has been describing. It would therefore be ruled out. My hon. Friend is not listening to me, but he can read what I have said in Hansard tomorrow.

I want to tackle the issue of ballots head on. Contrary to the impression that some hon. Members have given, the Bill will not ban ballots. It will not prevent schools or governing bodies from holding ballots if they wish to do so. Nor does it say that, if they do hold ballots, they should organise them in a particular way. I remember only one such ballot being held. There was only one ballot on a grant-maintained school in my constituency, and only one primary school in my constituency became grant maintained. The ballot had a majority of one. That was one of the last schools to become grant maintained so, fortunately, it had one of the shortest careers as a GM school. However, the ballot was binding, and it was carried by a majority of one parent, making that school become grant maintained. That could not happen under the provisions of the Bill, because the local authority will now have a veto if it does not consider the ballot to have been properly conducted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Sir Peter Soulsby) told us in an intervention that a ballot would protect us from the organisations with the most money, the most eloquence and the most force dominating the debate. That could not possibly happen in a ballot, could it? Yes, of course it could, and it happened in GM ballots time after time.

Helen Jones: My hon. Friend is missing the point that the new clauses include a power for the Secretary of State to make regulations on ballots. It would therefore be possible for the Secretary of State to regulate the amount of spending and the amount of material that could be put out.

Tom Levitt: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention.

Sir Peter Soulsby: I think that my hon. Friend has unintentionally misrepresented the point that I was trying to make earlier. I said that, without ballots, it is possible—as I have seen in an academy in my constituency—to employ very well paid professional consultants to carry out consultations. My point was that that kind of so-called consultation is no more than a selling job, and that, when important decisions are taken about the educational structure that will govern the schools in which our children are educated, we want properly informed debate and, at the end of the process, a vote.

Tom Levitt: Apart from that last clause, I accept the point that my hon. Friend has made. Indeed, I also accept the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) made earlier. However, their points do not detract from my argument, because schools considering trust status could still hold ballots if they so wished.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North mentioned regulations. In a sense, that is where the problem arises. In an earlier intervention, I asked who should be balloted. There seems to be consensus that it should be the parents of the children currently in the school, because that is the easiest way of doing it. It is not necessarily the right way, but it is the easiest. So the ballot would include the parents of children who were just about to leave, yet it would exclude the parents of children just about to join the school. Why not include the parents of children at the feeder schools? Why not include the children at the school in the consultation, particularly if it were a secondary school? Why not include all the stakeholders in the education system? In my constituency, every secondary school is already a specialist school, and there are partners—in some cases private sector partners—to be considered as well. Their opinion also needs to be taken on board.

However, at the end of the day, under the Bill, it will be the local authority that decides whether the consultation was appropriate and valid, and whether the conclusions drawn by the governors were consistent with the process and content of the consultation that has taken place.

David Taylor: I am listening with interest to the points that my hon. Friend is making. Is he about to refute the fundamental principle of the new clauses, and to describe why the requirement for a ballot—and for the governing body to observe its result—is so fatally flawed?

Tom Levitt: I have explained why a ballot should not be binding. As I understand it, new clause 16 does not require the ballot to be binding. There are many types of ballot that could be used, to ballot different stakeholder groups and so on, but whatever type of consultation is used, the local authority will have an obligation to decide that it has been demonstrably valid, inclusive and appropriate.

Some of us have fought long and hard, behind the scenes as well as in front, to re-establish the role of local authorities in the Bill, in a way that it was not on Second Reading. I think that we have done a good job, and that Ministers have listened and been sympathetic. A requirement that ballots should be binding flies in the face of that progress because it would undermine the role of the local authority envisaged in the Bill. It would give the local authority less power to implement the obligations that the Bill places on it to improve schools, which is its prime function. If the local authority were cut out of that process, as the amendment proposes, the procedure would simply not be worth doing.

I remind colleagues on the Labour Benches that we have received a letter today from the Labour group of the Local Government Association, which says:

> "We are therefore prepared to recommend support for Third Reading of a Bill which now goes a long way to meet our shared objectives...There is too much of value to lose if the Bill does not gain a Third Reading."

That letter does not advocate support for any particular amendments that have been tabled. I urge Members to get behind the Bill. It is a far better Bill than it was, so let us ensure that it gets on to the statute book without any unnecessary division.

Barbara Keeley: Following the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt), I want to speak briefly against the proposals to make parental ballots compulsory.

The method of consulting stakeholders, including parents, should be decided locally, subject to the guidance of the Secretary of State or the regulations described in clause 8. I say that from my experience as the council cabinet member with responsibility for education in Trafford. The time that I served in that capacity led me to understand that the range of those who should be involved in the establishment or change of status of a school is necessarily wide. Of the local schools, the feeder schools especially have a key role, and leaving them out of the decision making would not be appropriate. As for schools in nearby local authority areas, Trafford was particularly affected by children coming in from Manchester and Salford. Sometimes the borders were such that a catchment area of a quarter or half a mile took one into Manchester or Salford. The effects of such boundaries are an important consideration. Organisations such as dioceses, learning and skills councils, FE colleges and child care organisations, as were mentioned earlier, all have a role to play, especially as schools develop their functions. They ought to be consulted and weight should be attached to their views.

It is not right that a parental ballot should be either compulsory or the major deciding factor. That could leave the development of a school open to campaigns by small but vocal groups. Other Members have reflected on the fact that parents have an interest in a school only for the period that their child is at the school. In response to the trust model in the Bill, the National Confederation of Parent Teacher Associations stated:

> "Ask any parent to provide the definition of a Trust school and most probably won't be able to tell you. It's not that they aren't interested, but that they see their children's education as the product of individual schools and/or teachers. On the other hand, most would probably say that they would like schools to have more control and authority. This is because parents want their child to receive an education which is tailored to meet their individual needs."

It continued:

"Therefore, parents must instinctively welcome the notion of a Trust school. However, this would need to be weighed against their concern about further fundamental change within the education system and another cohort of children—their children—being the guinea pigs".

Having spent several years as a local education authority governor in both a primary and secondary school, I always found that the parent governors with whom I worked tended to have that narrow focus. That is not appropriate. It is not a wide enough body of people to make a decision about a change of status. The focus of that governing body is too short-term to take a long-term decision about a change in a family of schools. Those who should be involved in such decisions include affected feeder schools, schools in neighbouring authorities, dioceses, FE colleges and staff. They should all have a say, because the decision is important to all of them.

As for the main thrust of school changes, young people aged 11 to 16 cannot wait, yet there has been much debate about process and things that would take many months to implement. On behalf of those young people, and particularly the children in my constituency, I want to see improvement from which they can benefit start soon. One high school in my constituency achieved GCSE pass rates this year of 74 per cent. Another school in my constituency, however, has been in special measures, and achieved a pass rate of only 20 per cent. I want to close that gap. I want to see improved and better-performing secondary schools in my constituency and generally.

With other Labour Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan), I recently visited schools in Stockholm. We visited a municipal school and a free school. The latter is similar to a foundation or trust school as defined in the Bill. We felt—and I am sure that most Members would agree—that both schools seemed to work well. The young people at both schools were confident and enjoying their schools. The schools were different, however, and would probably suit different types of children. Stockholm's council cabinet member, in reply to our questions, said that the Social Democrats there would not change back from the system of free schools, as they had brought innovation and choice, which had caused improvements in the municipal schools in response.

We need the possibility of innovation and improvement in our secondary schools. That must be accompanied by wide consultation, which will develop the consensus required. That is the way forward.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): As I have listened to the debate, I have felt like an outsider intruding on a family row. The debate has really been between the two warring factions of the family on the Labour Benches.

However, while the Bill will not apply to Northern Ireland, and Northern Ireland has not had trust schools, it has had a body of schools with some degree of autonomy—voluntary grammar schools. Those have been subject to some local control, with the greatest control resting with the boards of governors and the headmasters who run those schools. That flexibility has been beneficial in making decisions. On Second Reading, the Democratic Unionist party supported the Government in their aim to increase the degree of diversity and autonomy where schools decided that they wished to have that. I am pleased that the Prime Minister and the Government have not been influenced by the forces on their Back Benches who wish to see substantial changes made to the Bill.

As the debate has progressed, it has become clear that the argument about the local ballot has really been an argument about how those who know that they are likely to lose today's debate can find some way of thwarting the main elements of the Bill when it is implemented locally. The ballot is seen to be the means by which that will be done. [HON. MEMBERS: "It is called democracy."] Hon. Members may say that, but in what system of democracy would such fundamental change, especially that which is designed to improve the quality of education for youngsters and have a dramatic impact on their lives, be subject to such a veto? Let us not forget that the argument about the ballot is really about placing a veto in the hands of one narrowly defined group of stakeholders—the parents of youngsters currently at the school. That is what would happen were the new clause to be accepted. Such a small group of people should not be handed the right to exercise a veto on something that would lead to such fundamental and, I believe, advantageous change.

As some Members have pointed out, should not parents of children who might attend the school in future be involved? Should not parents of children who have not currently chosen the school but who might choose it were there a change of status also be involved? Why are they excluded? Why should we focus on such a narrow group of people and give them a veto? The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) did not tell us the reason why a veto should be given to people to change the nature of a school when the same veto would not be given to people on a more dramatic decision such as the closure of an unsustainable school. We would not dream of giving parents that veto, and it would not be practical to do so. However, those Members who tabled the amendments say that a veto should be given on a decision much less fundamental than that.

Paul Farrelly: The hon. Gentleman is speaking from long experience of wielding a veto in Northern Ireland. Does he agree that if the principle of a ballot of parents—which is not perfect, for many of the reasons that have been advanced—is conceded, it is open to the Government to table further amendments in the other place that address all the consultees that my hon. Friend the Member for Worsley (Barbara Keeley) has mentioned? That would infinitely improve the process.

Sammy Wilson: According to my understanding of the Bill, parents will have the right to be consulted, as will others. The result of all that consultation must be collated, and a final decision must then be made. First, it must be established that a proper consultation process has been undertaken. Secondly, it must be established that all the arguments have been weighed up. After that, the change can be effected. In my view, that constitutes a much better safeguard than a provision allowing one narrow stakeholder group to have the right of veto.

My second point was made earlier by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). This will become a battleground. I do not want to intrude on another family embarrassment for the Labour party, but already, whether we like it or not, difficulties will have arisen for people who would have made money available for academies and the like. Those backers will already be reluctant to support some of the trust schools. Why should we place yet another barrier in their path, in the form of a fight over whether the status of schools should be changed?

If this is indeed a good change, I want as few barriers as possible to be placed in the way of it. I think that the ballot would be divisive. Whether we like it or not, there are substantial forces ranged against the change. As usual, the teachers unions are on the wrong side of the argument. Local authorities, who will have a stake in the issue, will take a particular view. The argument will tend to be one-sided in many areas, and much more resources will be available to those who do not want change. Many of those who wish to engage in the foundation system will simply want to improve youngsters' education, rather than becoming involved in a political debate or a political fight.

David Taylor: Can the hon. Gentleman explain why the views of the great and the good on the governing bodies should override hundreds, perhaps thousands, of views expressed by parents? I used to chair the governing body of a large school before I became an MP. The views of 1,600 students and possibly 3,000 parents might provide an overwhelming feedback on a trust school application, but it might be ignored just as though they were bolshie police authorities that did not want to be reorganised.

Sammy Wilson: That is an exaggeration, for the simple reason that the views of parents must be collected. The governing body's views will of course carry some weight as well, but, as has been said, the local authority will also be able to adjudicate, and to decide whether the balance of the argument has been correct. There is already a safeguard. Ultimately, however, if a governing body has identified deficiencies in a school that it has not been able to remedy with the existing resources and within the existing structure, of course it should have a large say in whether there should be a move to a new arrangement that could solve the school's difficulties.

Earlier, we heard the enticing argument that a ballot somehow conferred a veneer of respectability and allowed an element of democracy to become involved. I do not believe that that will apply in this case. I do not believe that democratic rights should be handed to one particular group. For that reason, we shall be voting with the Government on the Bill.

Alan Johnson: I shall be brief. We have had a vigorous and extremely interesting debate on an important group of new clauses and amendments. I believe that we have established a satisfactory procedure for community schools. I hope that my points about diversity, which have been written on to the record and will be in regulations, will satisfy Members—including my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones), who I know feels strongly about the issue.

The hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) raised some important points about safeguards. She said that the nine safeguards that I had listed were not in the Bill. Some are not in the Bill, but they are in statutory guidance and in regulations, which makes them very important. Four of them are in the Bill. The community cohesion provision will be there, if our new clause is carried. The provision for trust schools to be maintained schools is already there. The provision for trustees not to be involved in inappropriate activities is in statutory guidance, and the fact that trusts are incorporated charities, with all the safeguards that that involves, is in the Bill.

The hon. Lady mentioned governors, and in particular, Criminal Records Bureau checks. Certain categories of person are disqualified from being school governors and will be disqualified from being trustees—for instance, those who have been banned from working with children or young persons—and enhanced checks will apply in all those cases.

Let me now deal with what has become the central issue—ballots. My hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) made an entertaining and good-natured speech about that. I believe that it has been blown up out of all proportion to the issue with which I was trying to deal when I tabled our new clauses and amendments. Talk about Wilberforce and slavery and women's suffrage suggests that we have gone just a teeny bit over the top.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) is not present, but in an intervention earlier he paraphrased Neil Kinnock, saying that a Labour Secretary of State would disgracefully overrule an elected local authority by referring matters to the schools commissioner. That will not happen: nothing will be referred to the schools commissioner. While we are on the subject, let me add that local authorities will take on new powers as a result of the Bill. When the schools organisation committee, which currently makes a number of decisions, is disbanded, those decisions will be made by the local authority.

The main issue, however, is whether in all circumstances trusts must ballot parents, and whether that is really central to the democratic process. Unlike Opposition Members, I do not argue that it will be open to left-wing groups to influence debate. My argument is perfectly rational: it is for the local governing body to consult. It must ensure that the consultation is fair, and the local authority will have a role in ensuring that it has been conducted properly and has reflected the views expressed. It may or may not decide to do that by means of a ballot.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Jon Trickett) made an interesting speech. He is entitled to his own views but, as an American politician once said, he is not entitled to his own facts. He said that trust status was irreversible. It is not. As I said at the outset, a minority—one third of the governors—can trigger the process of pulling out. Thereafter, it will be up to the other two thirds whether to vote in favour of retaining trust status.

Jon Trickett: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Alan Johnson: I will in a moment.

Part of my hon. Friend's argument is that trusts are intrinsically evil and a terrible thing. On the basis of that view, he said that they would have their own admissions authority—that, indeed, they would be their own admissions authority. It is a fact that 30 per cent. of comprehensive schools are their own admissions authority. Being their own admissions authority means that the schools are part of the local authority family of schools. They comply with the national curriculum, they discuss and are part of the admissions forum, and they must apply all the rules that are not just in the Bill but in regulations—no selection, no interviews and so forth.

Jon Trickett: If my right hon. Friend will not accept my facts, will he accept those in the Bill? Clause 17(4) states:

"None of the following alterations may be made to a maintained school".

Subsection (c) lists one of those alterations, which is:

"any change of category from foundation...school to community school".

Is that not irrefutable evidence? I understand from a legal opinion that I received that it is possible for a foundation school to cease to have a foundation, but that it would still be a foundation school. So the preposterous situation could arise of a foundation school with no foundation, but there is no possibility of a foundation school—or trust, in effect—becoming a comprehensive school. My right hon. Friend says that we think that trust schools are evil. Well, we do. We want to see them rejected.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is describing the situation at the moment. I do not want to get into discussing the intricacies of a foundation school with or without a foundation, but there is a problem with his argument, which he has repeated. The argument seems to be that there is one group of schools called comprehensives and another called trusts, or foundation schools—but that is not the case. Many comprehensive schools are foundation schools.

A ballot is not a touchstone for democracy. We have had these debates on many occasions; indeed, we had them in the trade union movement. To put the argument on a different level, this House debated whether there should be a referendum on the European Convention, or whether Parliament should take the decision. The hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) made a very good point about ballots in the context of schools. No one is seeking a ballot on school closures.

Let me take the argument a little further. Members of this House have accepted that a change—a big one—can be made from a voluntary-aided to a voluntary-controlled school without the need for a ballot, and without falling to the floor sobbing because of a breach of a great democratic principle. A community school or a voluntary-controlled school can move to foundation school status by a simple vote of the governing body. We can expand a school without balloting parents; indeed, many such expansions involve adding on a special educational needs unit, which has a much more profound effect on the school than changing to trust status. However, no one is suggesting that not having a ballot in those circumstances is somehow a breach of democracy.

We are blowing this issue out of all proportion. Trust schools are not grant-maintained schools. The Bill rectifies many anomalies, some of which have existed for 62 years, since the Education Act 1944—the Butler Act. Others that it rectifies, relating to discipline and behaviour, have existed for 20 years, since the time of the Elton report. The real reason why I object to this characterisation is that it suggests that we are arguing for the creation of grant-maintained schools. We are not, and we should not get the two concepts confused. To argue that there should be a ballot in all such circumstances because that is what happened in other situations is to fall into that trap.

Several hon. Members rose—

Alan Johnson: I shall give way once—to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly).

Paul Farrelly: I thank my right hon. Friend for giving way. I am sure that he does not want to discuss the issue of ballots completely out of context. That context is a package of safeguards that we are reasonably seeking in respect of a very important change to a school's status. Concerns have been expressed about the composition of governing bodies. The Bill stipulates that trusts can appoint a majority of trustees to the governing body, and there is a maximum percentage for LEA-appointed governors. Will my right hon. Friend consider tabling in the other place an amendment stipulating a minimum percentage of elected parent governors on a trust school's governing body?

Alan Johnson: No. The 20 per cent. limit is right—but my hon. Friend has reminded me of another issue. A Labour-controlled local authority in Yorkshire—I will not name it in case that would embarrass him, although I doubt whether it would—is keen to introduce trusts as part of the building schools for the future programme. Indeed, the representatives of that authority came to visit me only this week. Insisting that there must be a ballot on every occasion when a school changes to trust status would breach another democratic principle, which my hon. Friend has helpfully reminded me of—that elected local authorities have a role to play. Many local authorities throughout the country will want to take advantage of these provisions.

Let us not get this issue out of proportion. We are not countering the argument advanced by some of my hon. Friends that there must be ballots in all circumstances with the argument that there can never be ballots. We say that it is a matter for the local governing body to decide, and for parents themselves to decide as part of that process. It is up to the local authority to decide whether the consultation process was good. Arguing that there has to be a ballot in every circumstance and on every occasion, irrespective of the background, is not a sensible proposition.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 16

BALLOT OF PARENTS ON CHANGE OF CATEGORY FROM COMMUNITY SCHOOL TO FOUNDATION SCHOOL

'(1) A proposal for a prescribed alteration involving a change of category from community school to foundation school may be implemented only if the proposal has been approved by a ballot of parents of pupils attending the school to which the proposal relates.

(2) The Secretary of State may make regulations about ballots under subsection (1).'. —[Mr. Grogan.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Motion made, and Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

(2) After section 168 insert—

"168A Proceedings for offences

No proceedings for an offence under this Chapter shall be instituted except by or with the consent of the registration authority.

(3) If an unincorporated body is charged with an offence under this Chapter, section 33 of the Criminal Justice Act 1925 and Schedule 3 to the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 (procedure on charge of an offence against a corporation) apply as they do in relation to a body corporate.

(4) Where an offence under this Chapter committed by an unincorporated body (other than a partnership) is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of, or to be attributable to any neglect on the part of, any officer of the body or any member of its governing body, he as well as the body is guilty of the offence and liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 69 and 79.

Phil Hope: New clause 34 will allow the registration authority for independent schools to institute proceedings against any person or persons who commit any offence relating to independent schools, as set out in chapter 1 of part 10 of the Education Act 2002. The registration authority in England is the Secretary of State and the authority in Wales is the National Assembly for Wales.

Subsection (2) of the new clause also clarifies the existing powers for proceedings to be instituted. It allows the registration authority to institute proceedings and requires the authority to give consent before any other body institutes such proceedings. The clause also extends that authority to all offences in chapter 1. Such authority had previously been directed at those operating an unregistered—illegal—school. The measure will enable the registration authority to prosecute after the provision comes into force for offences committed before or after the commencement of the provision.

The new clause also extends the definition of who may be prosecuted to include bodies corporate and specified members of that body. It is increasingly common for independent schools to be owned and managed by companies, rather than sole proprietors. The existing provision allows for the prosecution of a person, but the new clause reflects more accurately current practice in the independent sector. The new clause further extends the definition to cover unincorporated bodies and partnerships and their members for the same reasons.

Subsection (3) of the new clause is a consequential amendment in view of the extension of the authority of the Secretary of State and the Assembly to all offences in chapter 1. Subsection (4) of the new clause provides that the provisions extending the definition of those who may be prosecuted will not have effect in relation to offences committed before the commencement date. Government amendments Nos. 69 and 79 are consequential amendments.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

DUTY IN RELATION TO ALLEGATIONS AGAINST TEACHERS

'(1) This section applies where it is alleged that a teacher or member of staff, including a volunteer at an educational institution providing education for persons under 18 years of age, has—

(a) behaved in a way that has harmed a child, or may have harmed a child,

(b) committed a criminal offence against or related to a child, or

(c) behaved towards a child or children in a way that indicates he is unsuitable to work with children.

(2) Any person involved in investigating such an allegation must act with a view to ensuring the confidentiality of any information that might identify—

(a) the person who made the allegation;

(b) the person in respect of whom the allegation is made.

(3) The governing body of a maintained school shall in particular ensure that policies and procedures in relation to allegations against teachers or members of staff provide for disciplinary action to be taken against any teacher or member of staff who discloses any information to which subsection (2) applies without the express authorisation of the governing body.

(4) This section ceases to apply—

(a) in the case of a criminal offence, where the teacher or member of staff is found guilty in a court in respect of the offence, or

(b) in other cases, when at the completion of investigation and consideration of the allegation it has been determined that the allegation is proved.'. —[Mr. Willetts.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Willetts: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 4, in title, line 9, at end insert 'to make provision in relation to allegations against teachers;'.

Mr. Willetts: New clause 1 would place a duty on individuals investigating allegations against teachers to ensure the confidentiality of information that might identify the alleged offender until the allegation had been proven. It would place a duty on the governing body of a maintained school to ensure that its school policy provided for disciplinary action to be taken against any member of staff who disclosed such information.

We were concerned to ensure that the new clause was within the terms of the Bill, which was why we drafted it in such a way. We realise that it might have been simpler to provide for full anonymity that was backed up by a criminal penalty, but as that would be a criminal justice measure, we understand that it would be outside the scope of an education Bill. We have tabled the new clause in such a form because it is the best way of which we are aware of trying to provide greater protection for teachers within the scope of the Bill.

I assure the Government that we would not die in the last ditch about the exact form that the provision should take. The Government have access to parliamentary draftsmen, and there might be other mechanisms that the Minister can propose that would achieve the same objective of providing much more protection for teachers who face such allegations than they have at the moment. We hope to hear tonight from the Government a clear commitment in principle to legislate in some way, ideally through the Bill, to tackle a source of deep distress and concern to many teachers. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will be familiar with worrying cases in which teachers are accused, often without any foundation whatsoever, of assaulting a child in some way. The allegations might not even lead to charges, but the name of the teacher can be dragged through the media because it has leaked out.

That can severely damage their professional reputation and cause them enormous personal distress. Sadly, in many cases it can ruin their lives. They simply do not have the protection that the Opposition believe they deserve. The Minister will be familiar with the examples assembled by SecEd as part of an impressive campaign, to which I pay tribute. I shall cite two of those examples. In 2001, a 47-year-old teacher was arrested and charged with actual bodily harm and common assault after she spilled fruit juice on a pupil's head. The case was dropped by the Director of Public Prosecutions, but she was still mentioned in the national and local press. She was harassed and threatened by neighbours, and could not go shopping without exciting public recognition. She finally took long-term sick leave as a result of anxiety and depression. That is an example of the problems caused when such allegations surface in the press.

In a later case, a teacher was accused of physically assaulting a pupil and, as a result, a front-page story appeared in the local newspaper. After interviewing the teacher, the police decided not to take action, but the newspaper reported inaccurately that the Crown Prosecution Service wished to press charges. Eventually, it published a small apology. Colleagues on both sides of the House will be aware of other incidents that cause teachers great concern. There are arguments about whether the protection of anonymity should extend only to the point at which charges are brought or to the point at which someone is found guilty of an offence. We are happy to listen to the opinions of Members on both sides of the House, but we should all accept that teachers have been lost to the teaching profession following the broadcast of unfounded allegations in the media that ruin their lives.

The NASUWT has raised the matter with us and, I am sure, with the Minister, too. Its president, Brian Garvey, said at its annual conference earlier this year:

> "Respect for authority has undoubtedly diminished and this is visible in all areas of society, not just in schools...I was walking through my local village recently and overheard a youth of about 15 saying to his mother that a friend of his had one ambition and that was to get a teacher sacked before he left school."

Such allegations are used deliberately by a tiny minority of pupils to undermine teachers' authority and demoralise them. Sadly, they sometimes succeed, so hon. Members on both sides of the House wish to provide tougher protection for teachers in those circumstance.

I accept that there is enormous sensitivity about the treatment of sex offenders and that it is important to be as rigorous as possible when there is any such risk to children. However, the general secretary of the NASUWT has pressed for anonymity:

> "This is not an attempt to protect those who abuse children. Such behaviour cannot be tolerated...Providing anonymity does not hinder a proper investigation or protect abusers. It simply enables justice to be done in a civilised and fair manner, strengthening the principle of innocent until proven guilty and avoiding trial by media."

The statistics reveal the scale of the problem. Of 1,782 accusations of abuse against members of the NASUWT in 2005, only 69 resulted in conviction. Many members of teaching unions report that they have been the victim of exaggerated, false or malicious allegations of child abuse, but in many instances there was no case to answer.

The Government have already made some progress in tackling the problem. The guidance safeguarding children in education and dealing with allegations of abuse against teachers and other staff is a welcome step forward. We strongly support the guidance, which contains a paragraph on confidentiality with which we agree. It states:

> "Every effort should be made to maintain confidentiality and guard against unwanted publicity while an allegation is being investigation/considered."

It goes on to say that

> "the police will not normally provide any information to the Press or media that might identify an individual who is under investigation".

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): What happens if the loss of confidentiality occurs through the arrest process? It is not unknown for the police to have spoken to somebody. Is action possible against the police for failing to protect the confidentiality of that individual?

Mr. Willetts: That would not be possible within the framework of the new clause that we propose, as it relates only to educational establishments. There is an argument for wider protection for teachers, which would require provisions under criminal justice legislation that go beyond the Bill. If it could be shown that there had been a leak from the police contrary to the Government's existing guidance, I hope that that would be an offence and that people would have some redress. Unfortunately, it has not been possible for us, with our advisers, to put that in a new clause that would be in order. We have not been able to crack that within the framework of the Bill. Perhaps the Minister has better advice.

We are suggesting that the current guidance should have greater legal force. It should have full statutory force, and people who breach the provisions on confidentiality in the guidance should be committing an offence. That is what we are trying to achieve. If I may say so, I think the arguments in favour of our approach would be widely appreciated across the House.

We all know that in terms of a balance of rights and responsibilities, many people in the teaching profession feel that they are on the receiving end of a rights culture which is sometimes skilfully understood by extremely young children, but that the rights of teachers are not properly protected. There is a strong case for giving teachers at least a right to anonymity similar to that which those who accuse them often enjoy.

Mr. Drew: The hon. Gentleman is generous in giving way and he is doing the right thing by moving the new clause. If a child has made an allegation against a teacher, the child, as a minor, enjoys confidentiality. What happens if the parent of that child chooses to make the same allegation against the teacher? What recourse is there against the adult? A court case may follow, but in the meantime the teacher has lost their confidentiality.

Mr. Willetts: If a parent has broken the confidentiality in those circumstances, that should be an offence. The protection that we are trying to provide for teachers is a general protection. The hon. Gentleman is right. The protection of anonymity is enjoyed only by children. Often it is the child versus the teacher. We want as much protection as possible for teachers when they face such allegations.

I know that there are arguments against what we are proposing. One argument—which we hear from people who have reputations that we respect for their work with children who are genuine victims of abuse—is that children already find it difficult to make allegations of abuse, that many children suffer in silence, and that the proposal may make it even harder for them in future. The evidence that I quoted earlier shows that that is not the problem. The problem appears to be the very high proportion of allegations against teachers which are not well founded and which do not lead to a charge, let alone a successful conviction, but which cause enormous distress to many teachers, in some cases causing them to leave the teaching profession.

It should be possible in some way or other for the Government to put the proposed guidance on to a clear statutory basis. We would like to go wider by, for example, implementing some of the proposals in the Home Affairs Committee fifth report, which recommended the protection of anonymity for defendants in such cases, at least until charges are made. We need clear statutory action, but in pressing for the problem to be tackled, we are speaking on behalf of many people within the teaching profession who find the use of allegations against them an increasing source of concern. Even if our particular drafting today is imperfect, I hope that it is possible for the Minister to indicate that the Government are committed to tackling the problem.

Annette Brooke: As we approached this short debate, I was particularly struck by the headline of one of the many newspaper articles on this issue, "Crippling the life of a teacher is child's play". I share many of the concerns that have been raised by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts). All too often, teachers are subject to allegations that later prove to be either malicious or exaggerated, but the damage done to a career or to someone's personal integrity can last a lifetime and often cannot be undone. An innocent person can have their life destroyed, which, as the hon. Member for Havant has said, is not the usual presumption in British justice.

We have some concerns about the particular approach in new clause 1, but I hope that we can reach an agreement, because we all agree that more protection is needed for teachers. Anonymity up to the point of conviction is a particular concern. In past debates—for example, the debate on the Sexual Offences Act 2003—Conservative and Liberal Democrat Front Benchers came together on Report to argue for anonymity up to the point of charge. We felt that there was a strong case, which would have covered teachers.

There is a low conviction rate of teachers who are accused by pupils. That is extremely serious, and I would like some research to be undertaken on that point, because there must be something wrong with the processes of the Crown Prosecution Service if the conviction rate is particularly low. In other words, why is that the outcome in so many cases? What can be done to investigate the process from charge to conviction and the unusual outcome of so many teachers being found innocent? It seems to me that something fundamental must be wrong.

The police are currently urged not to release the names of school staff unless staff are charged, and there is guidance on that matter, which we discussed at great length during the passage of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. Although the guidance will probably be effective, the big issue is that someone else could go to the press, which would lead to the story's publication. Sadly, before the case that was mentioned previously, one of the youngest mothers in England was living in my constituency. It is possible that the parents sold the story to the press. One never knows who is going to do that. We always have to take on board how we are going to cope with any restrictions on the press.

When it comes to child protection, we need to listen to the children's organisations. We may need to build in a provision whereby reporting restrictions could be lifted in extreme cases involving really serious accusations, because it may be, for whatever reason, that that particular person must be identified. I should like everything to be turned on end. The widespread publicity that we see now should be the exception rather than the rule, and a court should have to give permission for it.

The National Union of Teachers is urging the Government to try to use the amendment to introduce legal protection. Its general secretary said:

> "The question the Government should be asking itself is whether there is a workable way of protecting teachers from mass publicity."

That is what this is all about. The guidance that was introduced last November has been very helpful, and it sets out the issues, which are well rehearsed. However, we need something with stronger teeth than mere guidance. We are looking to the Government to come up with a statutory way of giving teachers much greater protection. There should be anonymity up to the point of charging, not trial and judgment by the media beforehand. I hope that we can move forward and achieve a consensus on this, because it involves some important principles on which we are in thorough agreement.

Mrs. Dorries: It is a long time since I was in a school classroom and had a blackboard rubber lobbed at me for talking. I hate to think what would happen to a teacher who did that today, although I am not that old and it was not that long ago. We would not have dreamed of taking action against a teacher or accusing a teacher of anything. Unfortunately, things have changed. One teacher recently said to me of her classroom, "It's a war zone in there." Today's pupils grow up in a rights-aware society—they are rights-savvy. They know what their rights are, and some use them in a way that we would not expect. Indeed, parents encourage them to do so.

We ask our teachers to put up with an incredible amount in the classroom because society has changed. We live in a society where one in four nurses is attacked in an accident and emergency department on a Saturday night.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): When the hon. Lady's party was in power, it introduced the patient's charter, but not the staff charter. Do we need something like that now?

Mrs. Dorries: I have no idea. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) could answer that one for me. It is a good suggestion. The Royal College of Nursing may be considering it.

Society is changing its attitudes. We know what society thinks of politicians, journalists, nurses and doctors, so it is no surprise that in the classroom, teachers are facing similar problems. It does not happen in the majority of schools. My two children attend a comprehensive school where, fortunately, discipline levels are good. There is an exchange of respect that has been well worked out between the staff and the students; all credit to the headmaster for that. However, that is not the case everywhere. It must be scary for some teachers to work in particular classrooms, knowing that they cannot take any action and that, even if they held on to a child to restrain it, they could find themselves in difficulties.

9.15 pm

The amendment does not propose total anonymity for teachers, regardless of whether they are in the right. Once due scrutiny of any accusations against a teacher has taken place and a process has been undertaken, if the teacher is found guilty, that should be in the public domain. However, the new clause would provide protection in the initial phase when the facts are not clear and nobody knows whether the teacher is guilty or whether the allegations constitute malicious behaviour on the part of one or a group of students.

I know a story that is similar to the one told earlier. It involves a group of girls and a science teacher—the teacher who told me that the classroom is a war zone. The group of girls was out to get that teacher because she was of the old school and a disciplinarian. She taught science, which is difficult to teach and requires the full attention of the class. However, the fact that the girls were out to get her shows the mentality of some of the students teachers have to deal with.

If we want to get the best people into the teaching profession and attract the brightest and best to teach our children, we must offer them protection when they are in the classroom. They must know that their lives will not be destroyed by a one-off accusation that a pupil can make at any time for no particular reason. They have to know that teaching is a career in which they can progress and that it will not be halted or destroyed through no fault of their own, but by the actions of a malicious student.

I fully support the new clause and hope that the Government will consider it favourably and offer teachers the protection that they need. Perhaps we can consider doing that for nurses, too, through a staff charter.

Mr. Drew: As someone who spent 10 years as a teacher trade unionist and represented teachers in difficult circumstances, I am thankful that I did not have a case of a teacher suspended in the circumstances that we are considering. However, I know of cases that resulted in people having their names dragged through the newspapers. Whatever the rights and wrongs of their actions, that was a trial in itself.

There are two problems that make the new clause unworkable because of the way in which it is framed, but I have great sympathy with what Opposition Front Benchers are trying to do. First, the nature of the allegation will almost certainly result in a teacher's suspension—sometimes for their own good, given the way in which the rumour mill works in schools. A suspension means that a teacher loses some anonymity because it is difficult to hold the line on why someone has been suspended. When an allegation is made, the fact that some cases can take not only months but years to come to court puts such great pressure on the teacher that it adds to the unacceptable position. Something may therefore have to happen to try to bring those cases to some form of resolution much more quickly.

Secondly, I know of cases in which allegations have been made against a teacher, not in the context of the school or teaching activity there, but something else that the teacher does, for example, being a swimming coach. I shall not go into too much detail because this relates to a genuine case. An allegation could be made against a teacher who was also a swimming coach—nothing to do with the teaching or the fact that the person may also teach swimming at school. This was an allegation that had been made outside school.

How should such allegations be handled? Proceedings might be taken in such cases, but does the fact that they might be taken against a teacher mean that that teacher should have additional protection? Or should the teacher be treated in exactly the same way as any other adult? If charges were brought, they would of course lose their anonymity, if they had not already done so.

One of the downsides of being a teacher is that, rather like politicians, some people will always want to try them, regardless of the truth and of the process involved. Sadly, people make allegations and come to conclusions as to whether a person is innocent or guilty. I have raised these points simply to seek clarification from my own Front Bench.

Angela Watkinson: I should like to speak briefly in favour of new clause 1, and I want to illustrate its importance by sharing with the House a story about someone known to me personally. This is a case exactly like those that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) mentioned in his opening remarks.

I should preface my remarks by saying that they do not refer to a constituent of mine or to anyone who teaches in a school in my constituency. They refer to a very experienced teacher whom I know personally. He had a false accusation made against him, although of course it was not immediately known that it was false. He was suspended straight away, as one would expect, pending an investigation. The story immediately got into the local newspapers, however, and he was vilified and lost his reputation.

It took two years for the case to come to court, during which time my acquaintance had been unable to teach. He was found not guilty, but that did him no good whatever. His reputation had gone, and he had lost his home in the meantime. The local education authority, notwithstanding the court's decision, was very reluctant to accept him back on to the supply teachers list. It took another two years before the authority felt confident enough to allow him to go on to the list.

My acquaintance then began to get jobs in local schools. The head teacher would be pleased with him, as he would settle in well and develop a good rapport with the children. After a few weeks, however, as sure as night follows day, the gossip would start at the school gates. "Oh, that was the teacher—you remember the one—that we read about in the local papers." I should add that the local papers had printed a very small comment to the effect that he had been found not guilty. So the head teacher would ask him to leave. He would then find another job, but the same thing would happen again and again.

After three or four attempts to get back into the teaching profession, this man decided that it was impossible to recover his career. So a good teacher had been lost to the profession. Furthermore, he had been a lifelong foster parent, but as soon as the accusation had been made, he had been removed from the foster parents list. This is someone whose earlier foster children came to visit him with their children, whom he regards as his own grandchildren. He had had decades of blameless foster parenting.

This man had also spent decades as a scout leader. He would take his scout pack out every summer washing cars, cutting hedges and mowing people's lawns to earn their own money so that he could take them on holiday every year at no expense to their parents. In other words, he is just one of life's good eggs. The boy who had made the false accusation turned out to have been aggrieved because he had been dropped from the football team as a punishment for larking about. But this man has now been lost to the teaching profession, lost to the fostering service and lost to the scout movement. His reputation is irrecoverable.

That is why it is so important that all possible protection be given up to the point at which charges are brought. That would not have helped in the case that I have described, because once this man got to court, he was found not guilty. I take the point made by other Members that even if it is an offence for other people to leak such stories, it is of no great comfort to the accused person, as the very fact that their name is in the public domain means that their reputation is lost. That should not stop us at least trying to control that and giving some protection to the good reputation of teachers who have been wrongly accused.

Mr. Rob Wilson: It is always a great pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson). She made a number of valid and telling points, using a compelling example of how a life can be utterly destroyed. I was not planning to speak in this debate, but I have been encouraged gently by my Front-Bench colleagues to do so—as I value my career, of course I will do so. That apart, this is also an important and interesting debate in which to participate.

New clause 1 is extremely important, as it supports that ancient British legal right of being innocent until proven guilty. There is an old saying that mud sticks. Let me tell the House that it is at its stickiest when accusations involve teachers and other members of school staff. That is why privacy is so important when accusations are thrown around. The allegation that a teacher has harmed a child, committed a criminal offence against a child or behaved in an unsuitable way can have long-term repercussions. For example, the family life of the person and his wife and children can be put under strain. The whole school community can be affected—such allegations shock a school community. They are not a trivial, silly or straightforward matter.

My concern is that once the mud is thrown, some of it will stick, even if the accusations are later proven to be untrue. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), whose constituency name I always find a tongue-twister, made an important point about the current low conviction rates in relation to teachers who are accused. If a teacher is accused of being a paedophile—of sexually interfering with a child—their reputation and family life would be destroyed, even if there is not a shred of evidence to support that allegation.

We all know that some children can stretch the truth or muddle the facts. Therefore, we must know the veracity of the claims before anything is made public. We all know from our constituencies that the press loves nothing more than a scandal at the local school and we also know that that coverage is often blown out of all proportion to the actual events at the school.

We also need to be aware, however, that we should not protect the guilty. The new clause strikes the right balance, however, between protecting the innocent and ensuring that the guilty are exposed. It builds on some of the work started by the Government, which appears useful and which we can all support, so I hope that the Government can offer reciprocal support to the new clause.

Sammy Wilson: As someone who taught for 23 years, I recognise the importance of this issue, especially in more recent times, to those in the teaching profession. When I left the teaching profession about 10 years ago, it was not such a prevalent concern. For many who are still teaching, however, their worst nightmare is to have an allegation of assault or abuse of a child made against them. That can not only ruin their career but put terrific strain on their family lives. Several teachers with whom I served and several who are constituents have come to me about well-publicised cases in Northern Ireland.

I want to make three points about this new clause. First, in the absence of anonymity there is an incentive for youngsters to make allegations because they know that those allegations can have an almost immediate impact. I do not think it insignificant that over the past few years the number of allegations against teachers has increased fourfold. That may lead to one of two conclusions. Either the quality of the teaching profession and those who enter it is becoming worse, or youngsters who are now imbued with a knowledge of their rights, and who may want to be spiteful to teachers, are tending to use such allegations as a way of destroying a teacher's life. I suspect that that is the more likely explanation.

9.30 pm

Secondly, in an era in which we are extremely sensitive to allegations made by youngsters and newspapers are happy to take up lurid stories, boards of governors and headmasters react immediately to such allegations and, moreover, want to be seen to react. In one case in Northern Ireland, in the wake of a scandal that had been well publicised in the local newspaper following an allegation made against a teacher, the members of the board of governors tripped over themselves to state publicly that they had dealt with the matter by suspending the teacher. The teacher was named in the local press. The governors thought that they were doing the right thing. They believed that they were protecting themselves. "What a good board of governors we are," they said. "We have taken immediate action, and have told people that we have done so"—which had not happened in the last case that had featured in the paper. The teacher was found not guilty of the serious abuse that had been alleged, and the effect on him and his family was devastating.

My third point is this. The Government rightly want to attract the highest calibre of people into the teaching profession. That is one way of raising standards in schools. If such a disincentive is presented to teachers, however, it will be more difficult to attract good candidates. Who wants to put himself in a position in which not only his career but his family life can be ruined as a result of spurious allegations? I think that the new clause is right to propose the granting of anonymity up to the point of conviction, given the low conviction rate.

I suspect that that low conviction rate is yet more evidence that when such allegations are made, the police and the Crown Prosecution Service are very sensitive about the issue and will therefore give the benefit of the doubt and let the court make the decision. As a result, some cases probably go to court that in other realms would not go to court, and that compounds the problem for the teacher.

The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) raised two issues. First, he pointed out that on suspension a teacher loses anonymity to an extent. That is true, but at least the new clause does not encourage a board of governors to rush to take away that anonymity. In fact, it charges boards of governors with a duty to protect it. While the new clause may not be perfect and may not protect teachers completely, and while there may be instances in which—as a result of suspension and news on the bush telegraph—a teacher will named, it gives more protection than exists at present.

I believe that the Government should accept at least the essence of the proposal. That is the right thing to do if we are to protect teachers from false allegations. It is also the right thing to do if we want to attract high-quality people to what is a very honourable profession.

Jim Knight: I very much appreciate the concern of the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), expressed through this new clause, to protect teachers and other members of staff from the damaging effects of allegation. I share that concern and I am keenly aware, through my experiences as a Member of Parliament, a parent and a child, of the profound effect that false or unfounded allegations can have on a person's health, family or career—the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) gave one such profound example—and of how publicity can then make the impact of those allegations much more severe.

Equally, it has been my experience as a governor that some allegations of abuse are true. Being abused by a person in a position of trust and authority, such as a teacher, can have a similarly devastating effect on a child. It is because we have to strike that balance that we must be very careful in seeking to address this problem, which Members in all parts of the House want to address. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) quoted the National Union of Teachers asking the Government to use this provision to find a workable way of protecting teachers from false allegation. We should continue to improve the guidance and to try to find a workable method, but it is certainly a complicated issue, as I shall try to sketch out.

In 2004, my Department's five-year strategy for children and learners included a commitment to defending teachers from false allegations, to ensuring that teachers are not subjected to damaging delays where their integrity is in question, and to ensuring that swift action can be taken against those who made false allegations. That strategy was informed by research, about which the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole asked. The Department has in recent years put in place an audit of allegations against education staff, and the results have been published. I will make sure that a copy of those results is made available in the House Library for the hon. Lady and other Members to peruse. In 2003-04, for example, the bulk of allegations were resolved outside the courts. Of the 2 per cent. that were considered by the courts, 71 resulted in conviction. According to the research, some 23 per cent. of cases resulted in disciplinary action within schools.

Following discussions with the Home Office, the Crown Prosecution Service and the Association of Chief Police Officers, my Department consulted on new arrangements for handling allegations against teachers and other education staff. Last November, we issued guidance on this issue in England, to which the hon. Member for Havant referred. Governing bodies of all schools and further education institutions must take account of this guidance in making arrangements to safeguard and promote the welfare of children. The revised version of "Working Together to Safeguard Children", issued this April in England, also contains overarching guidance that can be applied to allegations against anyone working with children in any setting. It is important that we think about other people who work with children. In my own constituency, for example, there has been a series of allegations against prison officers working at a young offenders institution, which have been equally distressing for the people concerned.

As drafted, the new clause—I accept that the hon. Member for Havant said that the drafting may not be perfect—would apply only to teachers, other staff and volunteers in schools and further education institutions. However, as I said, they are not the only people who can be affected by allegations. Publicity about an allegation of abuse can have equally devastating effects for anyone who works with children. Department for Education and Skills guidance states that every effort should be made to maintain confidentiality while an allegation is being investigated, unless and until a person is charged with an offence. But it also makes it clear that in exceptional circumstances, the police may need to disclose the identity of a person under investigation.

Publicity can be helpful to an accused person in gathering support and bringing forward evidence on his or her behalf. There have been examples where responsible investigative journalism has brought to light cases of abuse. Freedom to report cases is an essential part of our criminal justice system, and we must take it very seriously.

The present system of self-regulation, overseen by the Press Complaints Commission, provides safeguards—no doubt not perfect—against the publication of inaccurate or misleading information. Certainly, hon. Members have reason to say that those safeguards might not be perfect. The PCC has recently revised its guidance on such matters. I noted what my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) said about the police. ACPO has strengthened its guidance to police forces, aimed at preventing people from being identified if they are not charged with a criminal offence.

Subsection (3) of the new clause sets out that policies and procedures should provide for disciplinary action to be taken against any teacher or member of staff who discloses any information about an allegation without the express permission of the governing body. Schools are free to include that sort of detail in their policies on allegations, and governing bodies are responsible for ensuring that such policies are in place.

Governors should bear in mind the fact that the use of reasonable force by teachers will be allowed under clause 85. I hope that that will assuage some of the examples of unfounded allegations of bodily harm and assault that have been highlighted in the press and to which the hon. Member for Havant referred. On the basis of what he said, it sounded as though those cases involved the use of reasonable force. I hope that other measures in the Bill will also help in that respect. Legislation is already in place that permits the suspension of governors for up to six months if they breach confidentiality, and appointed governors can also be removed.

I respect greatly the reason why the issue has been raised. We have had a useful and, I hope, sensitive debate. I do not think that the House should want to divide on the issue, because I do not think that we are divided about its essence. We all agree with the intent and essence of what the Opposition are trying to do with the new clause.

Mr. Willetts: I had hoped that we could avoid dividing the House, but to help us to reach a decision, can the Minister give any indication that the Government will consider legislating to tackle the problem, because voluntary codes or codes for governing bodies are not enough?

Jim Knight: All that I can say to the hon. Gentleman—I hope that this is enough—is that I am very happy to consider, with my ministerial colleagues, whether statutory force is needed. I am sympathetic to his argument, but if we decide that such force is needed, it would need full consultation, because we could not restrict it simply to teachers; we would need to think about all the people who work with children and their vulnerability to false allegations. I am not sure whether we could get that right in time to include it in the Bill. I am being completely frank with him: I very much doubt whether we could come back with an amendment on the issue in the other place, but I will work with him, other hon. Members and ministerial colleagues to find out whether there is a way to improve the situation for everyone who works with children in this country, without jeopardising the safety of children—something that is important to all of us.

Mr. Willetts: I am trying to find a way forward, because I fully understand that we do not particularly want to divide the House if we can avoid it. Is he willing to meet a group of hon. Members to consider what the options might be to legislate beyond the code, which, although admirable, is sadly not sufficient, while recognising that such provisions might not be included in the Bill?

Jim Knight: Of course I am very happy to meet the hon. Gentleman and have that discussion, although I cannot give a commitment to legislate, as I have said. On the basis of the reassurance that I have given, I hope that he will be happy to withdraw the motion.

Annette Brooke: Will that be a cross-party meeting?

Jim Knight: The hon. Lady got in just in time. As she is my neighbour, I know that she takes the issue of children's rights very seriously, so I am naturally happy to extend the invitation to her. I hope that that consensus will allow us to move on to other issues.

9.45 pm

Mr. Willetts: I had hoped that the Minister would be able to go a bit further. I realise that our new clause is not the ideal way to tackle the problem, but I had hoped that he could have given a Government commitment to legislate on it in some way or other. However, he has undertaken to meet us and to consider legislation, even if not through this Bill, and I look forward to discussing the matter further with him. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 2

ACCEPTANCE OF SCHOOL RULES A CONDITION OF ADMISSION

'An admission authority may make it a condition of a child's admission to a school that the parent of a child agrees to secure compliance with any school rules made by the headteacher of that school.'. —[Mr. Hayes.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 10—Home-school contracts—

'(1) Section 111 of SSFA 1998 is amended as follows.

(2) Omit subsections (4)(b), (4)(c) and (5)

(3) After subsection (4) insert—

"(4A) A governing body of a school to which section 110(1) applies or the local education authority where it is the admission authority for such a school may make it a condition of being admitted to the school that the parental declaration is signed in respect of the child."

(4) In the heading of sections 110 (home-school agreements) and 111 (supplementary provisions about home-school agreements) for "agreements" substitute "contracts".'.

New clause 11—Home-school contracts (no. 2)—

'(1) SSFA 1998 is amended as follows.

(2) After section 111 insert—

"Home-school contracts

111A Home-school contracts

(1) The governing body of a school which is—

(a) a maintained school, or

(b) a city technology college, a city college for the technology of the arts or an Academy, may adopt a home-school contract for the school, together with a parental declaration to be used in connection with the contract.

(2) For the purposes of this section and section 111 a 'home-school contract' is a statement specifying—

(a) the school's aims and values;

(b) the school's responsibilities, namely the responsibilities which the school intends to discharge in connection with the education of pupils at the school who are of compulsory school age;

(c) the parental responsibilities, namely the responsibilities which the parents of such pupils are expected to discharge in connection with the education of their children while they are registered pupils at the school; and

(d) the school's expectations of its pupils, namely the expectations of the school as regards the conduct of such pupils while they are registered pupils there;

and 'parental declaration' means a document to be used by qualifying parents for recording that they take note of the school's aims and values and its responsibilities and that they acknowledge and accept the parental responsibilities and the school's expectations of its pupils.

(3) The governing body shall take reasonable steps to secure that the parental declaration is signed by every qualifying parent.

(4) An admissions authority may make it a condition of a child being admitted to the school that the parental declaration is signed in respect of the child.

(5) An admissions authority may not—

(a) invite any person to sign the parental declaration at a time when the child in question has not been admitted to the school, or

(b) make any decision as to whether or not to admit a child to the school by reference to whether any such declaration is or is not likely to be signed in respect of the child.

(6) Subsections (3) and (4) do not require the governing body to seek the signature of a qualifying parent if, having regard to any special circumstances relating to the parent or the pupil in question, they consider that it would be inappropriate to do so.

(7) Where the governing body considers that a registered pupil at the school has a sufficient understanding of the home-school contract as it relates to him, they may invite the pupil to sign the parental declaration as an indication that he acknowledges and accepts the school's expectations of its pupils.

(8) The governing body shall discharge its duty under subsection (3)—

(a) in the case of a pupil attending the school on the relevant date, as soon after that date as is reasonably practicable; and

(b) in the case of a pupil admitted to the school, as soon after the date of his admission as is reasonably practicable.

(9) The governing body shall from time to time review the home-school contract.

(10) Where the home-school contract is revised by the governing body following such a review, subsections (3) to (8) shall, in the case of pupils admitted to the school after the revision takes effect, accordingly apply in relation to the revised contract.

(11) Before adopting the home-school contract or parental declaration, or revising that contract, the governing body shall consult—

(a) all qualifying parents, and

(b) such other persons as may be prescribed.

(12) In this section—

'qualifying parent' means a registered parent of a pupil at the school who is of compulsory school age;

'admission authority' has the meaning given by section 88(1).

(13) Section 110 does not apply to a governing body that decides to have a home-school contract.

111B Contents of home-school contracts

(1) In discharging any function under section 111A the governing body of a school shall have regard to any guidance given from time to time by the Secretary of State.

(2) If the Secretary of State by order so provides, the governing body of a school to which subsection (1) of that section applies shall ensure that any form of words—

(a) specified in the order, or

(b) having such effect as is so specified, is not used in a home-school contract or (as they case may be) in a parental declaration.

(3) An order under subsection (2) may apply—

(a) to any school specified in the order, or

(b) to any description of school so specified.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

(4) A home-school contract shall not be capable of creating any obligation in respect of whose breach any liability arises in contract or in tort.".'.

New clause 72—Burden of proof in cases of confiscation—

'(1) In any proceedings brought against a person in respect of his seizure or retention of an item in circumstances to which section 86 applies it shall be presumed that such seizure or retention was lawful unless the contrary is shown.

(2) In any proceedings brought against a person in respect of his disposal of an item in circumstances to which section 86 applies it shall be presumed that the disposal of the item was lawful if the item could not reasonably be restored to its lawful owner or, if a pupil, to that pupil's parent or guardian without thereby facilitating the commission of an offence or of creating the possibility that further disciplinary action might need to be taken in relation to the pupil.'.

Government amendment No. 58

Amendment No. 100, in page 64, line 36 [Clause 81], after 'measures', insert

'to ensure zero tolerance of disciplinary and behavioural problems'.

Government amendments Nos. 59 to 65, 68 and 78

Mr. Hayes: This group of new clauses and amendments deal with discipline in schools. If the objective of the Bill is to increase school autonomy, the Government should agree that a school must be completely in control of discipline. That is why the new clauses would make home-school contracts enforceable. If parents and children do not sign up to a code of behaviour, and stick to it, it would surely be inappropriate for those children to attend the school.

My proposals are also in line with the Government's White Paper. It set a clear direction and that is why Opposition Members, who share the intent to drive up quality in our schools, have broadly supported the Government since it was published. We certainly support the Government in as much as they are determined to improve discipline in our schools for the benefit of children and teachers.

The White Paper states:

"Home-school agreements can be a powerful tool in making clear to parents what they can expect from their child's school particularly when they join a new school and also setting out parents' own responsibilities in supporting the school."

It also states, in paragraph 5.14:

"Home-school agreements have been a requirement since 1999, but many schools have not yet exploited their potential."

As an example of home school agreements that work, the White Paper draws attention to Oulton Broad primary school in Suffolk. It says:

"The home-school agreement is displayed in the school's entrance hall, and sets out clearly the expectation that both the school and the family will play their part in the child's education. The school consults parents about reviewing the agreement every three years, and it is used in day-to-day conversations, where necessary, with parents to clarify responsibilities, and emphasise the role that both sides play."

That is so important in an age when people are prepared to bleat about their rights, but have little regard to their responsibilities, still less their duties.

It is in a spirit of consensus and co-operation, and of wanting to improve discipline in schools, that we suggest these improvements to the Bill to enable the Government to achieve those objectives.

Sarah Teather: We discussed this matter in Committee, when it was noted that many people—such as those who cannot read and write, and those who do not speak English as a first language—would find it difficult to sign a home-school contract or agreement. Has the hon. Gentleman taken that into account in his new amendments?

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Lady, and the whole House, will know that the protection of the vulnerable is always my top priority. I would not want to disadvantage any group of people who find it difficult to understand what is required of them, but I am sure that any good school or reasonable governing body would put in place measures to allow those who are illiterate or unable to speak fluent English to participate in the school's life. In that way, such people could understand and agree to their responsibilities in respect of pupils.

The hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) is right that we need to be sensitive about this matter and that it needs to be handed with appropriate care, but that is no reason to vote against the new clause. Given the spirit of consensus that has emerged in the course of consideration of the Bill, I hope that she will join us in fighting for good discipline in schools, and that she will support our teachers, and good teaching and learning.

Good discipline is vital in school, but in a minority of schools and classrooms, discipline is in a state of crisis. Teachers and learners face real problems; it is estimated that 270 serious assaults are carried out on teachers every year. More than 60 children are suspended or expelled for violent behaviour every day in London schools, according to an investigation conducted in 2005 by the Evening Standard—[Interruption.] I am sorry that the hon. Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) seems to make light of a problem that has such an effect on the life of schools, the progress of other learners and the morale of teachers. It is the responsibility of all hon. Members to stand by those whose lives are being made a misery by the small minority of people who are determined to disrupt good practice in our schools. The Government have recognised that, in the White Paper and in the Bill, and have introduced measures to give additional protection to schools.

The hon. Member for Brent, East has also tabled important amendments in this group that deal with confiscation. She recognises that teachers should be able to confiscate items such as mobile phones, which can cause immense difficulty. More seriously, they should be able to confiscate objects that are weapons or could be used as weapons.

It is sad that violence is on the increase in a minority of schools and classrooms, but we must not deny that most schools in this country do a great job. We should celebrate the work of our teachers accordingly, but it would be irresponsible of us not to deal with the real problems of violence and indiscipline that permeate too many schools.

It is therefore vital that we enforce home-school contracts and link them to discipline and pupils' expectations. If pupils know what is expected of them and the conditions attached to their attendance as soon as they join a school community, there will be little doubt about their responsibilities should problems arise later on.

Sir Alan Steer, the head teacher of Seven Kings high school in Ilford, was appointed by the Government to report on these matters. He said that schools should be "comfortable, warm, sociable places". To achieve that, we must get the right balance between discipline and security, so that students can enjoy the freedoms that they want, in the proper school atmosphere.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Does my hon. Friend think that the Bill deals adequately with the case not of sex offenders who might or might not be employed in schools, but of sex offenders who may be pupils? Will it protect other pupils from such offending pupils?

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend has great knowledge of educational affairs, on which he always speaks with great authority, and he is an immense champion of the interests of the people of the Isle of Wight. He is right to point out that offences such as he describes can not only disrupt the life of a school but ruin individual lives—they can be committed pupil against pupil as well as teacher against pupil. The new clause and this group of amendments do not deal with those specifics, and if I were to stray into them I have no doubt that you would call me to order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, my hon. Friend is right to suggest that when creating a disciplined environment in schools and setting out pupils' responsibilities and expectations such issues should be addressed. I have no doubt that in the Minister's expansive response to this short debate he will want to comment on that matter and to refer to some of the detailed measures that the Government propose for guidance in addressing it.

Throughout our consideration of the Bill, the Opposition have done the right thing, because we believe that for the most part the Government have done the right thing. That is good, responsible opposition—but it is also responsible opposition to challenge the Government and to try to improve legislation when it comes before the House. In my judgment, and in the judgment of teachers, learners, parents and families throughout the country, the amendments would improve the Bill still further, and in that spirit I commend them to the House.

Sarah Teather: With an eye on the time, I shall simply say that I would like to take up further aspects of new clause 72 with the Minister in writing, because we were not happy with the answer he gave us in Committee. If the Conservatives push new clause 2 to a vote we shall oppose it. I shall now let the Minister respond, in the three minutes that the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) has left him.

Jim Knight: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) for indicating that she wants to take up new clause 72 in writing, which is what I wanted to do anyway.

New clauses 2 and 10 would prevent a child from being admitted to a school if the parents were unable or unwilling to sign a home-school agreement. We agree that home-school agreements are an important tool in maintaining discipline and improving behaviour in schools, but we fundamentally disagree with the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) on the issue.

In Committee, it was clear that Members making that proposal believed that if parents declined to sign a home-school agreement their child should be refused admission to a school. I cannot accept a provision that would penalise a child by refusing them access to a school because their parents had not signed a document stating that they agreed with its rules and ethos. It is much better for discussion about home-school agreements to take place after the offer of a school place has been accepted; whether a parent signs the agreement should have no bearing on the security of a child's place.

I am also concerned that allowing some schools to make signing a home-school agreement compulsory could discourage some parents from applying to those schools. Such a scheme is best undertaken as part of the process of building a positive relationship between the school and family when parents know that their child will be attending the school in question. We have no wish to see home-school agreements used as another means whereby schools can select pupils, so I invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the new clause.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman has just told the House that he thinks people should go to schools without agreeing to their rules and respecting their authority, because they are not prepared to sign up to the ethos of the school. That is nonsense, as he must know. He is sending the message that he does not really care about discipline as much as he pretends. That is not a good message and it is not one that teachers or learners will welcome. Parents up and down the country will be very disappointed with him.

Jim Knight: The hon. Gentleman knows well, as will any Member who chooses to read the Hansard report of the full arguments in Committee, how seriously the Government take discipline in schools. That is demonstrated by all the measures on discipline in the Bill, which will really move things forward so that every child in the country can have a secure experience of school. Those powers will liberate teachers to exercise discipline without having to resort to common law. I ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his new clause—

It being Ten o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

INSOLVENCY

That the draft Enterprise Act 2002 (Disqualification from Office: General) Order 2006, which was laid before this House on 18th April, be approved.

NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE

That the draft National Health Service (Pre-consolidation Amendments) Order 2006, which was laid before this House on 26th April, be approved.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

That the draft International Development Association (Multilateral Debt Relief Initiative) Order 2006, which was laid before this House on 27th April, be approved.—[Huw Irranca-Davies.]

PETITIONS

Post Office Card Accounts

10.16 pm

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): I present the petition of Councillor Christine Drew and Councillor Stuart Hughes and councillors and residents of the East Devon district council area.

The petition

Declares that the petitioners consider that the use of Post Office Card Accounts is a valuable means of keeping rural post offices and shops open. The Card Account is often the only way that pensioners can access their pension payments.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to drop plans to end Post Office Card Accounts.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

10.17 pm

Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I am pleased to join my hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) and present a petition from Councillor Tony Wilkinson and councillors and residents of the East Devon district council area.

The petition

Declares that the petitioners consider that the use of Post Office Card Accounts is a valuable means of keeping rural post offices and shops open. The Card Account is often the only way that pensioners can access their pension payments.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to drop plans to end Post Office Card Accounts.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Oxford University (Student Rents)

10.18 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I am pleased to present a petition signed by 2,000 students of Pembroke college and other colleges of Oxford university protesting at the impact of excessive rent rises.

The petition states:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The Humble Petition of the students of University of Oxford

Sheweth That

Accommodation costs in Oxford colleges have risen by 35 per cent. in the last five years, compared to a rise of 8.6 per cent. in London and 3.5 per cent. regionally.

College accommodation in Oxford is the most expensive in England outside London and more expensive than Kings College London, University College London and the London School of Economics, all of whose students receive a student loan weighted for London living costs.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House shall urge the Department for Education and Skills to consider the plight of the students of the University of Oxford and others in a similar situation and henceforth allow students to live and work, free from the burden of unreasonable accommodation costs.

And you Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

To lie upon the Table.

Unfair Dismissal

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Steve McCabe.]

10.19 pm

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I am happy to have the opportunity to raise on the Adjournment the subject of the dismissal of my constituent, Mr. James Beedell. I welcome the Minister to his new responsibilities; as it happens, this debate concerns an incident that occurred in the borough, part of which he represents and therefore knows well. I hope that I have been able to assist him by letting his office know the burden of my case in advance, which I hope will help him to give as constructive a reply as possible.

Mr. James Beedell is a long-standing constituent of mine who has lived in Walworth in south London, which is just over the river, for a number of years. He first came to see me just less than two years ago about the circumstances of a previous dismissal from employment. Let me summarise my view on the matter before I go over the facts. It is my belief that in his particular case, the decision to dismiss him was harsh in light of the fact that he had worked for the same company for 28 years with an apparently impeccable record of service.

Mr. Beedell is a man in his 50s who, after a 28-year period of service in the same company, is now unemployed. As a result of his dismissal, he is finding it difficult to obtain work. The dismissal, which he is aggrieved about and which has so far prevented him from finding a new job, stems from one single altercation with a colleague in the workplace in 1998. It was that row that led to Mr. Beedell's dismissal.

Mr. Beedell had worked for that company, West Ferry Printers, since he joined in 1970 as a casual worker—eight years later, he became a permanent member of staff. The incident which led to his dismissal occurred on 29 September 1998 and involved him and a fellow employee, Mr. Radcliffe. In short, both men were reported for fighting in the workplace. They were reported by Mr. Fisher, the press hall manager, to the production director, Mr. Lawrence, and to the personnel manager, Mr. Marsden. Both men were then suspended on full pay pending a disciplinary hearing.

In the run-up to the disciplinary hearing, potential witnesses were interviewed, and the two men apparently gave differing accounts of the incident. On 2 October 1998, disciplinary hearings took place before Mr. Fairlie, the senior press hall manager. Based on the evidence of the two men, witnesses to the incident and reports from the company nurse and from Mr. Beedell's GP, Mr. Fairlie concluded that both men had been violent participants in the incident, and he summarily dismissed them both without notice.

Mr. Beedell subsequently appealed internally against that decision to dismiss him from the company, particularly on the grounds that he had worked for them for 28 years with an impeccable record for all that time. His appeal was heard on 16 October 1998 by Mr. Marsden, but it was dismissed. My constituent then took his case to the London (South) employment tribunal, which on 14 December 1999 upheld the employer's decision to dismiss Mr Beedell. Mr Beedell then appealed that decision to the Employment Appeal Tribunal on 7 July 2000, and again his appeal was dismissed. He then took his case to the Court of Appeal in 2001, where his case was also dismissed. The final stage in the legal proceedings occurred on 20 June 2001, when the House of Lords refused his application for leave to appeal.

When Mr. Beedell first contacted me as his constituency MP, I sought advice from an eminent lawyer, David Pannick QC, who is eminent not only in that area, but on matters connected with the European convention on human rights. His opinion was that the decision to dismiss Mr. Beedell after one altercation following 28 years of impeccable service to West Ferry Printers did seem "very harsh". However, following the decision of the Court of Appeal, David Pannick advised that there was no further legal remedy for Mr. Beedell. In May 2004, he advised me:

> "I can see no realistic prospect of the European Court of Human Rights finding that the law of unfair dismissal, as applied to Mr. Beedell, breaches any of his fundamental rights under the European Convention on Human Rights. The European Court would say that domestic law has a broad discretion to decide what standards of procedural and substantive fairness to apply in this context, and that Strasbourg does not provide an appeal on the merits of individual cases."

Mr. Beedell has therefore exhausted all legal avenues to appeal or to remedy the decision, and that is why I bring the case before the House today for Government and Parliament to consider.

Mr. Beedell's key grievance is that he feels that the current law is biased in favour of the employer, with, in cases like his, very unfair results. Under current law, disciplinary matters are of course dealt with first by the employer. After an initial decision, there would presumably in all circumstances be an internal right of appeal. If the employee was not satisfied with the outcome of that, he or she could then go to the employment tribunal. As the House knows, employment tribunals either dismiss the claim of unfair dismissal or uphold it. Most cases are dismissed, although the most recent Tribunals Service annual report that I have seen, which was published about a year and a half ago, shows that in 10 per cent of cases that went to the employment tribunal in England and Wales in 2004-05, the employer was held to have unfairly dismissed the employee.

After a finding of unfair dismissal, there are various remedies that the tribunal can give. Among those is the right to recommend re-engagement or reinstatement. The employment tribunal does not then have a power to substitute its own view of the fairness or unfairness of the decision to dismiss. But if it finds that the dismissal was unfair, although it cannot force the employer to re-engage or reinstate the employee, if that is what it holds should happen, the employer will be penalised financially if they do not follow the recommendation and the employee will be financially compensated. I understand why that is the case; it is to ensure that one does not end up putting an employer and employee back together in situations where they are not going to get on. According to the latest Tribunals Service annual report for 2004-05, re-engagement or reinstatement in a case of unfair dismissal was very rarely the decision of the tribunal. Only 0.4 per cent. of cases—one in every 250—led to reinstatement.

Mr Beedell argues that the figures show how difficult it is, first, for an employee to win a case against the employer; and secondly, even if the employee wins, for him to get his job back. That is the important aspect that I want the Minister to address specifically, because the rest is can be seen as the normal situation in all unfair dismissal cases. One of the key reasons why Mr. Beedell and people like him understandably feel that they have a bad deal in employment law is that tribunals are governed by the "reasonable response" test. In accordance with section 98(4) of the Employment Rights Act 1996—which is still the governing piece of legislation—the question of the fairness of the dismissal, first, depends on whether in the circumstances, including the size and administrative resources of the employer's undertaking, the employer acted reasonably or unreasonably in treating it as a sufficient reason for dismissing the employee; and, secondly, shall be determined in accordance with equity and the substantial merits of the case.

That may sound fine on the face of it, but it does not always work out that way. The test means that for a dismissal to be lawful, an employer's decision to dismiss an employee must fall within the range of reasonable responses open to an employer in all circumstances. That in turn means that a given set of circumstances may result in one employer deciding to dismiss and another employer, in the same or similar circumstances but equally reasonably, deciding not to dismiss.

In addition, the law provides that, when considering whether a dismissal is "fair" or "unfair", and when determining whether an employee's conduct justifies dismissal, an employment tribunal cannot substitute its view for that of the employer about what is "reasonable", provided that the employer's decision was within a band of reasonable responses open to a reasonable employer.

Several decisions by the Employment Appeal Tribunal and other cases have been reported, but I shall cite only one case. Mr. Haddon took his employers, Van den Bergh Foods, to the tribunal and the case was decided on 29 September 1999. In it, the Employment Appeal Tribunal sought to reformulate the test of reasonableness. The key elements of the case were simple. Mr. Haddon had received a long-service award at a presentation that started at 5.30 pm with a buffet supper afterwards. He failed to clear with his manager that he would not need to return to the evening shift after the presentation, although employees were not normally required to do so. A disciplinary hearing took place and Mr. Haddon was dismissed for failing to return to work after the presentation. The employment tribunal decided that the dismissal was fair because it was not outside the "band of reasonable responses" open to the employer. However, the Employment Appeal Tribunal—rightly, in my view—decided that the dismissal was unfair.

According to the Employment Appeal Tribunal, the test of reasonableness is objective—that is, the tribunal must ask itself what a reasonable employer would have done; the "band of reasonable responses" test is not helpful as there are bound to be extreme views at either end of the band, and all tribunals must consider whether the employer acted reasonably in dismissing the employee in all the circumstances.

The Haddon case, which dated from 1999, became one of the cases that has been used regularly in tribunals till now and governed the decisions of the employment tribunal, the Employment Appeal Tribunal and the Court of Appeal in Mr. Beedell's case as part of the case law that interprets the Act that Parliament passed. In Mr Beedell's case, the Employment Appeal Tribunal ruled that "the law on dismissal for a reason which related to conduct was not altered by the recent cases of Haddon v. Van den Bergh Foods Ltd, Wilson v. Ethicon (2000) or Madden v. Midland Bank Plc (2000)".

The latter two are the other most often cited cases.

As a result of the current law and its interpretation in the cases since we passed it, West Ferry Printers has been held not to have acted unfairly in dismissing Mr Beedell and to have had no duty to reinstate him. There is no argument in law about that. The last decision in Mr Beedell's case in the law courts was five years ago.

What next? I hope that I can persuade the Minister to see that there may be some scope for putting right an injustice. I understand that there are no recent Government or parliamentary proposals to change the basic legal framework or to adjust the balance between employer and employee interests in the way in which the framework currently works. There has been a new employment Act—the Employment Act 2002—which sets out new statutory and disciplinary grievance procedures. It was generally accepted and welcomed in all quarters of the House and it came into force in 2004. It ensures that internal procedures are better than they were. However, none of those changes appear specifically to tackle the balance of fairness in cases of alleged unfair dismissal.

Given that that law did not change anything, on behalf of especially James Beedell, and others who might be in a similar position in future, I come to Parliament today to ask four central questions. First, is any further general review of employment legislation envisaged? Is there any plan to reconsider the test or the practice for determining whether a dismissal is fair or unfair, rather than continuing with the law and the case law that is currently used?

Secondly, what options are available to Mr Beedell and people like him, who find themselves in the position of being dismissed, after an employer decision which is, at the very least, extremely harsh, and, the employee and others would argue, disproportionate and personally unfair?

Thirdly, if the decision in Mr. Beedell's case cannot be changed, and if re-engagement or reinstatement are not an option, how can Mr. Beedell—or anyone in his position—ensure that his long and excellent work record is not discounted or ignored in his search for subsequent employment as a result of the one incident that led to his dismissal?

Fourthly—this is perhaps the big question—is there not a way in which natural justice could be included as an overriding principle, or as a backstop, in the way in which we evaluate such cases? This could allow people like Mr. Beedell who make what might objectively be considered to be a serious mistake once, but who are then punished for it for the rest of their working life, to have the slate wiped clean.

Mr. Beedell is keen to get back into gainful employment, but the clock is ticking as he moves through his 50s, and so far this has not proved possible. The principal reason for this is that he might first be seen in the eyes of any potential employer as someone who was dismissed for fighting with a fellow employee, rather than as someone who gave committed, loyal, professional, diligent and unblemished service to his employer for 28 years.

Mr. Beedell feels that he has had a raw deal. Although I understand his former employer's decision, I agree with Mr. Beedell. How would our new Minister and his Department suggest that this case, and that of others in a similar situation to that of Mr. Beedell, be remedied, so that those affected might be treated better by the law of the land?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Jim Fitzpatrick): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) on securing this debate and welcome the opportunity to comment on some of the general issues surrounding the unfair dismissal legislation. I am advised in my brief that he has been campaigning on behalf of his constituent for some years, and I commend that activity. I regret to tell him, however, that I shall be unable to give him any satisfaction in my response this evening. He said that his office had contacted mine, but I am advised that we received no such communication. I hope that he will forgive me, therefore, given the specific nature of his questions, if I write to him about them rather than dealing with them in an ad hoc fashion. I know from the briefings that I have been getting over the past two weeks that I shall be able to give him better information if I write to him, and I undertake to do so after the end of tonight's business.

I must stress, however, that the general issues that I shall be discussing will address many of the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised. While I of course understand that his constituent was disappointed with the outcome of his own unfair dismissal claim, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on decisions made by the employment tribunal, or by the Appeal Courts, which are independent judicial bodies.

It might be helpful if I start by setting out how the legislation works. Protection against unfair dismissal has now been in force for more than 30 years. The fundamental tenets of the legislation have always been, first, that an employer must have a potentially fair reason for dismissing an employee. It could be a reason relating to the employee's conduct or to his or her capability or qualifications. It could be that the employee was redundant or that there was a legal reason preventing his or her continued employment—the classic example is a driver who loses his or her driving licence. Or there could be some other substantial reason to justify the dismissal.

If an employee believes that he or she has been dismissed unfairly, they can complain to an employment tribunal, subject to the necessary qualifying service. At the tribunal, it must first be shown that the individual was in fact dismissed. The employer must then show that the dismissal was for a potentially fair reason. If he or she can do so, the employment tribunal will consider whether the employer acted reasonably or unreasonably in dismissing the employee for that reason.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

The concept of acting reasonably is crucial to the unfair dismissal legislation. Understandably, case law has developed over the decades that helps the employment tribunals to decide what is reasonable in particular circumstances. For instance, if a dismissal relates to an employee's capability, a tribunal will expect the employer to have appraised the employee's performance properly and identified the root of the problem. The employer must not only do that, but warn the employee of the consequences of failing to improve and give him or her a reasonable chance to do so. That is acting reasonably; dismissing a poor performer when he or she first turns in poor work is not. Case law also guides tribunals in considering dismissals related to an employee's conduct. In that regard, the employer must have reasonable grounds for believing that the employee was guilty of the conduct that caused the dismissal. He or she must have carried out as much investigation as was reasonable in the circumstances.

The courts have developed another important test to assist tribunal decision making, which the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey raised specifically and with which he took issue. It is known as the band of reasonable responses test, or sometimes as the range of reasonable responses test. Essentially, it requires tribunals to consider whether an employer's action in dismissing an employee fell within the range of responses to a given situation which might have been expected of a hypothetical reasonable employer in the same circumstances. If it did, the dismissal would be fair.

The test has important and, I believe, desirable effects. It reduces the risk of inconsistent decision making from one employment tribunal to another. It acknowledges that more than one response to a given set of circumstances might be reasonable. For instance, two employers might be more or less lenient, according to the culture of their workplaces and the standards of conduct that they explicitly require of their employees, towards the same act of misconduct. It also underlines the principle that employment tribunals should avoid subjective decisions. To put it bluntly, tribunal members are not there to say, "We would not have sacked that employee," therefore it is an unfair dismissal," or, "We'd have sacked him or her, too, so it is fair." They must not seek to substitute their view for that of the employer. They must judge cases objectively in the light of all the circumstances.

The development of the test over many years has not been without its difficulties and inconsistencies, at least as tribunals have at times purported to apply it. That has led to criticism, which has been twofold. The first criticism has been that the test is a perversity test, or what amounts to one—that it compels tribunals to find that any decision to dismiss is reasonable as long as it is not so unreasonable as to be perverse. The second has been that the test prevents employment tribunals, which are sometimes described as "industrial juries", from drawing on their own workplace experience in deciding whether a dismissal is fair.

If those criticisms ever held water, however, they no longer do so. Later case law has made it clear that the band of reasonable responses test is not a perversity test—the relevant cases are the 2001 Court of Appeal case, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, of Post Office v. Foley, and the case of Midland Bank plc v. Madden. Case law has also made it clear that it is not an error of law for tribunals to refrain from applying the band of reasonable responses test at all. There will be cases in which the employer's conduct is so clearly reasonable or unreasonable that that there is no range of responses to consider. It has also emphasised that the test does not preclude tribunals from applying their industrial experience to the facts of a case. They can do so, and should do so, in deciding how a hypothetical reasonable employer might have responded when presented with the same facts.

None of that will assuage the disappointment of employees and/or employers who lose unfair dismissal cases, as one or the other must fail in every case. Their disappointment is natural, and it is perhaps also natural that in some cases it will promote a belief that the law must be loaded against one side or the other. The law is about balance, however, and it would clearly be unworkable to allow employers no discretion at all in dismissing employees. Since they must have some discretion, the question is how much. What is the proper balance between protecting employees from unfair treatment and enabling employers to run their businesses without undue constraint? I realise that this will disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but I believe that the current legislation and the band of reasonable responses test get the balance right. At the moment, we have no plans to override that, but as I said, I shall write to him about where we are with employment legislation.

That said, we are not complacent about employment law. We have made significant changes since 1997. For instance, for a long time the period of service that most employees must accrue before they qualify to make an unfair dismissal claim stood at two years. Some employers claimed that a substantial qualifying period was necessary so that they could rectify recruitment mistakes without the risk of facing a tribunal claim. We accept that recruitment mistakes do happen, but we believed that two years was longer than employers needed to discover and deal with them. In 1999, therefore, we reduced the qualifying period to one year, thus protecting more employees against the risk of arbitrary dismissal.

I could go on to describe in detail the new disputes resolution procedures that we introduced via the Employment Act 2002, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. We hoped that they would help to improve protection for employers and employees against having to have recourse to employment tribunals, and we believe that they have done so. Time is against me, however. I said at the outset that I did not expect the hon. Gentleman to be satisfied with my comments, and I have probably lived up to that expectation, but I have undertaken to write to him in response to the specific questions that are now recorded in Hansard, and I shall ensure that my office deals with that as expeditiously as possible.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fourteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Security Situation

1. Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): What recent assessment he has made of the security situation in Northern Ireland. [72220]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Paul Goggins): The 10th report by the Independent Monitoring Commission was the most positive yet and confirmed that the security situation has shown enormous improvement. Although loyalist paramilitaries and dissident republicans continue to pose a threat, I am confident that we continue to move towards the kind of peaceful future that we all want for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Dodds: As regards that peaceful future, the Minister will be aware of the full-scale republican paramilitary parade through Londonderry at the weekend, which was attended, it is reported, by Martin McGuinness—an interesting commentary on his commitment to exclusively peaceful and democratic means. Given that we are going to have an orchestrated campaign against Orange and other dignified and lawful parades in Northern Ireland, can the Minister tell us what his Department, the police or the Parades Commission have done, or will do, about that illegal display of force by republicans in Londonderry?

Paul Goggins: I can tell the hon. Gentleman what I am personally doing at the moment, which is to engage in a round of meetings with all parties—political parties and other groups as well—that have a particular interest in a peaceful period of parades over the next few weeks and months. I know that he is committed to that, as am I. Of course, all these parades should happen in a lawful and legal way. The Parades Commission has an important role to play in determining routes that make them safe.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): In terms of improving the security situation in Northern Ireland, I am curious to know what contact Northern Ireland Office officials have had with any of the loyalist paramilitary groups, but particularly the Ulster Volunteer Force, in order to persuade them to begin the decommissioning of their weapons.

Paul Goggins: As I said in answer to the previous question, I have been engaged in a round of meetings. I met representatives of the Progressive Unionist party and again reiterated the importance of ensuring that we have a peaceful climate as we prepare for the parades season. I received a very encouraging response.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I welcome the Minister to his new responsibilities. I also welcome the Under-Secretaries, the hon. Members for Inverclyde (David Cairns) and for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), to their responsibilities at the Northern Ireland Office and express my appreciation to the hon. Members for Basildon (Angela E. Smith) and for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward) for the work that they did during their time there.

Has the Minister had time to consider the conclusion by the Independent Monitoring Commission that loyalist and republican paramilitary groups are using community restorative justice projects as a way of imposing control over local communities? In the light of that verdict, will the Government undertake not to support such schemes or to impose new guidelines unless they have the clear support of the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Policing Board?

Paul Goggins: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his warm welcome. He asked whether I have had sufficient time to look into this. I have had sufficient time to know that this is a very tricky area and one that my hon. Friend the Minister of State is considering very carefully. He will bring forward some clear guidelines in the near future.

Mr. Lidington: May I further encourage the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends to ensure that their proposals on community restorative justice are placed on a clear statutory basis by embodying them in secondary legislation rather than just leaving this very important matter as the subject of administrative decision by the Minister of the day?

Paul Goggins: I can further confirm to the hon. Gentleman that when the guidelines are published, they will of course be underpinned by the rule of law and will indeed be operated in full partnership with the police. It is very important that it is done in that way. Restorative justice, as a concept, can have a role to play, but it must be part of the rule of law and operate within proper systems.

Northern Ireland Assembly

2. Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future of the Northern Ireland Assembly. [72221]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): First, I thank the shadow Secretary of State for the voluminous praise that he bestowed on my excellent team of Ministers.

Last week, the Assembly was recalled to begin its task of forming an Executive. As soon as that is achieved, I can end suspension, thus restoring power to locally elected politicians, who are fully accountable to the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Evennett: Does the Secretary of State agree that it would be helpful if all parties in the Assembly condemned all criminality and paramilitary activity and that that would be the best way forward for the future of the Province?

Mr. Hain: Absolutely. I fully agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is essential that all parties, especially those whose members hold ministerial office, are completely distanced from and condemn all paramilitary activity and criminality, and operate within the rule of law.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): May I refer the Secretary of State to his statement that he would make a further proclamation this week about creating a restoration committee for Northern Ireland, which he hopes that the party leaders will attend? Does not he believe that that might frustrate the work of the Assembly, the primary purpose of which is to restore Executive functions? What gives him the hope that, for example, the party leaders, who will not come together in the Assembly, will do so outside it in a restoration committee? Does not that make the shadow Assembly of even less substance by transferring its primary function outside that body?

Mr. Hain: I am giving further consideration to representations from all the parties, including the hon. Gentleman's, on the proposal for a committee to prepare for restored government. I am listening carefully to what people are saying, and there is a case for it. I know that he will understand that the proposal made by Sir Reg Empey of the Ulster Unionist party is not a model that I favour and that it has not found favour with the other parties. We must continue the consultations until I am in a position to move forward.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Cannot the Secretary of State summon the leadership of Sinn Fein and tell it simply and unequivocally that, unless it is prepared absolutely to forswear criminality, stop manipulating schemes for restorative justice and sign up to the rule of law, there can be no future for the Assembly and a power-sharing Executive in Northern Ireland? We all want him to succeed with that.

Mr. Hain: We all want a restored Executive and Assembly with everybody operating within the rule of law. I am encouraged by recent statements by senior Sinn Fein figures, including Martin McGuinness, condemning criminality and, unusually, saying that those who absconded in the Tohill case should return and be brought to justice. Such statements may be too late but they are nevertheless welcome and we must continue to put pressure on Sinn Fein, as the hon. Gentleman rightly says, to renounce all criminality, for the IRA to do so, too, and for everyone to operate within the rule of law.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): Can the Secretary of State give me a categorical assurance that no committee from anywhere will be set up to conduct the negotiations? The negotiations were promised between the Government and the parties and there cannot be another set of negotiations running alongside them. We know that the Prime Minister and the Minister are coming to talk to us. Will the Secretary of State assure me that no committee with power to negotiate will be set up? He knows the attitude of the Democratic Unionist party to that. We would not take part in any such committee. Hon. Members should be reminded that Sinn Fein is currently boycotting the Assembly's public meetings.

Mr. Hain: I believe that Sinn Fein should be at the Assembly's public sittings along with all the other parties. I am consulting the right hon. Gentleman's party along with the others about the proposal for a committee to prepare for restored government. I do not intend to give it any power to negotiate. I could neither do that nor force that on anyone. However, it would be helpful if there were a forum in which issues could be identified by all the parties. Negotiations will obviously take place with the Governments but there is an advantage to everyone seeing what is on the table before they take place.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): On setting up the full Northern Ireland Assembly, may I record Conservative Members' concern about the criminality and paramilitary activity of the Ulster Volunteer Force and the Ulster Defence Association? We call on them to abandon all criminality and paramilitary activity and completely decommission all their weapons. I am sure that the Secretary of State would like the opportunity to agree with me.

Mr. Hain: I fully agree with the hon. Gentleman, who has made his point with eloquence and force. It is a point that has been made across the House, and it has been stated with particular force by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) and by the members of the Democratic Unionist party sitting alongside her that all criminality by the UDA and the UVF must be ended now—and not before time.

Looked-after Children/Vulnerable Adults

3. Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): What plans he has to improve education provision and support for looked-after children and vulnerable adults in Northern Ireland. [72222]

4. Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): What steps he is taking to improve education provision and support for looked-after children and vulnerable adults in Northern Ireland. [72223]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Maria Eagle): In March 2006, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced £100 million additional funding for children and young people in Northern Ireland, of which £5.6 million has been set aside specifically for projects to improve the education provision and support for looked-after children and vulnerable young adults.

Jeff Ennis: I thank the Minister for her reply. I have always thought that the term "looked-after children" was a misnomer, because I have always regarded them as looked-over children. Will the Minister tell me what her Department is doing to ensure that looked-after children take the opportunity to stay on in education post-16?

Maria Eagle: I have every sympathy with my hon. Friend's view that looked-after children are often overlooked rather than looked after. We have a particular responsibility and obligation to do well by looked-after children, because we are effectively their parents. Part of the £5.6 million that I have mentioned will be spent on enabling children leaving care to stay on with their foster carers until they reach the age of 21. The resulting increase in stability will play a key role in improving the chances for looked-after children to achieve proper educational attainment in line with their peers. That in turn will be a key determinant in improving the life chances of this vulnerable group of young people.

Mary Creagh: Will my hon. Friend tell me what difference the new Education and Inspections Bill, which places a duty on local authorities to provide youth services for vulnerable young adults with learning disabilities, will make to such young people in Northern Ireland?

Maria Eagle: Providing support services for children and young people with learning disabilities is an essential part of enabling them to do well in life, and it is our commitment to those young people that we want them to do as well as they possibly can and to play their full part in society—including in education and jobs. The kind of support services to which my hon. Friend has referred play an essential part in ensuring that that happens.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): Can the Minister give me a categorical assurance that the ongoing survey of parents, teachers and members of the public on the way in which religious education is taught in schools in Northern Ireland is not an attempt to dilute the Bible-based Christian ethos that is fundamental to the people of Northern Ireland?

Maria Eagle: I am happy to make it absolutely clear that nothing being done by any of the Departments for which I am responsible, or by the Government, is aimed at undermining the ethos of schools or of religious education in Northern Ireland.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): Another group of vulnerable children is those who are registered blind. At present, only 30 per cent. of those who are in mainstream schools achieve five or more GCSEs, which is well below the Northern Ireland average. It has been suggested that one of the factors that contributes to this is the fact that, on average, those youngsters have access to only one text book for the full range of subjects that they are studying, even though the Royal National Institute of the Blind, and St. Joseph's School for the Visually Impaired in the Irish Republic, have the facilities to translate such books into Braille or to transfer them on to disks. What steps is the Minister taking to ensure that this gap in education provision for blind children in Northern Ireland is being bridged?

Maria Eagle: I have a great personal commitment to ensuring that disabled children, including children with a visual impairment, have the same chances as every other child to achieve to their utmost. I would be more than happy to look closely at what the hon. Gentleman has said and to come back to him with some more details.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): I welcome the Minister's commitment and the extra funding, but how does she reconcile that, and the commitment to special needs education, with the savage financial cuts being made by education and library boards? Those cuts are hitting the soft underbelly of education very hard, and seriously eroding those services. What we are giving with one hand, we are taking away with the other.

Maria Eagle: I do not accept that there are cuts in education spending in Northern Ireland. There has been a massive increase in spending, by more than 60 per cent., since 1997. There are demographic issues involved, however, and falling school rolls mean that the money has not always been used as efficiently as it might have been. That is why we are engaged in a strategic review of education, which will enable us to ensure that the big increases in spending planned for the future will be properly used to benefit the education of all the children of Northern Ireland.

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): What steps has the Minister taken to ensure that children in care have the same access to IT support as children in families? Will that include training?

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend raises an important point. I am happy to be able to tell him that more than £2 million is being invested in an education and training credit to make sure that a grant of at least £800 a year is given to foster carers, to enable them to make sure that each looked-after child has a computer. Having access to IT is one of the key ways in which children participate and do well at school. We must make sure that our looked-after children have that same access. In that regard, we are also making sure that every child who lives in a children's home has a computer of their own, not just one that might be available to more than one child. That should assist.

Northern Ireland Assembly

5. David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): If he will make a statement on the Government's intentions concerning the salaries and expenses of Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly. [72224]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): I have made it clear that should Assembly Members be unable to elect a First Minister, Deputy First Minister and Executive by 24 November, the salaries and allowances of Members of the Legislative Assembly would be cancelled immediately.

David Simpson: Since I tabled this question, the Belfast Telegraph has run a campaign in relation to mileage claims for Members of the Legislative Assembly. Does the Secretary of State agree that mileage claims for MLAs should be brought into line with those for Members of this House?

Mr. Hain: The Assembly ought to consider that issue, because many people in Northern Ireland are asking a question about that. The Assembly is perfectly free to set up a working group to resolve the issue and to make recommendations to me, and I hope that it does so.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is so noisy. Mr. Binley, perhaps your conversations could take place elsewhere.

Lembit Öpik: May I add my welcome to the Secretary of State's new ministerial helpers? I am sure that they will all be very happy together. I look forward to working with his team in the interests of peace over the next 20 to 30 years.

The Secretary of State says that he will cancel expenses immediately on 25 November. However, what arrangements is he making to manage the legal responsibilities of MLAs with regard to accommodation and staffing contracts, most of which involve periods of notice well beyond 24 November? If he is serious about avoiding that, how will he make sure that both Governments feed into the Assembly committee—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House is too noisy. Conversations should take place elsewhere.

Lembit Öpik: I will finish off now, Mr. Speaker. How will the Secretary of State make sure that both Governments feed into the Assembly committee on the restoration of devolution so that he does not have to cancel the expenses?

Mr. Hain: First, I am not sure that we will be here for 20 or 30 years, nice though that thought might be. Secondly, I do not want the Assembly to shut down on 24 November; I want restoration to succeed before then. The last thing that I want is to have to stop salaries and allowances and see the whole thing put on ice. That is the inevitability, however, if the parties are unable to agree. However, bearing in mind the hon. Gentleman's points, I shall circulate advice to Assembly Members in the late summer to make them aware of their legal obligations and to inform staff and particularly landlords should advice centres and constituency offices have to close if they are unable to agree.

Organised Crime

6. John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): What additional measures his Department has considered for engaging and developing cross-community support in tackling organised crime in Northern Ireland. [72225]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Paul Goggins): The Organised Crime Task Force is tackling organised crime on a cross-community basis with the support of the law enforcement agencies, the Northern Ireland Departments, the Policing Board and the business community.

John Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend for his answer and congratulate him and the Organised Crime Task Force on their work. The Organised Crime Task Force report of 2005 stated that the statistics show that loyalists and republicans are moving from sectarianism into organised crime. It said:

"of the gangs identified in last year's Threat Assessment, 70% remain active".

That did not include the splinter groups or the new gangs that came into the picture. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is fundamental for police groups and community groups to work together to ensure that the trend goes downwards, not upwards?

Paul Goggins: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. I know that he has a particular interest in the matter and that he has been very supportive of the relevant legislation. He is quite right that, if organised crime is taking place in order to line the pockets of organised criminal gangs or to fund paramilitary activity, those people need to know that the full force of the law will be brought to bear against them and that the agencies will work together to ensure that organised crime in Northern Ireland is combated.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): The issue in Northern Ireland is not the lack of cross-community support for the security forces in dealing with organised crime, although I note that Sinn Fein still does not support the police. I hope that the Minister will join me in urging that party to cross the line and support the rule of law. Is not the issue one of ensuring that the police, the Assets Recovery Agency, the Organised Crime Task Force and Revenue and Customs have the resources that they need to tackle the problem? Until organised crime and the grip of paramilitarism is broken, we will not have real peace in Northern Ireland.

Paul Goggins: I certainly join the hon. Gentleman in saying that all parties in Northern Ireland should fully support the rule of law. Of course that is the case. The agencies are well resourced and may I say that, under the incentivisation scheme that the Government have put in place, 50 per cent. of any assets recovered go back to the agency that recovered them and into front-line services? It therefore becomes a successful cycle in which more ill-gotten resources go back to the benefit of the community.

Northern Ireland Executive (Appointments)

7. Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): What his policy is on the appointment to ministerial office in the Northern Ireland Executive of people who do not support the police. [72226]

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): The Government believe that all parties, especially those holding ministerial office in a restored Northern Ireland Executive, should support policing arrangements in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Dunne: I thank the Minister for that reply. Can he conceive of any democracy—for example, the Republic of Ireland—in which Ministers hold office in an Executive without supporting the police? Will he support my call for Assembly Ministers to sign a new pledge of office to support the police and uphold the rule of law?

Mr. Hanson: The Government believe that support for the police should come from all political parties and I am encouraging all parties to play their role in the Policing Board. We currently have a pledge of office in place and I confirmed in a debate last week that we can discuss making revisions to it and having a new pledge if that is what people want. I am happy to discuss that with all parties.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): Would the Minister regard the Prime Minister as incompetent if he were to allow into his Cabinet someone who thought that it was optional whether or not he supported the police? Should not supporting the police be a requirement or are there double standards when it comes to Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hanson: As I have already confirmed, support for the police from all parties is something that we are working towards. I want Sinn Fein in particular to play its part in the Policing Board. We currently have a strong pledge of office and I am willing to discuss a revision of it with all parties. As I have already said, I am happy to do that in due course if the hon. Gentleman wishes to get agreement on those matters.

Northern Ireland Assembly

8. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future of the Northern Ireland Assembly. [72227]

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): I refer the hon. Gentleman to my earlier answer.

Mr. Bone: We will not allow terrorists or former terrorists to sit on the Treasury Bench, so why do the Government think that it is all right for such people to be involved in the Government of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hain: If the hon. Gentleman is referring to Sinn Fein, the fact is that the Independent Monitoring Commission has spelled out in categorical terms that Sinn Fein and the IRA have turned their backs on their past paramilitary activities and violence, and that they are increasingly doing so in respect of criminality, too. That puts us in a good position to seek agreement between the parties to restore the Northern Ireland Assembly and the Executive and to bring local democracy to Northern Ireland.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): If it is confirmed to the Secretary of State and the House that Martin McGuinness attended a paramilitary display in Londonderry at the weekend, will the right hon. Gentleman now tell the House that he has thus proved himself totally incapable of gaining the confidence of the people in respect of playing a part in any Northern Ireland Executive?

Mr. Hain: As I have just said, it is very important that we recognise the enormous change that has taken place. As the hon. Gentleman will know, because he and his colleagues and relatives have suffered over the years, there has been an enormous sea change since bombs and bullets were being let off by the IRA and other paramilitary organisations every day of the week. We must take advantage of that sea change, and build with confidence. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's party will agree to move forward, with all the other parties, and establish a restored democratic Government for Northern Ireland.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [73142] Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 24 May.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before listing my engagements, I should say that during this week we have sadly lost a Member of our House. Eric Forth was a redoubtable opponent, caustic at times, fearless and principled always, often witty—a lot of it at my expense—but also privately immensely courteous, friendly, and just a thoroughly decent man. We all send our deepest sympathy and condolences to his family.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Dr. Wright: I am sure that the whole House will want to associate itself with what the Prime Minister has just said.

When the Prime Minister was in Baghdad this week, the former American ambassador to the United Nations, Richard Holbrooke, was in this country, saying that it was now ridiculous for anyone to suggest that Iraq was not in a state of civil war. Does the Prime Minister agree, and where does that leave our promise not to leave Iraq until a stable democracy has been established?

The Prime Minister: I think that the people best able to give a sense of where Iraq is today, and where it needs to be, are the people who are now in government, elected by 12 million Iraqi votes. What they describe to me is a situation in which, for the first time, they have a genuine unity Government. In other words, we have Sunni, Shi'a and Kurds sitting down and working together, all of them representing parties that have stood in elections and been elected by the people of Iraq. I may say that none of them wanted the multinational force to withdraw immediately, but all of them believe that the terrorism that is attempting to push their country into civil war is a terrorism that has to be defeated—that can be defeated—by the united will of the Iraqi people who want democracy, and the international community that should support them in that endeavour.

I believe that, as the new Prime Minister of Iraq said to me, if we defeat terrorism there we will defeat it everywhere.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): May I begin by adding my tribute to Eric Forth. He was a master at this Dispatch Box. He had a quick wit, a brilliant mind and, above all, a dedication to this place. While he loved the Commons, he also worked hard for people in Bromley and Chislehurst. From his seat just behind me, he gave a running commentary on Prime Minister's Question Time. He had a few things to say about the Prime Minister's performance, but just as often he had a few things to say about mine as well. He always spoke his mind about everything, but he was a principled defender of what he believed in, and he will be missed by everyone.

The new Home Secretary has said that the immigration and nationality directorate, after nine years of a Labour Government, is "inadequate", "dysfunctional" and "not fit for purpose". More than two years ago, in February 2004, the Prime Minister said:

"The IND is a transformed part of the Home Office".

Does the Prime Minister now agree that that judgment was completely wrong?

The Prime Minister: Let me give the right hon. Gentleman the facts of what has changed over the past nine years. I think it is fair to point out that whereas over the last four years of the Conservative Government the number of asylum applications rose by 50 per cent.—[Interruption.] This is on the record. We have reduced the number of asylum claims to below the number that we inherited in 1997. Whereas that Government used to take 22 months over initial asylum applications, 80 per cent. are now decided within two months. We have doubled the number of failed asylum seekers who are removed, and unlike the previous Government we now actually know the number of people whom we need to deport and can deport them.

I agree that a huge amount still needs to be done, for the reasons given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. We have waves of migration, not just in this country but throughout Europe. Migration is a major issue in the United States at the moment for the self-same reasons. There has been, as my right hon. Friend said, huge progress in the past nine years, but there needs to be much more.

Mr. Cameron: To try to blame previous Conservative Home Secretaries just will not wash. The Prime Minister will be blaming Sir Robert Peel next. Let us be clear about what the Prime Minister said and what the Home Secretary said. The Prime Minister said that the IND

"is a transformed part of the Home Office...How has it done it? By changing the law; by innovating, by setting targets; by leadership; by focusing on results."

The Home Secretary, who is trying to help the Prime Minister in his hour of need, said:

"It is inadequate in terms of its information technology, leadership, management systems and processes."

How can those two possibly wash?

The Prime Minister: For the very reason that I have just given to the right hon. Gentleman. [Interruption.] No, I am not blaming the last Conservative Government. I am simply pointing out that the system that we inherited in 1997 took ages to decide asylum claims, and that it was a system in which the number of asylum seekers rose and failed asylum seekers were not removed. It is a fact that the number of asylum claims is now down; it is a fact that the number of removals has now doubled; and it is a fact that 80 per cent. of claims are now decided in two months. It is also, however, the case that much more needs to be done.

Mr. Cameron: All right; if Ministers are going to take responsibility, perhaps the Prime Minister can answer this. Can he explain why the Minister who has been judged too incompetent to run the immigration part of the Home Office has been put in charge of the police?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept that that is why my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) has been moved, and I point out that, under him, we actually doubled the number of removals of failed asylum seekers.

Let us turn to the measures that we now need to take. We need to introduce the new immigration points system, as we have outlined, but we also need to introduce the electronic borders that we have suggested, and we need a proper system of identity for everybody in this country. In addition, we need to change the law on deportation. Let me just point out to the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) that every time that this Government have sought to take measures—[Interruption.] Well, yes, but although the Opposition talk about tackling the problem in general, they oppose the measures in particular that are necessary to do it. So let me point out to the right hon. Gentleman that they opposed the measures that increased our powers to deport, they opposed—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentlemen must give the Prime Minister an opportunity to answer the question. There is far too much shouting down.

The Prime Minister: I was merely pointing out to the right hon. Member for Witney that every time he and his party have had an opportunity to vote for tougher measures—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I tell you this: when people hiss, I cannot find out who is hissing, so the next move is that I suspend the House, and we do not have Prime Minister's Question Time. [Interruption.] Order. So the behaviour must improve, or I suspend the House. That is the next move.

The Prime Minister: I was merely pointing out to Opposition Members that every time that we have proposed tougher measures—for example, to deport people or to fine those illegally getting people into our country—and every time that we have tried to tighten the law on those people who are in prison and whom we need to deport, the Opposition have voted against it. [Interruption.] It is no use the right hon. Gentleman looking puzzled. Does he want me to go through each and every measure? [Interruption.] Right. The Opposition voted against deporting foreign national prisoners at the halfway point of their sentence. They voted against removing refugee convention protection from all prisoners sentenced to two years. They voted against the single-tier appeal system, which is an absolutely vital part of getting people out of the country. They failed to support fines for carriers of illegal immigrants, and they failed to support one-stop appeals or penalties for spurious appeals. They also abstained on the measures for a points system and for limiting the rights of appeal in this country. In other words, the charge against the right hon. Gentleman, with respect, is that every time that we propose a tough measure, he opposes it.

Mr. Cameron: Honestly, it is hard to know where to start. If the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) was doing such a good job, why was he moved? The Prime Minister says that we have opposed his legislation: we have been telling him about the problems with the Human Rights Act 1998 for years, and he said that everything was fine. In the last week, we have learned that 95 foreign criminals who have committed serious crimes are still at large; 700 people escaped from open prisons last year; and illegal immigrants have been allowed to clean the offices of the Department that is meant to remove them. That is a typical week in Labour's Home Office.

While all the other Ministers are being moved, there is one Minister who has held the same job for nine years and who said that law and order was his priority. When will the Prime Minister take personal responsibility for the shambles?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to take personal responsibility, but I remind the right hon. Gentleman that according to the British crime survey, overall crime is down, not up. We have put in place the antisocial behaviour legislation—measures that he also failed to support in this House. We have also toughened sentences, which is why there are more people in prison serving longer prison sentences. He voted against the measures that allowed us to do that. In addition, we have an extra 14,000 police officers, and he voted against the investment for that. With the greatest respect again, although he talks in general about how much he cares about crime, he ends up voting in particular against the measures necessary to deal with it.

Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow) (Lab): Ten people a week die from asbestos-related cancers because of the negligence of their former employers. I do not expect my right hon. Friend to give an answer right now, but will he look into the issue as a matter of urgency, to ensure that those workers get their rightful compensation instead of being dragged through the courts by multinational companies?

The Prime Minister: I know about the issue that my hon. Friend raises and I have met other hon. Members to discuss it. I hope that in the next few weeks we will be able to provide some comfort and succour to the people in the position that my hon. Friend describes.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): May I associate my right hon. and hon. Friends with the tributes paid to Eric Forth. I, too, can pay tribute to his occasionally painful wit.

Following the tragic shootings in Dunblane 10 years ago, Lord Cullen recommended a national firearms register. Why has the Home Office not yet put that in place?

The Prime Minister: We have of course banned the use of handguns and taken many other measures, including saying that those in illegal possession of a firearm get a minimum five-year sentence. We believe that the measures that we have taken, along with the other measures that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is announcing today, are the best way to deal with the issue.

Sir Menzies Campbell: But three weeks ago, the Prime Minister told me that the Home Office was fit for purpose: yesterday, the Home Secretary said that it was not. Which is it?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the reasons that I have just been explaining to the Leader of the Opposition. There are huge challenges in the immigration and nationality directorate, because of the changing nature of migration, and if we want to deal with those issues, we have to take measures that allow us to do so. I was saying a moment or two ago that the Conservative party had voted against many of the measures necessary to strengthen the law on immigration, asylum and crime. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has been thoroughly consistent and voted against every measure necessary to strengthen the law against illegal immigration, against unfounded asylum seekers and in respect of crime. If he and the Conservative party want to support the police and others in the work that they do, I hope that they will support the next measures that we introduce.

Q2. [73143] Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What can my right hon. Friend say to my constituent, Mr. John Flynn of Llanishen in Cardiff, North, who worked for Allied Steel and Wire for 30 years and will retire next year at 65, when he will receive a works pension of £80 instead of the £800 that he was expecting and had contributed to for 30 years? Can my right hon. Friend extend the financial assistance scheme to help Mr. Flynn and all the other Allied Steel and Wire pensioners?

The Prime Minister: As I think I said in March, there is a strong and compelling campaign for the review of the financial assistance scheme. I said then that we would expedite it: we have done so and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions will make a statement tomorrow on the pensions White Paper that will also deal with that issue.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney): The Education and Inspections Bill to be considered later today will give schools greater independence, raise standards and give parents more choice. It will pass without being wrecked because we have given it our backing. The Prime Minister has been prepared to drop tribal politics and accept Conservative support in the interests of parents and pupils. Does he think that the Chancellor will take the same approach?

The Prime Minister: Well, I shall point out to the right hon. Gentleman what the Chancellor has done. We have the strongest economy since the war, and interest rates that are—

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): Go on.

The Prime Minister: Yes, I shall take every opportunity to do so. The Leader of the Opposition asked me about the Chancellor, and I should like to talk about him. As a result of my right hon. Friend's economic record, interest rates are half what they were, unemployment is down and employment is up. We have been able to invest in schools, in our pupils and in higher education. I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that that investment, along with the reform, will continue.

Mr. Cameron: If the Chancellor is doing such a good job, why does not the Prime Minister let him take over? [Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: The Leader of the Opposition may want to forget it, but we had a general election a year ago. We won, they lost.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): I know that the Prime Minister is aware that the question of illegal immigration is in the papers consistently. It is a difficult one, but I came across a case the other day involving a man from Ghana. He came here for an eye operation, and stayed for 10 years on benefits. This bloke did not work at the Home Office; he was a Tory party worker in 1995. The Home Secretary at the time should have been counting illegal immigrants, but he missed one right under his nose. We are now told that the Tory party wants to spread happiness—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: I do not know whether that man's greater mistake was to enter this country illegally or to work for Tory central office.

Q3. [73144] Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): In January, the Government's Health White Paper said:

"We will develop a new generation of modern NHS community hospitals."

Just before last year's general election, the West Suffolk primary care trust confirmed that a new community hospital would be built in Sudbury, in my constituency. Those plans were cancelled just after the election, and the trust has now decided to shut the existing and highly valued community hospital. Does the Prime Minister want his legacy to the people of Suffolk to be the destruction of their health service, or would he prefer to meet my constituents for just 10 minutes to understand why they prefer the policy in the White Paper to what is happening on the ground?

The Prime Minister: The organisation of services is obviously a matter for the local PCT and strategic health authority, but I point out to the hon. Gentleman that health funding has increased by more than 30 per cent. in the past three years, and that it is due to increase by 20 per cent. in the next two. As a matter of fact, I think that our record in respect of his health authority is rather good. The number of people there waiting more than six months for in-patient treatment has fallen—[Hon. Members: "Oh."] Well, Opposition Members should know that people care about these matters. The number of people waiting more than six months for in-patient treatment has fallen from more than 12,000 to just two. That is part of this Government's record.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): Does the Prime Minister think it right that only 30 per cent. of women reaching state retirement age are entitled to a full state pension? That compares with 85 per cent. of men.

The Prime Minister: No, and that is one reason why it was so important to have the Turner commission and report. Tomorrow, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions will set out the Government's view of the long-term pension framework for the future. However, my hon. Friend is right to say that many women have not built up their pension contributions because they have been unable to work, perhaps because they have had to care for someone. That is precisely one of the matters that my right hon. Friend will address tomorrow.

Nuffield Speech and Language Unit

Q4. [73145] John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future of the Nuffield Speech and Language Unit.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman raises an important issue and I recognise that it is something about which he feels strongly. The staff at the Nuffield speech and language unit have a good track record in providing intensive speech and language therapy to children with severe learning difficulties. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the future of the unit is currently under consultation. However, I understand that the trust will hold a meeting later this week to discuss the whole future of the unit. I am sure that the Royal Free Hampstead NHS Trust will listen to all the views expressed before making a final decision.

John Bercow: I thank the Prime Minister for that helpful and informative reply. For 35 years, the Nuffield unit has provided the specialist help for children with very severe speech and language disorders that the Prime Minister described. Given, however, that as things stand the unit faces the threat of closure purely on financial grounds, will the Prime Minister agree to consider how to safeguard it, whether by specialised commissioning or by some other means, as a unique resource for the benefit of some of the most vulnerable children in the country?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, this is primarily a matter for the trust, but we certainly should consider how to preserve the unit and its expertise. The hon. Gentleman knows what the issue is: as I understand it, there are a number of children in the unit at present, but a significant proportion of them are due to leave in July and therefore the income for the unit will diminish. However, I understand that referrals have been taking place over the past few weeks, so it is in that context that the meeting will take place next week. I am happy to keep an eye on the matter personally and to correspond with the hon. Gentleman about the outcome of the meeting.

Engagements

Q5. [73146] Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): Will the Prime Minister confirm that he did indeed ask the Deputy Prime Minister to give up his grace and favour mansion at Dorneywood?

The Prime Minister: I have no intention whatever of discussing the reshuffle or any matters associated with it.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the appalling murder last week of Kiyan Prince, a popular, hard-working student at the London academy in my constituency—a 15-year-old boy whose bright future was tragically cut short by an assailant's knife. We all hope that the knife amnesty starting today will succeed, but what can my right hon. Friend do to convince young men that knives are not fashion accessories but offensive weapons and that carrying a knife risks a heavy sentence and increases the likelihood of becoming another knife victim?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, that was a particularly tragic case and our condolences go to the family of my hon. Friend's constituent. As he is aware, the knife amnesty starts today; such an amnesty worked successfully some years back and, we hope, will again. It follows the successful gun amnesty in April 2003. In addition, we are doing two other things: adding a range of knives to the offensive weapons list and raising the minimum age at which a person can buy a knife. Where a child is threatened in any way it will constitute an aggravating factor. With the police, we will continue to do everything we can both to ensure that the penalties for those in illegal possession of a knife are sufficient and to discourage young people from getting into a knife and gun culture, which is not just appalling for its victims and the people who suffer its violence but does nothing for the lives of those engaged in it.

Q6. [73147] Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): Given that the Hutton report was an inquiry about the death of a public servant, should copies signed by celebrities be auctioned to raise funds for a political party?

The Prime Minister: I do not believe that any offence to anyone was intended.

Q7. [73148] Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): This week, at the start of the UK-wide knife amnesty, the Scottish Parliament will be debating an amendment proposed by my MSP, Charlie Gordon, which calls for mandatory prison sentences for anyone carrying a knife in public, in exactly the same way as the law currently deals with those carrying guns. Will the Prime Minister consider introducing a similar law for the rest of our country?

The Prime Minister: We are certainly looking carefully at how we can deal with that situation, which is somewhat different from that of guns, because there can be reasons for particular people to carry a knife. We are giving urgent consideration not just to banning a whole series of other knives that could be used as offensive weapons, but also to ensuring that there is a minimum sentence if someone is found in possession of a knife without good reason. That is something well worth looking at.

Q8. [73149] Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): In 1997, the Prime Minister said that things can only get better. Nine years on, when will the Home Office get better?

The Prime Minister: First, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to say how things have got better. The economy is stronger, unemployment is down and employment is up; waiting lists and times are down in the national health service; and school results have improved at 11, 14, 16 and 18. In relation to the Home Office, crime is down, as I pointed out earlier, and there are record numbers of police—indeed, there are record numbers of police in his own area.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may have noticed that the EU is trying to control the salaries of top football players. Does he agree that the salaries of some others—those who run railway companies, chief executives of housing associations, and even vice-chancellors—are out of control, especially by comparison with the pay awards being received by those who work for them? Surely nobody should earn more than the person who runs the country.

The Prime Minister: I am not sure about that. I thought that my hon. Friend was going to make a really helpful suggestion and say that the person who runs the country should be paid the same as the footballers, but no. There are always issues about how many people we should have on what salaries, but my own view of this, including in relation to football, is that it is very difficult to find a system that properly controls such things, especially in what is pretty much a global commercial market.

Q9. [73150] Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): The health White Paper says that community hospitals threatened with closure should not be lost for short-term budgetary reasons. Both Dilke and Lydney community hospitals in my constituency are threatened with closure for exactly that reason. What is the Prime Minister going to do about it?

The Prime Minister: It is surely the case that, in the end, the question for the Government is the amount of money that we give to areas such as the hon. Gentleman's, and we have increased the funding again dramatically over the last few years. It has been doubled over the period of this Government. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where has it gone?] I can explain where it has gone in the hon. Gentleman's own area. There are almost 3,000 more nurses, 500 more consultants, 400 more GPs, and a new £32 million hospital opened in March 2005—the new Honeybourne specialist rehabilitation and recovery centre. There is a massive amount of work going on in his area, but in the end how services are organised has got to be for the locality.

Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): Will the Prime Minister join me in congratulating the Swansea division of the South Wales police on its excellent recent crime figures? Overall crime is down by 32 per cent., burglary is down by 32 per cent. and auto crime is down by 48 per cent. I am sure that he will agree that those figures are worth celebrating.

The Prime Minister: I am very happy to congratulate the police in my hon. Friend's constituency. Of course, that is part of a pattern in which crime has fallen overall in the past few years. That is no consolation to anybody who is a victim of crime, but the fact is that the police have got more resources than ever before and the law has been toughened to allow them to deal with things such as antisocial behaviour and now serious and organised crime. I am delighted to see that that has produced such good results in her constituency.

Q10. [73151] Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): In Northamptonshire, 250 people are classified as persistent and prolific offenders and they commit 85 per cent of the crime in the county. Should not the law be changed to ensure that those people, when caught and sentenced, serve their time in jail in full?

The Prime Minister: Surely the most important thing is that, all the way through their sentence and afterwards, they are properly monitored and supervised so that even after they have left prison—because some people who are prolific offenders will leave prison—they are supervised in a way that allows us to track their movements and to know exactly what is happening to them. Those are precisely the measures that we included in the legislation that the hon. Gentleman and his party abstained on. What I say to him is that if we want to tackle any of those issues, whether they are to do with drugs or organised crime—where, again, the measures were either voted against by the Conservative party or abstained on—we have to have the measures necessary. We will propose those measures and I hope that he supports them.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I remind the Prime Minister that he and I were elected on a manifesto that included a commitment to make bank holidays over and above the minimum national holiday provision. Will he give an undertaking that that commitment will be fulfilled and implemented by the third summer of this Parliament?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has rightly referred to the Warwick agreement, and I assure him that it will be honoured in full, as we have said to trade unions and employers. It will bring decent minimum standards into the workplace, which is an important difference between the Labour Party and the Conservative party.

Points of Order

12.30 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to raise a question relating to the fitness for purpose of the Home Secretary, the former Home Secretary and the former Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality in respect of a priority question that I tabled just before the former Home Secretary was sacked. It asked what account the Home Secretary had taken, in exercising his discretion in implementing his policy on the deportation of foreign national convicted persons, of the Human Rights Act 1998 and article 3 of the European convention on human rights. It was tabled on 3 May, but 16 days later all I have received is a holding reply. Will you, Mr. Speaker, please insist that that question, which I tabled on 3 May, be answered forthwith?

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of his point of order. There appears to have been a lengthy delay in that case, and I will seek an explanation from the Minister concerned. There are currently too many such delays on questions to Departments. I remind the Ministers of their duty to the House to give timely answers to questions, as set out in "Erskine May".

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Jack Straw): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker, I apologise to the hon. Gentleman for that lapse. I have listened carefully to your remarks, Mr. Speaker, and will ensure that that matter is treated with the seriousness that it deserves by my colleagues in the Government.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Leader of the House.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I seek your guidance. I wonder whether it is acceptable for hon. Members to sell publicly provided documents for the financial benefit of a political party. I would be grateful if you issued guidance for the elimination of doubt for hon. Members. If that practice is not acceptable, will you issue guidance on whether you would handle such a breach, or whether it would be better referred to the Committee on Standards in Public Life?

Mr. Speaker: I understand that there is an early-day motion regarding that matter, which the Chair should not be drawn into. The hon. Gentleman should sign the early-day motion, if he so wishes, although I am not encouraging him to do so.

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker, Dr. David Kelly was a constituent of mine. Earlier, the Prime Minister said that no offence was intended to be caused by the sale of that document, but I assure him that it was caused. I have heard you say that you do not want to be involved in the debate, Mr. Speaker, but I wonder whether it would be in order for a Cabinet Office Minister to attend this House to make a statement—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must stop the hon. Gentleman there, because it was not clear that the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) was referring to an hon. Member's family. I would not expect anyone to draw the Chair into an argument about any hon. Member's family, whether that hon. Member is a humble Back Bencher or the Prime Minister. I will not do that, and I hope that that does not become a practice of the House.

Bill presented

SUSTAINABLE COMMUNITIES

Julia Goldsworthy, supported by Mr. David Drew, Gregory Barker, Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, Chris Huhne, Alan Simpson, Mr. Henry Bellingham, Andrew Stunell, Mr. Douglas Carswell, Jeremy Corbyn, Tim Farron and Mr. Dan Rogerson, presented a Bill to make provision for local authorities to submit plans to the Secretary of State in connection with promoting the sustainability of local communities; to provide for parish councils and other persons to participate in the formulation of such plans; to provide for the Secretary of State to assist local authorities in promoting sustainable communities; to specify the indicators by which the sustainability of local authorities may be measured; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 June, and to be printed. [Bill 187].

Sunday Trading Act 1994 (Amendment)

12.34 pm

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Sunday Trading Act 1994 to limit the hours of opening of large shops on Sundays and other specified days.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to present to the House a Bill that will limit the hours in which large supermarkets and other stores trade on a Sunday at present. I do so because I believe that every politician in the House must answer a simple question: what kind of society do we wish to create? In 1994, did we really wish to create a seven-days-a-week society, with each day identical to the previous one? Did we wish to make Sunday the same as a Saturday, Friday or Monday? I do not believe that we did.

A healthy society has a rhythm to life, not a monotony of work, work, work, shop, work, shop, shop, work, or whatever. To me, that is not good for a healthy society. I am worried about families, and I want to help them to be together, not to split them apart so that one partner works on a Sunday while the other looks after the children, allowing them to work on a Monday while the first partner looks after the children. That is not good for families. Families are generally a unit of two partners and children. I think that it is good if families can spend time together as a unit, rather than each partner spending time individually with the children. There are other opportunities that are missing from the rhythm of life.

Although I am a Christian—I am a Roman Catholic and I go to church—that is not the fundamental reason why I am proposing the Bill. I am suggesting that one day has to be different, and it does not matter whether that is for religious observance, a sporting interest, leisure, or time with the children. I fundamentally believe that, for a healthy society, such a difference must go on.

Let us consider the impact of the 1994 Act. The Government-commissioned Indepen report stated that the changes that have occurred since 1994 include the extension of Sunday opening and its continuing growth. The report concludes that congestion has increased on Sundays as more and more people go to the shops. However, more importantly for those who have to work on Sundays, there has been a reduction in the Sunday wage premium. Those who find themselves with little choice but to work on Sundays are thus finding that their reward for giving up their day off with their families is being reduced.

When we consider what people want, we must look at the changes that have occurred. One of the big changes to the grocery trade has been the growth of the big four. The big four now have 70 per cent. of all grocery trade. The Department of Trade and Industry's response to that is not to say, "Hold on a second. Aren't just four companies dominating the whole market?" It has refused year after year to examine that situation to determine whether there is fair trading, although there is some give on that at the moment.

The Department's proposals are actually the reverse of mine. It proposes to consult on deregulating Sundays altogether. The only consequence of that would be to increase the dominance of the big four. It would work to the detriment of small shops, and there would be not only no rhythm of life in society in the week, but no rhythm of where people can go to shop: the convenience stores would all close because they could not compete with the buying power of the large supermarkets.

What sort of society do we want? Is it one that is led by the market? I believe that that should not be the case. The market should serve us, not we serve the market. A survey by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, which does not support my proposals—it wants the existing regulations to remain in place; it does not want an extension of opening hours, but nor does it want to go back to the situation in 1994—showed that 43 per cent. of those who responded did not want to work on Sundays but often had to, that 37 per cent. did not mind working on Sundays occasionally, and that only 20 per cent. wanted to work on Sundays. The reality is, however, that more and more people are being forced to. I am aware of people in my constituency who are frightened to say no to their employers when it comes to Sunday working. The number of workers who are now protected is falling because work within the sector tends to be short term.

However, not only are shop workers affected by Sunday opening; so are street cleaners, who have to go out on a Sunday because there is now more mess on that day; so are bus drivers, because people want to go to the shops and there is pressure on services on Sundays; so are lorry drivers, who have to give up their weekends to make deliveries to stores; so are the police, who now have to do more work because shops are open on a Sunday; so are traffic wardens, who have to control the traffic on Sundays; and so are fire crews, who have to staff the fire stations because there is an increased risk of their being called out because of the shops and additional offices that are open on a Sunday. The 1994 Act has had an impact not just on the rhythm of life and on workers who are forced to give up their free time to work on a Sunday, but on a lot of other people in many other sectors.

Let me quote two or three cases that have been put to me. A woman working for a large department store in Swansea wrote to Keep Sunday Special, saying:

"I feel enormous pressure exerted on me to work Sundays, not only by my employer, but by my colleagues, many of whom felt threatened and worried by recent redundancies. I approached a supervisor, pointing out that legally I could not be forced to work on a Sunday. I was told that it was in my interests to be part of the team...no one else is complaining!"

People have contacted Working Families, which also wants to keep the status quo. It said:

"One caller had been working weekend shifts for many years while her ex-partner looked after the children. However, when he moved away she was left with no cover. She simply couldn't work weekends any more."

She lost her job as a consequence. Working Families also said:

"Another caller had had his shift patterns changed unilaterally to include some weekends, which coincided with when his wife worked. His employer wasn't prepared to fit shifts around partners. We advised the caller of his rights regarding flexible working, but he said that both he and his wife were too scared of losing their jobs to do anything."

That is the reality of Sunday work.

There is support for a change from the Churches, and the United Reformed Church used the phrase "rhythm of life" in its letter to me. Between 71 and 80 per cent. of parents say that they have no choice about whether they work weekends. They are not like MPs, who may opt to do their casework on a Sunday. Instead, they are the poorer members of society—the people who are forced to work. For them, we need to look at the legislation and to change it. For society as a whole, we need to look at it and change it. I believe passionately that Sunday needs to be different. We need a day when we can relax, meditate, play sport or go to church.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Richard Younger-Ross, Dr. John Pugh, Mr. Colin Breed, Andrew Stunell, Mr. David Anderson, Stephen Pound, Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas, Miss Ann Widdecombe, Peter Luff and Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger.

Sunday Trading Act 1994 (Amendment)

Richard Younger-Ross accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Sunday Trading Act 1994 to limit the hours of opening of large shops on Sundays and other specified days: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 20 October, and to be printed [Bill 186].

Government amendment No. 67.

Mr. Hayes: I am delighted to speak to new clause 4, and the other new clauses and amendments in this group.

For the benefit of the House, the new clauses that I have tabled with my hon. Friends mount a strong defence of the role of special schools in the service of special needs children. Last night, we ended our consideration of the Bill with a debate on school discipline and the quality of life in schools: their ethos and atmosphere. I hope that that debate marks the start of a war on thugs and bullies and a crusade for their victims.

Most strong, confident, able children will survive any school, but that is not so for the most vulnerable, including children with special educational needs. They are indeed special, and they deserve our special care and concern. Every parent knows the protective instinct evoked by a fragile, innocent child as we wonder at their beauty. Imagine the intensity of those feelings in the case of a child who is especially fragile, physically or emotionally, because of special needs.

I invite the House, in considering the new clauses and amendments, to attempt for a short time to share those emotions. I do so with little doubt about the good will in all parts of the House on the subject, which is not a matter of party affinity or prejudice. It is not, however, unaffected by ideology or even dogma. The unrelenting pursuit of the integrationist policies that followed the Warnock report in 1978 and the Education Act 1981, which was introduced by a Conservative Government, could hardly have been more dogmatic.

That dogma has coloured our perception for too long. When introducing the Special Needs and Disability Bill—I was pleased to serve as a Front-Bench spokesmen on the Standing Committee that considered that Bill—Baroness Blackstone said in the Lords that "commitment to inclusion has been strong and constant...The potential social, moral and educational benefits are significant."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 19 December 2000; Vol. 620, c. 635.]

As I said in Committee, the order in which she listed those benefits is interesting. We are, of course, concerned about the social, moral and cultural needs of people with learning difficulties, but their educational needs are always more significant than any cultural or social benefits that we might derive for them, their contemporaries or their schools. I could put it more bluntly: children's futures count—not the guilt-ridden consciences of the liberal bourgeoisie.

Closed minds have closed schools, and thus damaged lives. Of course, none of that was malevolent, and much of it was fuelled by the best intentions. But as we know, the path to hell is paved with good intentions. The integrationist broad-brush approach to an infinitely complex issue has damaged the educational prospects of countless children.

Of course, many children with special educational needs, where their parents wish it and where their needs can be accommodated, do well in mainstream schools and in special units attached to mainstream schools. I celebrate the work of those schools and of the teachers so committed to their important duty. However, there are two fundamental problems with integration. The first is that the resources necessary properly to meet the stated needs of children rarely follow them into mainstream schools. That is certainly true of staff training.

The former head of a middle school with a special unit tells of the practical costs of the policy in a letter referring to these matters published in the national media this week. He writes:

"When I was appointed head, I was not asked at the interview if I had any experience of children with special needs. I didn't. When I took up the post, I discovered that the teachers at the unit of 24 children with special needs ranging from emotional behavioural difficulties to mild autism also had no specialist qualifications. In a school of 400, these children took up at least half of my administrative time. The teachers were often off sick and most of the children in the unit would, in my view, have been better served in special schools. Inclusion may sound good in theory, but the practicalities often tell a different story."

So it is not surprising that, according to the comprehensive review conducted by The Times Educational Supplement last year, two thirds of teachers receive less than one day's training in how to teach children with special needs, and 90 per cent. of head teachers thought that their schools did not receive sufficient resources to fund integration.

That is perhaps why the amendments have been welcomed by the National Union of Teachers as an important set of improvements to the Bill. It is why the orthodox thinking on the subject among teachers and others has moved to the position that I have held from the early 1980s onwards, when I first became interested in special educational needs. I recall from that period—the mid-1980s—supporting many struggling parents who wanted their children taught in special schools, sometimes out of authority or even out of country, because they knew that that was the best way of allowing their children to fulfil their potential.

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): In new clause 4(5) the proposal is that a child with special educational needs

"shall not be educated in a mainstream school if that is incompatible with the wishes of his parents."

Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he would also subscribe to the view that a child with special educational needs shall not be educated in a special school if that is incompatible with the wishes of his parents?

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman makes a telling point, and he is right that parental wishes are paramount in these matters. I would not wish any child whose parents did not wish it or whose needs were not best catered for there to be educated in a special school. As I said at the outset, the educational needs of the child should be paramount in our considerations. I know the hon. Gentleman has a longstanding commitment to the subject and a detailed knowledge of it. I pay regard to that. He, like many hon. Members, wants the best for children with special needs. This debate is about how we achieve that.

Roger Berry: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. There is an issue about the needs of the child and the wishes of parents, which may come out in the debate. If the hon. Gentleman agrees that where educating a child in a special school is incompatible with the wishes of his parents, that child should have the right to mainstream education, why has he not made that clear in the new clause?

Mr. Hayes: Because the war that has been waged since Warnock has not been a war against children being integrated into mainstream schools. It has been a war against special schools. The prejudice that has underpinned much of the policy that has emanated since Warnock has not been a prejudice in favour of special schools; it has been a prejudice against them. So parents who wanted their children educated in special schools have found it increasingly hard to get places in them as those schools have closed, as I shall describe later in my long but fascinating speech.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman accept, however, that in addition to people campaigning for special schools, as indeed they have for various reasons, there has also been a major problem for parents of a child with special needs who want that child in a mainstream school and want the necessary support? Many, many of my constituents campaign to get that support, because they want their child in a mainstream school.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Lady makes another important point—a slightly different one from the hon. Gentleman's—about resources, which I was dealing with. It is crucial that if a child is to be successfully educated in the mainstream, proper resources and training be put in place to facilitate their progress. It is often difficult for parents to achieve a statement in the first place. The statementing process is still too often long, complex and bureaucratic. It bamboozles many parents. They are intimidated by the whole subject of their child's education and opportunities. I agree with the hon. Lady that it can be a struggle, therefore, for them to find their way through that maze, get the necessary resources put in place, get a statement that is appropriate to their child's needs, and get the education they need where they want it delivered.

[Mr. Hayes]

I argue for parental choice and for the needs of the child to be paramount. I take the hon. Gentleman's point—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman points in a rather theatrical way to the new clause. No doubt he will make an interesting contribution to the debate when he has a chance to speak. I want to know whether he is on the side of the mainstream thinking, or on the side of the growing weight of opinion that regards the policy that has been put in place since Warnock as having failed. Baroness Warnock thinks so, the teachers think so and I think so. Does he wish to intervene and tell me?

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hayes: I would be delighted to give way to my hon. Friend.

John Bercow: The intellect of Einstein and the eloquence of Demosthenes warrant a bigger audience than my hon. Friend enjoys today. May I put it to him that the sensible mainstream non-ideological rejoinder to the noble Baroness Blackstone in asserting the merits of inclusion should be, "Up to a point, Lord Copper"? In the case with which I am currently concerned—the future of the Nuffield speech and language unit—it is a matter beyond argument that the reason for a significant decline in the referrals to the unit is that there is pressure on local authorities to reduce the number of statements and, in particular, to avoid wherever possible the fact and cost of out-of-area placements. Should not we accept that sometimes it makes sense to include and sometimes it does not?

Mr. Hayes: Absolutely. My hon. Friend has been a great champion of Nuffield. I was able to add to his campaign in a humble way in Committee by drawing attention to the excellent work done there. I congratulate him on all he does. He is, if I may say so, Jonathan to my David, Ernie to my Eric, Bosie to my Oscar in this respect.

My hon. Friend says, pertinently, that part of the problem is getting the right referrals. Because of doubts about resources, there is a reluctance to statement and to refer. Consequently, parental choices and children's needs are neglected along the way. I said at the outset that I celebrated the work of all those who made integration work for the very many children who have integrated into mainstream schools and enjoyed and benefited from the experience. My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) is right when he says that a one-size-fits-all policy—a broad-brush approach—is not right and not sufficient in relation to special needs.

Roger Berry: If the hon. Gentleman does not want a one-size-fits-all policy and wants to be non-ideological and reasonable, why on earth does subsection (5) of new clause 4 refer only to the right to attend a special school and not to the right to attend a mainstream school? That is as moderate and as reasonable as I can be.

1 pm

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman needs to study the new clause. Subsection (3) says:

> "If a statement is maintained under section 324 for the child, any person exercising any functions under this Part in respect of a child with special educational needs shall ensure that he is educated in either a mainstream school or a special school, having due regard to—
> (a) the wishes of the parent,
> (b) the provision of efficient education for other children, and
> (c) the efficient use of resources."

We make it absolutely clear that, given those important caveats about efficiency and appropriateness, a child could be educated in a mainstream school or a special school to good effect.

Roger Berry rose—

Mr. Hayes: I am not going to give way to the hon. Gentleman again. If he wants to speak, Mr. Speaker, perhaps he can catch your eye later, but he is not going to intervene on me any more, much as I like and admire him, because I need to make some progress.

John Bercow: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hayes: I will indeed give way to my hon. Friend, because whereas the hon. Member for Kingswood has had three bites of the cherry, he has had only one.

John Bercow: May I simply underline the rather obvious point that we do not need to have some sort of Manichaean divide between mainstream on the one hand and special schools on the other? I put it to my hon. Friend—I think that he understands the point extremely well—that when one intervenes early in cases of people with very severe learning difficulties and has specialist provision outside mainstream for a period, one can then facilitate re-entry to mainstream, but to suppose that all children can get by in mainstream represents a triumph of hope over reality.

Mr. Hayes: The point is twofold. First, special needs are dynamic, because their causes are often dynamic. A child's needs will vary; that is why we need to look at the statementing process to ensure that it is sufficiently sensitive to deal with those changing needs. Secondly, a child's educational progress may mean that they are better educated at different points in their education in different places. Again, we have to be sufficiently flexible to take account of that. A good example is indeed that of the Nuffield speech and language unit. My hon. Friend knows better than I do that the average time that a person spends at Nuffield is two years, because they move in and out of provision as their needs require. He is absolutely right that a static view about appropriateness has been one of the problems with policy.

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Hayes: I give way to the hon. Lady, who was an outstanding servant of the House when she served on the Standing Committee.

Ms Smith: I thank the hon. Gentleman. The Education Act 1996 makes it clear that one of the criteria for placing a child in a special school is the appropriateness of the provision. The new clause would remove that criterion, and in effect prioritises the efficient use of resources over the appropriateness of the provision. Does not he agree that that in itself invalidates it?

Mr. Hayes: The difficulty, as the hon. Lady will know from her experience in this House and previously, is that in practice a balance is often struck between appropriateness of provision and resources. Sadly, integration, if it is to work well, is often very resource-hungry. I do not want to be too simplistic about this because it depends on the need of the child at any one point in time, but the resource issue that the hon. Lady properly raises is one of the reasons why integration sometimes fails. That will be an ongoing concern and something that Members on both sides of the House will want to scrutinise and raise when appropriate, both nationally and in their own localities.

I must make a little more progress, or I will be chided by my own Front Benchers and other Members. [Interruption.] Well, I know that they are enjoying it, but like all good things it must eventually come to an end.

The results of last year's comprehensive survey of schools by The Times Educational Supplement were shocking. It revealed that teachers believe that up to 25,000 children in mainstream schools in England and Wales would be better off in special schools. More recently, the National Union of Teachers has said that inclusion amounts to" child abuse" in some cases. It speaks particularly of those children with the most serious conditions who struggled in the confusing regime of secondary schools, where they could be taught by 10 or more teachers a week in different classrooms. Those findings followed a report that the NUT commissioned from Cambridge university. It is certainly true that teachers, head teachers and governors around the country are increasingly alarmed about the effect of inclusion when resources and training do not follow the child.

The second problem with the policy that followed Warnock is that many secure, supportive and vastly experienced special schools have closed, as a direct result of the pernicious Warnock effect. Ninety-three schools have closed since the Prime Minister promised that things could only get better in 1997. Before the Minister tells me, as I am sure that he will, that the same number of children with special needs are educated in special schools as always were, which is usually the rejoinder when one talks about special school closures, let me give him the figures. From January 1999 to January 2005, the number of children educated in special schools has declined by more than 85,000. The truth is that many fewer children are being educated in special schools.

The Minister for Schools (Jim Knight) rose—

Mr. Hayes: The Minister is about to intervene on me with an even more salient and clever point than I anticipated, as he so often does.

Jim Knight: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman; I have been very patient. As he is interested in statistics, I remind him that in the past 10 years, 122 special schools have closed, while in the previous 10 years, 234 closed. The trend is going in the right direction. Since 1997, more than 300 special schools have opened, 90 in the past two years. We often use the statistic about the proportion of children who are in special schools, which has gone up by 1 per cent.

Mr. Hayes: Yes, but the hon. Gentleman will know that many of those openings have been special units within mainstream school campuses. By the end of the debate, can he unpick that figure a little more, break it down, and tell us how many of those schools are freestanding independent schools with their own governing body and so on?

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: I have given way so often that I am beginning to tire of my own verbiage, but I will do so again.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I want to speak against the hon. Gentleman's new clause. As he has been addressing the House, I have become increasingly concerned by his repeatedly saying that the most important thing is structures, whether special schools or mainstream schools. Last week, the Education Committee went to Darlington to see a truly excellent example of an establishment that brought together a secondary school, a primary school and a special school, and where the education was entirely centred on the children's needs. The whole educational debate is moving on to be child-centred, so that we look after the educational needs of all children and stop having this obsession with structures.

Mr. Hayes: As ever, the hon. Lady makes a good contribution to the debate. I was enjoying it immensely until she used the term, "child-centred" and then I began to think of all the dreadful, progressive, post-Plowden dogma about child-centred learning that did so much damage and to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) has drawn the House's attention on more than one occasion.

However, the hon. Lady is right that good education depends on much more than structure. It is sad that the Bill has necessarily focused our attention on structure when we should be discussing quality, as she so often does. Good education depends on the quality of teaching and learning; leadership; the home-school environment; and a proper understanding of children's needs. That mix makes for high quality education. Most important of all is the need to raise the status of teachers and to believe in education and in those to whom we entrust our children.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): I thank the hon. Gentleman for his generosity in giving way. He is being as generous as he was in Committee. New clause 5 deals with the closure of special schools. I am puzzled by an action by the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), the leader of the Conservative party, who declined to help the Vines special school in Battersea to prevent its closure. On 11 May, the governors and teachers called on him to help, but he declined. Does that mean that new clause 5 simply represents party politics? I am sad that the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) is engaging in that. If Conservative Members genuinely mean to prevent closures, why did their leader refuse to help? He was asked to help as Leader of the Opposition, not as an ordinary Member of Parliament.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Lady knows me too well to believe that I would make nakedly party political points about the subject. I do not make them. I acknowledge the point of the Minister for Schools that even more special school closures took place before 1997, when we were in government. I pointed out that the Education Act 1981 was introduced under our stewardship. My pedigree on the subject goes back to the 1980s when, as a county councillor, I defended, for example, Foxwood school in Bramcote from closure.

I shall not comment on the case that the hon. Lady mentioned, but I emphasise that although I am not interested in my advancement in this place and I would never toady to my leader or be a sycophant, I believe that my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) is not only noble, an intellectual giant and a fine leader of men, but that, in a short time, he will prove to be one of our nation's greatest Prime Ministers. Is that enough?

We should not ignore the cries from the heart and from the front line that we hear from teachers about special needs education. The practical cost of inclusion when it is not appropriate is clearly high, but that is not my main consideration. What we cannot quantify often counts most: the joy of a child who can relax, play and learn in the knowledge that he is safe; the relief of a teenager who no longer feels different; and the peace of mind of parents who simply want to entrust their children to people with the specialist skills and experience to help them achieve their potential.

One such parent wrote movingly to The Times only a few days ago. The letter stated:

> "My 15-year-old son is autistic and has severe learning difficulties. He has flourished since he was 5 in a special school... where he has had specialist teaching and therapy and loads of support. Why on earth would I want him to be the odd one out, taught (or more realistically babysat) by an unqualified classroom assistant in a mainstream school? He isn't like most other kids and I won't have him sacrificed on the altar of political correctness... Inclusion, for kids like mine, doesn't work and never will."

Such stories are common and the consensus among the parents of special needs children, who are surely best qualified to judge, is clear. A special needs child has special needs, which are best served by specialised teaching and care in an environment that caters for them.

1.15 pm

I repeat that there are many good special units, fine leaders and teachers in mainstream schools and that many children prosper in them. However, let us end the prejudice against special schools and special education. Denying parents of children with special needs the choice of a school that is tailored to their needs is dangerously proscriptive. Closing special schools denies that choice and that is why we have tabled the new clauses.

There are many other aspects to the complex subject that we are discussing. We must consider the early identification of need much more seriously. Hon. Members with an interest in specific elements of special needs know that that is vital for autistic children—early identification of need can make a great difference to their progress. Hon. Members also know that it is profoundly important in the case of children with emotional and behavioural difficulties whose lives can be changed if they are statemented and supported in the right way. Hon. Members know that the House—not the Government; I make no party political point—needs to get better at concentrating on the critical matter of early identification of need.

As I have said, 8 per cent. fewer special needs children are now secure in special schools. I was going to speak at length about Nuffield school, but I did that in Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham asked a question about it at Prime Minister's questions and there has been an extensive Adjournment debate on it. I know that hon. Members will want to pay attention to it if they have not already done so. It is one of many examples that I could list.

A recent report published by Rathbone, the national charity that provides advice and support to parents of children with special educational needs, is a damning indictment of the current SEN system. Evidence collected from 570 schools in 36 local education authorities reveals that alarming numbers of parents feel frustrated and let down by their child's school. Forty-two per cent. of parents questioned believed that their children had made no progress since being on the SEN register and 10 per cent. felt that they had regressed. I draw hon. Members' attention to the Rathbone study, but I will not detain the House with details now because others want to contribute to the short debate.

Parents of special needs children already have to contend with so much. At the beginning of my contribution, I asked us to try for a moment to envisage their circumstances. Is it fair that they should also have to take the flak for a failed and failing education policy? Baroness Warnock, the architect of inclusion, has admitted that inclusion, as an aspect of her report and the subsequent Act, was "disastrous".

Special schools do a special job for very special children. The teachers and those whom they teach invariably show great commitment and immense courage. Let us now have the courage to admit that we got it wrong, as the architect of inclusion has done. Let us have no more closures, broken dreams and shattered lives. I am delighted to invite hon. Members, in the spirit of generosity that has permeated our consideration of the measure, to embrace the new clauses with relish on behalf of those very vulnerable children.

Ms Angela C. Smith: I greatly enjoyed the comments of the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes). He must have had one of his lunches at the Savoy in order to perform so well.

Much of our recent debate on these issues has become rather adversarial, which has polarised philosophies. A belief has grown that there is a stark choice to be made in regard to the means of educating special needs children between inclusion and special schools. That view is unhelpful, because it ignores the fact that children with special needs are as individual as the rest of us, that they often present with complex sets of needs, and that their education should to be tailored to reflect that. The hon. Gentleman's comments hinted that he understood that and showed some movement from the position that he held some time ago.

Our debate should therefore focus on how best we can develop a spectrum of provision in each local authority area. Such a spectrum should encapsulate special schools and special educational needs units in mainstream schools, as well as learning support units—which have a role to play—and pupil referral units, alongside provision developed and managed by the voluntary sector. In my constituency, for instance, we have an excellent facility called Pit Stop, which takes children with learning difficulties out of school and gives them the breathing space and focused attention that they need to get them back on track. Pit Stop works closely with its partner secondary schools and has a wonderful record of bringing children back into mainstream education. It is an excellent example of how special needs education can work more flexibly in the interests of the individual child.

It is true that many special needs children need the kind of education that only a special school can offer. I have no problem admitting that. However, those children can also benefit from mixing with their peers in a mainstream setting. Increasingly, special needs professionals are recognising that a flexible mix of provision, achieved by schools working together, is the way forward. That is why my local authority is redeveloping its provision, and building new fit-for-purpose special schools across the city, alongside the development of a series of SEN units in mainstream schools. This is not an either/or approach; it uses both options.

New clause 5 is unhelpful because it would limit the ability of local authorities to plan strategically the spectrum of provision that I have described. It would, for instance, limit Sheffield's plans slightly to reduce the number of special school places available for children with learning disabilities while increasing the number of special school places for children with emotional and behavioural difficulties. Local authorities are best placed to recognise and to consult on local need, and to remould the spectrum of provision accordingly.

New clause 4 would replace section 316 of the Education Act 1996. In so doing, it would remove the requirement for local authorities to consider in the statementing process the need to ensure that a child receives the provision that his learning difficulty calls for. It would replace that requirement with proposed new subsection 3, which asserts the rights of parents. That substitution ignores the fact that schedule 27 to the 1996 Act makes it clear that there is already a presumption in favour of parental preference for the placement of a child in a particular school. The schedule also contains the important qualification that, if a statement names a school, the school should be suitable in relation to the child's age, ability and/or special needs.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): I thank the hon. Lady for giving way, and for mentioning the naming of a school in a statement. Is she aware that the Government have plans to build another 200 academies, and that local education authorities will not have to name an academy in their statements unless the academy agrees to be named?

Ms Smith: My local education authority has an agreement with our academies that they will take children with special needs as a top priority, and I call on all local authorities to work constructively towards doing the same.

John Bercow: The hon. Lady rightly says that there is merit in mixed provision. I entirely accept that. However, she said a few moments ago that local education authorities were best placed to make judgments on these matters. May I suggest that there is often a well-grounded concern, even among those who are not overly suspicious or cynical, that LEAs are at least partly motivated by the consideration that they need to save money where they can? In that context, is there not sometimes a conflict of interest between the LEA commissioning and providing the educational provision, and its being obliged to pay for it? Would it not be better if there were an independent element in the process, so that there would be no reason to question or impugn the motives of the LEA?

Ms Smith: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, but it is important that the local people who elect their accountable representatives are listened to, and that they have the chance to remove a particular elected body if they feel that resources are being prioritised over need. That option is available and should be used.

The approach outlined in the Education Act 1996 is reasonable. It directs that parental preference should be strongly favoured, but requires that such preferences should be balanced, where necessary, with a professional assessment of a child's needs. New clause 4 would effectively prioritise the requirement to secure efficient use of resources over the need to provide the appropriate provision necessary to meet a child's special needs. I therefore believe that the new clause does not merit support today.

Amendment No. 16 is interesting because it draws attention to the needs of children who are sometimes badly served by our education system, a point to which I will return. However, the amendment, as it stands, is flawed. Non-statemented children with special needs are at present registered on school action or school action plus, but the code of practice that triggers entry to those registers allows for a great deal of flexibility in how schools interpret the criteria.

The criteria are drawn incredibly broadly and have led to wide and significant variations between local authorities. For example, Knowsley registers 21.6 per cent. of its pupils as having non-statemented needs, Rotherham 18.3 per cent., Doncaster 12.3 per cent. and Cornwall 16.3 per cent. Given those variations, it would be irresponsible to give admissions priority to children on those registers.

That does not mean that we do not need a debate about provision for non-statemented SEN children, because we clearly do. For instance, we need to discuss why there are such wide variations between local authorities. However, I suggest that the real challenge is to ensure that all our schools are equipped effectively to meet the needs of low-incidence special needs children.

New clause 31 would require governing bodies to secure the necessary support for SEN children, yet the SEN code of practice already places that statutory duty on those bodies. We have all heard stories of schools that fail to satisfy the demands of the code of practice and all MPs get complaints about children whose needs are apparently neglected. That point was also made by the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings.

I therefore ask the Minister to look closely at the evidence relating to provision for non-statemented children, and to act if necessary to strengthen the role of local authorities as champions of parents and children, in order to help to drive forward improvement in this often neglected area of education provision.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) suggested that Warnock had been pernicious, but I remind the House of what was happening pre-Warnock. We need to reflect on that, because we certainly do not want to go back to a situation in which children were institutionalised, regardless of the nature of their special needs, with no entitlement to a full and rich curriculum, and without the ability to mix with other children that they have today. We have had one of those infamous pendulum swings that take place in education over time and, possibly, it has swung too far. If the Minister shows total resistance to all the amendments, there is a denial that something is wrong, or at least a pretence that everything is right when, clearly, it is not.

It is well researched and proven that the main inclusion agenda, which I broadly support, has simply been under-resourced. The problem with inclusion is that it was never going to be a cheap option; it was going to cost money. Unfortunately, with pressure on resources, it has been seen as a cheaper option, which has led to certain actions. We must accept that under-resourcing has created a great deal of problems. First and foremost, it has created problems for those pupils who inadvertently, in so far as they are not in full control of their behaviour, make up 60 per cent. of exclusions. That is unhelpful for everybody. New clause 31, which we want to strongly support, picks up that point. When there is an exclusion, a full assessment of the special needs of the child involved is required.

As we know, parents do not feel fully supported and involved in the current system, which causes problems, and many teachers in mainstream schools find it hard to cope because of lack of resources. The report commissioned by the National Union of Teachers, "The Cost of Inclusion", has made a valuable contribution to the debate in highlighting the wide variety of special needs. Given that there is such an array of special needs, we should not use a single terminology. Obviously, individual children will need their requirements met in different ways.

The NUT report also highlights that, once one moves from primary to secondary school, the situation becomes even more complex. Children with special needs relating to mental health face a huge gap in resourcing for children's mental health services. While I acknowledge the massive increase in resources from the Government, I am sure that all Members know of inadequate provision locally. That puts enormous pressure on teachers and, although I have not seen the statistics, I think that that is a good reason for teachers deciding that they cannot cope any more. That is reflected in the point that more learning support assistants and teaching assistants—whatever we like to call them—are probably needed to make inclusion work. Being able to give more individual attention to children with behavioural difficulties is the No. 1 item that teachers mention to me. If they had that ability, they could make inclusion work. They want to make it work and feel proud when they do so, but it is difficult with all the constraints.

In relation to the points made by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith), I agree strongly about the need to have a spectrum of support. That fits into my argument that we have swung the pendulum instead of getting the right balance. It is important for a local education authority to give a strong, strategic lead on special educational needs. Perhaps we should not rehearse the arguments again, but with different types of schools, including those becoming more autonomous from the local education authority, it is more difficult to promote collaboration, which is especially important in relation to special needs, between all the schools within an LEA. A special school's numbers might fall for all sorts of reasons, but it is important to keep the resources of that school together and to have outreach workers with specialities supporting mainstream schools. However, such collaborative working requires the local education authority to pull everything together. I agree that pupil referral units, learning support areas and learning zones are needed in which specialist intensive help can be provided alongside mainstream school.

Training is essential and is probably mentioned in one of the many new clauses in the group. As we discussed in Committee, that applies to teachers, special educational needs co-ordinators and, I would add, the various teaching assistants—that is a slight omission from the new clause concerned. I still feel nervous about the idea that any closure of a special school should have the authority of the Secretary of State. I find that a surprising proposal from the Conservatives, as they keep telling me that the Secretary of State is causing all the closures in the first place with the policy being operated. I do not therefore know why they have such confidence in central Government in that respect.

My main concern is about the proposal that the Secretary of State shall consent to the closure of a special school only if there are places at nearby special schools. Of course, when one is managing a comprehensive policy for special educational needs, one might close a special school that does not have technology and science facilities—because it was built in the years when children with special educational needs were neglected—in order to build a brand-new unit, which might be on the site of a mainstream school. I cannot see the amendment concerned working.

Generally, we greatly support the sentiments behind this group of amendments, because this is a debate that should be held, and it would be a good idea, as the NUT's report suggests, to have an independent review of inclusion. Perhaps we should stop pretending that we can carry out a policy of inclusion on the cheap.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Lady might know that the Education and Skills Committee is nearing the end of a thorough inquiry into special educational needs. I have been listening intently to the discussion, but in relation to the automatic suggestion that there should be an independent inquiry, I assure her that the House has an effective means of carrying out good, independent inquiries.

Annette Brooke: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I know, of course, that the Select Committee is carrying out that inquiry. The suggestion came from an earlier debate on special educational needs and I remember him responding during that debate. I hope that I was not ignoring the role of the Select Committee by pointing out that we need to have this debate about cost and make sure that the money is following the pupils, especially in this area.

Apart from the caveats that I have mentioned, we are sympathetic to the new clauses. I hope that the Minister will take our comments on board and give us some indication of the way forward. The severe pressures in mainstream school, which are not serving pupils, teachers or parents well, cannot continue.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): I am delighted to speak to new clause 30 and other new clauses and amendments tabled by me and my hon. Friends.

Perhaps I can begin, as an effective way of structuring my remarks, by referring to the briefing on the new clauses and amendments, which states that they are designed to strengthen the rights and position of disabled children and those with special educational needs, with or without statements both for existing and for future schools. That follows on from discussions with the Special Educational Consortium and other disability and special educational needs groups about their concern that, in certain key areas, the Bill needs to be beefed up to ensure that the position of such children is protected. My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) has already mentioned the fact that his Select Committee is conducting a dedicated SEN inquiry. In its inquiry into the White Paper, we also took evidence on some of the issues, albeit briefly. I share the concerns of others that these matters need a broader airing on the Floor of the House, not least because they did not receive an adequate airing in the latter stages in Committee.

The amendments and new clauses tabled by my hon. Friends and myself cover three separate areas: setting training standards in special educational needs and disability issues for teachers; ensuring that fair admissions are a school requirement and are properly monitored; and, perhaps most importantly, strengthening the rights of SEN and disabled pupils in exclusion matters and educational support for excluded categories. I merely add at this stage that that is essential in view of alarming figures showing that SEN children have a disproportionate number of exclusions from school and that parents often fail to receive sufficient support and advice in those circumstances.

Mr. Hayes: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's contribution to the debate and, indeed, the important new clauses that he has tabled. May I invite him to suggest to the Select Committee that it looks specifically at the issue of exclusions, which was raised in Committee by my hon. Friends? It is a profoundly important issue, so perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to encourage the Select Committee to deal with it.

Mr. Marsden: I thank the hon. Gentleman for those remarks. I would not want to prejudge the final deliberations or conclusions of the Select Committee, but I would say—I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield would endorse this—that we have taken a broad range of evidence, both oral and written, and that the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised are covered by it. I wholly accept that they are vitally important.

Mrs. Dorries: It is important to mention that about two thirds of all children excluded from school have special educational needs; that is, two thirds of the total number excluded at any one time.

Mr. Marsden: I thank the hon. Lady for her intervention. She will see, as I continue with my remarks, that I will provide further statistics that underline her point.

New clause 30 specifically deals with professional standards for teachers, aiming to ensure that they demonstrate an understanding of SEN and disability legislation. That is terribly important because, without ensuring the inclusion of SEN children and without specialist support services, many children will not achieve their potential. The majority of deaf children, for example, are now educated in mainstream settings, but many still need appropriate support and provision.

I refer hon. Members to the Ofsted report of 2004, which dealt with the issue of inclusive schools and children with special educational needs and disabilities. It states that only a minority of mainstream schools meet special needs very well and that others are becoming better at doing so. However, the report also notes that few schools evaluate their provision for pupils with SEN systematically so that they can establish how effective the provision is, with many schools undertaking too little forward planning to ensure that provision was in place. It said that "when they coped poorly, this was often attributed to pupils' difficulties rather than the school's inability to provide adequately."

That is a leitmotif, highlighting an issue that we must deal with.

1.45 pm

Reference has already been made to the recent NUT report, "The Costs of Inclusion" published by Cambridge university. I shall cite from it because it provides important evidence about standards. It states:

"In the absence of professional development, teachers are sometimes 'trained' by parents, placing reliance on parental knowledge and expertise. Input on most initial training courses is minimal and few new teachers are able to develop strategies for meeting the needs of pupils with specific learning difficulties. 'On the job' training is also inadequate."

There is also sometimes a strong lack of understanding in schools of the requirements of the Special Educational Needs and Disability Discrimination Act 2001. The National Autistic Society report, "Make School Make Sense", concluded that in mainstream schools, only 27 per cent. of parents say that all their child's teachers have been able to adjust their approach and teaching materials, thereby meeting their legal duties under the 2001 Act to differentiate the curriculum for SEN children.

Finally, on the matter of training and development, I would like to cite two specific examples because I am mindful of the point made by the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) in his opening speech—that we should view the problem in the context of real individuals, real families, real pressures and real crises rather than by trading statistics across the Floor of the House.

These examples come from the National Autistic Society. A 13-year-old boy with Asperger's syndrome attended a mainstream school, part-time, to facilitate his integration process. His mother and a neighbour went to the school to find him standing facing a wall with a female teacher and assistant head teacher on the other side of the room. She went to talk to him. He had a tantrum, but was not physically aggressive. The female teacher intervened and tried physically to restrain the boy. The tantrum worsened and the boy ended up on the floor with all four adults trying to restrain him. He is then alleged to have kicked the female teacher and the police were called. The boy was calm when they arrived and was allowed to leave the school without comment, but he was formally excluded as a result of the incident. Three months later, he was actually arrested, with no recollection of the earlier incident being made, and he probably had no understanding of why he had been arrested.

Three important implications apply. First, there should be proper training in and guidance for staff on the appropriate use of force. Secondly, appropriate provision should be made in respect of behaviour policy and disciplinary penalties. Thirdly, as I have already said, it is vital that teachers are trained in SEN and disability legislation and requirements. A range of other examples across the autistic spectrum disorders could be mentioned. In that context, it is worth saying that there is often a false assumption that children with disabilities have low intelligence. In certain groups, and particularly among children with Asperger's syndrome, nothing could be further from the truth. That is a major misunderstanding that must be dealt with in training and related areas.

I want to put on record the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry) and I have had useful discussions with the Under-Secretary in the other place. We have already had a very helpful and supportive response from him and I am sure that the Minister will want to add to it today. I do not want to trespass on what he may say later, but on the issue of professional standards for teachers, I am reassured by the fact that a revised set of standards for qualified teacher status will be produced shortly. They will help to tackle some of the problems that I have mentioned. I understand why Ministers should think that there is no need to incorporate or update these references in statute, but the new clause does not preclude the updating of guidance or professional standards for SEN. I am sure that the Minister will respond to the point later, but what we are attempting is simply to set basic minimum requirements that could and should be supplemented and complemented by further guidance.

The other point that I would make about the proposed consultation on the standards is that, assuming their wider acceptance, they will be initially used in pilot schemes only—they will not be compulsory—because of which we should have a further discussion of whether we need to include more explicit standards in the Bill or, indeed, in other guidance. If my hon. Friend the Minister cannot develop that suggestion today, I hope that that will happen when the Bill passes to the other House.

Time is pressing, so I want to focus specifically on new clause 80, which was alluded to by the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke). New clause 80 and the associated new clauses that my hon. Friends and I have tabled are designed to address behaviour policy and exclusions. From my example of the boy with Asperger's syndrome, I hope that it is clear to the House how vital it is that we get things right in this respect. There is a lack of understanding about the requirements of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 in schools. Of course the DDA requires schools to make reasonable adjustments to ensure that pupils are not discriminated against because of their disability, but the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries) made an entirely valid point in intervening on me a few moments ago: two thirds of all exclusions involve pupils with SEN.

The Audit Commission report of 2002, "Special Educational Needs: a mainstream issue", suggested that children with SEN, including those without statements, account for the vast majority permanent exclusions—almost nine out of 10 from primary schools and six out of 10 from secondary schools. So it is important to evaluate behaviour policy and disciplinary penalties to ensure that they are justified in the particular circumstances of pupils with SEN and those with disabilities. It is essential that we ensure that appropriate special provision is made for pupils with SEN that will reduce the risk of unnecessary exclusion. The Department for Education and Skills has very strong guidance on the issue: schools should try every practical means to maintain the pupil in school, including seeking LEA and other professional advice and so on. Again, all too often, that advice is not taken up.

I also want to talk about pupils with SEN who have multiple fixed-term exclusions. Almost 4 per cent. of pupils with statements of SEN and 2.6 per cent. of pupils with SEN without a statement have one or more fixed-term exclusions in a year. It is very important that children who are not registered as permanently excluded but who still do not attend schools regularly due to multiple fixed-term exclusions should be provided for appropriately, especially given the number of informal or unofficial and, quite frankly, sometimes illegal exclusions of pupils with SEN. That issue will be familiar to many hon. Members because it comes to them by way of their casework, and for many hon. Members and certainly for me, it is one of the things that makes us have such a strong focus on the importance of the issue.

I want to refer to what has been done in this respect since September 2002, when the Special Education Needs and Disability Act 2001 came into effect, and to refer to the new disability equal duty that schools and local authorities have under the Disability Discrimination Act 2005. Again, I am grateful to the Minister in another place and his officials for the comments and assurances that they have offered in that respect. They say that "the resource was developed with schools and local authorities for schools and local authorities and fulfils a commitment we gave in our SEN strategy, 'Removing Barriers to Achievement'".

That shows how some schools are already meeting the duties effectively and provides a range of guidance and training activities. I understand that that guidance will be available in printed form very shortly.

The key phrase to consider, however, is "some schools", which suggests that the standards are very good, but that they are still not being implemented widely enough. They need to be stated more explicitly and more needs to be done to implement them. Although I accept the Government's assurances on the issue and that the new duties under the DDA 2005 will help with the exclusions issue, it is important they do not consider that the job is done. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will reflect on the fact that the Government should use the opportunity of the time between the Bill leaving the House if it receives its Third Reading and passing to the other place to talk to the Special Education Consortium and the other disability charities that have made representations to discover whether such things can be strengthened above and beyond the existing DDA legislation.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that quite a number of the exclusions from schools and LEAs that involve pupils with special educational needs are caused by the delay in statementing those children? If the statement is not made at an early stage, all the members of staff will not be aware of that child's needs. That leads to more serious behaviour problems if it is not addressed very early in that child's life.

Mr. Marsden: I thank my hon. Friend for her intervention. I know of her strong interest in these issues, and she is absolutely right to pinpoint the issue of early intervention and the concerns that she expresses about statementing. Statementing is very complicated, but the sort of delays that she refers to are apparent. Despite the legislation, delays occur in providing alternative education for children with SEN who have been excluded. I caution Ministers not to believe that, merely because the extremely welcome new clauses on discipline will reduce the period in which action should be taken, we should automatically assume that that will mean that everything is splendid. A conscious effort needs to be made to monitor the implementation of those provisions, to consider the way in which local authorities deal with the issue and, where and if appropriate, to give further guidance and support in that respect.

I want very briefly to return to where we go on these issues. It is evident from what I have said and from the helpful responses that we have received that there is no one solution to the sorts of the problems that I have been highlighting today. The solution is not just a question of legislation, nor of guidance; it is not even just a question of good practice. It is a question of ensuring that all three of those aspects are joined together.

Yes, I believe that the Government should look carefully at the new clauses and amendments that we have proposed to see whether more could be done to strengthen the legislation, but the most important thing is that they see, and we all see, the connection between those three areas and the need to keep the pressure on, to put it bluntly. Only by keeping that pressure on will the needs of children with disabilities and SEN and of their parents be met. We must remember that a substantial number of children with SEN have parents who either have or have had special educational needs. Sometimes, it is a question not just of dealing with the needs of one generation, but of dealing with those of two generations.

I make my final point in reference to a previous discussion. I think that someone used the word "Manichaean" earlier, but please let us not get hung up on the idea that the special schools issue is a complex battle between good and evil, or this year's zeitgeist as opposed to last year's zeitgeist.

2 pm

There are three excellent special schools in my constituency, Highfurlong, Woodlands and Park. They all co-operate, and in some instances there is very close collaboration. One of the schools is adjacent to a mainstream local authority school. I have visited all three regularly, and visited Highfurlong very recently. A mixed class there also included children from a local primary school and a local high school. The benefits of working together and using the same facilities were felt by both the children with disabilities and special educational needs and those without.

As I have said, we should not become too hung up on the struggle between good and evil. While many of us accept past criticisms of special schools policies—from Baroness Warnock and others—we should not assume that one set of false absolutes should be replaced with another.

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I want to speak in favour of new clauses 4 and 5. New clause 4 relates to the provision of education for children with statements of special educational needs. Subsection (3) of the proposed new section 316 refers to ensuring that a child with special educational needs

"is educated in either a mainstream school or a special school".

There is no trench warfare between mainstream and special schools. It is acknowledged that each child has individual needs, on which will depend whether that child is placed in a mainstream or a special school.

The wishes of the parent are very important. New subsection (3)(b) refers to "the provision of efficient education for other children", which is indeed an important consideration in mainstream schools. It is essential for proper provision to be made for the support of a child with special needs in a mainstream classroom, especially in practical terms. The practical tasks involved in looking after a child who is a wheelchair user and is unable to transfer from the wheelchair to an ordinary chair, or who needs a standing frame, are very time-consuming. There must be sufficient teaching and welfare support in the classroom, so that the education of the other children is not compromised.

New subsection (5), which has already been mentioned several times, states:

"A child with special educational needs being provided for under section (3) above shall not be educated in a mainstream school if that is incompatible with the wishes of his parents."

New subsection (4) is central to the decision that parents must make. Many parents, particularly if the child with special needs is their first and they have no recent experience of schools—perhaps no experience since they were at school themselves—will not know which is the best placement for their child. They will need to be presented with all the options and all the information that is available. They should be able to visit both local mainstream schools and special schools to gain an impression of provision there. They should be able to speak to head teachers, past teachers and assistants, and to members of the education authority, so that they can reach an informed decision about the best provision for their particular child.

I worked in a special school for many years during the 1970s and 1980s. The first thing that comes to mind is that it is impossible to generalise about children with special needs, and that therefore provision cannot be generalised. There was a fair amount of movement between the school where I worked, which is not there any more, and local mainstream schools, in both directions and with varying degrees of success. Again, it is impossible to generalise about whether movement from special school to mainstream or from mainstream to special school will succeed. It is necessary to take account of the individual child.

I recall one child with brittle bones who was highly intelligent. Her parents wanted her to try her luck in a mainstream school. She acquired a large degree of independence in a special school, because one of the rules was that, whatever a child's disability, that child should enjoy as much independence as possible. Unfortunately, when the girl went to a mainstream school, she was seen as a novelty: everyone wanted to help her, particularly the other children, who would fetch and carry for her. She lost much of the independence that she gained in the special school.

There was an enormous spectrum of disability at the school where I worked, from complex conditions affecting mobility such as Freeman-Sheldon syndrome, Friedrich's ataxia and spastic quadriplegia to disabilities that are not visible, such as chronic asthma, diabetes and heart conditions. In the middle of the spectrum are all sorts of other conditions which require very sensitive handling.

Special schools provide much more than education. Because they are so used to dealing with children with profound special needs, they are sensitive even to changes of mood, and to how a child may be affected by an incident in the classroom. They can avert episodes of children being unable to cope. It is that experience, built up over many years, that is so valuable to children, in terms not just of education but of emotional support. It enables them to cope with life as well as learning.

I recall another child. The hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) observed that people are not always conscious that children with special needs are often highly intelligent. There is an assumption that they are of low intelligence, which is wrong. One of our pupils, aged 16, had very mild cerebral palsy which affected only his speech. We discovered belatedly that his own family did not realise that he understood what they were saying to him. Because they did not understand what he was saying to them, it did not occur to them that his thought processes and intellect were perfectly normal. He reached the age of 16 before we were able to discover that, and to explain to the family that they could speak to him perfectly normally, as they spoke to everyone else, and he would understand: the mechanics of speech were his only problem.

Speech and language have been mentioned several times today. Even in the 1970s, there was a chronic, long-standing shortage of speech and language therapists. Since I have been in the House, I have conducted some research into why that might be. It is very difficult to get to the bottom of it. We have plenty of colleges and courses involving speech and language. They are full—they are not short of students—and they have a high success rate. Many students qualify, and there is not an unusually high drop-out rate. The mystery is, where do all the students go when they have qualified? They do not seem to go into the national health service, because my primary care trust cannot recruit speech and language therapists, and they do not go into special schools. The challenge for all of us is to redirect speech and language graduates to special schools and the NHS, where there is an enormous need for speech and language therapy. Whatever other problems they may have, if children cannot communicate with people whom they meet, that is almost the worst handicap that they could suffer.

Like the hon. Member for Blackpool, South, I have three superb special schools in my constituency: Corbets Tey, Dycorts and Ravensbourne. None of them, thankfully, is threatened with closure, which would be unthinkable. I cannot think of a single pupil in any of those schools who would be better off in a mainstream school. The children are flourishing, and their educational and social needs are being met. The schools also provide a support system for families. They often have great difficulty in conducting anything resembling what we would recognise as a normal daily life, particularly if they have children on the autistic spectrum. One function of those schools is giving additional support to parents and siblings. With the best will in the world, mainstream schools—given how busy they are and the enormous demands and pressures that are placed on them—do not have the time to provide such extra services to families with children with special needs.

John Bercow: My hon. Friend made some important remarks a moment ago about the need to improve and to maximise recruitment of speech and language therapists, and to get them into the national health service and, in many cases, special schools. This has been a good and stimulating debate so far, and I want to underline her point by saying that it is incumbent on all of us in public service to re-double our efforts on that front. It always strikes me that, when a popular local school or hospital is to close, there is a ready supply of articulate protestors. However, when a special school facility is to close and that closure will affect only a relatively small number of children, many people either are not aware of that threat and shortage of specialists, or, frankly, do not care enough about it. So Members across the political spectrum have a duty to step up efforts to meet the challenge.

Angela Watkinson: I thank my hon. Friend for those comments. We are all only too well aware of the shortage of such specialists. All of us do whatever we can, wherever we can, to encourage the greater availability of speech and language therapists. Even in the 1970s, children with speech and language problems in my school had a visiting speech and language therapist, who was able to give each child a quarter of an hour a week. Anyone who knows children with speech and language problems knows that that is hopelessly inadequate. So we all need to work very hard on the issue.

I turn to new clause 5, which deals with restrictions on special school closures. As I said, it would be unthinkable for any of the special schools in my constituency to close. New clause 5(2) states:

> "The Secretary of State shall only consent to the closure of a special school if there are places at nearby special schools in sufficient number and sufficient quality to replace the school adequately."

I should be surprised to learn that there is a single constituency in the entire country in which special school places are available. Most such schools have no spare capacity and are unable to take more children who would like to be placed there. It is highly unlikely that any area has sufficient spare capacity to enable a special school to be closed in the light of the caveat in the new clause. That caveat is important in protecting special schools and the enormously good work that they do.

I urge hon. Members in all parts of the House to support not just new clause 4, but new clause 5.

Mr. David Blunkett (Sheffield, Brightside) (Lab): I confess to the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) that, at one time, I was dogmatic. I was dogmatic for a brief period—I promise that it was brief—when I came out of a special residential environment. I spent six years in integrated education for the first time, on day-release from work and at evening class, before going into full-time integrated education for the first time at university. I was dogmatic because my experience had been a difficult one. My schooling had not offered the academic achievement that we would want for our own children, and, as with so many schools, the physical environment left something to be desired.

In the 1960s and 1970s, special schools, be they day or residential, were not what they are today. One precise reason why Baroness Warnock has changed her mind on this issue—and why, by the time that I became Secretary of State for Education and Employment, I began to see that it was absolutely crucial not to be dogmatic—is that the world has changed.

When I went to primary school, most of those whom I was at school with had just one special need: they could not see. By the time that that school closed because the number who simply could not see had dropped, the incidence of multiple disability—the multiple special needs that children had—had grown to the point where that type of education could no longer cope. So the school closed not because people wanted to eliminate a facility, but because it needed to be re-shaped for a different era, in which medical science had eliminated the original causes of special need, but had also kept alive children who previously would not have been in school at all, because they would not have reached school age.

2.15 pm

So we are dealing with a different environment, and I appeal to the House, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) did, to come together. None of us wants a system that does not take account of the special needs of the individual child and their family. Various issues have been raised this afternoon, such as the proper training of teachers, professional development, the training of learning support workers—there are now 110,000 such workers in mainstream schools throughout the country; they did not exist nine years ago—and the ability of learning mentors to develop, alongside special educational needs co-ordinators, the specialism of guiding and supporting families and others in the school environment. We need to recognise that those issues are crucial.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister for Schools on intervening to get the statistics right, and I believe that the Government are listening and responding. However, I have two or three regrets that I want to put on the record. In 1998, when I was Secretary of State for Education and Employment, we moved towards regional planning. I believe strongly that, without it, we cannot maintain centres of excellence, expertise and the necessary facilities. Even with the best resources in the world, no single education authority can possibly provide for every specialism and every need. In any case, the level of expertise across the country is limited. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith) described what my own authority is doing, but there are authorities such as Derbyshire that come very close to being exemplars. It is at the local level that an understanding must be shown of people's specific needs. However, we can do things at a regional level that cannot be done at the purely local. I now regret that the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001 did not place greater emphasis on ensuring that that happened.

Anne Snelgrove: My right hon. Friend is making an important point, and I have been of the same opinion for years. Small unitary authorities, in particular, are unable to provide the breadth of special needs education that larger authorities such as Derbyshire can provide. I hope that the Minister is listening to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Blunkett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Derbyshire has understood the message that is coming across loud and clear in this very good debate: unless we train teachers and assistants properly, and unless they are prepared for what is likely to happen, there will be resistance to sensible integration. If integration is done badly, it should not be done at all. We therefore have to get the balance right in providing training and expertise in centres of excellence. If special schools that can cater for specific requirements are no longer available, the expertise will die with them.

Providing good teaching in the classroom means providing adequate and supportive resources not just in the school itself, but during out-of-school activities, in order to make integration a reality. I took slight umbrage at the beginning of this debate at the idea that inclusion is a dogma, which is very silly. Inclusion is not a dogma; it is a sensible objective, which is to be met by not attempting to include children in mainstream education where doing so would be detrimental to them and to those around them.

That raises one further point. Because multiple disability needs and special needs are very different, we have to adapt the way in which we behave towards and think about them, in order to deal with those different layers. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough mentioned the non-statemented special educational needs child. I hope that the Government will place greater emphasis on supporting schools in that regard. What my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South said on the issue—it was repeated by the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson)—is absolutely true, and, although it pains me to say so, I also agreed with quite a lot of what the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) said.

Mr. Hayes: Would the right hon. Gentleman join the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) in calling for an independent review of some of these issues? I have in mind particularly the issue of non-statemented special needs, which were mentioned by the hon. Gentleman and which the right hon. Gentleman rightly amplifies now.

Mr. Blunkett: I am hoping that the Education and Skills Committee review that is taking place, and the Ofsted thematic inspection will also highlight what needs to be done in a constant monitoring review. I learned as Secretary of State that monitoring is even more necessary than vision or legislation in order to achieve anything. That was the point that I was going to make about the 2001 Act—we left it with a hope and prayer that people would do the right thing, but limited progress has been made in the past five years.

In supporting schools with a high number of special educational needs pupils, we need to recognise the point that has been made this afternoon that such needs can be passed from one generation to another, not just genetically but through the gross reinforcement of disadvantage that often leads to the exaggeration and emphasis of special educational need.

I found out that two of my older sons had quite severe dyslexia at a time when the teaching profession dismissed dyslexia as though it were a middle-class fad. Because I was emerging into the middle class and have always been tenacious, I managed to engage with the Dyslexia Institute—it has now changed its name—which did a superb job in finding out what was wrong. I do not think that my sons would mind me saying that the change in confidence, self-esteem and behaviour was dramatic once what was required was identified. Early identification, sensible assessment, proper decision making about the right environment, and training and support for teachers are all more important than any disagreement over whether an individual school should close. I hope that that will be the message from today's debate.

Mrs. Dorries: We have all been elected to represent the most disadvantaged in our constituencies. From that perspective, and in the spirit of consensus, I hope that the Minister will accept that any points that I make are not party political but made with the view of representing those of my constituents in the unfortunate position of not receiving appropriate educational provision.

I wish to speak about new clause 5, with brief reference to new clause 4. I notice that the Minister mentioned the number of schools that the Conservative Government closed before 1997, and he was right to do so. All Governments have made mistakes in education, and it is about time we all started getting it right. However, I am reminded of the point made by Baroness Warnock when she described the need to close down special schools because too many children were being isolated in special provision. She said that the pendulum had swung too far. Perhaps not all those 200 schools needed to close, but too many have and that has resulted in a crisis, which is why hon. Members are receiving so many representations on the issue.

One of the organisations with which I liaise contacted me this morning and asked me to make point about something that the Minister said yesterday. I have not had a chance to check Hansard yet and I was not in my place when it was said, but the organisation said that the Government referred to the school admissions code as a panacea to protect the rights of children who benefit from a statement of special educational needs, but we should all be aware by now that the protection of children with statements of special educational needs is not dictated by the admissions code or the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, but by the criteria specified in the Education Act 1996, especially schedule 27. I have now put that on the record on their behalf.

The Minister mentioned the 300 schools that have opened, and I have tabled questions to ask where they are and how many children they will take, because they are not in my patch nor in those of the many people who have asked me to speak on their behalf. It was fascinating to hear the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith) say that schools were opening in her area, because I wish I had such provision in my constituency. Perhaps some areas are better served than others, and the crisis arises in areas that are poorly served. When things go wrong for a special needs child, they can go spectacularly wrong, and that is why we tend to hear about such issues in that way.

The way in which many of our SEN children are educated is described to me as a scandal. I do not like to use that word, because it is emotive, but when we hear some of the stories, such as that told by the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) about the little boy against the wall, we realise that it is shameful that children are educated in such environments today. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the statistic that two thirds of all excluded children have special needs, including nine out of 10 of those excluded from primary schools and six out of 10 from secondary schools—some 27 per cent. of autistic children. I prefer to use the word "expelled" as do the organisations I talk to, because it expresses the nub of the matter. I shall talk in a minute about a six-year-old girl who has been excluded, but the reality is that she has been expelled from future education. Can hon. Members imagine the outcry if 27 per cent. of the generic school population was excluded or expelled each day? There would be an outcry. Despite that, special schools are still being closed.

When Lord Adonis gave evidence to the Education and Skills Committee I asked him whether the Government had a policy of inclusion, because I believe that the inclusion agenda may be driving the closures. He said that inclusion was the will of Parliament, which was a very strange answer. I asked the Minister in Committee whether the Government had a policy of inclusion, and he did not answer, so I ask again. Do the Government have a policy of inclusion? That is the fundamental question in special education today, and education authorities, parents and governors all deserve to know.

While the Government refuse to confirm whether they have an inclusion agenda, there are policies in the background that are driving forward and enabling that agenda. For example, the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001 states quite clearly:

> "If a statement is maintained under section 324 for the child he must be educated in a mainstream school unless that is incompatible with the wishes of the parents or the efficient education of others".

Those words lead to the presumption that all children should be educated in the mainstream, and they are backed up by the "Removing Barriers to Achievement" document, which acts as a reinforcement to the inclusion agenda.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) asked whether the Secretary of State is going in and closing down special schools. Of course he is not walking into a special school and saying, "This school closes today", but LEAs are implementing policies that they believe are the Government's agenda. LEAs are reluctant to statement children or to refer them to special schools. In a neighbouring constituency, referrals from the LEA have dried up completely since the 2001 Act. As a result, the local special school will be financially unviable by the end of the educational year. Referrals have dried up because the LEA is reluctant to statement. It believes that it is carrying out the wishes of the Government and using the 2001 Act as its justification not to statement or refer. It is also using the "Removing Barriers to Achievement" document to back that up.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): The hon. Lady will know from her recent Adjournment debate that I agree with what she has been saying. Does she agree that the issue is not only money, but a political pre-disposition at local and national level, in some cases, towards general inclusion, instead of the objective interests of the particular child?

2.30 pm

Mrs. Dorries: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I want the Minister to clarify whether the Government have a policy of inclusion or not, as LEAs appear to be carrying out such a policy without looking at individual children's specific needs.

Roger Berry: May I ask the hon. Lady the question that I put earlier to the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), who did not answer it? I want to know what is the Opposition's policy in this area. New clause 4(5) asserts that parents should have the right to choose a special school, but the new clause as a whole contains no assertion that parents should have the right to choose a mainstream school. Does new clause 4 represent the Opposition's policy?

Mrs. Dorries: My hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) has answered that already, but new clause 4(3) states that the responsible person shall ensure that a child

> "is educated in either a mainstream school or a special school".

Roger Berry: With respect, I was referring to new clause 4(5).

Mrs. Dorries: In fact, my speech is concerned with new clause 5, which deals with the closure of special schools. However, our policy is that children with special educational needs should have the right to be educated in a special school. If they want to be educated in a mainstream school, they should have that right too.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry) is being untypically obtuse, even though he has been in the House a long time. Does my hon. Friend agree that he should know that new clause 4, in proposed new subsections (3) and (5), deals with the question that he poses? Proposed new subsection (3) is not subsumed by proposed new subsection (5), and neither is it incompatible with it.

Mrs. Dorries: I thank my hon. Friend for rescuing me from my difficulty.

I want the Minister to say whether the Government have a policy of inclusion, because he may be aware of the 2020 group, whose sole purpose is to ensure that all this country's special schools are closed by 2020. Its founder, Richard Reisner, told the Select Committee that the group had been given £460,000 in Government funding. Would an organisation campaigning to keep special schools open be given an equivalent amount of funding? By giving the money to that group, are not the Government endorsing its policy?

Ms Angela C. Smith: I acknowledge the hon. Lady's kind words about Labour Sheffield, but if the Government have weighted their policy so heavily towards inclusion, why have authorities such as Sheffield been able to develop such a broad spectrum of provision?

Mrs. Dorries: I am sure that the hon. Lady will not be surprised to hear that I have absolutely no idea of what happens in Sheffield.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Dorries: I wanted to mention a remark made to me yesterday by a Labour Member, but I shall leave it till later, when it will be more in context. She said that the policy was not the same in all areas of the country. However, I shall give way now.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Does the hon. Lady accept that the Education Select Committee heard a lot of evidence from local authorities? They are planning a range of provision to meet special educational needs that involves special schools, mainstream schools and special units in mainstream schools. The range of provision is becoming wider all the time.

Mrs. Dorries: I agree that LEAs perform what is called provision mapping, which works for some but not for others. The fact is that 27 per cent. of children with autism are excluded from school every day. Those are the national statistics, and they apply to all LEAs, regardless of their provision policies.

I hope that the Minister will follow Baroness Warnock's lead in respect of inclusion and say, when he replies to the debate, that he will not continue with the policy. I have mentioned a little boy called Jack a number of times in the House, and the one thing that I want him to take away from this debate is the fact that the Minister mentioned his name in the wind-up.

Jack was the first child to come to my surgery. He has special educational needs, and on that visit he emptied my bookcase, turned my chairs upside-down and fizzed the lights on and off. He was excluded from school: his parents had taken him out of the school because the teachers could not cope with his very specific needs. He was beginning to be bullied, as happens to many autistic children in mainstream schools.

Jack now attends the Moorhouse school, thanks to the fact that his well educated and articulate parents were able to go to a SENDIST tribunal and argue his case. He is flourishing there, but he offers a perfect example of what happens when a child is placed in the wrong school—something that happens to many children in this country.

Some children have very complex special needs because they have physical as well as learning difficulties. I spoke recently to a teacher who has in her class a child with severe disabilities. The funding associated with that child has gone into the school pot, and the teacher has only a teaching assistant to help her. She believes that the funding allocated to a child should be velcroed to that child and used only to help him or her.

The teacher to whom I am referring gave evidence about her job which was used in a recently published report. Once an hour, she has to suck out that child's' tracheotomy tube. She has to wash her hands, use the suction machine to clear out the tracheotomy tube, then wash her hands again and return to teaching the class. The process takes 10 or 15 minutes, every hour of her working day. Is that really something that teachers should be doing, on top of trying to teach the other 28 children in the class the national curriculum? The teacher has had training only from the child's parents. She has had no specialist instruction, not even in how to lift the child. Is that to be the role of teachers? Do the Government expect them all to have a special needs child in their classes?

I shall conclude by quoting the evidence that Baroness Warnock gave to the Select Committee, which reinforces my belief that LEAs are driving forward a policy of inclusion. Although the Bill emphasises parental choice as the great good, Baroness Warnock said:

> "I think that produces a hollow laugh on the part of parents with children with disabilities because they have no choice. Everything depends on the assessment that their child gets and it is the local authority which conducts the assessment and also has to pay the money and naturally the parents do not believe the assessment is truthful because it is pitched as low as the local authorities can get away with because of the money. They really have...no choice."

Parents of children with special needs do not have any choices. It is sad that special schools are being closed, and I hope that the Minister will assure the House that the inclusion agenda will be abandoned.

Jim Knight: This has been a good debate, which deserves more than seven minutes for my response. It is occasionally a frustration of ministerial life that we do not have anything near as much time as the Opposition or Back Benchers when we respond.

I think that we are agreed on both sides of the House that we need a range of provision to deliver for the range of children's needs. We all agree that there is more to be done, but the picture is in shades of grey rather than the black and white presented by the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes).

I shall say a few words about Government policy. Schools and local authorities already have clear duties in relation to children with special educational needs and disabilities. Our policy is to achieve better outcomes for those children by ensuring that provision is tailored to individual needs and that all children have access to a broad and relevant education and maximum engagement with their peers. In that respect, I point out to the hon. Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mrs. Dorries), there is inclusion, but I am mindful that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) said, inclusion is a good aspiration but it has to deliver appropriate education for every child, which may be in a special school.

Our policy is also that agencies work together to provide children and families with co-ordinated services. We see the fruits of that in high-quality teaching and learning, in children's centres and extended schools and in better arrangements for accountability for the outcomes achieved by different groups of pupils in the new relationship with schools.

We are backing that change with real investment. Funding per pupil with SEN has increased by nearly 40 per cent. in real terms. Budgeted expenditure by local authorities is £4.1 billion, about 13 per cent. of all education spending, and the building schools for the future programme is delivering better schools and facilities for those children.

Ofsted reports improved local management of SEN, growing awareness of the benefits of inclusion and some improvements in practice. It also notes that many of the children with the most complex needs are in special schools or other specialist provision. I used statistics about those schools in an intervention during the speech of the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings: all 300 of those schools are new; they are not units added to existing schools. Contrary to what is reported in the media, they demonstrate our commitment to special schools alongside mainstream provision.

Mr. Hayes: Will the Minister give way?

Jim Knight: I can respond to interventions or to the debate—I am in the hon. Gentleman's hands.

Mr. Hayes: I thank the hon. Gentleman and I take his point, but will he tell us why in 2001 the Government dropped the provision in the Education Act 1996 that special education should be related to the learning difficulty of the child? Why did they drop the appropriateness provision in that Act?

Jim Knight: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a precise answer because I was not an Education Minister at the time. I can only imagine that it was because the provisions that were already in place and that we had introduced were delivering what he described.

The proportion of children with SEN statements and taught in special schools has increased by about 1 per cent. over the past five years, despite a fall in the total number of children with statements. We are not an anti-special school Government. We want children's special educational needs to be met so that, as far as possible, exclusions are unnecessary. Through our long-term SEN strategy, we are working to build the skills and capacity of schools to meet children's special educational needs earlier and more effectively.

We are mindful, however, that the Select Committee on Education and Skills is looking into SEN and we want time to consider the outcome of its inquiry. The Bill will go into another place after a very good debate, although I cannot respond to the amendments or the various contributions that have been made. My noble Friend, Lord Adonis, has met my hon. Friends the Members for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) and for Kingswood (Roger Berry) and we shall continue such engagement.

We will continue to listen to the House and to try to improve things. I am particularly impatient about the exclusion figures for children with special educational needs. It is not right that two thirds of excluded children have special education needs. The issue should not divide us; we should all work together to resolve it.

Mr. Hayes: This has been a good debate, albeit a short one. It has illustrated the strong feelings on the subject on both sides of the House and perhaps, as various Members have said, that we need more time to debate the issues over the coming weeks and months. I hope that the Government will make more time for that.

I do not have time to deal with all the points that were raised in the debate, but important things need amplification. Of course, the continuing and particular role played by special schools must be defended, but non-statemented special needs must be given closer consideration, as was pointed out. As the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) said, we need to look at the training and resources provided to our teachers to educate children who are especially vulnerable and have particular needs. Where schools are doing the right thing they need our support, whether they are mainstream or special schools. As my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) said, that means providing the services of speech and language specialists and educational psychologists.

This has been a good debate. I am determined that the Opposition will continue to fight the battle on behalf of special needs children. We will continue to defend special schools. We will not relent in defending those vulnerable people. I hope other Members will join us.

It being two hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [23 May].

Question put and negatived.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of the business to be concluded at that hour.

ADMISSIONS ADMINISTRATION

'(1) Chapter 1 of Part 3 of SSFA 1998 (Schools admissions) is amended as follows.

(2) After section 89 insert the following section—

"89A Admissions administration

(1) Admissions administration will receive all applications for places made on behalf of pupils seeking admission to maintained schools, academies, city technology colleges and city colleges for the technology of the arts within its area.

(2) Admissions administration will determine the awarding of places at maintained schools within its area having regard to the arrangements which are to apply for that year, established by any admissions authority within that area, including special arrangements provided for in section 91.

(3) The admissions administration shall then make the list of places awarded available to maintained schools, academies, city technology colleges and city colleges for the technology of the arts within its local area and notify parents of the results of their application.

(4) The admissions administration shall always act such that the identity of the individual applicants cannot be determined by the schools for which they have applied or expressed a preference during the admissions process, until the list of places awarded is made available to schools and parents by the admissions administration.

(5) If a school believes that the admissions administration has failed to adhere to its admissions criteria, as set by the admissions authority, it may appeal to the admissions forum, which may review, and report on their findings.

(6) The person responsible for admissions administration within a local education authority must be employed or commissioned by the local education authority.

(7) In this Chapter "admissions administration" means the person responsible for the administration of arrangements for the admission of pupils to any school within a local education authority's area."'.—[Sarah Teather.]

Sarah Teather: The amendments relate to what is probably the most controversial aspect of our debate. What has concerned many people is the proposal in the Bill and in its forerunner, the White Paper, to give schools more freedom to control their admissions. People are worried about that because all the evidence suggests that when we give schools that freedom, over time they tend to move towards choosing the brighter children and the more middle-class children.

I am certain that hon. Members will have constituency examples of when that is not the case, and I would not want to say that that is what happens in all schools, because clearly it does not. However, the worry is that the evidence suggests that, on the whole, schools will use that power to choose those children because of the pressure to drive up standards, particularly in the light of league tables. We have seen evidence from the Sutton Trust, Simon Burgess from the university of Bristol, and Rebecca Allen from the Institute of Education, and it all suggests the same outcome.

In response to that widespread concern, hon. Members—certainly Liberal Democrat and, in particular, Labour Members, if not Conservative Members—put pressure on the Government, who responded by changing the proposals in the White Paper so that the Bill now states that all admissions authorities should act in accordance with the code of admissions, rather than just having to have regard to that code. That was a welcome change.

The draft school legal code was published while the Bill was in Committee and was debated extensively in Committee. It touched on many things that worried me and was a welcome addition. Some things in it are very good. They include the ban on interviewing and prioritising children in care and those with a statement of special educational needs. However, I particularly welcomed the focus on the softer aspects, such as the tendency for schools to put poorer families off applying by advertising expensive trips and expensive uniforms and, specifically, for schools to use information known about a family gained through either brothers or sisters attending the same school or through parent open evenings.

The difficulty with many of those things is that they require a subjective judgment about whether the school has used that information in coming to a decision on admissions. My fears were fuelled by an ICM poll published in the press a few months ago, which suggested that one in four head teachers cheat on their selection criteria to cherry-pick pupils. The latter aspect of that concerned me most: they were quite specific that they do it to cherry-pick pupils. If a head teacher cheats, that undermines trust in the system. It undermines the trust of parents, students and other schools in the same local authority area. Above all, it undermines the Government's good work and their efforts to improve admissions and tackle covert selection by introducing a code that is welcome in many ways.

The safest way to remove the danger of cheating is to allow someone else to administer the system. New clause 24 would allow schools to continue to set their own criteria in accordance with the code. Under that code, admissions criteria must be objective. They must not be subjective, and they must be easily understood. However, if they are objective, why must the school administer them? Anyone could do so, as they could be written down and measured. It would be better to give the duty to an impartial body. The local authority, which oversees and co-ordinates strategic provision, is best placed to administer the system. It does not have any incentive to cheat as it does not favour one school over another. It simply wants all its schools to do well and to raise standards across the area.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): The hon. Lady takes the view that local authorities do not have any reason to favour one school over another in admissions. Does she accept that if a school is undersubscribed the local authority may have an incentive to try to move pupils into it?

Sarah Teather: It would have to act in accordance with the code and, indeed, with the selection criteria submitted by the schools and admissions authorities. We have included a safety net so that if a school believes that the administering authority has not administered admissions in accordance with its own selection criteria, it can appeal to the admission forum.

Mr. Brady: The hon. Lady appears to accept that the local education authority may not be unbiased and impartial. Why, therefore, is it better at administering admissions than the school itself?

Sarah Teather: No, I do not accept that. The local authority is far more likely than a school to be impartial, as it does not have an incentive to favour one school over another or to improve the standard of only a few schools. We have seen a great deal of evidence of cheating by schools, so to increase confidence in the system we must try to give the administration of the system to an impartial body. That would help to iron out the problem of cheating to which Members have drawn attention, including prior knowledge of the family. A child's brothers and sisters may be pupils at the school, or staff may have met parents at parents' evenings. In Committee, the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) highlighted the case of a faith school in London. Various procedures allow parents up to half a dozen contacts with the school before they submit an application. It is therefore unreasonable to assume that a school would not have prior knowledge of a family in such cases.

New clause 24 proposes that admissions criteria should be set by the relevant admissions authority, whether the school or the local authority, in accordance with the code. Those policies would then be submitted to a named local authority officer, who administers admissions in accordance with the criteria. Parents would apply centrally to the local authority, which would make application a great deal easier. Obviously, this is not the case in London, but in some areas parents are forced to submit applications to successive schools. Parents would state their preferred school and the authority would sort the applications, matching the children against schools' criteria.

Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): How would that system deal with applications across a local authority boundary? There are a considerable number of such applications.

Sarah Teather: There is no reason why local authorities should not work together on the system.

The key point is that the names of applicants should be kept from the schools. Obviously, applicants are not completely anonymous, as names are required for administrative purposes, but the proposal would deal with the problem of cheating. The local authority would send acceptance letters to parents and inform schools of decisions. Under the system, head teachers and governors would not see the list of names, so they would not be able to pick out difficult parents or children who are in trouble. In response to our debate in Committee, we have added extra protection so that if schools believe that the local authority has failed to administer the system in accordance with the criteria, they can apply to the admission forum for a review. I am sure that the hon. Member for Bury will speak to his new clause 46, which is similar to our new clause. The Local Government Association believes that the proposal would improve the transparency of the system, and individual councils are enthusiastic about it. Teaching unions have expressed concern about allowing schools more freedom to set admissions. They, too, favour a more co-ordinated system. New clause 24 allows schools to continue to set their own criteria, but it removes the danger of cheating.

New clause 39 leaves decisions on selection at 11 to local discretion, but it reverses the presumption in favour of selection, which would cease to exist unless local people asked for it in a ballot. That is a sensible way forward, and we shall support the proposal if it is pressed to a vote. As all Front-Bench spokesmen no longer favour selection, and would certainly not re-introduce it, I hope that, despite the fact that the issue was once divisive, the proposal will unite the entire House.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con) rose—

Sarah Teather: I am afraid that I have finished.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), who seems to have a skewed view of the principled stance taken by head teachers. I do not believe that there is mass cheating by head teachers who deliberately manipulate the admissions system to boost their results. If that is happening, we need to take action against head teachers who are behaving in such an unprincipled way, but I do not believe that it happens to the extent that she suggested.

Listening in Committee to the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) speaking about admissions, and to other Labour Members over the years, it is hard not to conclude that the new clauses tabled by him and his colleagues are driven primarily by ideology, rather than by a concern for raising standards in our schools. That ideology is based on the notion that the quality of a school is determined solely or largely by the intake of the school. That is not true. What makes a good school is the quality of the teaching, the quality of the head's leadership, and the ethos and approach to behaviour and discipline taken by the school.

There are schools in extremely deprived parts of the country where behaviour is impeccable because the head has in place strong systems and procedures that ensure that poor behaviour is dealt with swiftly and predictably. There are schools in leafy county towns that have appalling behavioural problems because of weak leadership. There are schools that have intakes where the most academic pupils have been creamed off to the local grammar school, yet those schools achieve examine results higher than most comprehensive schools.

3.30 pm

Wellington high school in Trafford, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady), is in effect a secondary modern school, where the 40 per cent. most academic go to the grammar school. At Wellington high school last year, 73 per cent. achieved five or more GCSEs at grades A* to C, 66 per cent. including English and Maths, and there are no GNVQs in that figure. That figure—73 per cent.—is way above the national average of 56 per cent.

By contrast, there are many schools in leafy prosperous towns and suburbs that languish with just 35 per cent. achieving five or more GCSEs at grades A* to C, and in a number of cases schools with much worse results. In a small minority of schools, the intake can be so challenging that it becomes overwhelming and we need to intervene, but in the vast majority of the 3,500 secondary schools, the intake is largely not as relevant as what happens within the school.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): If the hon. Gentleman believes what he is saying about the intake, can he explain the Sutton Trust figures that show that the best performing comprehensive schools have the lowest proportion of children on free school meals?

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Lady is making the same point as the hon. Member for Brent, East, who is leading for the Liberals. I do not believe that head teachers throughout the country are deliberately manipulating their intakes to boost their results. There may be a small number of exceptions to that premise, but I do not believe that it is happening on a large scale. It is not possible to engineer an intake to accurately reflect the local population to the last detail. I suspect that most of those results are capricious, rather than deliberately manipulated.

Sarah Teather: The problem is that heads have admitted that. It is not as though someone has done a survey and suspected that the system may have been manipulated. A Headspace survey reported that 38 per cent. of head teachers admitted breaking their own criteria.

Mr. Gibb: I have not met such a head teacher when I have been going round. I ask head teachers, "Are you on principle and deliberately manipulating your intake?" and they always tell me no. [Laughter.] The point that I am making is a more serious one. Even if head teachers are unprincipled and are manipulating their intakes to boost their results and those do not reflect the quality of the school generally, my argument is that the intake is largely irrelevant to the quality of the school. It is the teachers, the leadership, the ethos and the behavioural policies that make for a good school, not the intake, whether that is manipulated or not.

Mr. Brady: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for paying such glowing tribute to Wellington high school in my constituency, which is an excellent school. May I support the excellent case that he is making with another useful statistic? In the value-added league tables, of the 21 schools adding most value between the ages of 11 and 14, 18 were grammar schools. That surely proves exactly the point that my hon. Friend is making—that is it what happens inside the school, rather than the quality of the intake that is most important. The value added in the grammar schools is even better.

Mr. Gibb: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The value added tables reveal which schools are genuinely adding value, regardless of the intake. They measure the added value to the particular child, based on their ability level and attainment before they arrived at the school. My hon. Friend's point is well made.

I believe that, at the vast majority of the 3,500 secondary schools, the intake is largely irrelevant. If we ensure that all academic subjects taught in the school are set or streamed by ability, the intake is even less relevant, because if we ensure that classes are made up of children of a similar ability, the ability levels elsewhere in the school have no impact on that class. The problem in many of our comprehensive schools is that the vast majority of academic lessons are taught in mixed ability classes. According to Ofsted, 60 per cent. of lessons are in mixed ability classes: 49 per cent. of English lessons, 69 per cent. of geography lessons and 71 per cent. of history lessons are mixed ability. Even in science, where setting is even more important, a third of lessons take place in mixed ability classes.

Annette Brooke: Can the hon. Gentleman give us some indication of the ages to which his figures relate? It is often difficult to set by ability at age five, even when the children might be doing simple science lessons. Does he agree that a whole range of subjects, including PE and art, are perfect for social integration to take place?

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Lady makes a good point. First, all the figures that I have cited are for secondary schools. Secondly, I am talking only about academic subjects—this is not about PE or any other non-academic subject. We do not disagree on that.

Helen Jones: May I try to tease out some more precise figures from the hon. Gentleman? Does he have any information on the age range for which mixed ability teaching is used in secondary schools? It is quite common for secondary schools to begin teaching subjects in mixed ability classes and move to setting later on. That will affect his percentages for subjects such as history, because all children will take them to begin with, but fewer will do so once options are chosen.

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Lady could be making a valid point, but the figures do not show that. She is right in that there is a slightly higher proportion of mixed ability teaching in year 7, but it does not vary much beyond that. In fact, in the GCSE year, it dips from the previous year, so that there is less setting than in the year before. Broadly speaking, it goes right across the five years of secondary education and is not confined to year 7. Even if it were, that would be an error too. We need to set and stream by academic subject in all years in secondary schools.

Maths has the highest proportion of lessons set by ability—86 per cent. That still means, if my maths is correct, that one in seven maths lessons in comprehensive schools takes place in mixed ability classes. That is very much a linear subject that should not be taught in mixed ability classes. Again, this is not confined to year 7 classes.

There is overwhelming evidence, particularly research by Jim Kulik of the University of Michigan, that if one sets by ability and tailors the curriculum to each ability grouping, with accelerated and enhanced curricula for the most academically able sets, one will see a huge rise in educational attainment in the top sets, with no falls in attainment in the lower ability set. The research also shows a small rise in self-esteem in the lower sets as pupils are given the time, space and attention to learn rather than drowning in a mixed ability group. At the top end, there is a small fall in self-esteem as bright pupils find themselves competing with other bright children.

Anne Snelgrove: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that rigid setting is as bad as blanket mixed ability teaching? Perhaps we should be looking at banding instead of rigid setting, so that young people who would be in a top set in mathematics but a bottom set in English have ways of moving about in that band.

Mr. Gibb: The hon. Lady uses the term, "rigid". Setting is by definition flexible—that is how it differs from streaming. The more homogenous a particular group of children is, the easier it is to teach them and the better able one is to tailor the curriculum to that particular set level. There is a philosophical divide between us—I will not be able to convince the hon. Lady—but I hope that through these debates we can convince the public that this is the kind of education that we want for our children.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): The hon. Gentleman speaks with great conviction on these issues, and in many ways I agree with him about setting. I find the Ofsted figures difficult to understand in terms of the level of mixed ability teaching. However, I have a specific question for him. If there is general agreement across the House, and within the educational fraternity, that setting is a good thing that should be used in all academic subjects, does that mean that the Conservative party has now ceased to advocate grammar schools and selection by ability? If we followed his thesis, we would not need it.

Mr. Gibb: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has seen the text of my speech. I am about to deal with that precise point, if he will hold his horses for a moment. I am not a million miles from his view.

Such issues are more important than whether a group of children has access to an especially good school or whether a different group of children should have access to it. All that debates about admission, codes and prescriptive methodologies for determining intakes do is substitute one set of injustices for another. The genuine problem is that there are simply not enough good schools. If there were more good schools, the heartache and anger of parents who are unable to get their child into their preferred option would be less.

The National Audit Office report has been much cited in the two days of debate on Report. It reported that 23 per cent. of secondary schools underperform and that it is likely that a similar proportion is coasting. Ofsted reports that 34 per cent. of secondary schools are no more than satisfactory according to its grading system and that a further 10 per cent. are inadequate. Forty-four per cent. of schools are therefore either satisfactory, which we no longer regard as good enough, or inadequate. That is a sad and alarming indictment of our education system.

No one claims that the causes started in 1997, and they did not start under the previous Conservative Government. They date back more than 40 years. We all need to tackle the underlying causes in a practical and non-ideological way. We must examine the evidence of what works and not what fits our ideological stance. It is clear from the research evidence and the success of schools that set that, when comprehensive schools set all their academic subjects by ability in all year groups—with flexibility, so that children who develop later in a subject can move up to a higher ability group—and have smaller classes with more experienced teachers focusing on the lower attainment groups, far-reaching improvements occur in the quality of education in those schools.

If we can recreate in the top sets the academic education that grammar schools and many independent schools offer their pupils—an education that stretches children academically and enables them to fulfil their educational potential with an enhanced or accelerated curriculum—there is no need to undergo the upheaval of reintroducing the 11-plus and selection, and re-establishing grammar and secondary modern schools in areas where they were abolished more than 30 years ago.

Anne Snelgrove: There will be no need to reintroduce the 11-plus because a grammar stream will be created in an alleged comprehensive school. That is why I questioned the hon. Gentleman closely earlier. I am sure that the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) will be delighted by the news, but we should warn the general public that that is what the Conservative party intends. It is not right. Children could be prevented from going further and faster by the policies that the hon. Gentleman proposes because they would be excluded from the grammar stream.

Mr. Gibb: No, I do not propose that. We are trying to create a grammar school sort of education for the top sets in a school. Because the school would be on one campus with a setted structure, there is flexibility so that children who might have gone to a secondary modern at 11 but develop later, when they are 13 or 14, can move up the sets into the grammar stream. The grammar stream would not have a glass ceiling, which prevents children below from getting into it. There would be flexibility. Children could well be in the grammar stream for English but not maths. The purpose is to enable us to have the grammar school type education that the country needs but to make it flexible so that children of all abilities can move into those sets if they develop. It is precisely the opposite of what the hon. Lady suggests.

Ms Keeble: Does the Conservative party intend to scrap its commitment to grammar schools, or is the hon. Gentleman saying that it will scrap it but not just yet? What is he saying about Conservatives' commitment to grammar schools and the 11-plus?

Mr. Gibb: I said that we would not reintroduce the 11-plus and selection. We are committed to getting all academic subjects in all years in secondary school setted by ability in a flexible system. I probably share the hon. Lady's view that the binary division that took place at 11 with the 11-plus was socially divisive. It is uncomfortable for me to see children who have been friends at primary school being forced to attend separate campuses, with one turning right at the end of the road and the other turning left. That is why the Conservative party has taken the position that it will not bring back selection when it returns to office. Nor did we do so when we were last in office.

3.45 pm

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman's argument. Would he go further and advocate getting rid of the grammar school system in places such as Kent and Buckinghamshire? He has just described the system as socially divisive. If it is socially divisive in one place, surely it is in another.

Mr. Gibb: The answer to that question is no—

Matthew Taylor: Why?

Mr. Gibb: I will come to that in a moment.

We believe that we can ensure that academically able children receive a grammar school-type education within the campus of a comprehensive school. To do that, however, we need comprehensive setting, and most comprehensive schools are far from being in that position at the moment. However, teachers and head teachers are far more in favour of that approach than of the upheaval implicit in any return to wholesale selection.

To deal with the point raised by the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor), we will protect and safeguard the existing grammar schools and schools that have partial selection. It would be a criminal act to destroy schools that are providing first-class education to thousands of youngsters in this country. That is why we oppose the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) and his colleagues, which propose the end of selection by 2010 unless ballots are held in the areas in which grammar schools exist. I believe that any such ballots would come out in favour of retaining the grammar schools, because they are enormously popular in the areas that have them, even among parents whose children do not attend them.

Mr. Willis: I am sure that Mr. Woodhead, who is listening to this debate, has now abandoned his support of the Tory party. That cannot be a bad thing. May I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are talking not only about selection by ability in the 160 or so remaining grammar schools, but about the 10 per cent. selection by aptitude that exists in some schools? As he knows, we have been debating this matter for many years. Does he advocate getting rid of that arrangement, given that all the schools in the brave new Conservative world would have setting for academic subjects?

Mr. Gibb: Chris Woodhead is a friend of mine, and we discuss these issues at great length. I am sure that he will retain his support for this party.

On the hon. Gentleman's question about the 10 per cent. selection, that arrangement is designed to achieve something different, namely to create an ethos in a specialist school. We are in favour of schools being able to establish an ethos, in relation to music, languages, maths, computing or whatever. We are therefore in favour of retaining the 10 per cent. selection on that basis.

To return to my point about the amendment on grammar schools tabled by the hon. Member for Bury, North, I believe that any ballots to retain those schools would be won, but why should the schools have to go through such a time-consuming and distracting process just to satisfy the ideological yearnings of a few Labour MPs?

Our amendments Nos. 103 and 104 seek to restore to the Bill its original White Paper vision by deleting the change proposed in clause 37(4):

> "In subsection (3), for 'to have regard to' substitute 'to act in accordance with'."

The starting point of the whole saga of the admissions code is section 84 of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, which states:

> "The Secretary of State shall issue, and may from time to time revise, a code of practice containing such practical guidance as he thinks appropriate".

It goes on, in a very non-prescriptive way, to say:

> "The code may include guidelines setting out aims, objectives and other matters in relation to the discharge of their functions".

Subsection (3) of that section contains the famous phrase:

> "It shall be the duty of"—

LEAs and governing bodies—

> "to have regard to any relevant provisions of the code."

Clause 37 of the Bill does two key things. First, it replaces the phrase

> "a code of practice containing such practical guidance" with the far more prescriptive words

> "a code for school admissions containing such provision" as the Secretary of State thinks fit. It also replaces the looser phrase "to have regard to" with the far more authoritarian wording > "to act in accordance with".

As everyone knows, clause 37 was introduced into the Bill as a result of pressure from the Labour rebels, and following the Secretary of State's letter of 6 February to the Chairman of the Education and Skills Committee. In that letter, she said:

"As you know it has always been our intention that the Code of Practice on admissions should have real force."

She then said,

"we are concerned that recent legal judgements may have weakened the perceived force of the Code, so we will close the legal loophole so that admission authorities must 'act in accordance' with it, rather than having to have 'regard' to it."

On the first of those assertions, I looked in vain in the White Paper for a reference to the code having real force. The nearest I could find was at paragraph 3.22, which states;

"No one approach towards admissions will work in all circumstances. This is why we want to ensure that all self-governing schools...are free to use the approach to fair admissions that they think will best meet their local circumstances, as long as it is compatible with the Admissions Code."

Of course, in all their radio, television and newspaper interviews in the period between the publication of the White Paper in October last year and the concession letter of 6 February this year, the Prime Minister and the then Secretary of State categorically ruled out giving the code of practice any more compulsion than it already had. As the Prime Minister said at his press conference on 23 January:

"I can't agree, for the reasons we have given on many occasions, that this code becomes statutory".

The second slightly misleading statement in the letter of 6 February is that the change of heart was prompted by recent legal judgments that may have weakened the perceived force of the code. The implication is that those legal judgments occurred after the publication of the White Paper in 2005, hence the need for a last-minute change of mind. The case of the London Oratory school was decided on 17 December 2004, some 10 months before the publication of the White Paper. The truth is that it is simply an unnecessary concession made for internal Labour party management reasons and has nothing to do with what the Prime Minister or the then Secretary of State thought, in their best judgment, was in the best interests of the education system.

We believe that clause 37 is far too prescriptive and that circumstances not envisaged by the drafters of the code might require more flexibility. For instance, it should be permissible for a school to refuse admission to a child whose parents refuse to sign a home-school agreement. We agree with the White Paper at paragraph 3.25, which states:

"We recognise that no form of admissions arrangements can increase the number of places at an oversubscribed school. That is why we are continuing to increase the number of good schools and the number of places in good schools."

That should be the focus of our attention rather than the over-obsession with admission arrangements.

I also agree with the Prime Minister, who was absolutely right when he said on 24 October:

"Local authority efforts to create equity often produced deadening uniformity, with child-centred learning and a rigid adherence to mixed ability teaching too often failing to raise expectations and meet basic standards."

The focus of an incoming Conservative Government will be to raise standards in all our schools so that children of all backgrounds will have a greater opportunity to attend a good school.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman has talked about time scales and changes of mind, but I seem to recall that the Conservative party changed its mind on selection by ability in a remarkably short space of time. Was that for internal Conservative party reasons or external electoral reasons?

Mr. Gibb: No, it is genuinely based on the belief that if we set flexibly but comprehensively—not rigidly—within a school, all the upheaval involved in returning to selection would not be necessary. We need to make sure that many of our comprehensive schools have an enhanced and accelerated curriculum that stretches the brightest children. In too many comprehensive schools, that is not happening. We are concerned about standards in schools, and we think that the best approach is universal setting in our comprehensive schools.

I believe that parents want concentration on standards in our schools. They want more good schools and they want their local school to be a good school. That, rather than developing ever more complex and prescriptive admission arrangements designed to allocate a dwindling number of good school places, will be our focus. That is why we will move amendment No. 104 at the appropriate moment, and I hope that it will have the support of the whole House.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): I shall speak to the group of amendments tabled by myself, but may I say first that I agreed completely with many aspects of what the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) said? He provided a powerful critique of selective admissions systems, which will also underpin my own argument in support of new clause 39. I am therefore extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making those points.

Today's debate, furthermore, could not have taken place without the Conservative party's dramatic switch of policy over selection earlier this year. My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly) asked why that happened, and it may well have been due to the authoritative YouGov poll published in The Daily Telegraph last December, which showed that only 20 per cent. of parents supported selective admissions policies to secondary schools. That amounts to focus-group policy making with vengeance, but I am delighted that the Conservatives have listened to the focus group that The Daily Telegraph offered them.

I shall speak mainly to new clause 39 and briefly to new clauses 40, 41, 42, 43, 45, 46 and 47 in reverse order. New clause 47 argues the case for bringing academies into the overall admissions arrangements of other schools. New clause 46 is similar to new clause 42, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), but the latter has the advantage of dealing specifically with anonymised admissions.

[Mr. David Chaytor]

New clause 45 raises the question of the local education authority's role as the co-ordinator of local admissions arrangements and the monitor of compliance with them. I feel slightly ambiguous about it because I was one of the first to argue that the admissions forums should have a new enhanced power to monitor compliance. I am very pleased to say that that is now in the Bill and I am grateful to the Government for including it. I would still like to test the argument and I hope that the Minister will think further about it in due course. Perhaps we should ensure that the admissions forum has the full support of the LEA, particularly in respect of secretarial and administrative functions.

New clauses 43 and 42 simply place within the Bill the admissions criteria that are deemed to be either acceptable or unacceptable in the current code of practice. There has been a long-standing debate about whether the code of practice or elements of it should be incorporated into the Bill, perhaps as a schedule, and these new clauses make the argument for having a full list of approved over-subscription criteria—not non-permitted criteria—placed directly in the Bill. We have already established a precedent for doing so with some over-subscription criteria: for example, we have agreed that the ban on interviewing, the priority given to children in public care and the promotion of banding should all be in the Bill; so it is illogical if other approved criteria are not in it.

New clause 41 is consequential on new clause 40, which argues, given that the Bill brings about significant changes to admissions arrangements, that we should establish, six months after the passing of the Act, an independent review body to monitor and assess the operation of all aspects of admissions arrangements across the country.

I wish to speak at slightly greater length to new clause 39 and I intend to press it to a vote. The new clause deals almost entirely with process rather than with the arguments between supporters and opponents of selection. An argument about process can take place now only because, for the first time in more than 30 years, we have a consensus between the three main political parties about not returning to selective admissions policies as an organising principle of secondary education in this country. For that, I am hugely grateful to the leader of the Conservative party, who changed the policy earlier this year. I believe that they have listened—

Ian Stewart (Eccles) (Lab): Do not go too far!

Mr. Chaytor: No, they have listened carefully to the arguments and considered the evidence about the impact of selective admissions policies. What new clause 39 does is to deal simply with the anomaly that is left. If all three parties accept that a return to the universal 11-plus system is not acceptable because of the various disadvantages of which we are all aware and about which I shall say more later, it remains completely inconsistent that we should support that system in the 36 English local education authorities where it still applies. I do not argue that there is a simple solution, and I do not argue that the Government should simply decide to change things overnight. The purpose of my new clause is to suggest a process whereby the remaining anomalies in the 15 wholly selective areas and the 36 areas that contain large elements of selection can be resolved.

4 pm

At the heart of the issue is the fact that it can be resolved neither by local people alone nor by national Government alone. New clause 39 suggests that the Government establish a clear principle, namely that selection is not a desirable form of admission to secondary education, and that they set an end date beyond which selection will no longer be permitted. It proposes 2010 as the end date. At the same time, it allows the current ballot arrangements to be maintained. Parents would be able to engage in debate locally, consider the alternatives and express their views, and would have the right to vote to reintroduce selection if they were so minded.

Mr. Willis: Let me add my voice to the consensus to which the hon. Gentleman alluded.

The School Standards and Framework Act 1998, which introduced the current arrangements for balloting to take a grammar school out of the selective process and recreate it as a comprehensive, was deeply flawed. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there has only been one ballot, involving Ripon grammar school in north Yorkshire, and that process was deeply flawed because of the nature of the constituency.

Damian Green: What happened?

Mr. Willis: I have described what happened. The balloting arrangements are deeply flawed: the hon. Gentleman and I agree on that. The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) has said that under his new clause the same arrangements would apply. If that is so, the same flawed system determining who can vote would be transferred to this Bill. I think it is appalling that the vast majority of people in the community surrounding a grammar school do not have a say, although it is their local school.

Mr. Chaytor: The hon. Gentleman has raised an important point. He has rightly forced me to clarify my point about the balloting arrangements. Under new clause 39, there would still be a ballot, but the new clause says nothing about the details of the arrangements. I agree that the current ballot regulations are unfortunate. They are designed to protect the status quo, are limited in terms of how they describe the electorate and provide for different kinds of ballot depending on local circumstances; on whether the area is wholly selective, or is largely non-selective but contains individual selective schools. Different rules apply in different circumstances, but I think that the argument for reviewing the ballot regulations is powerful. I hope that if the Government are minded to adopt the new clause at some point, we shall in due course discuss the possibility of a more democratic form of electorate and procedure.

Mr. Brady: Thankfully, common sense prevailed in the Ripon ballot. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on at least demonstrating a greater commitment to democracy than the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), but given his belief that there should be a role for ballots and for democratic choice, why does he not have the courage of his convictions? Why does new clause 39 not allow the balloting process to be available to parents in areas containing comprehensive schools that are failing?

Mr. Chaytor: The hon. Gentleman asked me the same question in a Manchester BBC studio about two weeks ago. The answer I gave him then is the answer I shall give him now. I am sympathetic to that argument, for the simple reason that if the Conservative party in my constituency went into the next general election arguing wholesale—in a ballot—for the reintroduction of the system that was scrapped in Bury 30 years ago and to which hardly anyone wishes to return, I should be delighted to fight the election on those terms.

The majority of my colleagues would also welcome that opportunity. If we were to find that the modern, newborn, compassionate Conservatives—the friends of the poor and the dispossessed—were suddenly, in the next general election, fighting ballots throughout the country to take us back to the 1950s, we would be delighted. So the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) makes an important point, and I am inclined to table a handwritten amendment to that very effect.

Mr. Brady: I hope that the hon. Gentleman does, and I might even be tempted to vote for it. However, surely those ballots ought not to be fought by political parties. Is not his point that this is a matter for parents to decide? If he believes that parents in areas that are currently selective should be able to decide, why will not he give a choice to parents in areas with failing comprehensives, who might choose a grammar school?

Mr. Chaytor: The point is that the new clause would deal with the remaining anomalies in the system. I take it as read that the three main political parties have settled their argument about what happens in the majority of the country. Of course, there is an internal debate in the Tory party between those who deeply resent the change of policy and those who are prepared to put up with it; but that is a matter for the Tories, and I suggest that they go somewhere else and have that internal debate.

New clause 39 has to be seen together with new clause 40. In retrospect, it may have been preferable to incorporate the latter into the former, because new clause 40 calls for an independent review of the admissions arrangements. So the strength of the argument is simply this. If the Government accepted the new clause, they would build on the all-party consensus that no longer accepts selection as the organising principle for admission to secondary education by following through the logic of that consensus and establishing the end-date of 2010. Six months after the Bill has been enacted, an independent review body would be established to examine all aspects of our admissions arrangements, and to study the evidence of the impact of admissions arrangements in different parts of the country. The review body would report before 2010, and we could then have an informed debate based on evidence, not on ideology or prejudice. Parents would then form their judgments in the light of that informed debate. That is precisely why I am confident that if such a procedure were adopted, very few parts of the country would choose to reintroduce selection.

It is hugely significant that since the great change to our admissions policies under the Labour Government between 1964 and 1970, and under the Conservative Government between 1970 and 1974—of course, we all know which Tory Secretary of State was responsible for abolishing more selection in our system than anybody else—we have been unable to have that informed debate.

I draw an analogy with the way in which we have tried to resolve other intractable problems when the political parties have themselves found it difficult to reach agreement. All the parties agreed that it was necessary to get a neutral third-party expert to consider the funding of higher education, and we invited Ron Dearing to take charge of the commission dealing with HE funding. The Government did not accept everything in the Dearing report, but it was subsequently considered to be the authoritative body of evidence and argument, and now we all refer to it. I am delighted that, in another of the Tories' historic flip-flops, they have adopted our policy on HE funding.

I also draw attention to the impact of the Tomlinson report on education reform for 14 to 19-year-olds. That issue was a political football that the parties kicked about for a number of years. There was a desperate need for consensus, and we resolved the problem by setting up an independent review body under the chairmanship of Mike Tomlinson. [Interruption.] No—Mike Tomlinson suggested that there would be a 10-year period of reform and change, and the Government have taken the first steps as part of that reform.

Let us move outside education and consider the analogy of pensions policy, the implications of an ageing work force, and the balance between the responsibilities of the state, the individual and the employer. What did we do to deal with that issue? We brought in a former president of the CBI and gave him the task of building a national consensus on pensions policy.

We can draw some lessons from the Turner report. A few months ago, there was very little public support for the raising of the state retirement age. Because of the work of the Turner commission and the informed debate that followed the publication of its report, the Government are now confident enough to raise the retirement age and a majority of the public are in favour because they now understand the arguments clearly. That is the best analogy I can give for the way in which I would envisage new clause 40 operating, with an independent review body of admissions. We need a neutral expert to lead the national debate and gather all the evidence. With such a lead, we could kill off all the old sterile arguments about which kind of school is best and how many A to C grades this school has as opposed to that school. We could really focus on the impact of selection in our system and, once we did so, people could form their views accordingly.

[Mr. Chaytor]

I assume—I may be wrong, and they can correct me later—that the Conservatives have reached their new position because they understand that selective admissions policies lower achievement overall. They understand, because they have read the recently published evidence from Professor Jesson, chief academic adviser to the Specialist Schools and Academies Trust; because they have considered what the National Foundation for Educational Research has been saying for many years; and because they have read what the London Institute of Education has said. The Conservatives know that the brightest children perform equally well, if not slightly better, in all-ability schools than in selective schools. They know that the impact of selection is to depress results overall; to depress post-16 participation rates overall; and to increase levels of segregation overall.

The Tory party also knows the differential between selective and non-selective schools, in respect of the proportion of children on free schools meals. It is slightly over 1 per cent. in selective schools and almost 17 per cent. in the population as a whole. Similar figures exist for children with special educational needs and, in some parts of the country, from minority ethnic groups—an issue that has not been examined in the detail that it deserves.

The Tories also know what we find if we compare Northern Ireland, the most selective area with the highest levels of segregation, with Scotland, with the least segregation; it compares favourably with the Scandinavian countries that manage to combine equity and high standards. In Northern Ireland, the number of adults in the population who left school with no qualifications is twice the number for Scotland. In Scotland, the number of adults in the work force with degrees or degree-equivalent qualifications is almost 50 per cent. higher than in Northern Ireland. That is the most dramatic evidence that selective systems depress results overall, lower levels of attainment and increase levels of social segregation.

Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): The points that my hon. Friend has just made about Northern Ireland and Scotland will, I presume, enable Ministers to support his proposal, because they have taken the enlightened step of tackling selection in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Chaytor: My hon. Friend anticipates my final remarks. The great advantage of new clauses 39 and 40 is that they combine the merits of the Government's policy in Northern Ireland—establishing a commission and setting an end date for selection—with the merits of the policy in the remaining selective areas of England, which is to leave the decision to parental ballot. The beauty of the new clauses is that we get two Labour policies for the price of one. I commend the new clauses to the House and confirm that I wish to press new clause 39 to a Division.

Damian Green: I wish to speak against unnecessary disruption in our schools and in favour of local choice, and therefore I speak against new clause 39, which was supported with characteristic eloquence and wrong-headedness by the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor). That is a reminder to us all that the prejudices of old Labour are still around, and that the party is still fighting the battles of the 1960s and 1970s.

4.15 pm

I have not participated in education debates for a few years, so this afternoon's exchanges have been quite nostalgic for me. I have been struck by how insular and inward looking our debates on education are. The point underlying the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) was that there are different ways to achieve an excellent academic education. That is true, especially when one looks at what happens in the rest of Europe.

By and large, the schools in Holland are big comprehensives that contain significantly different streams. In any given Dutch town, one can find what is effectively a grammar school on the same site as a good technical vocational school. Incidentally, it is the lack of the latter schools that is the real, long-term failure of British education.

The German approach is different, with different types of schools being provided. Over the past 30 or 40 years, both countries have gone through good and bad periods. Their results have been better than ours some of the time, and at other times they have been worse, but both have managed to ensure that debates about education have been about improving children's life chances. They have not allowed them to deal in social engineering, class warfare or any of the things that have bedevilled education debates in this country. I am depressed to find that those influences still affect our debates here.

It is a shame that the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) has left the Chamber. She did not respond to my earlier intervention, but I was fascinated to hear her commit the Liberal Democrats to supporting new clause 39 and therefore the abolition of all grammar schools. I shall be interested to see whether my Liberal Democrat opponent in Ashford at the next general election says the same thing, and whether his counterpart in the neighbouring constituency of Folkestone and Hythe is pledged to abolish the grammar schools in Folkestone. Over the years, I do not remember Liberal Democrats ever saying such things in counties such as Kent, but the party's policy may have changed under the hon. Lady's tutelage.

Mr. Chaytor: Nothing in new clause 39 would lead to the abolition of any school. It may cause some schools to change their character, and it would open up many good schools to more young people. Fair access and fair admission are at the heart of that new clause.

Damian Green: New clause 39 would enable the prejudices of the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues to be imposed on schools in my constituency and elsewhere, against the wishes of the people who live in our towns and cities. That is what I object to.

Annette Brooke: I feel that we have already debated the question of parental views and voting. Does the hon. Gentleman not think that it is perfectly reasonable that parents should have a say in how the education system is run?

Damian Green: Yes, I do think that it is reasonable. That is precisely the point that I am making.

I oppose new clause 39 because I saw the damaging effect of anti-grammar school campaigns in the late 1990s and the early years of this century, both in my constituency and across Kent. Those campaigns damaged all the schools in the area, and not just grammar schools, because they diverted effort, money, resources and energy from education. People who should have been involved in improving school standards took up opposing positions in destructive political campaigns that, in the end, achieved nothing because they had no support.

In Kent, for example, the Government's regulations meant that the anti-grammar school campaigners needed 45,000 signatures to trigger a ballot. When they set off, they were extremely confident that they would achieve that number, but that was in the late 1990s heyday of new Labour, when it was both new and popular. It is neither of those things today.

After months of trying, however, the campaigners were forced to admit that they were giving up, as they were able to raise only 7,000 signatures in the whole of Kent. That was not just a failure, it was a pathetic failure. Despite the opinion polls quoted by the hon. Member for Bury, North, the campaign showed that the parents who knew most about education did not want it to be disrupted. A majority of those parents would have known that their children would go not to grammar schools but to the high schools or comprehensives that we have in certain parts of Kent, yet not only would they not vote to change the system, but they would not even sign the petition to trigger a ballot.

That is clear evidence, in addition to the one ballot that actually did take place—in Ripon. The hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) could not even bring himself to say what happened, which was that when parents were faced with a choice they voted to retain the existing system. In Kent, which is a much larger area, parents did not even want a ballot. However, the anti-grammar school campaigners came back again and again, and the energies and efforts of too many people were spent for too long on something that was not helpful to any school in the area.

I hope and expect that the common sense of those on the Treasury Bench, including the new Secretary of State, means that people of reason and common sense on both sides of the House will vote against the new clause—against the hard left of the Labour party and their natural allies, nowadays, in the Liberal Democrats. I am sure that they will be defeated, because when parents have had the chance to speak they have spoken loudly against that type of change. They do not want to destroy the existing school system.

Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab) rose—

Damian Green: Ah, a Kent MP.

Gwyn Prosser: The hon. Gentleman paints a picture of Kent that I do not recognise, and nor would my colleagues or the heads and staff of Kent secondary modern and high schools. We did not reach the tripping point because the level was set far too high. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the conversations between people who, like me, were campaigning for change, and the parents of primary school children were not on the lines of, "That's all right, I know my child's not going to get into the grammar school, but let's vote for the status quo anyway". It was the ambition of all of them to get their children into grammar schools, but they did not. If we held those conversations again, the answer would be very different.

Finally, has the hon. Gentleman ever met a high school head or teacher who supports selection—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made his case.

Damian Green: The answer to the question put by the hon. Member for Dover (Gwyn Prosser) is: many. Very few head teachers have told me that they want the wholesale disruption of Kent schools; they all know that is what would happen if he had his way. He says that the problem is that the barrier to trigger the ballot was set too high. I have to say, first, that that is a touch pathetic and, secondly, it was not a near miss; the tripping point was missed by miles—by a quantum of six or seven. There is no enthusiasm for the change.

I realise that the hon. Gentleman campaigned for change and would no doubt continue to do so, but he had no support from the vast mass of parents in Kent, so he should change tack and support different systems in different parts of the country. I observe what happens in my constituency, as no doubt he does in his. In my nearby constituency, schools work well together. Ashford grammar schools and high schools co-operate in a forum; they work together in an imaginative new cluster system. People do not care whether they are working with a high school or a grammar school and primary schools work with both. Educational standards, which need improving, can be improved. Overall, the system works well for the children from relatively poor backgrounds who can benefit from a highly academic education.

Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): As I understand it, the national policy of the Conservatives, as enunciated by their new, old Etonian leader, is not to have selection by ability for secondary schools. We can understand that a self-proclaimed Conservative wants to maintain the status quo in Kent—that is what Conservatives do—but what is the logic of saying that they are against selection by ability everywhere in the country except where there are grammar schools already? It is postcode selection.

Damian Green: The logic was very well explained by my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). I am not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman was here to listen to his speech. As I said, I am speaking in favour of non-disruption and local choice. The first seems an extremely sensible educational point. The second seems an extremely good Conservative principle. Indeed, the Government whom he sporadically supports occasionally say that they support that principle, too. They say that they are in favour of local choice. I invite the Government to put their words into practice and support local choice, as I think that they will in opposing new clause 39. I will happily go into the Division Lobby with them to do that.

Mr. Chaytor: If the hon. Gentleman is so confident that the people of Kent would support the status quo and that the merits of the system in Kent are so self-evident, why is he frightened of putting the matter to a ballot under new clause 39?

Damian Green: The hon. Gentleman is not listening to what I am saying. I am not frightened of that, but I saw what happened after the ballots were introduced under the School Standards and Framework Act 1998. There were years of disruption in Kent schools. People were not spending enough time making the schools better. They were spending too much of their time preparing themselves for a political campaign. I do not want to go through that again and I do not want the schools to go through that again.

Every parent—every family—should have choice, not just the well-off. One of the more sensible things that the Government have said in recent years was in their response to the Education and Skills Committee's report on secondary schools admissions in November 2004:

> "The Government wants all secondary schools to play to their strengths and provide a flexible curriculum able to meet the needs of individual pupils. Selection by aptitude allows a small number of pupils with particular gifts and talents to benefit from particular curriculum strengths."

I agree with all of that. Where I part company from the Government is that I regard all-round academic excellence as an aptitude, but I know that, for historic reasons, they cannot adopt that view. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his consistency. He disapproves of any kind of differentiation. He wants all secondary schools to be the same and he is completely consistent in that.

I think that the Government were right in that response and they are right to reject new clause 39. I do not want to impose the system that obtains in Kent on other areas of the country if they do not want it and I do not think that the hon. Gentleman should want to impose his system on my constituents and the schools in my constituency. I believe in local choice, and I demand that local choice for parents in my locality. They have said clearly that they admire the work done in all the schools in Ashford. They want to keep the current system and they would hate political interference driven by an out-of-date levelling down ideology to get in the way of good schools. I urge the House to reject new clause 39.

Ms Keeble: I will keep my comments brief because I know that a large number of other hon. Members want to take part in the debate. I am opposed to the new clauses and amendments tabled by the hon. Members for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) and for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). The new clause moved by the hon. Member for Brent, East proposes an admissions policy that is based on a mistrust of head teachers. That seems fundamentally flawed. We rely on the ability and leadership provided by head teachers for the quality of what happens in schools, so it would be wrong to have an admissions policy that assumed that they were trying to cheat. I also think that, when we are trying to encourage schools to build more links with their communities, it would send mixed messages to say that they can have links at all times, except where anything to do with admissions is concerned, when an exclusion zone applies. The way in which that was presented was completely false. The proposals made by the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton were clearly a retrograde step and would undo the progress that had been achieved by Labour Members.

In opposing those new clauses, I ask Ministers—I have spoken to my hon. Friend the Minister for Schools about this matter—to give me some assurances about the position on admissions in relation to a particular group of pupils: those who have been excluded from school. They seem to have been missed out of the present debate, although there are supposed to be some provisions in the Bill for them.

A school community can be shaped by not only admissions, but exclusions. All of us who know of schools that have opted out over the years, or entered into different management arrangements, have often seen that accompanied by large-scale exclusions. When I was a council leader in London, a school became a city technology college under the then Conservative Government. Its establishment as a CTC was accompanied by shedloads of pupils being excluded, all of whom ended up at a neighbouring community school. The situation had a profound impact on the community school's ability to cope and its performance. Although we have an admissions code, I am worried that it is not clear that the priorities will also be applied to children who are excluded. I do not want to end up with school communities shaped by not only admissions policies, but exclusion policies—in other words, selection by behaviour, not ability.

4.30 pm

I am especially worried because we must consider the real ethnic impact of exclusions. Segregation in schools has been profoundly damaging. Information from the Office for National Statistics shows that permanent exclusion rates are highest for children of Traveller Irish heritage, with a rate of 66 children in every 10,000. The rate for children of mixed ethnic origin is 25 in every 10,000, which is much lower. The exclusion rate for pupils of mixed ethnic origin and black pupils is similar, and it is about twice the rate for white pupils. The figures are similar for fixed-term exclusions. We also know that the peak point for exclusions is for boys aged 13 and 14. Unless we are sure that those children can get back into schools and that there is a code on, and sensible arrangements for, their readmission to schools, we will run the risk of finding that there is a drift of difficult children from schools that abide by the consensus to those that decide for one reason or another to be outside it.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend as concerned as me to ensure that the effect of clause 94, which deals with reintegration interviews, and clause 95, which sets out the duty in relation to excluded pupils, is monitored in the context of race and social deprivation?

Ms Keeble: I completely agree. I tabled a couple of amendments on the matter, but they are not being debated, so I am having to tailor my remarks to the amendments in the group; otherwise I might be ruled out of order. All the issues that my hon. Friend raises are extremely important.

I hope that the Minister will give us assurances on the points that I have raised. I understand that it will not be possible to deal with them all under the framework of the Bill, but given the big concessions that the Government have made on admissions to ensure that we have a cross-section of the community accessing local schools in a proper and fair manner, we do not want skewing to occur owing to the impact of exclusions and what happens with the readmission of excluded children.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) on her speech and on bringing a different perspective to the debate.

I wish to speak against new clause 39, which is a clumsy and, some would say, spiteful attempt to destroy the remaining 160-odd grammar schools throughout the country. The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) is an intelligent and decent individual. He is also my colleague on the Education and Skills Committee, and he often speaks with insight and creativity on education matters—[HON. MEMBERS: "More!"] I am building him up. However, the hon. Gentleman has allowed himself to be sucked into the Deputy Prime Minister's style of class warfare. Just because the hon. Gentleman dislikes grammar schools and selection does not mean that those in existence are wrong in principle.

There are two wonderful grammar schools in my constituency which provide excellence in education that is rarely matched anywhere else.

Mr. Chaytor: Why cannot more children attend those schools?

Mr. Wilson: I am about to go into that, if the hon. Gentleman will bear with me.

Reading school for boys and Kendrick school for girls offer local children a fantastic start in life. They come from a range of backgrounds. Many are bright and come from poorer or disadvantaged backgrounds. They often apply to the grammar schools because schools elsewhere in the borough are appalling.

Mr. Chaytor: Is it not the case that 70 per cent. of the intake of the wholly selective schools in Reading comes from outside Reading? How can the hon. Gentleman say that they give opportunities to local children? They are kept out of those selective schools because of their admissions policy.

Mr. Wilson: That is not true. The figure of 70 per cent. is not correct; it is much lower than that.

As I said, many of the other local schools are not of sufficient quality that parents wish to choose them, although there have been improvements. The good work at Highdown school means that it is catching up fast.

Anne Snelgrove: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wilson: Can it wait? The hon. Lady's intervention yesterday was hardly useful.

Merely a year ago, the local education authority in Reading was judged by Ofsted to be only satisfactory, and that was by a whisker. Some 40 per cent. of pupils in Reading are exported to South Oxfordshire and Woking authorities. Why? Because the performance of local schools, particularly at secondary level, has been poor historically. The fact that we float slightly above the bottom of the league tables is thanks to the performance of the grammar schools.

Parents in my constituency will be angry that an MP from Bury has decided that they should not be able to exercise a choice that, in the case of Reading school, has been open to them for hundreds of years. That is unacceptable.

Mr. Chaytor rose—

Anne Snelgrove rose—

Mr. Wilson: I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Chaytor: Is not the hon. Gentleman making my case for me? My argument is that selection leads to greater division and segregation. He is proving my case.

Mr. Wilson: I will deal with that in a second.

Mr. Hayes: Is my hon. Friend familiar with the work on the subject by Lord Adonis, the Prime Minister's special adviser on education? He argues in his book "A Class Act: Myth of Britain's Classless Society" that the abolition of grammar schools has had the effect that my hon. Friend describes. He disagrees with the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) about social mobility and makes the case that selective schools aid social mobility, a view supported by the work of the London School of Economics last year, which essentially concluded the same thing.

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. However, I do not want to dwell on the internal battles within the Labour party.

Damian Green: As, I think, the only pupil from Reading school in the Chamber—[HON. MEMBERS: "We rest our case."] Very good. However, I can assure the hon. Member for Bury, North that, whatever he thinks about the intellectual attainments of individual pupils, when the admissions policy of local education authorities were more rigid and 100 per cent. of pupils who went to Reading school came from within a narrowly defined boundary of a growing town—he will know that that is often a difficulty—the school was extremely socially mixed. Many of my school friends came from deprived backgrounds, and went on to successful university careers and careers following that, precisely because they went to a very good academic grammar school. It was a force for social mobility in the town.

Mr. Wilson rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that our debate is time-limited. If hon. Members are to take interventions, will those making them be brief?

Mr. Wilson: The idea that a ballot of parents provides legitimacy is a fig leaf for the views of the hon. Member for Bury, North. I dare say he would say that it is democracy in action, but we have seen how that form of unpleasant democracy worked with ballots for grant-maintained schools. At a school in my constituency where a ballot took place, there was a disgraceful local campaign of intimidation and bullying. The school community took a long time to recover, and I dare say that such events were repeated in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Damian Green).

It is not right to politicise schools in that way. May I tell the hon. Member for Bury, North that the current arrangements demonstrate that there is no appetite to destroy the few remaining grammar schools, including two in my constituency? He would do much better to concentrate on the fact that 1 million children have been failed by schools for which his party is responsible.

Anne Snelgrove: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wilson: I am mindful of Madam Deputy Speaker's ruling.

Anne Snelgrove: I shall be brief. The hon. Gentleman was silent in Committee, so it is interesting to hear his views today. He maligned successful schools in Reading local education authority, but having served as vice-chair of Berkshire county council education committee at the time, I can attest that there was not a malicious campaign against grant-maintained schools. Parents rightly debated the issue, as did politicians of all colours. I regret the fact that the hon. Gentleman denigrated Reading LEA, as it has made great strides in improving the schools in the area.

Mr. Wilson: I am afraid that, as she did yesterday, the hon. Lady shows her ignorance of both the historical and current situation in Reading. I certainly have not denigrated any schools that have achieved a reasonable performance.

I have tabled amendment No. 110 to clause 48. According to the regulatory impact assessment, clause 48 creates "greater flexibility and encourages collaboration by permitting schools, or groups of schools working together, to adopt admission arrangements that band applicants".

There are three kinds of banding: it can apply to a single school, across the local area, or it can represent a national ability range. The previous attempt to encourage banding failed, because it was a lengthy process and there were applications from only 15 schools, two of which were turned down. I hope that the present attempt fails. I have two main objections to banding. First, it derives from an ideology that dictates that the quality of a school can only be determined by planning its intake. People who push that philosophy do not believe that the success of a school is determined by ethos, quality of teaching or leadership. Banding is a substitute for making genuine improvements to a school. It attempts to fiddle the figures, rather than address the problems inherent to a school or to a group of schools.

Mrs. Dorries: Is my hon. Friend aware that city academies use a banding system for admission? They take a percentage of children with special needs and a percentage of children of certain ability. They argue that as they have accepted a certain percentage of children with special needs they will not take any more. As a result, community schools in the neighbourhood are affected. In Southwark, for example, where the City of London academy is located, 62.2 per cent. of pupils at neighbouring schools are children with special needs. [Interruption.] There is a table that shows how many schools are affected—it is not just one or two. Many community schools in the area have far more children—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson) may wish to reply.

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend makes a very good point, and I am sure that the Minister will respond later.

Secondly, banding ultimately takes children away from their local school. They are bussed to schools in an extensive area for the sake of social engineering that diminishes parental choice. I do not understand how that fits with the LEA's responsibility under the Bill to champion parental choice. I am sure that parents will not support the measure, so perhaps the Minister can explain why he thinks they will do so. I have serious concerns about whether banding will work effectively. The new clause, the Bill, and the code of admissions do not give the number of bands for good or best practice. Will there be a 10, five or three-band system? Will all those systems be used, and will the number of bands differ from school to school? Who decides the banding category? Is it the governors, the LEA or another authority?

The proposal has not been properly thought through. I instinctively oppose anything that smacks of social engineering: clause 48 is an unnecessary interference in local administration of schools, so it should be removed. I hope that the Conservative spokesmen will press the matter to a vote.

4.45 pm

Paul Farrelly: I, too, shall speak to the new clauses moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) which also bear my name, and particularly new clause 39. I want to contribute also from personal experience, as someone who was educated equally at a grammar school and a comprehensive school. I was part of the generation that went through the changes implemented by the then Labour Secretary of State, Shirley Williams, and my school, Wolstanton county grammar school, became the Marshlands comprehensive school in my fourth year, when I was 15.

I speak, too, as someone representing a constituency where selection remains very much part of the landscape. In 1997, as part of my rite of passage, I contested Chesham and Amersham, that favourable ground for Labour in Buckinghamshire, so I am familiar with a broad range of opinion about the academic selection still practised in that county.

Before I begin my remarks, I crave your indulgence, Madam Deputy Speaker, to take this opportunity almost a decade after that election to pay tribute to the late Keith Kingswood. Keith was the secretary of the Chesham and Amersham constituency Labour party, a tough calling in an area where for many people even new Labour conjured up the same fears as old Vikings. Keith, a very erudite and educated man, was above all a fervent opponent of academic selection all his life and a leading light in the Campaign for State Education, CASE.

Sadly, during that election, Keith died and was never able to see a new Labour Government. Such was his dedication that he flew over to New York to see his son to register a postal vote, of all things. During that visit, he contracted a mystery virus and never recovered. In 1997, while many people were still partying to the strains of "Things can only get better"—and they have—on election night we went quietly to bed and, with his family and widow Janet, laid Keith to rest at his funeral the next day.

There is no better tribute to Keith's lifelong efforts than the work done by Comprehensive Future, by the Socialist Education Association, of which I am a vice-chair, by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North, and by dedicated educationists like Fiona Millar, in drafting and tabling the new clauses.

Of course, we would all like the Government and my hon. Friend the Minister for Schools to support the new clause or even allow a free vote. After comments I have heard from many Labour Back-Bench colleagues, Ministers and indeed some of the Whips, I have no doubt that if there were a free vote, new clause 39 would be passed today.

I passed my 11-plus. I was also the only person in my year who did so and was refused entry at a grammar school—the Catholic grammar school of choice—because of a bad reference about my behaviour. The Whips' reach is long and I am still getting bad references now. So I went to Wolstanton, which is a non-denominational school, where I am now a governor, and in hindsight that did me the world of good, because I do not think I was made for the Christian Brothers' discipline.

I was distraught at the time, however, and so were lots of children who, for whatever reason, "failed"—in inverted commas. That was the language. There were good friends of mine who passed but went to the secondary modern round the corner, the Blessed Thomas Maxwell, either because other mates were going or because grammar schools were seen as snobby and "for them, not for us". And then there were the kids—and parents—who at that age did not know, did not care and did not have a clue. That was a disgraceful and divisive way to run an education system—to mark out large numbers of children as failures, based on an arbitrary test on an arbitrary day at an arbitrary age.

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): As one of those failures who did not pass the 11-plus but was a very good boy indeed, I resent your remarks that people who did not get to a grammar school were failures—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman of the terms of address. Those certainly were not my remarks.

Mr. Binley: Thank you for that advice, Madam Deputy Speaker. I take exception to those remarks. Does the hon. Gentleman not understand that the secondary modern schools in many parts of the country gave a very good education and set young people on a solid path to a good future?

Paul Farrelly: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his ascent. He speaks eloquently, but perhaps he should listen more carefully. When I used the word "failure", I deliberately said "in inverted commas". That was the language. It should never again be the reality.

Selection by so-called academic ability through such a test is a throwback to the days when education was in effect a privilege, not a right. When I was young, the system acted at each stage as a sieve so that a small minority could go to university. At each stage—11-plus, CSE, O-level and A-level—those who did not make the grade were out: they had "failed". That was the language. Thank heaven that, for most children, those days have gone.

There was no proper vocational education at the local secondary modern. My two brothers went there and left without many qualifications or any preparation for working life whatsoever. In the 1980s, one of them went through a succession of so-called youth training schemes, stacking shelves, only to be "let go" days before his six months were up, when the company was supposed to offer a permanent job. What a great start to life that was.

I was fortunate enough to start at a grammar school. However, there were hierarchies among the grammars. There was a snobbery attached to the grant-maintained schools, all of which locally opted out to become private schools in the mid-1970s. Those hierarchies and snobberies explain why many of us are suspicious about the Bill, which creates yet another new class of schools—trust schools.

As I said, my grammar school went comprehensive. That was a painful process because it involved the merger of two schools—a grammar and a secondary modern—but once the pain was over I do not remember Marshlands high school being anything but the better for being a comprehensive. It was far more balanced—and we got girls for the first time, so perhaps I was biased. There was certainly no attachment to the old grammar school, the 11-plus and the all the disgraceful division associated with it, and since then there has been no call from any political party to go back to that system. However, the way in which it was done left an echo of selection that remains divisive to this day.

That time of reorganisation is full of great ironies. It is often said that the Secretary of State who turned more grammars into comprehensives was none other than Margaret Thatcher. And the Secretary of State who presided over the biggest expansion of private education, at least in my area, was a Labour Secretary of State who is now a Liberal Democrat and whose mother, coincidentally, comes from Newcastle-under-Lyme.

It was wrong then, and it is wrong now, that Labour has not followed through by fully addressing academic selection at such a young age. New clause 39 would address that historic anomaly, but not by imposition—it would allow for a ballot of parents of pupils and primary schools feeding grammar schools.

Mr. Brady: Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that the highest levels of independent education often occur in the areas that have comprehensive schools, whereas the lowest levels often occur in areas such as mine, which have extremely high-performing selective education?

Paul Farrelly: When I was at my comprehensive in Newcastle-under-Lyme, I very much enjoyed going out to the ice rink at Altrincham. I can speak only for my area, where the historical legacy of the way in which the system was changed led to the expansion of private education, not the existence de facto of comprehensive schools.

I want to turn to the years before 1997 when I was campaigning in Chesham and Amersham in Buckinghamshire with my good friend Keith and other long-suffering Labour stalwarts such as my agent, Peter Ward. The area has some great secondary schools—high schools that are not grammars, such as Chesham high school. However, it would be wrong to say that as a result most parents to whom I spoke are happy with the selective system—quite the contrary. Many would welcome the opportunity of a change, or a proper debate about change, which new clause 39 would facilitate.

None of us would be supporting the new clauses if we did not believe that comprehensive education levels up, not down. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North quoted the evidence, which has remained unchallenged by Conservative Members. But there is another factor that is often overlooked. Selective schools, grammar and private, take out of the state system many of the very parents who are most likely to agitate for and contribute to better standards for every child in every school in every community.

I want to mention one another overlooked factor. In 2000, when, much to the horror of some of my former teachers, I became a governor of my old school, which is now Wolstanton high school, I was taken aback by its size. It had 1,200 pupils, compared with 600 when I was there. Whereas before it had teachers and form heads, it now had, like so many schools, senior management teams and lots of the bureaucracy involved with administering such a large establishment.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman paints a misty-eyed—some would say myopic—view of the comprehensive ideal. Does he favour it in its original incarnation—one sort of school catering for all abilities in one way—or does he support the Government's view of academies, specialist schools, trust schools and a diversity of provision, whereby different children go to different sorts of school, depending on where they live?

Paul Farrelly: I favour schools with mixed ability that level up, not down, for everybody. Again, I cite the evidence to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North referred. The Opposition have not challenged it.

Labour Members have rightly emphasised smaller class sizes. However, after so many school mergers, the implications of school sizes for teaching and attention to pupils and standards are often missing from the debate. I hope that that will receive attention in future.

We want all schools to be good schools, not factories, inclusive and not divisive, and to level up, not down, for everyone. We want schools that improve life chances for everyone, not only a minority, and we want all parents to have a say. I therefore urge hon. Members, especially my hon. Friend the Minister for Schools, to support new clause 39.

Mr. Brady: I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly), especially as he revealed his early days of skating on the ice rink in Altrincham. That is obviously where he gained his taste for skating on thin ice.

I am delighted to follow my hon. Friends who have spoken, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson), who obviously does an excellent job not only for his constituents, but for education. One of the most important aspects of his speech was a preparedness to talk about bad schools. One of the most damaging things in education is the number of people who find it convenient not to admit that bad schools exist. They tend to ignore them and they get away with it. My hon. Friend mentioned Reading local education authority's performance, with about 46 per cent. of children getting five or more good GCSEs. That is unacceptable. The hon. Member for South Swindon (Anne Snelgrove) intervened on him, and I believe that 50 per cent. of children in her LEA obtain five or more good GCSEs. That is also unacceptable. Such levels of achievement should not be tolerated.

Anne Snelgrove: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon—I was discussing going to get a cup of tea, so I was not entirely paying attention, but I believe that he mentioned my local authority. We are doing several percentage points better than we were in 1997 when the Labour Government came to power.

Mr. Brady: The hon. Lady has fallen into the trap about which I was warning hon. Members—defending abysmal performance that should not be tolerated.I am delighted if the performance is marginally better, but getting 50 per cent. of children through five A* to C grade GCSEs is simply unacceptable.

Anne Snelgrove: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brady: No, I have dealt with the point.

I have a specific obligation in the debate because, as hon. Members who heard my contributions on Second Reading know, my constituency and the borough of Trafford have the best performing schools in England. The system there is wholly selective and it would be an act of vandalism and stupidity to disrupt and damage it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Damian Green), who also represents an area with selective education, made a point about the Liberal Democrats' contribution. I cannot resist picking up on that, especially given that the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) is again in her place, because my experience in Altrincham, like that of my hon. Friend in Kent, is that the Liberal Democrats support grammar schools and selective education. They know how popular they are with parents.

Mr. Khan: In the light of the hon. Gentleman's comments and those of the hon. Member for Reading, East (Mr. Wilson), why will he vote for the Bill, especially clause 36, which abolishes selection by ability and limits the ability of other areas to benefit from the fantastic schools that he mentioned?

Mr. Brady: I am prepared to support the Bill because the current Government and the future Government thankfully agree on one issue—the excellent education that is offered in my constituency and elsewhere in the borough of Trafford should remain. The Government and the Opposition are joining together on that—new clause 39 will be defeated. Good education in those areas can therefore continue.

Mr. Khan: That is precisely the point. While the status quo remains for the hon. Gentleman's constituents, he is denying others that right. If he supports that ethos, how can he support clause 36 or the Bill?

Mr. Brady: If the hon. Gentleman reads my remarks on Second Reading, he will see that I made some of these points then. There are of course other measures that I would like to see in the Bill or another education Bill. I have made that very clear.

I was about to make a point about the Liberal Democrats. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashford was concerned about whether the Liberal Democrat candidate in Ashford would be honest enough to communicate the position of the Liberal Democrats on these issues. Whether or not they do so, I would urge my hon. Friend to do as I intend to do, which is to take it upon myself to inform the local community of how the Liberal Democrats vote on the Bill today. It is essential that people understand where the Liberal Democrats stand on quality education, and I intend to ensure that they do.

Sarah Teather: When the hon. Gentleman makes that position clear, presumably he will also make it clear that new clause 39 would allow for a parental ballot. It would therefore allow grammar schools to exist if they were very popular in a particular area.

Mr. Brady: I will, but I was listening carefully to the hon. Lady's opening remarks on this subject—brief as they were—in which she made it clear that she opposed selection and grammar schools. I will be happy to give way to her again if she wants to make it clear that she in fact supports grammar schools and selection; otherwise, I will rely on the remarks that she has already placed on the record.

Sarah Teather: We have always made it clear that this is a matter for local discretion, just as new clause 39 allows.

5 pm

Mr. Brady: Well, there we are—as with everything else for the Liberal Democrats, this is a matter for local discretion.

The hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) has pointed out that we have had this debate many times before, both inside and outside the House of Commons. I know that his views are as sincerely held as mine. I believe that he is profoundly mistaken, and he believes that I am. That is the way in which debates ought to be conducted.

Mr. Chaytor: I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman is mistaken. I know that his majority depends on the parents who send their children to Trafford grammar schools.

Mr. Brady: Well, the hon. Gentleman may be right, but his majority in Bury, North might prove more elusive than mine at the next election. I would have much more faith in the arguments that he advances—especially his argument for the maintenance of the balloting arrangement to mitigate the damage of his proposals—if he had put in his amendment a proposal that the ballots should be extended more widely to other communities. As I said in an earlier intervention, I might even have been tempted to vote for such a proposal.

I have no doubt whatever that the situation in my constituency would be similar to that in Kent, where the few campaigners against the grammar schools could get nowhere near the 5 per cent. threshold necessary to trigger a ballot. However, if such a ballot were to take place in my constituency, I am confident that the majority in favour of preserving the highest performing education system in the country would be at least as great as it was when such a vote took place in Ripon, albeit with a different type of electorate.

Mr. Chaytor: In that case, why is the hon. Gentleman so opposed to new clause 39? He should be supporting it, because it would give him the opportunity to prove once and for all that his pro-selection argument is supported by his constituents. Also, why is he not arguing for ballots in the other parts of Greater Manchester?

Mr. Brady: The hon. Gentleman knows that I do argue for precisely that, and not just in Greater Manchester. I advanced that case on Second Reading. I would be delighted if parents across the country were given the freedom to choose on this issue. He asks why I do not want to put this matter to the test in Trafford. He has already pointed out his own test, which is the test provided by the electorate. That is clearly why my majority has tripled in the past three general elections and why we have now regained control of Trafford borough council. Of course, if he were to advance the same cogent arguments that I do on this subject, he might still be gracing the House with his presence after the next general election, rather than merely until that time. I wish that he would come over to our side on this issue.

The hon. Gentleman talked about opinion polling, but he was slightly selective in his choice of statistics. He referred to a YouGov poll, which apparently took place last year, but did not allude to the ICM poll that took place in March this year—much more recently in the context of the debate about this Bill—which showed 70 per cent. support for more grammar schools. That, however, is not really the point. The fundamental point is what works in raising standards in education. He did not explain in his opening remarks why the borough of Trafford gets more than 70 per cent. of children through five or more good GCSEs, whereas the borough of Bury, which he represents, gets only 58 per cent. through. I have been trying to get that explanation from him for months if not years, so I would be delighted to listen to what he has to say.

Mr. Chaytor: If I did not explain that then, I shall explain it now. The borough of Trafford sucks in children from the whole of Greater Manchester, and the higher standards of Trafford are achieved at the expense of lower standards in Manchester, Salford, Wigan, Warrington and the county of Cheshire. It is simple.

Mr. Brady: I assure the hon. Gentleman that he does not know my borough as well as I do. If he did, he would know that those who are sucked in, as he put it, by the high-quality schools available in the borough come in many cases from much more deprived areas, such as Wythenshawe on the Manchester side of the boundary. I am afraid that there is no cogency to the point that he makes.

Similarly, the hon. Gentleman alluded to the education system and performance in Northern Ireland without, astonishingly, mentioning that Northern Ireland gets the best GCSE results in the whole of the United Kingdom. It is scandalous that the Government intend to proceed to abolish Northern Ireland's grammar schools, which, together with its high schools, achieve the best results in the whole country. He did not seek to apply his balloting regime there. Apparently, he is happy for Labour Ministers—from a party that is not even represented in Northern Ireland—to act over the heads of the people of Northern Ireland, the massive of majority of whom, when there was consultation on the subject, supported keeping the system as it is.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): Does the hon. Gentleman also accept that the selective education system in Northern Ireland not only provides better results but better social mobility?

Mr. Brady: I absolutely accept that it does, and that is also the case in other areas that retain selective education. Of course, in many areas where there are grammar schools, they are enormously popular, especially with some ethnic minority populations, who find them a way of raising their achievements and increasing their opportunities in life.

The hon. Member for Bury, North talked about a consensus on this issue, and there is a sort of consensus developing—[Interruption.] He says from a sedentary position that I am not part of it, and he may be right. It is a funny kind of consensus, however. The Government and the Opposition agree that existing grammar schools and selective areas should be left alone because they work so well. My hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) also made it clear that the quality of education can be improved by teaching to a smaller section of the ability range, which is why setting and streaming works to raise standards in schools. Again, that is a point of consensus between Government and Opposition.

In my view, that is also a reason why academic selection between schools works, as my hon. Friend generously acknowledged by paying tribute to Wellington high school in my constituency, which gets outstanding results. It is not the only high school that does so. Most high schools in Trafford, and all those in my constituency, are achieving fantastic results and could not be described in any sense as failing. They also perform particularly well in the value-added league tables. Altrincham college of arts, a high school in my constituency, is the best-performing school in the borough of Trafford in that regard. As I also pointed out to my hon. Friend, however, and as he accepted, the figures for valued-added performance also show that grammar schools get remarkably good results. That completely confounds the argument so often advanced that grammar schools do well simply because they admit bright children. They admit them, but they then raise standards of attainment even more than other schools would have done. That is why, on the value-added basis, 18 of the 21 best performing schools in the country for 11 to 14-year-olds are grammar schools.

The high level of performance in selective education authorities is shown in Trafford and across the country in the value-added league tables. It is also shown in the figures that I provided on Second Reading about standards from high-performing LEAs at primary level being maintained into secondary education. The comparison that I mentioned then was between Trafford and the borough of Richmond-upon-Thames.

Trafford starts off being second in the country at primary level and goes up to first place at secondary level; Richmond starts out first in the country at primary level, slipping down to 65th place at secondary level. The point is also borne out by the number of selective education authorities that are at the top of the performance tables, year in, year out.

The first part of the consensus is to keep selective education where it exists because it works, and the second part is to maintain and increase selection within schools also because it works. Almost everyone believes that that is a way of raising educational standards within comprehensive schools. However, another issue should be dealt with. It relates to another part of the consensus, which appears to be that there should be no more selective education, even if it would work. As I made clear on Second Reading, I have no desire to impose a new system nationwide. All the arguments about the dangers of disrupting selective systems could be said to apply equally to comprehensive systems. It is generally a bad thing to march in from Whitehall and attempt to reorder and re-engineer the provision of local services by diktat. I would not support that in any way, but I hope that we will, in time, move to a more thoughtful and more open-minded consensus—one built only on what works and what parents want for their children. In doing so, we will certainly defeat new clause 39, but I also hope that we will endorse a much more diverse provision of education, which should include some academically selective schools, especially in our cities.

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): I shall speak briefly to amendment No. 112, but I do not advise hon. Members to reach for the amendment paper to see what it says because it is gobbledegook. What is does, however, is to close an unintended loophole in the Schools Standards and Framework Act 1998, under which an adjudicator could increase the level of selection at a partially selective school back up to the 1998 level. Thus, if a school selected 50 per cent. of its pupils in 1998 and has since been instructed by the adjudicator to decrease it to 25 per cent., it would be open to the adjudicator to increase it back up to 50 per cent.

If anyone thinks that that is not what Parliament intended, I would agree, but Parliament only passes the law and the judges decide what it means. In this case, Mr. Justice Collins decided in the High Court a couple of years ago that the true meaning of section 100 of the 1998 Act was not that there could be no increase in selection, which is what we thought that it meant, but that there could be no increase above the level that obtained in 1998. A group of parents in my borough asked the adjudicator to increase selection at two partially selective schools in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) from 25 to 50 per cent.

I am glad to say that, on this occasion, the adjudicator did not accede to the request, but she stated in her determination of September 2004 that it would be within her power to agree an increase to 50 per cent. I put it to my hon. Friends that, if there were such an increase from 25 to 50 per cent. in a partially selective school, we could hardly view it as agreeing with our election promise to have no new selection. Indeed, we could hardly justify it by saying that it is not an increase in comparison with 1998.

5.15 pm

Mr. Khan: Is not one of the problems that that loophole allows the possibility of future sets of children and their parents being made miserable by the annual wait for year 6 results? If a school is allowed to increase from 25 to 50 per cent, those whom it selects by ability, the number of those who come in because of their siblings, proximity or special needs is reduced.

Martin Linton: I agree with my hon. Friend and constituency neighbour, who knows all too well that the effect of selection in the partially selective schools in his constituency has a very big effect on other parents of year 6 children in his constituency and, indeed, in mine.

Significantly, the mistake was not made in the admissions code of practice, which does not use the 1998 level as its benchmark but says that selection cannot be raised if it has been continuous since that time. However, the code of practice was not mandatory. Unfortunately, the 1998 Act causes the problem. That Act was never intended to say what the judge says that it meant. I spoke to my right hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), who was the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when Mr. Justice Collins made his ruling, and I have a letter from his Under-Secretary—Stephen Twigg, whom we all miss, I am sure—who wrote:

> "It was not widely expected that schools that had been compelled by the Adjudicator to reduce the level of partial selection would be able to raise it again. Nor was this our intent when we introduced this provision."

The then Minister went on to say that

> "we may want to amend the School Standards and Framework Act at some time in the future".

The time has come; the opportunity is here.

I raised the issue with the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government and I understood that she would consider it in Committee. It has not yet been dealt with, so I have tabled an amendment that would deliver what the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 intended, what we meant when we said, "No new selection", and what most of my constituents and, I am sure, those of my hon. Friends are expecting.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills and the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Phil Hope), both of whom were educated in my constituency, will understand when I say that, when the 1998 Act was passed, there was in my constituency one of the six lowest performing schools in the country—not the one that they went to—and its performance was worse than that of any school in Liverpool, Manchester or Leeds. Since that Act was passed, that school has dramatically improved its pass rate from 4 per cent. to more than 30 per cent., partly because the partially selective schools in the neighbouring constituency were forced to stop taking the most academically gifted children from our borough.

The adjudicator forced those schools to reduce academic selection in successive steps from 50 to 33 to

[Martin Linton]

30 and then to 25 per cent. The head teacher and the staff of that school, having rolled that heavy boulder up from the bottom of the hill to the top, are now on the verge of a bright new future, as an academy. I want to be able to assure them that that process will not be suddenly reversed by an adjudicator who can decide to increase the proportion of selective schools, with all the devastating consequences that that would have for the other schools in the borough.

I wish to say a brief word about new clause 39, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor). I am a great admirer of the work that he does with Comprehensive Future—a total supporter—and I believe that it is important to keep hold of the fact that ballots in fully selective areas of the country and adjudicators in respect of areas with partially selective schools are the two means by which we can gradually reduce and then I hope, one day, eliminate the use of academic selection in secondary schools.

I welcome the new cross-party consensus—although it does not appear to have reached all Opposition Members—the logical conclusion of which is that we must make ballots and the adjudicator system work. With my brief amendment, I am trying to ensure that the adjudicator system works in the way that we intended. My hon. Friend is trying to improve the ballots system, but I fear that putting the onus on supporters of grammar schools to call for referendums may make it easer for them to run "Save our grammar schools" and "Vote no to abolition" campaigns, and to have the upper hand in referendums. I am not convinced that reversing the current system and providing for ballots opposing abolition would advance the cause that my hon. Friend and I both support. For that reason I shall not vote for his new clause, but I should like the Minister to say what the Government intend to do about this loophole.

Mr. Binley: I realise that time is short, so I shall be brief, but I cannot resist commenting on the fact that the only member of the present Cabinet who went to a secondary modern school is the Deputy Prime Minister. I wonder whether Labour Members might tell me whether he and, indeed, I are good examples of that system. They might like to come up to me in the bar and let me know privately.

I can reassure the Secretary of State and his Ministers that my speech will be non-contentious, and that mine is a simple, innocuous, highly non-political, immensely practical and, I hope, entirely helpful new clause. It provides:

"Any child of staff currently serving at a maintained school shall be eligible for preferential admission at the discretion of the school governors."

I hope that the Secretary of State will jump to his feet and say immediately that he wants the new clause to be included in the Bill. If he does, I will of course sit down.

Anne Snelgrove: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Binley: I see that the Secretary of State is not moving all that quickly, so I will.

Anne Snelgrove: I think that the hon. Gentleman will be disappointed. The draft code for admissions specifically bans what he is proposing.

Mr. Binley: I am delighted that that point has been made, because I expected it and am therefore able to reject it.

The Bill states that there can be equal preference for admission, but that is not strictly true, and I can cite a number of cases in which it has proved not to be true. A school can include in its admissions policy the provision that, if it is oversubscribed, it will have to choose from an excess of applicants. It can give preference to those living in certain areas, and thus less preference to those outside those areas; it can give preference to children with a medical need, and thus less preference to those without such need; and it can give preference to children with siblings already at the school. So it is not quite right to say that equal preference should be pursued.

It would be perfectly possible, within that framework, for school governors to give preference to the admission of children of staff, and that is what my new clause seeks to allow. It seeks to give preference to teachers with one or two children whom they might wish to go to the school in which they teach. There is good reason for that proposal. We argue, again and again, that we want ladies, in particular, who have had children and who have been teachers to return to teaching.

Ian Stewart (Eccles) (Lab): Who, other than ladies, can have children?

Mr. Binley: I reject that sedentary observation. I shall ignore it, and continue my remarks to the Secretary of State.

There are ladies whom we want to attract back to the profession. I believe that the new clause would give ladies a major boost, and would help to attract them back to teaching when their families are growing up. I ask the Secretary of State to consider the new clause. I recognise that it is not the most vital part of this debate, but it would help a number of teachers returning to the profession, and it could well help in those areas where we particularly need to attract experienced teachers.

Jim Knight: We have had a lively debate on school admissions. The Bill creates a more equitable and transparent admissions process for parents and children. Labour Members have always been opposed to any extension of selection by academic ability, and the Bill reaffirms that stance. I am delighted that we have now won the argument, with the Opposition today agreeing that, far from having a grammar school in every town, there should be no new selection. That is a great victory for progressive politics. Perhaps the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) will have to inform one or two of his Back-Bench colleagues about that policy; they did not seem to be that informed about it during the debate. Nevertheless, we welcome it.

It will be unlawful for any school to introduce selection by ability to its admission arrangements, or, if it already selects part of its intake by ability, to increase its level of selection. I shall address in a little while the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) made about that issue.

Schools that set their own admissions arrangements need to know what is and is not acceptable, so that parents are treated fairly. Clause 37 sets those limits by creating a new, stronger schools admissions code with which admissions authorities must act in accordance. The skeleton code that was issued to Members in Committee and circulated among the educational community has been widely welcomed. Opposition Members seek to undermine the new, stronger code through amendments Nos. 103 and 104, and I strongly urge the House to oppose them.

5.30 pm

We will ban interviews as part of the school admissions process. They have long been perceived by many to be an unfair and subjective means of deciding which applicants should be offered school places, and the provision banning them has been widely welcomed.

Members in all parts of the House asked for more to be done to give priority for admission to looked-after children. I am delighted that in Committee, clauses 43 to 47 were inserted to give local authorities powers to direct the admission of children in public care to appropriate schools, in order to ensure that that most vulnerable group is not disadvantaged in the admissions process. Of course, we have considered how schools and local authorities can work together to ensure that admissions processes work for parents, take account of local circumstances and do not restrict fair access. We believe that we have provided helpful clarification, and that the Bill's provisions will ensure a fairer admissions process.

New clauses 24 and 46 and amendment No. 95 illustrate the concern, shared by Members in all parts of the House, that some admissions authorities might not administer their arrangements fairly. The proposal is to give local authorities or some other, more independent body responsibility for allocating places to all maintained schools, by considering applications against published admissions criteria.

I fully appreciate Members' motives in proposing the new clauses and amendment, but we are already taking the right steps to create a fairer admissions system. We now have a single-form application via the local authority, and we have created a robust system of checks and balances. Legislation and the schools admissions code establish parameters within which admissions arrangements must be set and operated. The schools adjudicator and the Secretary of State both have a role to play in dealing with complaints and objections. Under the current system, individual admissions authorities are accountable for decisions to permit or refuse admission to their schools. We do not want to change that, particularly because they, as individual admissions authorities, might be better placed to consider applications against their own admission arrangements—especially where they relate to faith criteria or require an aptitude assessment.

As I said in Committee, there is nothing to prevent schools and local authorities from agreeing, through their admissions forum, to take such an approach if their admissions arrangements lend them to it. Indeed, I am interested to know whether any areas are keen to pilot that approach, so that we can learn from it. I hope that Members will accept that as a sign that we are relatively relaxed about that approach, and that we do not feel the need to include such a statutory requirement in the Bill.

Sarah Teather: When we discussed this issue in Committee, I pointed out that there was no reason why faith criteria could not be taken into account. A letter from a priest could be appended to an application or a tick box could be added to the form to say what criteria were required. We welcome the Minister's comments about pilots, but will he actively encourage them or is he simply trying to prevent us from voting against the Bill?

Jim Knight: If there are admissions forums that want to pursue the hon. Lady's first point, my officials would be interested. It would have to be with the agreement of the members of the forum. For example, the faith communities would want to be happy with it and, at the moment, some are cautious. They are certainly cautious about who is best placed to make judgments about faith criteria—

Mr. Chaytor: My hon. Friend will know that new clause 24 is very similar to new clause 46, which I tabled, and I welcome the assurances given. Can he give us some idea of the timescale for the process of working towards those pilot schemes?

Jim Knight: I cannot give my hon. Friend a definite commitment on timescale. We have to allow time for the new admissions forums to be set up in their new form. In many cases, they will be significantly enlarged, and they need to identify the core members and elect the chair. We need some time for the arrangements to bed in before we have any idea about an accurate timetable. I fear that I might mislead my hon. Friend were I to give him anything concrete.

Paul Farrelly: My hon. Friend raises the interesting and practical idea of pilot schemes. Would he consider piloting trust schools until they are proven to raise standards as the Government hope they will?

Jim Knight: Foundation schools, including those with trusts, are already proven. They have effectively been piloted already, and we had that debate last night, as I recall.

I turn to the amendments on selection, as I imagine that that is why most hon. Members are present for this debate. The Government do not support the extension of selection by ability. I do not like selection. That has been our stance since 1997 and clause 36 reaffirms our stance that selection by academic ability cannot lawfully be introduced. But the Bill is not about imposing our view on structures centrally. It is an enabling Bill, and we want to encourage schools of all kinds to work together to benefit all pupils.

Clause 48 on pupil banding is an example of how we are enabling schools to adopt such arrangements, which will widen access and provide an intake that is more representative of the range of ability of all applicants. Banding is not about selection. In fact, children cannot pass or fail a banding test. What happens is that children are allocated to ability bands and places are allocated from each of those in a non-selective way to produce a comprehensive intake. Although some banding schools run tests to assess ability and allocate to bands, it is not absolutely necessary to run separate tests for that. In Lewisham, where all schools band, the results of QCA year 5 SATS tests are used to allocate children to appropriate bands, so no additional testing is required. We will advocate the use of that means of assessing ability in the code.

Amendment No. 110 seeks to prevent the introduction of banding by removing clause 48. I believe that pupil banding arrangements have a key role in reducing social segregation in an area. The new flexibilities on banding are important because they will allow schools situated in areas of traditional high academic attainment to send out a positive message that they are also there to serve less able pupils who might not gain entry if the school banded simply to admit local residents. That, coupled with our reforms of pupil transport, will increase opportunities for less affluent children, and I encourage anyone who wants to see a more equitable admissions system to support clause 48 and oppose amendment No. 110.

Amendments Nos. 119 to 122 would go further and remove all selection by ability, including banding. New clause 39 would discontinue all selection except for banding purposes from all schools, unless local parents have voted in favour of its retention.

In 1997, the Government made a commitment to leave it to parents and governors to decide the future of their grammar schools. The spirit of this Bill honours that commitment, as it does not impose any structure on any school. Grammar school governing bodies can bring forward proposals to remove selective arrangements, and the appropriate mechanisms are already in place to enable parents to challenge the continuation of selection in their local schools.

Ms Keeble: Will my hon. Friend the Minister deal with the point about the readmission of excluded pupils?

Jim Knight: I have every intention of doing so, but I felt that many colleagues wanted to hear what I had to say about grammar schools.

As we have heard, parents have organised a number of petitions about grammar schools, but only one has gathered sufficient support to prompt a ballot. I always listen to the opinions of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) with great care, as he has great knowledge and wisdom and adopts an instinctively progressive point of view. However, the evidence suggests that it would be neither productive nor cost effective for the Government to organise ballots across the country, given that there has been so little call for them so far.

My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Martin Linton) admitted that his amendment No. 112 read like gobbledegook, but it would prevent schools with partially selective admissions arrangements from increasing the proportion of children selected. In addition, if the schools adjudicator has upheld an objection and reduced a school's level of selection, the amendment would prevent that school from reinstating its original level of selection later.

As I said, I appreciate that it is still possible for the admissions authority to restore the proportion of intake that is selected, even though we have moved to make sure that the decision of the schools adjudicator will stick for two years. However, the loophole uncovered by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea goes against the Government's commitment to no new selection—a commitment now shared by the Opposition—and I shall look at ways to bring forward an amendment in another place to close it.

I turn now to the arrangements for admissions to academies, about which I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) is especially concerned. I recognise that there are concerns that academies should be subject to the same admission rules that apply to maintained schools. New clause 47 highlights that concern by seeking to require academies to consult on their arrangements and take part in a co-ordinated admissions process, and it would also require objections about those arrangements to be made to the schools adjudicator. However, the Secretary of State already places those conditions on academies through their funding agreements. Moreover, he, rather than the adjudicator, determines objections to their admissions arrangements. That means that we already have the power that my hon. Friend is looking for, although it is expressed in a different way.

The funding agreement goes further, requiring academies to comply with admissions legislation and to have regard to the school admissions code of practice. Once clause 37 is enacted, academies will also have to act in accordance with the new schools admissions code. I hope that that reassurance is sufficient for my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North.

I want to allow the hon. Member for Brent, East to wind up the debate, and I apologise that there is not enough time for me to tackle all the amendments. However, I think that we dealt in Committee with the arguments in respect of the ones that remain, and I urge that they be withdrawn.

In conclusion, this Bill addresses the needs of parents and children, while at the same time setting a sensible framework in which school admission authorities must operate. It allows a degree of flexibility to take account of local circumstances, but it also provides clear parameters.

We want an admissions process that allows parents to choose schools, rather than schools choosing parents. Ruling out admissions interviews, strengthening the status of the admissions code and giving forums greater responsibilities and powers will all help to achieve that aim.

Sarah Teather: I am grateful to the Minister for his recognition that distortion of admissions policy occurs on the ground, unlike Conservative Front-Bench Members who were unwilling to accept that fact.

I am pleased that the Minister has indicated that he will look at pilots, but I would have had more confidence in his commitment to do so if he had drafted a permissive clause or enabling regulations, such as those on banding or transport, so that the pilots can go ahead. My fear is that under pressure, perhaps from faith schools, the proposal will be kicked into the long grass. It is a point of principle for the Liberal Democrats. We are not willing to support greater freedom for schools to control their admissions without extra safeguards.

Despite the Minister's assurances, I shall have to test the opinion of the House on the new clause. We want the provision to be included. I hope that, perhaps in the other place, the Government will consider drafting enabling regulations or a permissive clause so that safeguards can be included in the Bill.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Order for Third Reading read.

6.26 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Alan Johnson): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Valid concerns have been raised during the passage of this Bill, and I hope that Members on both sides will agree that the Government have listened very carefully and responded where possible to make this a better Bill. The House has conducted a mature and healthy debate on a matter of supreme importance to all of our constituents.

Education remains this Government's priority. Since 1997, we have almost doubled education spending, so that today there is an unprecedented rebuilding and refurbishment programme, with more teachers and support staff who are better trained and using new books and computers in our classrooms. We have also made huge progress in tackling embedded problems with literacy, numeracy and failing schools. All this is reflected in the fact that schools today are achieving the best ever results at every key stage.

However, serious problems remain. High achievement is unevenly spread, and the scales of educational opportunity are still tipped far too heavily against disadvantaged children. The Bill focuses on unleashing the potential of each and every child, and with nine years' successful experience in raising educational attainment, we can build on what we know works well.

The Bill will help more schools to follow the path to high achievement. By enabling schools to become self-governing and to form links with a charitable trust, the Bill will give greater independence, but within a structure of increased interdependence, so that all those with an interest in successful schooling can make a full contribution to their local school. The opportunities are great for further and higher education establishments to entice more children to climb the ladder of attainment, for voluntary groups to bring in new ideas and fresh thinking, for business trusts to help focus on future careers and take forward the 14-to-19 agenda, and for schools to share best practice.

The trust model also ensures that those relationships are permanent and lasting, rather than transient and dependent on a few visionaries whose departure heralds the collapse of the project. Trusts combine the best of all the existing models, and there has been broad consensus about their potential in principle. However, concerns have revolved around how they might operate in practice.

Sarah Teather: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Alan Johnson: No, I will not, as time is limited.

We have confirmed that no school will be forced to become a trust school, but that every school will have that option, after consulting parents and stakeholders. And we have set out safeguards to ensure that trusts are not involved in activities that may be considered inappropriate. We have also put a requirement on trusts not only to help drive up standards but to contribute to community cohesion.

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Alan Johnson: No.

We have amended the Bill so that the best local authorities will automatically be able to put forward new community schools for consideration. Most other local authorities will have opportunities to do the same, with only the worst being barred from doing so. The Bill also includes a clear ban on interviews and new selection by academic ability. We have strengthened the code on admissions, enhanced its status and circulated a draft of it to the House. That makes it crystal clear that there will be no new selection by the more covert means used in some places.

Although the spotlight has fallen on trust schools, the Bill contains many other crucial measures that have attracted less attention. Giving all 14 to 19-year-olds the right to study for specialised diplomas will help to tackle three major economic and social problems: the skills gap; youth unemployment; and classroom disengagement. Twenty years after Lord Elton's ground-breaking report, the Bill enacts its central recommendation by giving teachers tough new powers to tackle unruly pupils inside and outside school. That will reduce classroom disruption and improve the attainment of all pupils. Other important powers relate to school meals, transport and an obligation on local authorities to ensure that young people have places to go and constructive things to do in their leisure time.

I want to highlight one other less publicised aspect of the Bill. In respect of looked-after children, on whom we will focus attention over coming months, I remind the House that, for the first time, schools will be obliged to take in looked-after children who move into their area during the school year, as they often do, even if the school is full. That addresses the central problem of looked-after children consistently being dumped in the worst-performing schools to make up the numbers. That is one of the most important measures in the Bill, even if it has not attracted the most publicity.

This Bill has received robust and thorough scrutiny in the House.

Clive Efford: I wanted the opportunity to engage with my right hon. Friend on a number of issues that, I think, are missing from the Bill, such as targeting resources on those areas where we need to raise standards—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but Third Reading is not the occasion to raise points that are not in the Bill. Third Reading is about what is in the Bill.

Alan Johnson: Incidentally, through this Bill and other policies, we are targeting attention on the most disadvantaged areas and failing schools. Another aspect of the Bill is that it allows us to turn around failing schools more quickly, as I have mentioned.

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the proposals in the Bill relating to school food provide for the first time ever a national curriculum for children's bodies as well as for their minds? Will he urge local authorities to use the powers in the Bill to provide free school meals to children in their areas and to opt out of the charges that they currently impose?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend gives me the opportunity to mention the ground-breaking scheme introduced by the local authority in Hull to provide free school meals, free fruit and vegetables and free breakfasts to all primary school pupils. To do that, it had to go through a tortuous process under the power to innovate. This Bill will allow every local authority to do that, and I agree very much with my hon. Friend, who has done some splendid work on the issue, that that is another crucial aspect of the Bill.

As always, there will be Members who will not agree with every single aspect of the Bill. The question on Third Reading must be what educational advantage would be served by defeating the Bill. The Bill will drive up educational standards further by supporting stronger partnerships; creating new curriculum entitlements for 14 to 19-year-olds, enacting in many respects what was in the Butler Act of 1944 but was never brought into practice; ensuring better discipline; developing a powerful strategic role for local authorities; tightening up the admissions framework; and, as I mentioned, helping to turn around failing schools. Its purpose is to make every school a good school and to ensure that every child realises their full potential. Those objectives are shared by all hon. Members, no matter on which Benches they sit, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): Perhaps I can begin by paying tribute to the work that has been done by hon. Members on both sides of the House in scrutinising the Bill in Committee. It emerged from the Committee remarkably similar to the Bill that went into Committee and remarkably similar to the Bill that the Conservative party voted for on Second Reading. We will, of course, support the Bill on Third Reading, for many of the reasons set out by the Secretary of State for Education and Skills.

I welcome the Secretary of State to the Dispatch Box. I have not previously had a proper opportunity to welcome him to his new post. I have enormous respect for his abilities, both as a politician and as a Minister. Our paths have strangely inter-twingled—[Hon. Members: "Inter-twingled?"] I should be the Deputy Prime Minister, talking like that. We have gone from pensions to energy and now to schools. In fact, the Secretary of State is to be found wherever the Government are in crisis, and he brings his own distinct sort of "Dad's Army", "Don't panic" style to the various crises that he finds. If I may say so, I thought that he was in fine form yesterday. I cannot think of any member of the Cabinet who could have handled the rebellion that he faced yesterday better than he did. His reward, of course, was a Labour rebellion of 69 Members who voted against the Government. Perhaps it tells us a lot about the state of the Labour party and the Labour Government that, with all his skill, he faced a rebellion that wiped out their majority.

The debates on the Bill, both in Committee and on the Floor of the House, have had a strangely elusive quality, because the implications of the Bill may be quite modest. I hope that they are not modest in practice, but I am not as confident as the Secretary of State about how many schools will become trust schools. I have some concerns about what will happen when the human rights lawyers get to work on some of the points in a recent report. We may find that some of the Bill's provisions are hard to implement.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): The Secretary of State told me yesterday that a great many schools would opt for trust status by the end of this Parliament. Will the hon. Gentleman estimate how many schools he thinks will go for trust status?

Mr. Willetts: I would not like to give an estimate, but I believe that we should encourage schools to become trust schools. That is what the White Paper said, and it was one of the more curious moments in the passage of the Bill when the Secretary of State and other Ministers went through the Lobby yesterday to vote against a Conservative amendment that would have simply implemented the proposals in the White Paper. It is very unusual for Ministers to vote against the proposals in their own White Paper, when the Bill comes to the House.

Ian Stewart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: I am afraid that time is very limited, so I hope that hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way.

I want to bring out the point that the reason why these debates have been so hard to pin down is that, although the Bill's implications may be modest in practice, they are very large in theory. There is a different way to think about education behind the Bill. It is a recognition that the future role for local education authorities is as purchasers, not as providers, that the future for schools must involve diversity, not standardisation, and that parents want choice, rather finding their children trapped in certain catchment areas.

Ian Stewart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Willetts: I am afraid that I will try to make progress in very limited time.

Conservative Members have consistently believed in that philosophy; it is the thinking behind the White Paper and many of the provisions that survive even in relatively modest form in the Bill. The Labour rebels, if they may be called that, are deeply uncomfortable with that philosophy. I disagree with them, but I respect the integrity and consistency with which they have argued their case. They have revealed the real division that now exists in the House on education reform. A majority in the House, represented by the entirety of my party and the Front Bench of the Labour party, believe in those principles, although there may be many Labour Members who are uncomfortable with them. It is partly a disagreement of principle, but I have to say that I am increasingly persuaded by the evidence produced by evaluations around the world that school choice and school freedom work.

Mr. Chaytor rose—

Ian Stewart rose—

Mr. Willetts: I am afraid that I have only four minutes. It would not be right for me to give way.

There is clear evidence from Sweden, from America and even from evaluations of our own grant-maintained schools that that is the best way in which to raise standards of education in our country, which is why we support the Bill and will continue to support it. But of course, in supporting the Bill and developing this agenda, my party has changed its approach as well. I fully recognise that my party's approach to the issue of selection has changed. In the process of forming a consensus on the best way of reforming education, we have abandoned any idea of a grammar school in every town. We have abandoned any idea of bringing back the 11-plus in grammar schools. We have recognised that our focus should be on how we can best raise standards in all our nation's schools. If there is to be selection, it is best for it to take place by means of setting within schools rather than allowing children across the country to face an invidious decision, at the age of 11, on which school they should attend.

Ian Stewart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Willetts: Of course we wish to support the grammar schools that survive—they are institutions with a long history—but my party will not bring back the 11-plus, and will not bring back grammar schools. That was an important statement for us to make, enabling us to show that we were serious about proceeding with the education reform agenda that lies behind the Bill.

In fact, we have now reached a stage at which, unlike some Labour Members, we are not obsessed with the issue of selection. We are not going to try to expunge the last grammar school from the country. We will focus our attention on how to secure more good school places in total, rather than on the endless depressing battle over exactly how children are allocated to a small number of good schools. We all recognise that the problem in our country today is that there are not enough good schools.

Ian Stewart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Willetts: Perhaps I can look forward to a day when a Conservative Secretary of State is in office, and is able to use the powers in the Bill to deliver real education reform of the sort that the Prime Minister envisaged when he produced his White Paper last autumn.

Ian Stewart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) has made it clear that he will not give way.

Mr. Willetts: We will use the powers in the Bill to make it easier for schools to expand. We will use the powers in the Bill to give more freedom to schools. We will use the powers in the Bill to deliver on some of the promises that the Prime Minister made, but on which he has not been able to deliver. We look forward to using the powers in the Bill to deliver what the Prime Minister called, in his foreword to the White Paper, the aim of "the creation of a system of independent non-fee paying"

state schools. That, I think, is the true objective of serious education reform, and as we fight that battle we will be able to say that ours is the party that is united in a commitment to deliver the radicalism behind the White Paper—from which, sadly, the Government have had to retreat because of pressures from their own Back Benchers.

It is on that basis that Conservative Members are pleased to support the Bill's Third Reading.

Sarah Teather: I am not sure how to follow that extraordinary love-in between the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) and the Secretary of State—[Hon. Members: "Inter-twingle!"] Indeed. I cannot help wondering whether such a deep and personal display of affection may be something that we should not be watching in public. Although we are liberals on these Benches, I have always felt that three is a crowd, so we will not be joining in.

Of course, the truth is that it is just a marriage of convenience, not the real thing. The Secretary of State needs the passport that the Conservatives can give his Bill, and the Conservatives are really only interested in breaking up his family. The Secretary of State has been left walking a tightrope between the two, trying to persuade his family that this time he really has changed while still clinging to his affair with the Conservative Front Bench. The truth is that, as the hon. Member for Havant said, the Bill has change very little since Second Reading, despite the Secretary of State's attempts to reassure his own Back Benchers that it has.

The three key concerns that we had when we embarked on Second Reading remain. First, we do not believe that adequate safeguards on admissions have been given. If we are to give schools more freedom to control their own admissions, we want the extra safeguard of ensuring that someone impartial administers them. I welcomed the concession that the Minister made on Report for the conducting of pilots. However, I would have preferred that a permissive clause or enabling regulation be included in the Bill so that we could be sure that the Government are serious about this issue and are not simply going to kick it into the long grass, as I fear they will. Without such a safeguard, giving schools more freedom to control admissions is not adequate.

Secondly, on accountability, we are totally opposed to giving trust schools the option of reducing the number of elected parent governors. To us, that flies in the face of all the spin about parent power. I assumed that I would never win the argument with the Secretary of State about giving away the power of veto, so that local authorities could have the strategic power that they desire to plan their own services. New Labour's commitment to new localism has never really been about accountability. Nevertheless, I was astonished by the arguments that were advanced yesterday against parental ballots.

Thirdly and most importantly, I still do not feel that an adequate, clear vision has been set out. Is this a competitive education model or a collaborative one? Still, we have the Prime Minister's vision of a competitive model, rather than the vision that, I suspect, the Department for Education and Skills would much rather pursue: of a collaborative model that allows real choice in the curriculum. Without that model, we will never see the real reforms that we want—reforms that give schools the freedom to teach what young people want to learn.

In our view, this Bill is a missed opportunity. It is a timid Bill with hidden dangers, and for that reason we will vote against it tonight.

Mr. Sheerman: It is with reluctance, almost, that I rise to speak. I feel embarrassed at not having participated in the long hours of consideration of this Bill in Committee; however, my Select Committee did carry out a virtual pre-legislative inquiry when we examined the White Paper.

I welcome the Bill and I will support it on Third Reading, as will the vast majority of my Labour colleagues. I will do so because it builds, as the Secretary of State said, on what we know works. The longer that I have chaired the Select Committee, the more that I have come to realise that it is not dogma that will deal with the problems that we encounter in our schools throughout the country. Some of my colleagues like dogma. A small group of them would still like to nationalise the top 100 companies, for example, and will vote for any of those old dogmas if they are given the chance. [Interruption.] Well, they do not like it, do they?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must talk about the contents of the Bill.

Mr. Sheerman: I am supporting this Bill, Mr. Speaker, because it is based on the principle of judging the evidence of what works in our schools. As the Chairman of the Select Committee, I visit at least one school a week, and I know that what works on the ground is not some high-flown dogma from the past or, indeed, the future. We need to sit down with our teachers, governors, parents and students and work out what will improve education on the ground.

Paul Farrelly: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Sheerman: I only want two more minutes.

The fact is that this Bill is not radical or revolutionary; rather, it builds on the steady progress achieved—dare I say it?—under previous Conservative Governments as well as this Labour Government. That is the truth that we sometimes dare not speak in this House. Education is too important an issue for one party to make changes on taking office, and for the other then to reverse them on taking office. However, such a consensual approach is not good enough for some of my colleagues. What I want to do is to make steady progress, which probably sounds a little Oakeshottian to some of my colleagues. We have worked for nine years to improve the education of our children throughout this country, but that is not enough. There is a long way to go, and this Bill will take us further along the path of good, steady progress.

Clive Efford: There is much in the Bill that deserves to be supported and I accept the efforts that have been made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his team, and their predecessors. However, the Bill provides the opportunity for schools to break away from the school community in a locality. The danger of that is that the local authorities will lose direct control of and influence over those schools. That would mean that the local community would lose influence over those schools.

I hope that my right hon. Friend, in further proceedings on the Bill, will take on board that it should not diminish the role of local authorities. The overarching strategic responsibility for developing education in an area should remain with the local authority. We need a dynamic relationship with local communities, in which the local authority has a responsibility to consult with the whole school community—parents, head teachers, governors and everybody else involved in education—to develop an education plan that it can then publish and against which the performance of schools can be measured. Local parents will then have a clear framework for education in their area, against which they can measure the performance of schools and the delivery of education. The issue is providing information that parents can understand about education in their area that will allow them to make informed decisions about education.

Even more importantly, local authorities have to be given the opportunity to identify areas of deprivation and of special educational need so that they can direct resources to those areas to raise standards. I said on Second Reading that as we came to power in 1997 the league tables for schools were being published. Although we have improved standards enormously across all schools, the schools are in the same positions in the league tables. That is true for my area and for areas across the country. I would have liked to have seen it stated in the Bill that we intended to identify areas of deprivation and need by setting the necessary criteria, so that we could direct the resources to them and finally, once and for all, give those kids who have not had the opportunity of having a decent education the resources needed to give them that. The Bill has been more about structures than about providing support for the very people at the sharp end of doing that very job.

Ms Angela C. Smith: Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that the Government have already done a great deal to direct resources to deprived areas? Excellence in cities is a good example of the Government directing resources to where they are needed.

Clive Efford: I fully accept that and I made that point in my opening remarks. Indeed, the education action zone in my area worked because it provided extra resources and the freedom for staff and governors to direct those resources to improve standards.

The White Paper said that the Government would make an announcement about that subject in the autumn, but why is it not part of the Bill? That is what I am arguing for. If a future Government did not want to invest resources in that way, they would have to explain to parents why it is no longer part of the local education plan that resources would be directed to schools in that way. That is what I wanted from the Bill. I accept that some hon. Members will say that that is what we want to achieve, but that is light years away from the rhetoric surrounding the Bill when it was published and from some of the statements made later.

I have outlined my concerns about these proposals. Unfortunately, I cannot support the Bill this evening.

6.55 pm

Dr. Blackman-Woods: There have been some very interesting discussions and deliberations over the past two days. However, I suggest to the hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather) that consensus in the best interests of our children is something to be applauded rather than denigrated.

It is perhaps unfortunate that we could not spend more time on some of the excellent proposals in the Bill. I shall highlight a few of them briefly, beginning with the duty that the Bill places on local authorities in the provision of services and facilities for young people. That is a huge step forward and it will help a lot of young people, in my constituency and others, to access a range of services that are not available at present.

The Bill also moves forward the education of 14 to 19-year-olds. The availability of new diplomas and the right to study for specialised diplomas are essential for many of our young people and will contribute to the promotion of vocational education. In addition, local authorities will have new opportunities to provide free school meals to all children in their areas. That will transform the quality of food available to students, who will be able to eat good food at lunch time. I hope that the Government will encourage local authorities to take the option up.

We have not had an opportunity to explore what personalised learning will mean for young people. However, I have seen it at work in some schools in Sweden, and I hope that the Bill will help its delivery in this country. That is one reason why I urge all colleagues to support the Bill's Third Reading.

Other good provisions in the Bill include the new procedures to help improve discipline in schools, but before I conclude I want to mention the greater ability that this measure gives to local authorities to intervene in failing and coasting schools. That will raise standards for all our young people.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): It would be remiss in starting this Adjournment debate not to welcome the Sri Lankan cricket team to this country and to wish its players the best of luck, because I think that they may need it.

The primary reason why I have called the debate this evening is to report to Parliament on a recent delegation to Sri Lanka that the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley) and I headed at the beginning of April this year. I shall report what we saw on our visit and some of the issues and concerns that were raised with us.

I want to focus on the rapidly deteriorating situation in Sri Lanka and on the action that both the UK Government and, through them, the international community are taking to address the increased number of suicide attacks, random killings and assassinations and to move towards the resumption of the talks that were cancelled in April.

I thank all those who were involved in arranging our visit, of whom there are too many to mention in this debate. I particularly want to thank those who were involved in facilitating our visit to the north—we flew to Jaffna and visited parts of the north that are under Government control.

Before we made the visit, my constituents and members of the Sri Lankan community throughout the country expressed their concern to me, as chairman of the all-party group on Sri Lanka, that tsunami aid was simply not getting through to the north and east of the country. As a result, I raised two questions with Ministers in the Department for International Development. Despite the reassurances that I received, people still expressed concerns that nothing was happening in the north and east. I was thus relieved to receive a letter from the Sri Lankan high commissioner, who detailed at some length several of the projects that were being undertaken in the north. I shall cite a representative example from the letter. She wrote that the World Bank was spending just over $32 million and providing support for "community capacity building reconstruction" in the north and east.

"to rehabilitate small irrigation schemes damaged by the tsunami"

Even with that letter, it was still difficult to persuade those who made representations to me, so our visit to the north was welcome because it allowed us to see three sites, two of which were just outside Jaffna and one that was at Point Pedro, which is the most northerly point of the Sri Lankan island. During our visit, we saw the work of an Italian non-governmental organisation called Movimondo, which had completed work on 36 houses and built a school just outside Jaffna. Right adjacent to that was a World Bank scheme involving 111 houses. A lot of the houses were in the early stages of construction, but quite a few had roofs on. I have no doubt that they will have been completed by now. We also visited a site that was organised by Caritas, another NGO. There were to be 68 houses on the site. Although they were in the early stages of development, we could at least see the foundations of the houses that would be there.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing such an important and worthy debate. I have also heard reports from the Sri Lankan diaspora in my community—the Tamil diaspora—of the intimidation and harassment of NGO workers. The White Pigeon charity in my constituency and the Tamil Rehabilitation Organisation in Sri Lanka have complained especially about the recent kidnapping of workers. When my hon. Friend was in Sri Lanka, did he get the chance to speak to NGO workers and find out from them whether they were being intimidated in the work that they were doing?

Mr. Love: We had the opportunity to speak to some of those involved in the three schemes in the north, but focused our attention primarily on the work that they were doing to rehabilitate and reconstruct following the tsunami. In all honesty, we did not get on to concerns about kidnapping, although I have heard similar reports to those cited by my hon. Friend.

During our visit, we also spoke at length to the reconstruction and development agency in Sri Lanka. It confirmed that, although there had been complex negotiations, it was confident that the tsunami relief efforts were beginning to show in the north and east, so I hope that I can provide reassurance to those who are concerned about that.

Through the good offices of the ministry for resettlement, we were able to visit Puttalam, which is in the western part of the island. We met some of the internally displaced people, who are primarily Muslims, who exist in 35 camps in the region. They have been in the camps for nearly 16 years. What we found was an absolute disgrace. The shelters were threadbare. The food supplies that the people received were intermittent and the food was basic, to say the least. People had to walk two miles to get water that they could drink and more than a mile just to get a bath in the morning. There were few employment opportunities for the people. Education was non-existent and discrimination was rife among the local people.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) on securing the debate. The sad thing about Sri Lanka is that religious intolerance is still bad. The conflict between the Sinhalese and the Tamils is one thing, but the undercurrent of religious intolerance is just as bad. Did he see any of that on his visit?

Mr. Love: In relation to the Muslim community, a great deal of the discrimination described to us was partly based on religious differences. I have heard reports of other minority religions being discriminated against. It is of concern, but it was not our primary focus on visiting the island.

We spoke to a number of the people in the camps and were surprised to discover that they did not want to return to their original homes in the north and east. They felt safe where they were and had been living there for a considerable time. It was very much the strong feeling of both members of the delegation that they had been forgotten by everyone—by their Government and the international community. It was part of our wish on returning to raise their profile and see whether something could be done. I note that the Department for International Development has been involved in innovative programmes on internally displaced persons. In former programmes, it has tried to assist people to return to their original homes. It could construct a similar programme so that people can rehabilitate themselves within the district of Puttalam and establish employment opportunities. Perhaps the Minister can pass that request on to his colleagues.

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) on obtaining the debate and thank him for his great companionship on the trip. I support what he says about those unfortunate people in Puttalam. Frankly, their plight shocked me to the core. One of our objectives was to get the British Government to raise the matter in a slightly more active way. I recognise that Ministers are aware of the situation and are compassionate about it, but I make a plea to extend those efforts and to raise the profile of those people, who have been forgotten in relation to the tsunami, the troubles and so on. Does he agree that that would help?

Mr. Love: I agree with the hon. Gentleman and endorse everything he says. I hope that Ministers will read our debate tomorrow and take those issues up on our behalf.

The main reason for having the debate this week is the concern that exists throughout the international community, but primarily on the island itself, about the major escalation in violence following the breakdown of the ceasefire agreement talks in April. That had been coming for some time. The two sides were on the slippery slope. Although there had been a so-called ceasefire agreement since 2002, the violence never stopped. If we look back at the history of that agreement, we see that, although intensive talks took place between 2002 and 2003, they soon ran out of steam. There has been little or no political progress since then. The situation between the two communities has deteriorated and violence has flared up.

A combination of events led to that position, such as the assassination of the former Foreign Minister, Mr. Kadirgama, the collapse of the post-tsunami operational management structure—P-TOMS—agreement, which would have allowed both communities to be involved in tsunami relief, and the split in the Tamil Tigers, with the Karuna faction actively engaged in violent activities, mainly against the other part of its own community. Human rights violations have been perpetrated with impunity in the north and east of the island. There was euphoria when the talks began in February, but that was soon replaced by the same old problem of lack of trust and confidence between the two communities, with the result that tit-for-tat violence led to the current situation.

Talks broke down after the Tamil Tigers walked out, because in their view the Government did not help to facilitate meetings between commanders in the north and east of the island. They claim that those talks have not been abandoned. I hope that that is the case, because the re-establishment of genuine talks is one of our few hopes of progressing to negotiations. The situation is serious—indeed, it is much more serious than it was. In a recent speech, the Minister highlighted the attempted assassination of the army chief, General Fonseca as an example of the escalating violence on the island. There have been many incidents, but recently, a suicide attack on a navy gunboat killed 18 crew members and injured many others. Many people who were on the boat used by the attackers were also killed.

In April, 191 people—some of them were soldiers but many were civilians—were killed on both sides of the conflict. The violence has been condemned and there has been a flurry of diplomatic activity. Norway has actively engaged in the task of trying to bring people together. What are the British Government doing on behalf of Parliament to try to bring the parties together to reduce the violence on the island? For example, have they pressed for a resumption of the talks between the two parties on a ceasefire agreement? What action has been taken by the United Nations and the European Union to try to support efforts to engage the parties? We are in a unique position—we have a long historical connection with Sri Lanka, and many Sri Lankans live in the UK—so are we assisting Norway with our expertise?

At the end of the month, major donors, including the EU and the UK, will meet in Tokyo. What action will they take to try to reduce the violence on the island? People across the country who are interested in Sri Lanka often raise the issue of whether the UK Government could and should play a more central role in offering assistance. We all know the historical record: the Indian Government and the United Nations have been involved, and Norway is currently involved. We accept that there are difficulties, but Britain can play a special or unique role. I hope that the Minister accepts the urgency of the situation.

Mr. Khan: Today, I received a letter from Mr. Seevaratnum at my local Sivayagum temple. He feels frustrated and let down by the British Government. He believes that they have failed to take enough action to make people aware of what is happening in his homeland and that they should be more interventionist and help their kin in Sri Lanka. Does my hon. Friend empathise with those feelings?

Mr. Love: I hope that the Minister can respond, as I have certainly heard such feelings expressed on many occasions. We are doing what we can, but I am sure that the Minister will offer reassurance to the House and the communities that are listening to our debate so that they can be confident that we are doing everything that we can to help Sri Lanka at a time of extreme need.

7.29 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Dr. Kim Howells): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) on securing the debate. These are difficult times for Sri Lanka, and I welcome the opportunity to discuss how the United Kingdom is engaged in Sri Lanka to help improve the prospects for all. We should remember that Sri Lanka is not a small, faraway island. It is a substantial country of 20 million people.

The Indian ocean tsunami caused wide-scale loss of life and devastation last year. Hopes that the process of tsunami recovery and reconstruction would help develop greater long-term harmony among communities were unfortunately not realised. Over the past year, there has been a steady and deeply worrying deterioration in the security situation in the country. Sri Lanka's development is again in danger of being overshadowed by its long- running ethnic conflict.

The appalling assassination of the Foreign Minister, as we heard from my hon. Friend, was followed by the attempted assassination of an army commander, regular attacks on military personnel, grenade attacks against civilians, extra-judicial killings, disappearances and intimidation, mob violence and violence by paramilitary groups. The cycle of violence has contributed to an atmosphere of extreme mistrust and polarisation, which has fuelled further antagonism and violence.

For a lasting peace to be possible, the violence must abate, and the parties must discuss in earnest and honest terms the issues that matter to them and find a way forward. No one else can do that for them. That is a statement which I know my hon. Friend understands. He has visited Sri Lanka, together with the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley), and seen it for himself. I saw it for myself on my visit there.

Only Sri Lankans can secure a peace for Sri Lanka. All sectors of Sri Lankan society need to contribute positively to the quest for peace. The Sri Lankan diaspora in the UK and elsewhere in the world, like any diaspora, needs to allow the parties the appropriate space to make progress towards peace, and we must try to help with that.

However, as my hon. Friend made clear, the international community has an important role to play in the peace process by supporting and encouraging the parties on that journey, and creating an environment conducive to building a sustainable peace that will benefit all the peoples of Sri Lanka. Within the international community, the UK uses its long-standing and good relationship with the people of Sri Lanka to work to that end. I am sure the House supports that aim.

In response to the worsening situation in December and January, the international community urged the parties to talk. As presidency of the European Union, Great Britain played a big part in those efforts. The co-chairs of the Sri Lanka donor group—the EU, the United States, Norway and Japan—put great pressure on the Sri Lankan Government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam to put an end to the violence and fully respect the ceasefire.

Those efforts brought results, when the Sri Lankan Government and the LTTE got round the table in Geneva in February for the first time in three years. All of us had great hopes at that moment. The Government pledged that no armed group or person other than Government security forces would carry arms or conduct armed operations, and for their part, the LTTE pledged to take all necessary measures to ensure that there would be no acts of violence against the security forces and the police. Both sides made a commitment to ensure that there would be no intimidation, acts of violence, abductions or killings.

I am sure my hon. Friend and hon. Members will agree that the resurgence and subsequent escalation in violence since that moment is all the more disappointing. Since the beginning of April, as my hon. Friend reminded us, at least 300 people have died, more than half of them civilians. That is a terrible situation.

We know that the LTTE are responsible for many of the violent acts. Our position on the LTTE is clear: they are a proscribed organisation under the Terrorism Act 2000. Along with the international community, we have urged them time and again to move away from the path of violence. Our concerns go beyond high profile attacks on the armed forces. There is an established pattern of LTTE involvement in killings, torture, detention of civilians and denial of freedom of speech. For many Tamils, any expression of opposition to the LTTE is not an option. That is the sad truth. We remain deeply disturbed by the LTTE's continuing recruitment of child soldiers.

But the LTTE is not the only source of violence. I have to make clear, too, our deep concern at the plight of civilians in Government-controlled areas, who are regularly subjected to brutal attacks by paramilitary groups, often acting with apparent impunity. There are also reports that Government security forces may be involved in some of those killings.

So what needs to happen next? My hon. Friend asked some very pertinent questions. In my view, the answer is clear. It is vital that both sides return to the negotiating table and live up to the commitments that they made in Geneva in February. We shall continue to offer political and practical support to the peace process in whatever way we can. Violence is not the answer. The only way forward is a negotiated settlement that satisfies the concerns and legitimate aspirations of all Sri Lankans and preserves national unity and integrity. I am sure that the House will join me in expressing the hope that all parties go down that road, and soon, and that we shall finally see Sri Lanka fulfil its very considerable potential. As the hon. Member for Northampton, South has told me, it is potentially a tourist paradise. It should be one of the wealthiest countries in southern Asia, but it is rapidly becoming one of the poorest. It is a disgrace that that has been allowed to happen.

What are we in the United Kingdom doing? The British Government continue to urge the Sri Lankan Government and the LTTE to fulfil the obligations that they made at the Geneva talks in February, to do all they can to stop the violence, and to return to talks. We have given our full support to the efforts of the Norwegians, who have the difficult task of facilitating this process. We very much admire their continued determination and inexhaustible work in the face of much public dissension. The Norwegian interlocutors who are doing this work always pay us the privilege of calling into the Foreign and Commonwealth Office so that they can keep us abreast and we can find out from them what we can do to help. We have continued to do that. We also continue to support the work of the Sri Lanka monitoring mission, now led by a Swedish general, in monitoring ceasefire violations.

On a practical level, we contribute to peace-building in Sri Lanka through the implementation of a peace-building strategy that has been agreed across the Department for International Development, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Ministry of Defence. It focuses on such themes as greater adherence to human rights standards, preparedness for peace negotiations, and strengthening civil society. DFID has contributed £2.6 million towards de-mining activities in Sri Lanka, which is a very serious issue that my hon. Friend did not have a chance to discuss; £6.25 million to UNICEF's children affected by armed conflict programme, which is another very serious issue; almost £2 million to civil society organisations to promote conflict transformation; £3.5 million to Oxfam to reduce the number of children suffering as a result of the conflict; and £3.3 million to Save the Children Sri Lanka to increase respect and realisation of child rights.

Let me deal with the issue of internally displaced persons—I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton and the hon. Member for Northampton, South for raising it. Internally displaced persons should be protected and assisted by their Governments in the first instance. However, if a Government are unable or unwilling to do that, the international community should provide support. There has been much debate about that in the United Nations recently. We must carefully examine what the international community can do to help in those circumstances.

In Sri Lanka, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is mandated to assist internally displaced persons. In 2005, the British Government gave £30 million to UNHCR, of which £20 million was DFID core funding, and we would like at least some of that money to be spent on alleviating the problems of internally displaced persons in Sri Lanka. Like my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Northampton, South, we support the principle that every internally displaced person has the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his or her residence.

Internally displaced persons should have conditions established by competent authorities, which allow them to return voluntarily, in safety and with dignity to their homes or habitual residence, or to resettle voluntarily in another part of the country. I hope that my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman understand that the Government are concerned about that important issue. I am glad that they raised it.

Since the tsunami, a great deal has been achieved and assistance is reaching most victims of that terrible natural disaster. However, with so many independent non-governmental organisations active throughout Sri Lanka, there are wide differences between districts in the standards and quality of relief work. The immense size of the reconstruction task is stretching the capacity of central and local government to manage and co-ordinate assistance. Assistance has been reaching some communities more quickly than others.

The Government and donors, including DFID, are working to make the administration as efficient as possible and to remove any bureaucratic hurdles that constrain non-governmental organisation activities. With that in mind, DFID has recently approved £1.5 million for the north-east provincial council—NEPC—to increase its capacity to deliver services to affected communities. The NEPC is responsible for some 70 per cent. of the area damaged by the tsunami. Despite the difficulties, the achievements to date have been substantial. Assistance is reaching communities throughout the country and making a genuine difference. Sadly, the recent escalation in violence has led to a suspension of the programme and some other DFID activities in Sri Lanka. I greatly hope that an improvement will occur in the security situation and allow those activities to resume.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Teacher Retirement

1. Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): How many secondary school teachers with a qualification in chemistry or physics will be eligible for retirement over the next 10 years. [73368]

The Minister for Schools (Jim Knight): In 2005, 26 per cent. of teachers with a physics degree and 22 per cent. with a chemistry degree were aged 50 or over and would therefore be expected to retire in the next 10 to 15 years. There is no fixed retirement age for teachers but the normal pension age for existing teachers is 60, rising to 65 for ordinary recruits from January 2007. Actuarially reduced pension benefits are also available to members of the scheme from age 55.

Mr. Willis: May I first welcome the Secretary of State and his new ministerial team and wish them well? I genuinely mean that.

Yesterday, the Education and Inspections Bill went through the House promising that more children at key stages 3 and 4 could have access to single subject physics and chemistry. Also, the Chancellor said that 3,000 extra science teachers—mostly of physics and chemistry—would be recruited by 2014. Yet only one in four science teachers has a qualification in physics, only one in five has a qualification in chemistry and the Government have missed every science teacher recruitment target since 1997. What plans has the Minister to ensure that, by 2014, we have a supply of teachers to satisfy the demands of our schools and British business?

Jim Knight: We are taking significant steps to recruit and retain more science teachers. The targets are challenging but numbers have already increased by 30 per cent. between 1997 and 2004-05—the last year for which figures are available. As a result of the Chancellor's Budget statement, we are increasing the value of the teacher training bursary for science graduates, training new science specialist high level teaching assistants, continuing the drive to recruit graduates into teaching via employment-based routes, exploring current pay incentives and flexibilities—there is a long list, but I shall not detain the House by continuing to read it out. We take the matter very seriously.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): It is not simply a matter of good science teachers in the classroom, but of good technical back-up. Will my hon. Friend examine the training of technicians and technical assistants who help teachers in the laboratory and elsewhere in school? There are some problems with supply.

Jim Knight: As ever, my hon. Friend follows these matters carefully. He is right to highlight the important role that technicians play. The support staff in our schools perform a valuable role but, all too often, we focus only on teaching assistants. We should applaud the work and contribution of technicians. We take my hon. Friend's point seriously and the national network of science learning centres provides professional development for science teachers and technicians.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): The shortage of chemistry and physics teachers stems ultimately from the crisis in science teaching in our secondary schools that has developed in the past 20 years, and ill-judged reforms to the curriculum such as the double-award science GCSE. Does the Minister share our concern about the latest reform—the new 21st century science curriculum—which puts more emphasis on societal issues in science than fundamental scientific knowledge and is being boycotted by the top independent schools in favour of the International GCSE? The state sector is not allowed to use that exam because it does not include continuous assessment of coursework. Should not that rule be changed and the IGCSE be made available to all state schools as well as the private sector? If he makes that change, he will have our support on that, too.

Jim Knight: It is relatively early days for me but I am looking into all that. However, we do not agree with the hon. Gentleman—the new programme of study for science does not lower standards. We worked with the science and science education communities to develop a revised programme of study, which has a core that focuses on scientific literacy and provides options for further study and links with other subject areas. It will still be possible for schools to offer GCSEs in the three separate sciences and we are confident that the changes will ensure that our children's scientific knowledge is fit for purpose for this century.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): We all know that great strides have been made in getting more students to study science, including chemistry, and maths. Will my hon. Friend also consider engineering? Will he further examine joined-upness and the gaps between study at 16, being oven ready for A-level and being prepared for university? There is something wrong with the joined-upness between the ages of 16 and 18 that puts kids off staying with science. Will my hon. Friend urgently examine that process?

Jim Knight: Of course I must listen carefully to what my hon. Friend is saying, and I will look carefully at engineering. I will also look at the impact of the new diploma, and at how the foundation degree is working. I will ensure that we have the sort of joined-upness that he is looking for.

Subject Skills Shortages

2. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What steps are being taken to address subject skills shortages among teachers. [73369]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Alan Johnson): Having enough teachers with the right subject skills remains one of the Government's highest priorities. Ofsted commends our newly qualified teachers as the best trained ever. We have measures in place to ensure that we continue to attract the teachers that we need, particularly in priority subjects. These include bursaries of £9,000 for trainee secondary teachers and golden hellos of up to £5,000. We support a range of professional development measures to enhance the subject skills of serving teachers.

Mr. Hollobone: I recently met the secondary heads at Montsaye community college in Rothwell, Montagu school in Kettering and Latimer community arts college in Barton Seagrave, and they all said that skills shortages among teachers in maths, English, design and technology, information and communications technology and music were among their biggest headaches. Despite the policies that the right hon. Gentleman has just announced, the results do not seem to be filtering down to real head teachers in real schools on the ground.

Alan Johnson: There is a problem in those and other subjects, including modern languages. That is why we have looked at this matter again, and why the Training and Development Agency has made recommendations, all of which will be put into effect from September next year. Recruitment into maths teacher training has gone up over the past four years from 1,410 to 2,580, and the figures for science teachers have gone up by a similar amount, from 2,580 to 3,560. But there are still shortages, which is why the bursaries, the golden hellos and all the other efforts that are going into inspiring youngsters to get involved in these subjects are crucial. The hon. Gentleman has raised an important point, but it is an issue that we are aware of and that we are seeking to tackle.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): The fact that many of our top universities are closing their chemistry departments could have serious consequences for chemistry teachers in the future. Has my right hon. Friend made any direct assessment of the effect that this will have on the recruitment of chemistry teachers?

Alan Johnson: I know that my hon. Friend takes a huge interest in these issues, and I should like to tell him that the number of chemistry graduates has gone up last year and this year. We had a bit of a concern about Sussex university, but it announced recently that it was keeping its chemistry department open. That is no cause for complacency, however. We have to work through the Higher Education Funding Council—universities are independent organisations, as my hon. Friend knows—to ensure that those courses are available. The central point, however, is that we need students who wish to study those subjects. That is why the process starts not at the higher education level in the universities, but much further down in primary and secondary schools.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): One in four modern language teachers are teaching a subject in which they have no qualification beyond A-level. Given the difficulty that the Government are having in recruiting graduates to teacher training, would it not be sensible also to invest in retraining existing teachers in those specialist areas?

Alan Johnson: We are doing some of that as well. Through the national centre for excellence in teaching mathematics and other learning centres, we are seeking to ensure that we give qualifications to those who come into teaching late. As for modern languages, we are using a number of strategies to increase the number of teachers with a specialism in their subject, but that does not detract from the ability to bring in people who have a degree in another subject and switch them over to modern languages. That is a way of tackling the skills shortage, and a combination of both methods is necessary.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Would the Secretary of State care to say a little about the success of the pilot scheme for the repayment of teachers' loans in relation to shortage areas? The prime scheme ended on 30 June 2005, although the final tranche of applicants was allowed up to 30 June 2006. This is particularly important in areas such as science and my own subject, mathematics, in which there has been a chronic shortage for a very long time, predating this Government by decades.

Alan Johnson: If my hon. Friend will accept this, I will write to him on this issue. My understanding so far—from my two weeks' experience in this job—is that that scheme has worked very well, and that we are now looking at a new phase. We are drawing on the lessons that we have learned from the previous period. I will write to my hon. Friend with the full details immediately after questions.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): I have seven secondary schools in my constituency, but I shall spare the Minister the pleasure of having them read out. [Hon. Members: "Shame!"] I would be delighted to read them out if that is what my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) wants. More seriously, one thing common to the entirety of my constituency and Hertfordshire is a lack of maths teachers at secondary school level. Indeed, advertisements for a new teacher often go completely unanswered. Can the Secretary of State provide something encouraging for me to take back to the head teachers in my constituency about what the Government are going to do to encourage more people into the teaching profession, specifically into mathematics teaching, in the east and south-east region?

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman will recall the Chancellor's Budget statement in which, as part of the 10-year science and innovation framework, he announced a number of measures for a variety of subjects, but particularly for maths. The intention is that the number of specialist mathematics teachers will have been increased dramatically by 2014. Currently, 88 per cent. of maths teachers have a specialism in maths, which we aim to increase to 95 per cent. by 2014. That, together with the other procedures that I mentioned—the golden hellos, bursaries and so forth—will have a dramatic effect. Overall, the number of maths teachers has increased, but we need more of them, particularly with the maths specialism, to teach the subject properly.

Secondary School Places (Wellingborough)

3. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): What estimate he has made of the number of secondary school aged children in Wellingborough who have not been allocated a secondary school place. [73370]

The Minister for Schools (Jim Knight): Northamptonshire county council is responsible for ensuring that all parents in Wellingborough who want a place for their child are given one. The Tory county council has told the Department that all parents who applied for a secondary school place for September 2006 were offered one on 1 March, the national offer date.

Mr. Bone: I will take that answer, if I may, with a pinch of salt. Wellingborough is a fast-expanding town with thousands of new homes being built, but under the Labour Government, one of its four secondary schools has been demolished, leaving the remaining three schools grossly overcrowded with some children being bussed to school, some parents moving from Wellingborough to get an education for their children and the scandal of many children being left at home with no school to go to. Is the Department for Education and Skills fit for purpose?

Jim Knight: I think that the hon. Gentleman is stretching things a little, so he needs to look at the facts. Generally, for each year group in his area, there are 704 places across the three schools and about 630 pupils for those schools: there is a surplus. Those figures were supplied by the Tory county council. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that there is a problem with school places in Wellingborough, he needs to go to his friends in his party who run his local authority to get them to sort it out.

Education Links (UK/China)

4. Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): If he will take steps to build higher education links between the UK and China. [73371]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): There are 160 links between our universities and those in China, and 53,000 students from China studying in the UK. This month, I visited China with three vice-chancellors to explore the scope for greater collaboration. We have expanded the scholarships for excellence programme, and the second phase of the Prime Minister's initiative for international education will enable us to extend and deepen our higher education partnerships with China.

Mark Tami: I thank the Minister for that answer. Given the remarkable pace of growth and change in China, does he agree that we need to do more to establish greater links between UK and Chinese universities? I am aware of the links with Loughborough, Nottingham and Liverpool, but how do we encourage our other universities to follow suit?

Bill Rammell: I very much agree with my hon. Friend that we need greater higher education collaboration, but we are building from a high base, with 160 collaboration initiatives in place. My hon. Friend refers to the specific initiatives of Nottingham and Liverpool universities. Given that more of China's students are home grown, those initiatives are a key element of our future higher education engagement with China, so we are strongly supporting them.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Notwithstanding the Government's own problems with mandarins this week, does the Minister agree that Mandarin should be rolled out to all schools, particularly at secondary level, so that Britain remains competitive against global competition, not least from China?

Bill Rammell: I certainly want young people in this country to study modern languages in greater numbers across the board. Our commitment that in every primary school by 2010 there will be an opportunity for the teaching and study of a modern foreign language is an important initiative, and I am encouraged by the fact that undergraduate application numbers to universities this year to study Mandarin have increased by some 53 per cent.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware of Northumbria university, which has one of the largest overseas student bodies in the UK? It has 1,000 students from China, which is a quarter of the overseas student body of 4,000, and it also teaches 2,000 students on—

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Distance learning.

Mrs. Hodgson: Yes, distance learning. I thank my hon. Friend. The university has 2,000 students who live in China doing distance learning. I would recommend that any hon. Member visit Northumbria university to find out from its best practice how it does that and learn from it.

Bill Rammell: I thank my hon. Friend for her interest in this area. I recently met with the pro vice-chancellor of Northumbria university, who is leading on those issues. While we have about 53,000 Chinese students coming to study in this country, which is welcome, I firmly believe that we have a strategic national interest in getting more British students to study in China. We will be looking to see how we can support them.

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): I congratulate the Minister on the steps he is taking to build up links with China. As we know how important it is that UK universities should have a good international reputation, and that there can be no greater deterrent to international students than the prospect that they might not have their degrees marked, may I urge him now to break his sphinx-like silence and say, loud and clear, that Chinese and other international students must have their papers marked this year?

Bill Rammell: I have certainly not shown a sphinx-like silence on this issue. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Government are not involved in the dispute between universities and the trade unions, but quite rightly, given my concern for students, both home and overseas, I have kept in contact with both sides. I am pleased that the employers and the unions involved in the dispute have been and, as we speak, are continuing to talk to each other at ACAS.

I strongly urge everyone involved in the dispute not to continue to take any action that would jeopardise the assessment timetable for students and disrupt their studies. I hope that, following those talks, the unions will ballot their members as soon as possible.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Obviously, my hon. Friend will be aware of the close links between the university of Central Lancashire and China, as well as the number of students exchanged, but can we use those good avenues to ensure that we also get the voice of democracy across to China and that students do not have to suffer religious intolerance, which we see coming out of China? Maybe there is a good role for UK universities to play to ensure that that continues.

Bill Rammell: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. I have recently visited the university of Central Lancashire to discuss that, among many other issues. In terms of the change and development of China, the very fact that we have close links and that our students are travelling in both directions enables us to have a better dialogue with the Chinese Government over those issues.

Universities (Academic Freedom)

5. Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): If he will make a statement on academic freedom in universities. [73372]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): Academic freedom is a fundamental principle of our higher education system. It is vital that academic staff have freedom within the law to question and test received wisdom, and to put forward new ideas and voice controversial or unpopular opinions, without placing themselves in jeopardy.

Michael Gove: I thank the Minister for that reply. He recently appointed Dr. Atta Ullah Siddiqui of the Islamic Foundation in Leicester to review Islamic education at university. Given that the Islamic Foundation has been described by the BBC's "Panorama" as one of "the most influential" outposts of "militant Islamist ideology" in Europe, given that it led the militant opposition to Salman Rushdie's "The Satanic Verses" and given that it promotes the work of Abu Ala Mawdudi, who called for a worldwide Islamic revolution, how is this move likely to promote freedom in our universities?

Bill Rammell: This is an important issue and an important review that we are pursuing. It is crucial that we get it right. I appointed Dr. Siddiqui after careful consideration and decided that he was the best-qualified of a number of candidates. If the hon. Gentleman looks at Dr. Siddiqui's record, what he has said and what he has written, they will show that he has a commitment to improving relations between Muslims and the wider community. He is vice-chair of the Christian-Muslim association launched by the Archbishop of Canterbury. He also has a distinguished academic record, and in terms of the number of questions that have been put forward, he has categorically assured me that he has no links to the Jamaat-e-Islami party. I think that he is a very credible candidate to take on this task.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): We completely agree with the Minister about the importance of academic freedom. Does he agree, however, that the freedom that academics enjoy must be matched by a responsibility to their students? If the strike by academics were to leave many students unable to take their degrees and jeopardise their careers, that would be taking academic freedom much too far. Further to the Minister's answer, will he confirm that he will support universities that legitimately make alternative arrangements to ensure that exam papers are marked this summer?

Bill Rammell: The answer to that question is, of course, yes. The Government want absolutely to ensure that students are not adversely affected by this dispute. We have made it clear on several occasions that a resolution of the dispute is crucial. I regard it as an encouraging sign—I put it no stronger than that—that talks were held at ACAS on Tuesday and that talks are taking place today. We urge the trade unions to put an offer to their members and hope that the dispute is resolved as quickly as possible.

Secondary School Places (Milton Keynes)

6. Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): If he will make a statement on the availability of secondary school places in Milton Keynes. [73373]

The Minister for Schools (Jim Knight): As I made clear in my response to the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), the local authority determines the demand for and supply of places at its schools, which is a procedure reinforced by the Education and Inspections Bill. Where an authority demonstrates that it cannot fund the statutory number of places from the funding that it is allocated, it can apply to my Department for exceptional funding. It should be noted that the Government have met all funding requests from Milton Keynes borough council since 1997.

Mr. Lancaster: Every day, Milton Keynes welcomes 13 new residents as the Government force the city to expand. That puts enormous pressure on our schools. Currently, 450 pupils are being educated in temporary accommodation, and the temporary accommodation at Oakgrove is now set to stay for another five years. Given that the Government are happy to set the expansion plan for Milton Keynes until 2031 but funding for schools only until 2008, does the Minister at least accept that temporary schools appear to be here to stay?

Jim Knight: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's concerns about the expansion of Milton Keynes and the subsequent need for enhanced infrastructure. Under this Government, Milton Keynes and its schools have been allocated more than £125 million of capital support for 2005-06 and 2007-08 alone, including £86 million based on new pupil places criteria. I am aware of his concerns about temporary accommodation, and the overall position on temporary accommodation has improved dramatically under this Government. He will know that, in 1997, investment in school buildings was just £683 million, and that will increase to more than £8 billion by 2010-11. The Government are committed to ensuring that we do not need temporary buildings and that we keep them to a minimum, but, clearly, where there is rapid expansion of population and schools, they will be used.

Prisoner Education

7. Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): If he will make a statement on his policy on the education of prisoners. [73374]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): With the Home Office and the Department for Work and Pensions, the Department for Education and Skills has produced an education policy for prisoners and offenders generally, "Reducing Re-Offending Through Skills and Employment". We aim to improve the skills of offenders, including prisoners, and to improve their employment prospects, so that we can help to reduce reoffending and ensure that those individuals make a positive contribution to society.

Greg Clark: I thank the Minister for that reply. Is he aware, however, that 70 per cent. of prisoners are illiterate, though it is obvious to anyone that their rehabilitation depends on them learning to read and write? Is he also aware that the director general of the Prison Service appeared before the Public Accounts Committee, on which I serve, and pointed out that only 30 per cent. of prisoners have access to education during their sentences? He said that there is "a limit to the education one should reasonably do with prisoners."

Does the Minister agree that that is a shameful assessment?

Phil Hope: The hon. Gentleman is right that there is a huge basic skills gap among prisoners, and we are doing a great deal to ensure that we deliver more skills for life qualifications to offenders, including those in prison. We have doubled the number of offenders receiving skills for life level 1 literacy qualifications, which has been a huge success. The document to which I referred spells out in detail how we are trying to improve the quality of training inside our prisons to widen access to education and training and to ensure that more offenders, inside and outside prison, gain skills that lead them into jobs. If an offender gets a job, the prospects of them reoffending are much reduced.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): For many years, education funding for young people in the secure estate was less than two thirds of funding for the average pupil in a secondary school, although young people in the secure estate are some of the lowest educational achievers and are some of the most vulnerable members of society. What are the Government doing to increase per capita funding for those young people to a higher level than the average funding for secondary school pupils?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is right to raise the important issue of young offenders. I was at Feltham young offender institution last week talking to young people who were undergoing education. Many are alienated, disaffected and disengaged from education. They are in secure accommodation because they committed offences that merited imprisonment, and they are some of the most challenging individuals with whom to work.

I spoke to staff at Feltham, who, like staff in other youth custody institutions throughout the country, do a fantastic job in re-engaging young people in education, and giving them skills and aspirations that they have never had before. It is a challenging environment in which to work, and I was deeply impressed. We have doubled resources for the education of offenders, and that increase, along with the talent that is there and the new Offenders Learning and Skills Service—which is now being delivered throughout the secure estate—will raise aspirations and the quality of the education given to young people in our prisons.

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Does the Minister recognise the concern expressed by the Home Affairs Committee and the Prison Reform Trust about the possibility that progress in the meeting of basic skills targets will be eroded by the ever-increasing number of people going through the system, the high level of transfer between institutions, and the apparently large differentials between institutions in terms of provision? Does he share those concerns, and what is he doing to address them?

Phil Hope: I do share those concerns. We are taking a number of steps to ensure that we can deliver education and training in a service in which prisoners move from one institution to another. That is a real challenge, but our Green Paper specifies a number of measures to deal with it. They include modularised courses, which mean that an offender who has been taking a course and is moved from one institution to another can continue to study because the second institution provides a similar course.

The transfer of records is a problem. We want to improve the manual transfer system, and, ideally, to adopt a system of electronic transfer so that prisoners' learning profiles can follow them to new institutions. All our proposals are spelt out in detail in the Green Paper. The consultation finishes at the end of this month, and later in the year, once consensus has been achieved, I shall present proposals for the implementation of those changes.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): I know that my hon. Friend is aware of the importance of linking education in prisons directly to the development of skills for employment, but will his Department examine the way in which education is structured in prisons? It is important to engage prisoners who are serving short-term sentences. Many of those prisoners are women. Can they be encouraged to take advantage of such programmes, and can the courses be structured in such a way that they can be continued following release?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend has put her finger on a key issue: how we can improve the quality of education and training in our prison system. Inspection is now conducted at a level equivalent to mainstream education standards, and as a result of that regime, more prisons are paying attention to the quality of education.

I met a young woman in Low Newton prison in Durham who was taking a painting and decorating course. The possibility of a qualification leading to a job was a bonus, but it also meant that she could decorate a nursery at home for her child. We would like that combination of improved skills and enhanced life chances to be replicated throughout the prison system.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): The Government have a criminal record on prison education. A damning report from the Education and Skills Committee stated that 50 per cent. of inmates lacked the skills needed for 96 per cent. of jobs. A year later, only four of its 55 recommendations have been implemented. My hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark), who is a member of the Public Accounts Committee and whose work I commend, found that only 30 per cent. of prisoners receive any formal education during their sentences.

The Government set a target: prisoners should devote 24 hours a week to purposeful activity, including education. Why, given the Minister's fine words, have the Government—according to the director general of the Prison Service—dropped their target for prison education altogether?

Phil Hope: We are in fact exceeding those targets as a result of increasing investment in the Prison Service, and offenders now have more and longer opportunities to engage in education. During the day in prisons, there are not only education courses but, because of the way in which prisons are run, other learning opportunities to enable skills levels to be increased, such as catering and making things in workshops. Training and education is provided across the piece and is seen as an integral part of the way in which the Prison Service operates. We have delivered 18 of the recommendations in the Select Committee report to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Four of them are long term and are being delivered as we speak, four others do not require any action—they were recommendations for others—and six we disagreed with.

Our record on delivering the recommendations of that report—I point out to my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) that it is a good analysis—suggests that we have made and are making real progress. As we build on the Green Paper this year, we will see further delivery of our commitment to improve education and training for prisoners, so that their chances of reoffending are reduced and they can get a job when they leave prison.

EU Students (Loan Repayments)

8. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): What estimate he has made of the number of EU-domiciled students who will receive loans for study at a UK higher education institution and will then default on repayment of those loans. [73376]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): We estimate that 14,000 students each year from other European Union countries who are studying in English institutions will be able to take out loans for tuition fees. We have put in place robust measures so that after graduation, these borrowers repay their loans—just as United Kingdom graduates do. Repayments are affordable and linked to income, and will be collected even if the graduate returns home.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am very grateful to the Minister for that constructive reply, but what will happen to those students who do not keep the Student Loans Company informed of any changes and those who move, for example? How will they be traced? Is it right that the hard-pressed British taxpayer should be responsible for picking up the cost of those loans that are not repaid? Why, moreover, are EU countries apparently not prepared to help the UK in recovering these loans?

Bill Rammell: I made a parliamentary written statement on this issue on Tuesday, and we have done a number of things. We have deliberately introduced lower repayment thresholds for less wealthy EU countries, so that students who return to them will nevertheless make an income-contingent repayment. Crucially, we have put in place procedures to enable the Student Loans Company to take action to enforce the debt in court both in the UK and abroad, if necessary. We intend to use EC regulation 44/2001, which will allow the SLC to enforce a judgment made in the UK courts and in the rest of the EU. On rights and responsibilities, these provisions stem from a European Court of Justice ruling back in 1988. I ask the hon. Gentleman to recall how many times in the nine subsequent years, when the Conservatives were in office, the Conservative Government challenged the ruling. In my recollection, they did so not once.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Contrary to the implication of this question, which is that EU-domiciled students are foreigners, is it not true that actually, all British students are also EU-domiciled? Indeed, they have benefited enormously from greater opportunities to study elsewhere in Europe over the past few years, but such opportunities depend on reciprocal arrangements with other countries. If we are to ensure that those opportunities really are advanced for young students—be they from the Rhondda or anywhere else in the UK—is it not vital that we strengthen our relationship with other countries? Would it not also be a good idea to have greater integration of our legal systems, so that we can pursue debts elsewhere in Europe?

Bill Rammell: My hon. Friend tempts me too far on this issue, but I strongly agree with him that we have a massive strategic national interest in a two-way flow of students: students from Britain going elsewhere in the European Union, and other EU students coming to this country. But it is important to make it clear that, although we welcome those overseas students, it is right that on leaving their courses, all those who can contribute to the cost of their higher education should do so, regardless of what country they are from and where they choose to live. The arrangements that we have announced this week will ensure that that happens.

Further Education

9. Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): What steps he is taking to increase the participation in further education of people with no qualifications. [73377]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Parmjit Dhanda): A wide range of policies exists to increase participation in learning by adults without qualifications. Our national employer training programme, Train to Gain, and the entitlement to free tuition for a first level 2 will both be available throughout England from this September. We also announced in our recent White Paper a new foundation learning tier to create progressive pathways below level 2.

Helen Jones: I welcome my hon. Friend to his new post, and I also welcome the steps that the Government are taking to improve participation in further education. Will he consider the issue that I raised in a recent debate in Westminster Hall, which is the closure of some adult education courses that, without leading to qualifications in themselves, actually bring into education adults who have no qualifications and who would not come through the college doors otherwise? Will he undertake to monitor that issue carefully and to learn from the success of adult and community learning in increasing the participation rates of those without any qualifications, so that we can get to those who are hardest to reach?

Mr. Dhanda: My hon. Friend makes her point exceedingly well and I enjoyed reading the report of her Adjournment debate in the early hours of this morning. She will be well aware that the personal and community development learning courses that she mentioned in her debate are being protected by a fund of some £210 million for the next two years, and I know that she will also agree that the Government face a challenge in terms of equipping people for the workplace at level 2. Part of the difficulty is that over the years so many people have taken courses below level 2 and have not made it through to that level, and 51 per cent. of those who do not have any qualifications do not end up in work, whereas 75 per cent. of those with a level 2 qualification do find work. We want to complete the pathway from no qualification to level 2, so I am sure that my hon. Friend will support the new foundation learning tier that will be implemented from September to do just that.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I welcome the Minister to his post and I entirely endorse the comments by the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones). It is disappointing that the Government have cut the funding for the learning and skills council in north Yorkshire to such an extent that York college is no longer able to offer the sort of evening classes and community education that are so important in rural areas. The Minister mentions level 2 qualifications, but why should funding for that level exclude funding for community education and evening classes? The Government must surely fund both.

Mr. Dhanda: The hon. Lady makes an interesting point, but provision for spending the £210 million that I mentioned, which is ring-fenced for the next two years, is patchy nationally. Provision is not consistent across the board, and we will look at that. I am determined not to be overtly partisan on my first outing at the Dispatch Box, but it is important for Opposition Members to realise that funding for further education has increased by 48 per cent. since 1997, whereas it fell by 14 per cent. in the last term of the Conservative Government.

Lynda Waltho (Stourbridge) (Lab): In adult learners week, will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating my constituent, William McSorley, who through learndirect has gained qualifications in language, literacy and IT skills and become a confident and capable library user? Will my hon. Friend also undertake to protect funding for such initiatives, as provided at Stourbridge library?

Mr. Dhanda: My hon. Friend makes a good point and I commend the work that she does in her constituency. I also congratulate her constituent. Over the course of this decade, we are seeking to provide basic skills to another 2.25 million people, and we are on course to meet that significant target. My hon. Friend's constituent and many others will be the beneficiaries of that and I hope that it will equip them for a place in the work force.

Trust Schools

10. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What recent estimate he has made of the number of trust schools that will be established by 2010. [73378]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Alan Johnson): I have not made any estimate of the number of trust schools that will be established by 2010. Our proposals are about schools making decisions that are right for them and their pupils in order to raise standards. It will be for individual schools to decide whether they want to acquire a trust and what form that trust should take, after consultation with parents and other stakeholders.

Mr. Prentice: Why is it so difficult to give a figure for trust schools? After all, we know that the Government want more than 200 city academies, even though they depend on super-rich sponsors coming forward. Will the current controversy and police investigation into alleged cash for honours have an impact on the numbers of would-be sponsors?

Alan Johnson: I cannot give my hon. Friend a figure, as we do not have one. Many schools are already interested in becoming trusts, but the number will grow when the Education and Inspections Bill has completed its passage through the House and receives Royal Assent. I can tell him that many people are waiting to sponsor city academies. Although the controversies to which he alluded were real, they have not in any way inhibited people from coming forward. Most of them want to remain anonymous, but they all want to put something back into the communities from which they came. A lot of them have deprived backgrounds, and all the academies will be in areas of educational deprivation. Whatever their expectations, I think that it is commendable that such people want to sponsor the academies. We should congratulate them, not condemn them.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): How does the Secretary of State square his answer to the substantive question with the enthusiasm of the Prime Minister's foreword to the White Paper? It was clear that he envisaged that every school, both primary and secondary, would become a trust school.

Alan Johnson: My answer was to the question about whether we had a figure for the number of trusts that would be established by 2010. I said that we did not have that figure. That is a world away from saying that we are not enthusiastic about setting up trusts, but it is up to schools to make that decision. I believe that a host of schools will wish to become trusts, and that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is right to speak about the policy with enthusiasm. It is being put forward because we believe that trusts can bring together experience from the outside world of universities, colleges and business and that that can contribute to raising educational attainment in a school. That is why many schools will wish to become trusts.

Childcare Work force

11. Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): What action is being taken to improve skills within the child care work force. [73379]

12. Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): What steps are being taken to improve skills within the childcare work force. [73381]

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): To improve quality in early education and care, we are developing a new graduate level role—the early years professional—and increasing skill levels for other staff. We have also introduced a transformation fund, worth £250 million over the next two years. That supplements the considerable financial support that we already give local authorities to develop their early years and child care work force.

Mrs. Humble: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply and I especially welcome the announcement of the transformation fund. When she issues guidance on staff training and development, will she take into account and acknowledge the existing expertise of the many people who have worked in child care for many years? Will she make sure that that is taken into account in the proposals to recruit and train a new and more diverse work force in child care?

Beverley Hughes: I thank my hon. Friend for that question, and I also commend her on her work to promote understanding and awareness of the need for quality in early education and child care. I assure her that we will take account of the expertise to which she referred. We want to make it easier for people in various parts of the children's work force to build on their existing qualification and find pathways to higher levels of skill. That will enable them to have more choice about where they work in the children's service. The integrated qualifications framework that we are developing will give existing child care practitioners of various kinds many more development opportunities, and in that way it will contribute to the quality that young children need.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): The Minister will be aware that the pay of those who work with children is notoriously low. That is not helpful when we are trying to attract people with higher skills into that sector. Can she explain the effect on child care workers' pay of the Government's actions?

Beverley Hughes: Yes, I can. Pay is agreed ultimately by employers, staff and their representatives. My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that, as a result of the Government's push towards quality and higher skills levels in the children's work force, the survey published today for child care and early years providers for 2005 shows that the average level of pay for staff working, certainly in group settings, has increased across the board in the period 2002-05 by 16 per cent. on average for hourly pay. That compares well with a 10 per cent. increase for the United Kingdom as a whole. In addition, I have asked the Children's Workforce Development Council to report to me by September on the whole package of pay and conditions and on how we might look at that to improve recruitment and retention.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Community Court (Nottingham)

18. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): What recent discussions the Crown Prosecution Service has had with the Department for Constitutional Affairs about the proposal for a community court in Nottingham; and if he will make a statement. [73361]

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Mike O'Brien): I have spoken to the Department for Constitutional Affairs Ministers about a community court in Nottingham. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor has asked my hon. Friend to provide a paper on the options available and I know that the Nottinghamshire local criminal justice board, together with the Crown Prosecution Service, are keen to develop these proposals.

Mr. Allen: The Solicitor-General will be aware of the sloppy, slapdash research done this week, which was based on inaccurate census figures, inaccurate boundaries and out-of-date population numbers, which has condemned Nottingham wrongly as the city with the highest crime in the United Kingdom. Will he do something that the authors of that report did not do, which is to visit Nottingham, talk to me, the local chief of police and the leader of the council, and see what great work has gone on in the past few years to force crime down by 15 per cent. in five years and reduce our murder rate by a dramatic 63 per cent.? As part of that will he also ensure that he meets the CPS and gives a warm welcome and fair wind to our proposal for a community justice centre?

The Solicitor-General: I am happy to go to Nottingham to look at the proposals for a community justice court and to talk to Jon Collins, the leader of Nottingham city council, and chief superintendent Marcus Beale, both of whom have expressed serious concerns about the way in which the report suggests that the situation in Nottingham is far worse than it is.

Probation Service

19. Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): What discussions the Law Officers have had with the Home Office on the impact of the Human Rights Act 1998 on the work of the probation service. [73364]

21. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): What discussions the Attorney-General has had with the Home Office on the impact of the Human Rights Act 1998 on the work of the probation service. [73367]

The Solicitor-General: The Attorney-General and I have had regular discussions with Home Office Ministers about the probation service. In accordance with longstanding convention, law officers do not disclose whether or not they have given advice on a particular issue.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government are in a complete muddle about human rights. Ministers regularly complain about an over-cautious interpretation of the Human Rights Act 1998 by Government agencies and judges. Does the Solicitor-General agree that we can at least amend the Human Rights Act, but that that is not true for the separate and even more prescriptive EU charter of fundamental rights, which the Prime Minister unwisely signed up to as part of the European Constitution? Does the Solicitor-General think it was wise of the Government to sign up to a charter which would put these human rights matters permanently beyond the control of the British Government, British Parliament and British courts?

The Solicitor-General: The status of the charter is primarily political at present; it is not part of our domestic law, but the European convention is, through the Human Rights Act, and it can be interpreted in our courts. The convention provides a basic list of fundamental democratic rights that we should respect, so I do not accept the right hon. Gentleman's view that there is a mess in respect of the convention. We need to ensure that the convention is dealt with in a way that protects both the interests of society as a whole as well as the rights of individuals.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: What about the charter?

The Solicitor-General: The right hon. Gentleman refers to the charter, but the question he asked was about the human rights convention and the probation service.

Mr. Bone: For clarification, are the Government considering amending the Human Rights Act?

The Solicitor-General: The Human Rights Act is enormously important. It sets out articles on respect for life, prohibition of torture and degrading treatment, freedom from arbitrary arrest, the right to a fair trial and to freedom of thought, association, religion and speech, privacy and property, all of which are in the convention that was brought into our law by the Act.

The convention was drawn up in 1950 in the aftermath of the war and those freedoms continue to represent the civil and political values of a modern democracy and have been signed up to across Europe. The convention may have been written in different times, but most of its articles balance the rights of individuals and the interests of society. We shall look particularly at article 3, which does not include such a balancing clause in respect of the interests of society. We will not repeal the Human Rights Act, but we will not rule out amendment should that be necessary. At present, our view is that some of the problems that have arisen are due to officials taking a view about human rights that is in error, and that might be resolved by better and stronger guidance rather than by amendment.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Given the problems that the partly privatised Prison Service is experiencing in establishing an audit trail on foreign prisoners, does the Solicitor-General believe that the soon to be privatised probation service will have similar difficulties, as the ways in which it manages offenders in the community might compromise their human rights?

The Solicitor-General: I certainly believe that the way in which the probation service will be organised will improve our management of prisoners and reduce crime. The people of this country have already seen a reduction in the level of crime; an overall reduction of 44 per cent. over the last 10 years. We can be proud about that, and we are organising the probation service to ensure that that process of crime reduction continues.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): Do Law Officers agree with the views set out in the article by David Pannick QC in The Times on 23 May? He stated that the Human Rights Act is not responsible for the release of rapists into the community, nor for decisions about whether they are safe to be in the community, which are the responsibility of the Parole Board; that it is not responsible for the failure of the probation service to track down foreign convicted people who should have been deported; and that the Act is a good and excellent thing, far more important for the majority of law-abiding citizens than for a minority who might have been to prison.

The Solicitor-General: The Human Rights Act is a major achievement of the Government and there is no question of withdrawing from the convention or, indeed, of blaming the whole Act for particular problems. It is right, however, that when problems arise we look at ways to resolve them. As I indicated, on some issues—especially in the Rice case—some officials have sometimes taken an over-zealous view of the interpretation of the legislation. That might be dealt with primarily through more robust guidance to those officials and by making sure that we take the strong view that in each case there should be not only a recognition of the rights of individuals but of the interests and security of society, and the right of society not to be subject to people being arbitrarily or wrongly released.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): The Solicitor-General has been drawn out in his replies. He started by telling the House that he could not say what discussions he had been having with the Home Office about the operation of the probation service and then he became a bit more forthcoming. If it is correct that in the Rice case, for instance, there was a serious failure at an official level to understand how the Human Rights Act and the European convention on human rights ought to operate, meaning that officials wrongly failed to provide a proper degree of supervision of Mr. Rice, I assume that that is a matter of concern to the Law Officers. Although I would not expect a comment to be made on individual cases, may we have an assurance that this is an area in which the Law Officers are providing guidance to the Home Office and its relevant agencies on how to do their job properly and well within the scope of the ECHR?

The Solicitor-General: I have already indicated that I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman whether Law Officers have given particular guidance to the Home Office. He is well aware of that convention. I know that he is a great supporter of the Human Rights Act, unlike many of his Back Benchers. He voted for the Human Rights Act and was supportive throughout the debate. I remember that well. The Anthony Rice case, which resulted in the tragic death of Naomi Bryant, was an example of officials not properly balancing the rights of individuals against society's need for proper security. The Human Rights Act provides for that balancing test. Where that is not being applied properly—as the chief inspector of probation made it clear in the report that it was not in that case—we must ensure that the officials concerned are given an adequate understanding of the Human Rights Act, stronger guidance and better training. We are looking at whether further changes need to be made in some areas of legislation that may or may not involve the Human Rights Act. We need to look at the matter with care and see what lessons can be learned.

Crown Prosecution Service

20. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What plans he has to improve inter-agency working by the Crown Prosecution Service. [73366]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service will improve inter-agency working by delivering initiatives such as conditional cautioning, the prolific and priority offender scheme and prosecution team performance management. We will also develop programmes that are currently under way such as charging; no witness, no justice; and the effective trial management programme.

Julie Morgan: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that in areas such as domestic violence, it is especially important that the Crown Prosecution Service train and work closely with agencies such as Women's Aid, Victim Support and the probation service, so that women and children are made as safe as possible by a shared understanding of what domestic violence is and by the ability to share information?

The Solicitor-General: I certainly agree with that. Importantly, in recent years inter-agency working has had a dramatic effect on the way in which we deal with domestic violence. In particular, inter-agency working resulted in 25 specialist domestic violence courts being set up by April 2006. We are making 25 further bids for domestic violence courts that will be based on inter-agency working. There are proposals to introduce independent domestic violence advisers who will work on an inter-agency basis to improve the prosecution of domestic violence cases. Importantly, there was a 43 per cent. increase in recorded domestic violence cases in 2005-06 compared with 2004-05, mainly due to higher levels of reporting. However, unsuccessful outcomes in terms of prosecutions fell by 4.7 per cent. in 2005-06. We are improving the way in which we are prosecuting cases.

Business of the House

11.33 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for the week after the recess?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Jack Straw): The business for the week after the recess will be as follows:

MONDAY 5 JUNE—Second Reading of the NHS Redress Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 6 JUNE—Second Reading of the Company Law Reform Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 7 JUNE—Opposition day [16th allotted day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

THURSDAY 8 JUNE—Second Reading of the Compensation Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 9 JUNE—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the beginning of the following week will be as follows:

MONDAY 12 JUNE—Second Reading of the Fraud Bill [Lords].

Let me also inform the House of the business for Westminster Hall for June:

THURSDAY 15 JUNE—A debate on the report from the Foreign Affairs Committee on the human rights annual report.

THURSDAY 22 JUNE—A debate on the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

THURSDAY 29 JUNE—A debate on the report from the Health Committee on changes to primary care trusts.

Mrs. May: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving us the business for the week after recess.

Figures issued yesterday show that 15 per cent. of new housing development is on garden land. Houses are being knocked down with flats built in their place, and houses are being crammed into people's back gardens. No wonder children are getting obese if they do not have any gardens to run around in. May we have a debate in Government time on the ten-minute Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark), which would change the definition of brownfield sites to exclude gardens?

Yesterday, the European Union licensed Herceptin for the treatment of early-stage breast cancer. It is expected that the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence will approve its use in the next month. Two weeks ago, when I raised the issue of Herceptin with the Leader of the House, he said:

"I shall follow up the right hon. Lady's request that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health make a statement on advice to PCTs about Herceptin."—[Official Report, 11 May 2006; Vol. 446, c. 508.]

No such statement has been made. Given that many women's lives depend on it, will the Leader of the House confirm that the Health Secretary will make an urgent statement to the House after recess on the use of Herceptin?

In January, the Government published the White Paper "Our health, our care, our say: a new direction for community services". It says:

"You told us ... 'I'd like to see extended opening hours at GP surgeries, including weekends' ... Here's what we're doing ... In future, many GP surgeries will stay open longer and open on Saturdays."

I have news for the Government. GP surgeries used to open on Saturdays, until the Government's changes to the GP contract led to their being closed. All the Government are doing is desperately trying to get back to the service that people had before this Government interfered.

The White Paper also says:

"You told us ... 'I'd like to see hospitals back in the community, run for the community' ... Here's what we're doing ... By bringing health into the local community and linking it more closely with social care, we will make it easier for people to get the help they need."

However, how are the Government going to do that when about 80 community hospitals, such as Townlands in Henley and the elderly mental illness unit at St. Marks in my constituency, are still threatened with closure? How will health be brought back into the local community if there are fewer community nurses? Is this not another example of a Government in paralysis? May we thus have a debate in Government time on the White Paper on community health services?

The standards watchdog, Sir Alistair Graham, said that the Prime Minister considered standards to be a "peripheral minor issue not worthy of serious consideration".

Many people have been shocked by news of the sale of a signed copy of the Hutton report to raise money for the Labour party, and more shocked that one of the MPs who organised the event was a Government Minister: the Minister for Pensions Reform. May we have a debate, led by the Prime Minister, on standards in public life, in which he can say whether or not he condones the sale of copies of the Hutton report for party profit?

On Tuesday, it was revealed that one criminal has escaped from Leyhill open prison every single week for the past three years. Yesterday, the Home Secretary admitted that figures on foreign prisoners that he had given to the Home Affairs Committee the previous day were wrong. Today, we learn that a suspended chief immigration officer facing investigation into claims that he offered a visa for sex was himself an illegal immigrant.

The former Home Secretary was sacked, the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality has been moved, and the Home Secretary says that the Home Office that he inherited is inadequate in

"IT, leadership, management systems and processes".

But, of course, we have heard that before. When the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) took over as Home Secretary, he told us that his predecessor, who is now the Leader of the House, had left the Home Office in a mess. He said:

"Nothing had prepared us for it. It was worse that any of us had imagined possible. God alone knows what Jack did for four years."

The right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside also said that he respected my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) for what he did in the Home Office, and on Tuesday the current Home Secretary also spoke in respectful terms of my right hon. and learned Friend. With the Government in paralysis, it is good to see that the only thing on which Ministers can agree is that the only good Home Secretary is a Conservative Home Secretary.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Lady asks for a debate on the definition of brownfield sites. We are responding to the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) on that subject. If her party is committing itself to not building on any spare land in people's back gardens, she had better say so. The pressure for housing, particularly in many areas represented by Conservative MPs, means that such land, as well as other brownfield land, will have to be used; otherwise, she and her colleagues will face far worse social problems from a shortage of housing than exist at the moment.

I note what the right hon. Lady says on Herceptin. Since I made that statement, I think she will accept that things have moved on in a better way. She will be aware that Roche announced yesterday that the drug has been granted a licence for use in early breast cancer. As a result, the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence has been asked to carry out a fast-track appraisal of Herceptin for early breast cancer. It expects to publish guidance to the NHS in early July.

On GP surgeries and community nurses, I am delighted to debate our record on the health service compared with the right hon. Lady's Government's record on it. Since we came to office, one of the many records of which I am proud is the increase of 33,000 in the number of doctors, including general practitioners, the increase of 85,000 in the number of nurses, and the 132 new hospitals that have been opened. As a result of what she describes as "interference", which I would describe as "activity", compared with the inactivity over years and years of a Conservative Government, health care for every client and patient group has improved over the past nine years.

In respect of standards in public life and the signing of the Hutton report, my hon. Friends have apologised—that is in the newspapers today—for something that was obviously inappropriate. I hope that the right hon. Lady will let the matter lie there. I would be delighted to debate standards in public life, because the Conservatives did nothing in their 18 years in government to implement any changes in the regulations relating to standards of conduct in public life. It fell to us. Indeed, much of the responsibility fell to me, as Home Secretary between 1997 and 2001, to implement those changes, and I am very glad that we did.

As for the wider issues, we have had nine years of a very fine record on crime, law and order, and asylum and immigration. We have always—I include myself in this—been generous to a fault about the former Conservative Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard). I always felt it important to have him right in front of the cameras, because the more publicity he received, the more support we received for our proposals in 1997 on law and order, which we put before the public. We proposed to cut crime, in place of the rising crime over the previous 18 years, to cut the time it took to process asylum seekers, given that that had risen to 22 months, and to turn around the cut in police numbers, which had dropped under the right hon. and learned Gentleman. That is what we did. Since 1997, there has been a 35 per cent. drop in crime, and the time that it takes to process asylum applications has dropped from 22 months to two months. The number of removals has doubled. In place of the cut of 1,200 planned by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe in asylum and immigration staff, their numbers have increased by 5,000, and there are 14,000 extra police officers on the street—a record of which to be proud.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): May we have a debate on football in the run-up to the World cup, particularly on the need to strengthen the role of fans? Like many football fans, I am appalled that players earn in a week what a nurse would earn on average in five years. In some clubs, season ticket prices have gone up by 47 per cent., which is quite unacceptable. Is it not time to introduce a fans charter and legislation to establish a supporters trust and a fan on every board in Britain?

Mr. Straw: As an ardent football fan and season ticket holder, I accept my hon. Friend's concerns about the high rewards for football players and the pressure that some clubs at the top of the leagues have put on the finances of a wide range of clubs. The issue is being examined by a European committee on which my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport serves, and I hope that its proposals will be taken seriously. Issues such as a cap on salaries are difficult, but they are not necessarily impossible. We ought to be concerned about the health of the game overall as well as the financial health of one or two clubs.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Home Office statistics are rather like Hollywood marriages—they are best timed for the early morning so that when they go wrong it does not ruin the entire day. However, may I ask the Leader of the House about the Home Office's other inadequacies? Yesterday, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) asked why a key recommendation of the Cullen inquiry after the Dunblane shootings 10 years ago has still not been implemented. Can we have a debate on the fact that the key recommendations of the Bichard inquiry after the Soham murders in 2002 have not yet been implemented? Is not the Home Office failing in its key responsibility to protect the public, and would it not be better if, instead of reorganising the police, it reorganised itself?

Can we have a debate soon on the collateral damage caused by the NHS funding crisis? Many of us are worried that there will be a knock-on effect on drugs rehabilitation funding, which plays a key role not only in helping vulnerable people but in protecting the public?

I support the view that the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Greg Clark) has introduced an important private Member's Bill. I do not kid myself that his Bill, which is 12th in the list for Second

[Mr. David Heath]

Reading on 14 July, will make a great deal of progress, but many of us are concerned that gardens are considered brownfield sites for planning purposes, thus distorting development in many towns, villages and cities. That ought to be dealt with as a matter of urgency.

Finally, we learn that the tax credit overpayment figures are—surprise, surprise—to be issued in the recess. I cannot imagine why that should be the case, but will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement to be made on the first day after the recess so that hon. Members have the opportunity to ask questions?

Mr. Straw: The recommendation of a national firearms register was one of the Cullen inquiry's recommendations. However, the hon. Gentleman may have forgotten that the principal recommendation was far more effective control of firearms overall. I implemented that recommendation as Home Secretary in the first months after we came to office in 1997, and it was one of the few anti-crime measures ever supported by the Liberal Democrats. I shall write to him about the Bichard report.

The hon. Gentleman talked about an NHS funding crisis. Some trusts face financial pressures, but they do so from a very high base indeed. Spending has doubled in real terms; there has been an increase of 85,000 in the number of nurses, and of 33,000 in the number of doctors; and there are 132 new hospitals across the country. The issue for the hon. Gentleman is whether any Liberal Democrat economic and social policy could possibly have achieved that improvement and turnaround in the economy and in health care.

In respect of tax credits, I will take account of what the hon. Gentleman says, look at the statements that are likely to be made, and see whether it is possible for Ministers to be questioned on the matter when we get back.

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the arrest this morning by the Israelis of Kate Maynard, a solicitor at the firm of Hickman and Rose, which is based in my constituency? She was due to speak at a conference organised by Avocats sans Frontières and do other legal work, and she has been questioned about her work with Palestinians and about her work obtaining an arrest warrant for the alleged criminal General Doron Almog, which I know my right hon. Friend knows a little about. Can we have a debate on this very important subject, as the arrest would seem on the face of it to be a vindictive act?

Mr. Straw: I note what my hon. Friend says. I will ensure that the matter is raised with our right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): Will the Leader of the House make time available shortly after the recess for an urgent debate on a matter of concern not only to my constituents, but to the entire UK road transport industry—that is, the imminent and indefinite closure of the main London to Holyhead A5 trunk road between Ty-nant and Dinmael in my constituency? It was announced on Friday last week by the Welsh Assembly that because of a dangerous rock face, the road would have to be closed. No indication was given as to how long the closure will last. It may last for well over a year, and although the Assembly has been aware of the problem for a considerable time, it has put no measures in place for an alternative route. The closure will cripple my constituency, cause massive damage to the tourist and farming industry, and cause huge damage to the UK road transport industry, for which that is the principal inland route between London and the ferry port of Holyhead.

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the matter, of which I was not aware. By the sound of it, it is principally a matter for which the Welsh Executive is responsible, not my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I will raise it with my right hon. Friend, as well as ensuring that the hon. Gentleman's feelings about the matter, which I well understand, are communicated to the First Minister of the Welsh Executive.

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): When the House returns, may we have a debate on the problems of industrial firms in London? The largest industrial concern in my constituency is Young's Brewery, which told its employees this week that, having failed to find an alternative site in Wandsworth, it is moving to Bedford. Many of us feel that the departure of the Ram brewery, which has been there for 425 years, will rip the heart out of Wandsworth. Should we not debate how we can keep firms like Young's in the communities that they serve, before the developers turn us all into identical and soulless suburbs?

Mr. Straw: I understand my hon. Friend's concern, having faced problems of the closure of one regional brewery in my constituency, and having ensured the maintenance of another. Those of us who enjoy Young's products also like the association with London, so I understand his concerns. Let me also say, however, that overall manufacturing investment is very strong and everybody accepts that there must be some changes in the location of employment.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Waiting lists for in-patient NHS operations longer than six months were in December 959, in January 957, in February 904 and in March 915, according to a parliamentary answer that I received from the Secretary of State for Health. The Prime Minister and other Ministers have continually claimed from the Dispatch Box that the number was zero. What measures can the Leader of the House take to ensure that statements by Ministers from the Dispatch Box are accurate?

Mr. Straw: I do not dismiss the figure that the hon. Gentleman gives, which is just under 1,000, but it is one or two per constituency, compared with the thousands per constituency that existed in 1997. On accuracy, as he knows, we are assiduous, as previous Ministers have been, in ensuring that if figures are given that are not accurate, they are corrected very quickly.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): Is the Leader of the House aware of the recent Fairtalk survey highlighted in my early-day motion 2161?

[That this House recognises the concerns expressed by many hon. Members and others about the high cost of incoming calls to hospital bedside telephones provided by Patient-line, Premier and Hospital Telephone Services; warmly welcomes the Fairtalk survey carried out by Patient and Public Involvement forums across England which covered 40 per cent. of all hospitals using these services and questioned 1,255 patients and members of the public, a much larger sample than previously surveyed; notes that in 88 per cent. of cases people surveyed rated the cost of inbound calls as expensive or very expensive and in some cases as causing real hardship, and that 80 per cent. were not aware of any areas within hospitals where they could use a mobile phone; and calls on the Government to ensure these findings are taken into full account during the current review of the use of mobile phones in hospitals and when awarding or reviewing the contracts to the providers of bedside telephone systems.]

The survey carried out by patient and public involvement forums across the country found that 88 per cent. of people considered hospital bedside telephone systems to be too expensive. May we therefore have a debate on whether to allow the use of mobile phones in controlled and safe areas in hospitals to end people's dependence on those overpriced services?

Mr. Straw: I will raise the matter with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. I understand my hon. Friend's concerns. It can only be a matter of time before the problems of mobile telephones interfering with medical equipment, which is the reason why their use is controlled, are overcome.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): May we have a debate soon in Government time on the growing knife culture in society? The Leader of the House may be aware that yesterday a three-month knife amnesty got under way in Northern Ireland. It has been widely welcomed, not least by the parents of Thomas Devlin, a young teenager in my constituency, who was knifed to death last August. I pay tribute to the campaign that his parents have waged for the amnesty and for tougher measures against those who carry and use knives to commit crime. A debate would allow us to discuss these issues and see what more can be done to eradicate this growing problem.

Mr. Straw: Yes, is the answer. It has been a constant problem ensuring that young men, in particular, are not attracted to carrying and then using knives. As the police are pointing out, aside from anything else, those young men become far more vulnerable to attacks by other youths who are carrying knives. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have begun a knife amnesty. It is relatively successful, but all of us, in all parts of the House, in support of the police and community organisations, must keep up the battle to persuade those young men, principally, not to carry knives and never to use them.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): If we are to have a debate on the Home Office, would it not be useful to examine carefully the role of the most senior civil servants previously and to some extent now? Is it not about time that politicians stopped covering up for those who have demonstrated sheer incompetence in their jobs?

Mr. Straw: The system we have in this country is that Ministers take responsibility for their Departments. At any one time there will be some officials who are performing well and some who are perhaps performing not as well. In my experience of nine years in government, both the home civil service and the foreign service do extremely well, often in difficult circumstances. The fundamental problem with the Home Office, which distinguishes it from any other Government Department, is not the quality of the staff, but the nature of the individuals whom the Home Office must deal with. In every other area of Government activity, local or national, those who are the customers, so to speak, of the Department—schoolchildren, parents, patients—are on the whole willing volunteers, but the last thing the customers of the Home Office are is willing volunteers. Many of them are dysfunctional individuals—criminals, asylum seekers, people who do not wish to be subject to social control, the purpose of the Home Office. It is that which places the burden on the staff and provides a challenge to both staff and Ministers. But we have no proposals to shift from a fundamental aspect of the way we run Government, which is that it is Ministers who are responsible for their Departments.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): May we have a debate on maintaining the integrity of our precious electoral process and democracy? In the debate we could expose and seek to prevent sinister abuses of the system, such as those investigated by James Redgrave, the excellent Essex Enquirer reporter, which are soon to be considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions?

Mr. Straw: I am afraid that I cannot comment on individual investigations, but the Electoral Administration Bill is currently going through Parliament and is intended to tighten controls on electoral administration and to counter fraud.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the latest findings in Scotland about the smoking ban? It has not reduced trade in public houses. Will he assure me that there will be a ban in the House, with no exceptions, including in the Members' Smoking Room?

Mr. Straw: That is a matter for the House to decide. As someone who was rather sceptical about the bans, I find the evidence in Scotland interesting and significant.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): May I join my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) in calling for a debate on community health services? The Leader of the House's reply only emphasised the need for such a debate. The Government's strategy is to shift the delivery of patient care from hospitals to our communities, yet only last week, the British Medical Association issued a report that stated that three out of every four GPs feel that their surgeries are not big enough to tackle future demand. We need an urgent debate in Government time to ensure that the Government's strategy matches what the NHS delivers on the ground.

Mr. Straw: The NHS is delivering in the hon. Lady's area. In the Hampshire and Isle of Wight health authority area, there are nearly 3,000 more nurses, more than 1,000 extra doctors and 382 more consultants. That is making a genuine difference to patients. I wish that Opposition Members would praise the work of additional staff and its effect on patient care.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I support the calls from Members of all parties for a debate or statement on the operation of the Home Office. The Home Secretary's statements to the Select Committee on Home Affairs and his assessment of his Department were devastating. I appreciate that, when my right hon. Friend was Home Secretary, he started the reform process, but a major problem remains with the way in which the Home Office operates. The latest allegations of sex for visas are serious. Like my right hon. Friend in Blackburn, I will go to my surgery in Leicester on Friday and there will be many cases of constituents complaining about the Home Office. The matter is not for an Adjournment debate but for the Floor of the House, where all hon. Members can participate in setting the benchmarks for a more efficient and effective Home Office. May we have such a debate?

Mr. Straw: As my hon. Friend knows, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary gave evidence to the Home Affairs Committee, which is compiling a report on Home Office administration. It is best for us to await the outcome and the recommendations before deciding about a future debate on the matter.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): The Leader of the House may know that all four Welsh police chief constables now say that the reconfiguration of the police service in Wales cannot take place in the time scale that has been set out. They also say that, if it were carried out in the proposed way, there would be a financial deficit of approximately £60 million year after year. More and more people believe that the proposed model is not right for Wales. Indeed, in the Welsh Grand Committee, the right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) proposed an alternative model that would tackle some of the concerns of people who want to ensure that local policing remains strong. Will the Leader of the House ensure that everybody gets together on the matter so that we get an affordable and effective solution for Wales?

Mr. Straw: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is taking time to consider those matters and, of course, taking the advice of the Welsh Assembly and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. However, I note that Mr. Terry Grange, the chief constable of Dyfed-Powys, said to the BBC in December last year:

> "I would ask myself why there are four police forces in Wales... one would probably be the best in all honesty".

There is therefore a debate in the police service as well as in the community about the future of police services in Wales.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is aware of the work of Derian House children's hospice in Chorley. It is sad that the hospice movement, especially children's hospices, is underfunded. It is unacceptable that the funding crisis continues, with the Government funding only one week in 52. That must change. We need a debate and we must ensure that the hospice movement, especially the children's hospice movement, is properly funded.

Mr. Straw: I note my hon. Friend's comments. There is a fine hospice, which is supported by voluntary contributions, in my constituency. I shall pass on his concerns to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): May I join the hon. Members for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) in calling for a debate on the Home Office? At a recent Public Accounts Committee meeting on the Home Office's accounts, we heard that they were in such chaos that the Comptroller and Auditor General could not qualify them but had to disclaim them. In other words, there were no accounts even to consider. The former Home Secretary is wrong to say that the problem is simply one of dealing with dysfunctional people. Home Office procedures and administration are dysfunctional. Although he is right to say that, ultimately, Ministers take responsibility, Sir John Gieve, the former permanent secretary, was in charge and is now deputy Governor of the Bank of England. We need a debate in the House and we must take a serious interest in not only policy but administration.

Mr. Straw: Of course, I agree with the hon. Gentleman's latter point. If Ministers are to be successful, they must do both. One of the failings of the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) when he was Home Secretary was his effort to evade responsibility by claiming that he was responsible only for policy and that others were responsible for operations. The test of a policy is how it operates in practice.

I accept that there are problems with the Home Office—no one has ever denied that—and there always will be. Administration should be better, but the nature of the tasks that the Home Office undertakes—especially given the extraordinary explosion of movement across borders, the increase in civil wars and so on since the collapse of the Berlin wall and the end of the Soviet empire—means that the pressures are likely to remain and put pressure in turn on all interior Ministries, including the Home Office.

I note what the hon. Gentleman said about debates and I look forward to the Public Accounts Committee's report as well as that of the Home Affairs Committee on the matter.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Are we getting the most out of official residences? Dorneywood, for example, is open to the public only one week out of 52, and my spies tell me that the Deputy Prime Minister rarely goes there. May we have a statement when we return on the allocation and proper use of ministerial residences?

Mr. Straw: There are many ways in which my hon. Friend can raise the matter, but he knows that those residences go with certain jobs. In addition, I understand that they do not cost the public purse anything, or anything significant.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): May we have a debate in Government time before the summer recess on Iraq and Afghanistan, where the position remains difficult? It is some time since we had a proper debate on that subject. Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Prime Minister to introduce the debate and the Foreign Secretary to wind it up on the Adjournment so that the Government can take the mood of the House?

Mr. Straw: As I have said on other occasions, when I was Foreign Secretary, I sought a debate on those issues, although it would have been opened not by the Prime Minister but by the Foreign Secretary. I am still trying to arrange such a debate. Meanwhile, there is a debate in the second week in June on proceedings before the European Council. Since the European Council will consider Iraq and Afghanistan, that is a good opportunity for the right hon. Gentleman to raise his concerns.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): May we have a debate about the corrosive impact of elements of the popular press on democracy? My right hon. Friend may know that there is an undercurrent of racism to the popular press's surveys, supported by Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen, that present Scots as dour, dreary and unfit to hold the most senior position in British politics. That is damaging to our democracy. If another nation or religion were treated in the same way, there would rightly be a public outcry. Even today, one of the most successful British football managers is being criticised for endangering England's World cup hopes. I am sure that Sir Alex Ferguson and I will be the first to offer England our support, with the volume turned down, of course.

Mr. Straw: As a true-born Englishman, may I say that I understand my hon. Friend's concern? I hope that the World cup will lead to real ecumenical feeling between the different nations of the United Kingdom. I have always supported Scotland whenever they were playing in a game other than against England, but, as Scotland have a bye on this occasion, I look forward to all Scottish Members on both sides of the House supporting England in the World cup.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): The right hon. Gentleman is emerging as a truly reforming Leader of the House and I know that he is keen to represent all shades of opinion in the House. Will he therefore have a look at the membership of the Liaison Committee and work to end the exclusion of the minority parties? Even a cursory glance at the arithmetic will show that we are entitled to a place, and it is not good enough simply to say that membership is confined to the Chairs of Committees, because co-option is an easy matter. Will he demonstrate that he truly speaks for the whole House by ending this unfair exclusion?

Mr. Straw: Flattered though I am by the hon. Gentleman's compliments, it is probably too early to say, after only three weeks in the job, whether I am going to be a truly reforming Leader of the House. I shall look into the composition of the Liaison Committee, but I cannot promise him the result that he wants.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): An audit of hepatitis C health care in England was published this week by the all-party group on hepatology, and it shows that diagnosis and treatment of the disease are a matter of chance. An estimated 400,000 people are carrying the disease, the vast majority of whom do not know that they are carriers. That represents a health time bomb. Will my right hon. Friend draw the report to the attention of the Secretary of State for Health? May we also have a statement in the House on the Government's delivery of the hepatitis C strategy and their action plan?

Mr. Straw: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the work that he has undertaken with the all-party group on hepatology. I will indeed tell my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health about this matter. As she is sitting on the Front Bench, that should be straightforward.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): The Home Office can release and then lose serious offenders from overseas, but the immigration and nationality directorate can find women asylum seekers who have committed no offence, some of whom have been detained for more than a year at the Yarl's Wood detention centre in my constituency without any immediate prospect of deportation. The mental anguish resulting from indefinite detention can only be imagined, and the system was never designed to be used in this way. Will the Leader of the House find time for an urgent debate in Government time on this matter, so that we can determine whether there is a better way of dealing with these almost forgotten women?

Mr. Straw: I know of the hon. Gentleman's concern about this matter, and it illustrates the complexity of dealing with asylum seekers. In general, people on both sides of the House say that asylum seekers should be sent back as quickly as possible and that their rights should be restricted. However, Members on both sides are assiduous in representing individual cases. The Home Office has to deal with individual cases, rather than with the generality. In my experience, it is very rare for anyone to be detained in a detention centre for as long as 12 months without a very good reason. They are fully entitled to apply for bail, and if there is no good reason for detaining them, bail will be granted.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): In the last year for which figures are available, there were 4,159 fires in the home caused by smoking materials. Those fires resulted in 1,416 non-fatal injuries and 123 fatalities. On 13 and 14 June in Brussels, the general product safety directive committee will consider regulations that could lead to a requirement for reduced incineration propensity cigarettes—those that go out unless they are actively being smoked—to be produced in this country. We shall be represented by officials from the Department of Trade and Industry at those meetings. Will the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry make a statement to the House on the attitude his officials will take, and whether he will support my forthcoming early-day motion, to be tabled on the day that we return from the Whitsun recess, or my 10-minute Bill, which I shall present on the third day after the recess?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend is right to be concerned about this important matter and I will certainly talk to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry about it. If it is possible for him to make a statement, there will be one.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): This morning, the Oxford Radcliffe hospital in my constituency announced 600 job losses, half of which will be compulsory redundancies. The Secretary of State for Health has said that this is the best year that the NHS has ever had and that such developments are a sign of efficient hospitals, but this is a debt-ridden hospital that is being forced to do that. Her remarks have been described as coming from another planet and a parallel universe by people working in the health service. Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Health Secretary to come to the House on planet Earth to explain why hospitals up and down the country—including the Oxford Radcliffe—are cutting all these jobs? The cuts will have a huge impact on patient care.

Mr. Straw: I heard my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health give an excellent explanation about the problems, which are not affecting anywhere near all the health trusts and authorities. They affect the few trusts that, despite record levels of overall spending, are still spending above those levels and placing pressures on their own health facilities and those of other heath trusts. I greatly regret the fact, as I am sure my right hon. Friend does, that these redundancies have been announced, but the hon. Gentleman will be aware that there are a large number of unfilled vacancies in the Oxford area. I wish that he would tell his constituents about the huge improvements that are still being made in his area, illustrated by the vast improvements in patient care, and by the fact that the number of nurses in that area has increased by 2,700, and the number of doctors by 1,200.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, a year or two ago, the European Scrutiny Committee resolved that its routine meetings should be held in public? That was a modest request, but it was nevertheless ignored by the then Leader of the House, who refused to change the Standing Orders to permit that arrangement, despite the Government's professed commitment to openness and to the public's right to know. Will the new Leader of the House—whom I very much welcome—bolster his reforming credentials by looking more favourably on this request, so that we can blow away the cobwebs of secrecy and allow the public to see what we try to do on their behalf?

Mr. Straw: I will certainly look into the right hon. Gentleman's request. When I was Foreign Secretary, I was in the vanguard—along with the then Minister for Europe—of seeking ways to improve the scrutiny of European business by the House. I promise the right hon. Gentleman, and you, Mr. Speaker, that I will look very carefully at the overall recommendations to improve scrutiny by the House.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): May I appeal to the Leader of the House to secure from the Secretary of State for Health, whom I am pleased to see in the Chamber, a statement on the dangerous decision by the South London and Maudsley NHS Trust to close the emergency centre at the Maudsley hospital? It is one of the few places in the country offering a walk-in service to people suffering a serious psychotic or suicidally depressive episode. It has been said that such people will now have to go to an ordinary accident and emergency unit, which will be potentially lethal for them and distressing for the other people in the unit. Can this be examined as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Straw: I am sure that the arrangements being made in respect of the Maudsley hospital are more than adequate to meet the needs of those patients. I must say to the hon. Gentleman, as I have said repeatedly to Opposition Members who raise these issues, that, had it not been for our spending plans—which were opposed by every single Conservative Member year after year—none of the improvements in the health service would have taken place.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): The Leader of the House will know that the best way to improve scrutiny is through transparency. May I therefore urge him to place on the Order Paper a motion that would enable us to end the scandal of the European Scrutiny Committee sitting in private? That arrangement excludes Members of the House, members of the public and journalists, and it is a scandal for a free Parliament and a free people.

Mr. Straw: I am in favour of open scrutiny, and I have already said to the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) that I want the House's scrutiny of European and other business strengthened. Some Select Committees need to meet in private some of the time, which does not necessarily undermine their scrutiny—it may improve it—but I understand the point that hon. Members are making and I will work on it.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): As it is adult learners week, I was going to ask the Leader of the House for a debate on those matters so that we can consider why we lost 150,000 adult learning places last year. Given the right hon. Gentleman's earlier comments, however, I am going to ask for a debate on crime. Gun crime is soaring and knife crime up 36 per cent. on last year, so we need a debate to test the bizarre idea that dysfunctional clients excuse dysfunctional Ministers.

Mr. Straw: On places for adult learners, investment in further education, including for adults, has been dramatic. On crime, I am happy at any stage to set our record on fighting crime against the record of the previous Conservative Administration. The simple fact is that in 18 years of Conservative Administration, crime doubled and by 1997 police numbers were going down.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): Say it again.

Mr. Straw: Under 18 years of Conservative Administration, crime doubled and police numbers were going down. Under the Labour Administration, crime has gone down, not up, by 35 per cent. and police numbers have risen by 14,000.

Pensions Reform

12.21 pm

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the future of our pensions system.

Our first priority has been to tackle pensioner poverty. Compared with 1997, we are spending more than £10 billion extra each year on pensioners, and almost half that spending goes to the poorest third. We have raised the minimum income from a totally inadequate £69 a week in 1997 to more than £114 today. As a result, for the first time in a generation, pensioners are now less likely to be poor than anyone else.

We have also tackled the loss of confidence in the private pensions market. We have legislated to clear up the pensions mis-selling scandal, created the pensions regulator and the Pension Protection Fund. We established the financial assistance scheme to help some of those who stood to lose most from schemes that collapsed before 14 May 2004. I know that many Members have been concerned that the scheme is limited to those within three years of retirement.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced in March that we were expediting a review of the financial assistance scheme and I am delighted to announce today that it will be extended to cover eligible people who were within 15 years of their scheme's normal retirement age on 14 May 2004. Under that extension, the Government will top up to 80 per cent. of the expected core pension for those within seven years of scheme pension age, to 65 per cent. for those within eight to 11 years of scheme pension age and to 50 per cent. for the remainder.

We have made real progress on pensioner poverty, but despite those improvements, significant challenges remain. We established the Pensions Commission in 2002 to consider what reforms might be necessary to meet those challenges, and I am grateful to the three commissioners—Lord Turner, Jeannie Drake and John Hills—for the work that they have done. In its report last November, the commission made it clear that there was no immediate "pensions crisis", but that there would be one if we did not act soon. They identified four major challenges.

First, the Commission found that between 9 million and 12 million people are not saving enough for their retirement. Secondly, it estimated that, by 2050, there would be 50 per cent. more pensioners than today and that the ratio of people in work to those in retirement would halve over the same period. Thirdly, as a result of historical legacy, the current state pension system is complex and delivers unfair outcomes, especially for women and carers. Of those recently reaching state pension age, 85 per cent. of men have a full entitlement to a basic state pension compared with only 30 per cent. of women. Finally, it found that, if we maintain current indexation, the basic state pension might be worth in today's earning terms only £35 by 2050 and that more than 70 per cent. of pensioner households could be eligible for pension credit—never the Government's intention. The Commission urged the Government not to duck the long-term challenge of reform.

[Mr. John Hutton]

I believe that the proposals in today's White Paper address the challenges that the Pensions Commission identified. We will therefore introduce a new system of personal accounts that will make it easier for more people to save. We will reform state pensions so that they are simpler and more generous. We will modernise the contributory principle and make the state pension fairer and more widely available. We will increase the state pension age, keeping the proportion of life spent receiving the state pension stable for each generation and helping to secure the long-term financial stability and sustainability of the state pension system. Let me take each of those in turn.

A new system of personal accounts will be introduced from 2012, providing more than 10 million people with the opportunity to save in a low-cost savings vehicle. Employees will be automatically enrolled into either their employer's scheme or in the new personal account, but they will have the right to opt out. The accounts will provide a simple way for people to take personal responsibility for building their retirement income. Employers will be required to contribute 3 per cent. of employee earnings in a band between £5,000 and £33,000. Employees will contribute 4 per cent. on the same band of earnings and a further 1 per cent. will be contributed in tax relief.

I recognise that these changes represent a major change in our pension system. Accordingly, we are taking steps to help smooth the introduction of reform. Employer contributions will be phased in over at least three years and the contribution rate will be fixed in primary legislation. In order to minimise the burden on the smallest businesses, we will consult on additional transitional support and on whether a longer phasing period is necessary. However, the Government are clear that reforms to private pensions must go hand in hand with reforms to the state pension system.

During the next Parliament, we will re-link the value of the basic state pension to average earnings. Our objective, subject to affordability and the fiscal position, is to do that in 2012, but in any event by the end of that Parliament at the latest. We will make a statement on the precise date at the beginning of the next Parliament. That will help to preserve the value of the basic state pension. We will also simplify the state second pension so that it gradually becomes a flat-rate weekly top-up to the basic state pension.

That means that a person retiring in around 2050 who has been in employment or caring throughout their working life could receive a contributory state pension worth £135 a week in today's earnings terms, which would be £20 a week above the guaranteed income level. Without those reforms, people retiring in 2050 would receive a total contributory state pension worth between £90 and £100 a week—well below the means-tested threshold.

We will continue to uprate the standard guarantee in the pension credit with average earnings from 2008, so the pension credit will continue to help the poorest pensioners, but we will also be able to limit the spread of means-testing. We will make an immediate start by modifying the calculation of the savings credit from 2008. That gives a clear indication from the outset of our determination to make clear people's incentives to save. As a result of that change and our restoration of the earnings link, we estimate that, by 2050, far from rising to 70 per cent., only about a third of pensioners will be eligible for pension credit.

Our reforms to the state pension must also achieve fairer outcomes for women and carers, but we do not believe that a residency test for future accruals, as proposed by the Pensions Commission, would be the right way to achieve that. It would offer no immediate help to a group of women aged 45 and above who have poor contribution records and, quite literally, no time now to put it right. That is why, from 2010, we will introduce radical changes to the current system, reducing the number of years needed to qualify for the basic state pension to 30 and improving the system of credits to better reflect the different ways in which people contribute to society. As a result, by 2010, 70 per cent. of women reaching the state pension age will receive a full basic state pension, compared with 30 per cent. today. By 2020, up to 270,000 more women will get a full basic state pension—approximately three times the number under a residency-based approach.

We propose to increase the state pension age in line with life expectancy. The state pension age for women is already due to rise from 60 to 65 between 2010 and 2020, to equalise with men's state pension age. There will be a subsequent rise for both men and women from 65 to 66 over a two-year period beginning in 2024, and further increases—also over two years—to 67, starting from 2034, and to 68 from 2044. However, no one over the age of 47 today will be affected by these changes.

Finally, today's White Paper proposes a number of simplifying measures that will streamline the regulatory environment. We will abolish contracting out for defined contribution schemes at the same time as we restore the earnings link. We will reduce the burdens on schemes by introducing legislation to allow them to convert guaranteed minimum pension rights into scheme benefits—reforms that will, I believe, be of significant benefit to employers and employees. We will introduce legislation to begin implementing these reforms in the next session.

In November, I set out five tests for the reform of our pensions system: they needed to promote personal responsibility and to be fair, especially to women and careers, and they needed to be simple to understand, affordable and sustainable for the long term. I believe that we have met those five tests.

Today's White Paper seeks to entrench a new pensions savings culture, whereby future generations can take increasing personal responsibility for building their retirement savings. While there will always be specific individual circumstances, such as debt or stock market performance, that affect people's savings, fundamentally these reforms mean that people should be better off in retirement by having saved. Moreover, this package of reforms continues to protect the poorest pensioners from poverty and, for the first time, delivers fair outcomes for women and carers with a modernised contributory principle, operating within a simpler overall architecture.

Over the period to 2020, our proposals broadly keep spending on pensioners as a proportion of national income constant at today's levels, thus helping pensioners to share in rising national prosperity. In the long term, the rise in the state pension age will help to secure the long-term financial stability and sustainability of the state pension system. Altogether, this represents a comprehensive integrated package of reform. I believe that it can lay the foundation for a new and lasting consensus on a long-term solution of the pensions challenge that we face as a country. I commend the White Paper to the House.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): I congratulate the Secretary of State on the safe delivery of his White Paper to the House. Frankly, there have been times over the past couple of months when we were not sure that it would see the light of day. We welcome the key elements of the package that he has just announced. The Conservative party fought the last election on a platform of a restoration of the earnings link to curb the growth of means-testing—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] We fought the last election on a platform of a restoration of the earnings link to curb the growth of means-testing—something that the Chancellor said at the time was unaffordable.

We also welcome the package of measures that will address the unfairness suffered by women in the present system, but let us just take a moment to set the statement in context:

"when Labour came to power we had one of the strongest pension provisions in Europe and now probably we have some of the weakest."

Of course, those are not my words but those of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field)—Labour's first Minister for Welfare Reform.

Since 1997 the savings ratio has halved, and 9 million people in this country are not saving enough for their retirement. Some 60,000 occupational pension schemes, with more than 1 million members between them, have wound up or begun the process of winding up on Labour's watch. At least 125,000 people have lost some or all of their accrued pensions rights. Not all of that is the Government's fault—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh?"]—but the Chancellor's £5 billion a year tax raid on pension funds, the two reductions in the minimum funding requirement, the ever more complex regulatory regime and the pernicious affect of widespread means-testing on the savings culture are matters for which this Government are responsible, and that is the context of the statement today.

I should like to join the Secretary of State's tribute to the work that the Pensions Commission has done. We do not agree with every detail of the commission's proposals, but the key recommendations of its report clearly point the way forward. Cross-party consensus is essential to a lasting pensions settlement. Long-term savers want long-term stability, which needs a guarantee that the pension regime will not change every time there is a general election. So it is bad news for Britain that the consensus building that the Government promised us on the back of the Turner report has been a victim of the internecine warfare between the neighbours in Downing street.

It is bad news, too, that a degree of uncertainty has now been inserted in the equation by the Chancellor's insistence on the caveat that the restoration of the earnings link in 2012 is subject to some subjective tests of affordability. The start date for the restoration of the earnings link is pushed back into the next but one spending review—the fiscal equivalent of the long grass—and is subject to a get-out clause that reduces the very certainty about state benefits that was the cornerstone of the reform package that the White Paper was supposed to deliver. The Prime Minister's legacy is left to a decision that will not even be taken until the next Parliament. No wonder the Government are now so keen to build that cross-party consensus to which they have devoted no time over the past few months.

We have set out our own five criteria by which we will judge the White Paper; they largely reflect the criteria that the Secretary of State has set out. Does it deliver pensioner dignity? Does it deliver fairness, not just between the generations and the sexes, but between different groups in society? Is it affordable? [Interruption.] Is it simple enough for people to understand? Perhaps most importantly of all, does it underpin self-reliance through the promotion of saving? [Interruption.] I am glad that the Chancellor is having such a good time this afternoon.

On the basis of what the Secretary of State said and an initial trawl through the White Paper, we have a number of detailed concerns, which I will address—but first I want to say something about affordability. We share the Government's determination that the proposed settlement must be affordable and sustainable. No party that seriously aspires to be in government when these changes take effect can take any risk with the public finances or the stability of the economy.

Conservative Members will certainly not make promises that we cannot deliver, but if there is to be an affordability test, there must be transparency about the cost and the financing of the package of measures in the White Paper. Without transparency, affordability will remain a matter for the Chancellor's subjective judgment. Given the challenge of longevity, change is essential, and I believe that the British people will be willing to shoulder the burden of change, provided that it is fairly distributed—but if change is not seen to be fair, it will not be durable.

This package will improve the situation of women with broken contribution records and those who have committed time to caring responsibilities—we very much welcome that—but is it fair that a woman who retires one day before the changes take effect should spend the rest of her life living on a partial basic state pension, while her neighbour who retires a month later with the same contribution record will have a full basic state pension? Is it fair that tucked away in the small print is a provision that will freeze the maximum state second pension at today's level, but will not freeze the contributions that people pay towards that pension? That issue has been neither properly understood nor properly debated.

The Secretary of State has said nothing at all about public sector pensions. Can the Government really look the British public in the eye and tell them they have to work until they are 68 to gain their basic state pension rights, when the Government have cravenly surrendered to pressure from public sector unions and agreed to their demands for retirement at the age of 60 on a full final salary indexed pension for the next 40 years?

Public sector workers deserve fair treatment, just as everybody else does, but median public sector pay is now higher than private sector pay and growing faster, and public sector workers are benefiting from the increase in life expectancy. They, too, must share in shouldering the burden of adjustment. In the interests of fairness, the Government must reopen the public sector pensions debate. We cannot be bound by a deal based on favours, not fairness.

The acid test of this package is the extent to which it promotes saving. The proposals that we have heard about today will halt the growth of means-testing, but only after another six years of expansion. It is far from clear to us that, with 30 to 45 per cent. of the pensioner population remaining within means-tested benefits, savings behaviour will change, as is required to deliver the Government's objectives.

There is also a huge concern that the introduction of the auto-enrolled state-sponsored scheme along the lines of the national pension savings scheme, together with the abolition of contracted-out rebates, will be the death knell of many more generous occupational pension schemes. I hope that the Secretary of State can confirm that the Government are committed to a review of the regulations around occupational schemes that will support them and make them less onerous for employers to develop.

We will support the NPSS proposal, including the proposed compulsory employer contributions, because we believe that that will help to ensure that saving pays, but we need to hear the Secretary of State say very clearly that that cannot be at the expense of Britain's economic competitiveness, and that as employers pay those contributions on behalf of their employees over time, that will be reflected in slightly lower pay increases, as remuneration is transferred from cash wages to pension contributions. That is essential to ensuring the affordability of those proposals.

Finally, I want to refer to the Secretary of State's announcement on the financial assistance scheme. We welcome the broadening of the eligibility criteria, although there is no indication of the cost of that or of how it will be funded.

Will the Secretary of State also tell the House what he will do to ensure that the financial assistance scheme works more effectively? In its first year, it has managed to pay out less than £127,000 to fewer than 50 beneficiaries while spending more than £5 million on administration. This is a question not just of broadening the criteria or of pouring extra money in, but of reforming the system to make it work more effectively.

The White Paper has been long awaited and will be widely welcomed. Whatever our separate party political motivations, it is now our duty as elected representatives—all of us here—to do what is right for the long-term interests of Britain. In this case, that involves building that cross-party consensus, however late in the day it is to start that process. We are willing to engage in that process, if the Government are now, at last, willing to do so with us.

Mr. Hutton: I think I can assume from that that the hon. Gentleman generally supports the reforms that we are making through the White Paper; I genuinely welcome that, by the way. His point about consensus is well made, and we certainly intend to establish and maintain the widest and deepest consensus that we can. However, an important part of that has to be a grown-up approach to affordability issues. He cannot just brush those away, as he did by suggesting at the beginning of his remarks that affordability is not an issue. It is absolutely fundamental.

May I correct the hon. Gentleman on one or two things that he said that are not right? I have only a few minutes, so I shall try to keep to the point. He said that means-testing would be extended over the next six years. That is not true. He will have the opportunity in due course to look more carefully at the White Paper, and he will see that the changes we are making to the savings credit fix will prevent that from happening.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the administration of the financial assistance scheme needs to be improved, and we will set out how we intend to do that. His remarks on public sector pensions reflect two problems that he has. We all remember the Conservative party saying before the election that it had no plans at all to change any aspect of public sector pensions. Now, with the election behind him, he is waving his plans to change the pension schemes of the nurses, the teachers, the doctors and the local government workers. People will draw their own conclusions about his consistency in doing that.

More fundamentally, the hon. Gentleman is confusing occupational pension age with the state pension age. It is simply not true that people in the public sector will have the benefit and advantage that he claims.

In general, I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for our proposals, but I would be remiss if I did not, finally, correct some of his description of the record. He described the pensions system as being pretty well perfect when his party left office and we took office. I do not think that that is what many pensioners would say. There was no help for the poorest pensioners, and there was pension mis-selling on a scandalous scale. There was no scheme protection at all for people whose pension schemes collapsed. Anyone who thinks that is a credible record does not understand the reality of pensions policy.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I congratulate the Secretary of State on trying to make a silk purse out of a pig's ear. I draw his attention to the extraordinary support for that part of his statement in which he announced that those on the Government side of the House want to give much greater justice to women working than they have hitherto received. However, can he help me with one problem that I have, given that he has rejected an investment-led and accepted a tax-financed approach?

Four years ago, the then Secretary of State sent us back to our constituencies to sell to our constituents the idea that the state second pension would not only eradicate poverty as we knew it, but would last their lifetime. Today this Secretary of State has, in effect, announced the winding up of the state second pension as we know it. Why will these tax-financed reforms last for even four years?

Mr. Hutton: I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend—[Laughter.] I thank him for welcoming those parts of the White Paper that he agrees with—but I have to make something clear to him, and to others, in relation to the state second pension. We had always signalled our intention that over the long term, we would move to a flat rating by 2050. Lord Turner, having considered those issues, has concluded that we should be looking to do that on a faster time track.

I simply say to my right hon. Friend that he needs to consider the two reforms together—the restoration of the earnings link for the basic state pension and the changes we are making to the state second pension. Overall, this is a beneficial sequence of changes that will benefit pensioners in their retirement. I set out the figures on that in my statement.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I start by adding our congratulations to Lord Turner and his fellow commissioners on what is clearly an influential report on pensions. I also congratulate the Secretary of State, as well as his team and his officials, on introducing the White Paper according to the timetable that was initially indicated, which some of us might have felt would be difficult, particularly in the light of the divisions in the Government on the issue.

I also congratulate the Secretary of State on appearing to have brought the Chancellor of the Exchequer on board for the pensions solution. Indeed, the Chancellor was even seen smiling on the Front Bench earlier. Whether that is because he feels that he is now in a position to take credit for the proposals, or whether he feels that he has succeeded in burying some of them, we shall find out over time.

The Secretary of State knows from our earlier discussions that there is a great deal in his White Paper that we welcome and agree with, and that we believe fundamentally that the direction he is taking on pensions reform is the right one. However, he also knows that we have a major concern that the pensions architecture that he is building rests on the sandy and insecure foundation of a basic pension system—a state pension system—that will still rely hugely on means-testing, have a very low basic state pension and therefore raise issues of complexity and disincentive to save.

We have indicated to the Secretary of State that we are in favour of the proposal to restore the earnings link, that we have broad support for the NPSS and that we also accept the increase in the state pension age in order to fund a lot of those improvements. However, I want to discuss some of our fundamental concerns about today's statement, starting with what appears to be a Gordon Brown get-out clause in relation to when the link to earnings will come in.

The Secretary of State has given the impression today that he is signing up to Lord Turner's proposals. In fact, he is bringing forward by five years the proposals to increase the state pension age, therefore saving money, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to be moving back by between two and five years the date when pensioners will see some benefit from the earnings link. Why is there the issue of an affordability test, when the cost of the proposals is clear? Why is it stated on page 110 of the White Paper that the earnings link and higher state pension age should be "inextricably linked", when it is now clear that although the Secretary of State proposes to increase the state pension age, he is vague about when the earnings link will be introduced? He says that there will be a decision on that at the beginning of the next Parliament, if his party is still in power. Can he indicate what "beginning" means? Does it mean within the first Budget or within the first year? Does he accept that in bringing forward the state pension age and delaying the earnings link, he is short-changing the pensioners who will be interested in this statement?

On the earnings link, will the Secretary of State also comment on the position of the 1 million pensioners who live abroad, some of whom do not even receive a price link at present in relation to the state pension? Will he confirm whether the earnings link will be extended to pensioners abroad, including those who do not benefit at present?

Does the Secretary of State accept that he was wrong to describe the basic pension that he will deliver as in any way generous? If the earnings link is delayed until 2015, as it could be, does he accept that the average pensioner today would be just £2 better off than with a price link? In other words, does he accept that the settlement does little for today's generation of pensioners? Does he also accept that although he has succeeded in capping the degree of means-testing in the system, he is still reliant on a system in which, even if his figures are accurate, one third of pensioners will be subject to means-testing? How will that affect the incentives for people whom he hopes will enter the national pension savings scheme?

Will he also indicate why he has not accepted—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. These are complicated matters, and the House should listen courteously to the Member addressing the House.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. These are important issues, and we are entitled to ask the Secretary of State for answers.

Why has the Secretary of State rejected Lord Turner's proposal to have a permanent standing commission on pensions and to consider those issues on an ongoing basis? Why does he suggest instead that there should simply be periodic reviews? Can he also return to the issue of public sector pensions and tell us whether the Government will at some stage set up a similar Turner-type review to consider the reform of public sector pensions?

As we consider proposals for legislation, we also want to find as much cross-party consensus as possible. We have accepted major parts of today's White Paper and the direction of travel. We are of the view, however, that the Government are only delivering half solution today, because of the inadequate nature of the basic pension system on which it will be built. We therefore fear that it will not be the final settled pensions solution that all of us have sought.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. I fundamentally reject his analysis that this is anything other than a comprehensive and integrated series of reforms, which will benefit pensioners. Let me respond to some of his points.

The hon. Gentleman was concerned about the spread of means-testing, and so are we. That is why I have announced these reforms, which will see means-testing fall considerably. He has mentioned the figure of a third, and it will be about a third. However, we expect only 6 per cent. of pensioners who are being means-tested in 2050 to be in receipt of the guarantee credit. The remainder will receive the savings credit, which, as he knows, is designed to reward savings. That is a good outcome, not a bad one. I ask him to reflect on that.

The hon. Gentleman asked about increases in the state pension age. I need to remind him that those increases will not take place before 2024, and we intend to introduce the earnings link by 2012. There is therefore no question whatever of the link being broken as he suggested. We are absolutely not short-changing today's pensioners. This is a comprehensive, full and positive endorsement of Lord Turner's report, and we have responded in a way that, as he said at the beginning of his remarks, he did not expect us to. Having heard him, however, I am delighted that we responded as we did. I do not want to set up another quango, which is why I have decided not to set up a pensions commission as Lord Turner recommended.

As for public sector pensions, let me remind the hon. Gentleman and the House that several negotiations are taking place now, scheme by scheme, to change the terms of those schemes. It is right to change those terms, and the negotiations will continue.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. I am surprised that he did not refer more positively to his proposals, which, as I understand it, would cost the taxpayer an extra £11 billion in 2010, rising to £16 billion in 2015 and £90 billion in 2050.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the comprehensive reform package that he has brought forward today. Can he confirm that he will not abolish the new deal to finance the earnings link, and that that link will not last for only four years? More seriously, getting a consensus in the House should be fairly easy, but we have had consensus in the past, and it lasted about three years—so it is much more important to get a consensus among the general public. What education and promotion programme does he envisage to get all the messages across to the general public?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding us that the Conservative party's policy at the general election was to pay for the restoration of the earnings link by scrapping the new deal, thereby making it harder for younger people to get jobs. That is not the right way to build a sustainable affordable package for long-term pensions reform. That is why we have eschewed that approach.

My hon. Friend is right to talk about the need for consensus building. Now that the proposals have been made, and we have broadly received a welcome from the Opposition parties, which we very much appreciate, Ministers have a responsibility, which we would be happy to undertake with the Opposition parties, to take the message around the country about the importance of the reforms and how good they will be for pensioners in the long term. I look forward to the support of the two Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen in doing so.

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on a thoughtful package of proposals. I want to ask some questions about it, but the all-party group that I chair will welcome pretty well everything that he has put forward.

In relation to the national pension savings scheme, to what extent does the Secretary of State envisage the participation of the private sector in its implementation? Alternatively, will it be entirely a state enterprise? In relation to tax relief, he said in his statement that there will be a 1 per cent. tax relief contribution. Who will get that tax relief? Do employers get any tax relief? How does the tax relief structure work within the system? That is an interesting point for all of us.

I also welcome the principle of the return to a link with earnings, which is perhaps long overdue. I am concerned, however, that it will take so long. The way in which society treats its elderly always involves an intergenerational transfer. My problem is that, for example, those who fought in the last war and created the conditions and freedoms that we enjoy today will be in their 90s before the earnings link is reintroduced, and many who grew up in the post-war austerity period will be in their 80s. Is it not possible to bring forward that reintroduction a little, as Lord Turner recommended?

It seems to me that there are a number of ways in which that could be done—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman has probably said enough for the time being.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support, and I appreciate the work that he does in the House for pensioners. He asked several specific questions about the restoration of the earnings link. We aim to restore it in 2012, and that is partly a decision about affordability, but is also linked to the creation of the national pension savings scheme and low-cost personal accounts at that time. It is important to introduce those reforms together, which is why we propose 2012. The national pension savings scheme and the personal accounts will be run by private-sector providers.

Let me make it absolutely clear that the Government are not nationalising the pension savings industry, and have no intention of doing so. I hope that reassures the hon. Gentleman.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. These are complicated matters, and the Front-Bench spokesmen understandably took quite a long time to ask their questions. A good many hon. Members are attempting to catch my eye. I ask for one brief question from each Member, and the briefest possible answers from the Secretary of State. If need be, I may interrupt Members if they go on for too long.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's package, especially his action in reducing the shadow of the means test, which has stalked pensions for too long. Will he also think again about the financial assistance scheme? Although he has gone some way towards meeting the concerns of the 85,000 steel engineering and other workers whose case is before the European Court of Justice, he has not gone all the way, and we do not want a ruling from the ECJ that would turn his hand. May I invite him to continue to consult on and consider that sensitive issue as he examines the White Paper further and implements its proposals? A great many people feel that their pensions were stolen from them.

Mr. Hutton: We will certainly do that. I think that what we have announced constitutes a significant extension of the financial assistance scheme. I was asked earlier about the cost: it will be an additional £2 billion.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): May I ask a direct question about the state second pension? There has already been a certain amount of publicity and comment in the broadsheets following leaks of the Secretary of State's announcement today. Is it true that anyone earning more than a reasonable salary who is contributing to the state second pension, whether directly to the scheme run by the Government or to a private scheme if they have contracted out, will receive no benefit whatever from that contribution?

Mr. Hutton: That is certainly not the case, as Lord Turner has made clear. We must take into account not just reforms of the state second pension, but the impact of the restoration of the earnings link to the basic state pension. People will be better off as a result of our combined reforms.

Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement. I hope he will not mind my spoiling the consensus by saying that it is not necessary to look at the small print of what he said to see that it has Labour origins and a Labour direction, which comes as a relief in these troubled times.

I hope there will be no attempt to cherry-pick Turner so that the personal savings scheme starts in 2012 and the earnings link does not. Will my right hon. Friend assure us that the two dates will be coupled, and that the start of the personal savings scheme and the restoration of the earnings link will constitute a single package?

Mr. Hutton: Yes.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): I welcome much of what the Secretary of State has said. He is aware that many people with quite small pensions are still paying income tax. Has he considered raising the threshold at which pensioners start to pay income tax?

Mr. Hutton: We have done that already, and those are matters for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth) (Lab/Co-op): I warmly welcome the statement, and everything that my right hon. Friend has said. May I ask specifically about the help that he will give to, for instance, the workers at Allied Steel and Wire—whose headquarters were in my constituency—who lost their pensions when the company collapsed?

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend and the Chancellor for listening to the representations made by my hon. Friends the Members for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) and for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt), by me and by others, and for giving such a major boost to the financial assistance scheme. Will he tell me how individuals will learn about their specific circumstances, so that they can be certain about their futures: must they apply, or will they be approached by the Department?

Mr. Hutton: I thank my right hon. Friend for his support, and pay tribute to the work done by him and others in highlighting the predicament in which many pensioners found themselves when their insolvent employers' pension schemes collapsed. I am truly grateful for the work he has done.

My right hon. Friend's constituents need do nothing. They will be informed of their entitlement under the new arrangements. As I said earlier, I think that we need to improve the operation of the financial assistance scheme, and we will present proposals on that shortly.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): The Secretary of State has made it clear that the earnings link will be restored in 2012, subject to affordability and the fiscal position. We understand that that has been agreed with the Treasury. As he will know, the Treasury green book contains a section on projects with uncertain outcomes, which advises Ministers and officials to attach probabilities to each of the likely scenarios. Assuming that he has followed the Treasury guidance, may I ask what probability he has attached to the earnings link not being restored in 2012?

Mr. Hutton: This is not a project with an uncertain outcome.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): I was interested to hear what the Secretary of State had to say about women and pensions, and I think that many women will be very happy about it. He mentioned a reduction in the time for which contributions must be made to 30 years. He also said that it might be easier for some women, and carers, to accrue national insurance credits. Will he give us a little more detail about those changes?

Mr. Hutton: We will change the way in which carers' contributions accrue for pension entitlement under both the basic state pension and the state second pension. We will make it easier for carers to earn a state second pension credit. The entitlement that currently applies to those looking after a child under six will be extended to those looking after a child under 12. As for carer's credit, on which we intend to consult, we want to extend basic state pension credits to those caring for more than one person if the time spent on that combined caring totals 20 hours at week. At present, the total must be more than 30 hours a week.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Given that employers can opt out of the personal accounts, what projections has the Department made about those who might opt out, and what if the projections are wrong?

Mr. Hutton: We think that many millions of people will save under the NPSS, which will provide a welcome boost to the savings culture. I hope that the hon. Gentleman welcomes that.

It is difficult to estimate the number of people who might opt out in the future. We think as many as a third of eligible employees might want to opt out of the low-cost personal accounts that we are introducing. We are making it clear today that that must be a personal choice. It would be wrong—and Turner rejected the idea—to compel every employee to participate in the new personal accounts, irrespective of personal circumstances. For that obvious reason, we decided not to do so.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): May I praise the Secretary of State for a courageous and forward-looking statement? How many of the Texon UK workers in my constituency will be able to benefit from the financial assistance scheme? I urge him to be proactive: a number of those workers may not be aware of the changes that he is introducing.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said. I do not know the precise figures relating to the financial assistance scheme, but I will find out. I can reassure him that it is our responsibility in the Department to ensure that scheme members who might be eligible for the additional support are notified. If he has any worries about how that is proceeding, he should come and see me.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Will the Secretary of State investigate an alarming practice involving occupational pensions? Overseas companies, such as Parsons Engineering and EMC Engineering in the United States, are effectively defrauding their British pensioners by contriving an arrangement whereby they temporarily liquidate a British subsidiary, expunge their pension liabilities, offload them on to the British taxpayer and resume normal business, including the winning of large Government contracts.

Mr. Hutton: I should be happy to look into that if the hon. Gentleman would like to come and see me.

Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): I know that means-testing pensioners has been unpopular with some, but the truth is that pension credit has lifted millions of older people out of poverty. What is the future of pension credit, and how will my right hon. Friend's announcement today ensure that there is no pensioner poverty trap tomorrow?

Mr. Hutton: We are making it clear that there will be a continuing role for targeted financial support for the poorest pensioners. One obvious reason is that many women, in particular, have not accrued a full entitlement to the basic state pension. They will be in the pensions system for many decades, and we have no intention of withdrawing any of their financial support. I think it right, in the short, the medium and the long term, for us to adopt sensible measures to restrict the spread of means-testing. By definition, ours must always be a targeted approach, and I hope and believe that the measures we have announced today will go a long way towards dealing with my hon. Friend's concerns.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I, too, welcome the changes to the financial assistance scheme. Workers in my constituency at the Richardson's IFI plant have been treated shabbily and are devastated; I hope that these changes will help to improve the situation. Is the decision to uprate the pension credit in line with earnings from 2008 subject to an affordability test?

Mr. Hutton: The decision to uprate the pension credit from 2008 in line with earnings is an affordable decision and we are committed to it.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): I draw the Secretary of State's attention to the Treasury Committee report on this issue, published this week, which was unanimous. May I remind him that the national pension savings scheme will be successful only if regulation is kept at a minimum? Simplicity is the key word and if we can achieve that, we will have a realistic chance of achieving the 30 basis-point annual management charge that Lord Turner envisaged. More money will thus go into the pension pots of workers, instead of the pockets of the financial institutions, enabling them to get the maximum amount at the end of their working life.

Mr. Hutton: I agree absolutely with my right hon. Friend and I congratulate him and his Committee on a very good report. The point to which he has drawn our attention is fundamental. If we can get anywhere near the 30, 40 or 50 basis points that Lord Turner has suggested might be possible under the personal account scheme, that will improve the value of people's savings by as much as 20 or 30 per cent., which will be a major boost to those on low and middle incomes in particular.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): Plaid Cymru and the Scottish National party welcome the improvements to the position of women and the restoration of the link with earnings, but we regret that that is at the cost of establishing a citizen's pension, which is our favoured route. Will continuing with the means test not guarantee that a proportion—albeit small—of pensioners will remain in poverty, particularly in Scotland and Wales?

Mr. Hutton: I do not think so. For reasons that I have tried to spell out and that I do not want to repeat, it is absolutely essential to maintain additional targeted financial support for the poorest pensioners; to do anything else would be quite wrong. The hon. Gentleman's preferred solution—the citizen's pension—would cost the taxpayer an immediate £10 billion in 2010. Unless and until he and his hon. Friends can come up with a way of financing that proposal, we should treat it with a very large dose of salt.

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for the courtesy that he and his predecessors have extended in the past four years regarding the financial assistance scheme, and for increasing it from £400 million to £2 billion—an astonishing sum. He has said today that he will look again at those who do not yet qualify who will be aged under 50. Can he tell us what percentages of people above and below the age of 50 will qualify for the FAS?

Mr. Hutton: That will depend largely on whether such people meet the FAS eligibility conditions, which we are not changing today, so I cannot give my hon. Friend an exact figure. However, he has played a very significant role in getting Ministers to look again at this issue, and I thank him for his encouragement and support.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): Given that one of the main drivers for reform is the decline in the dependency ratio over forthcoming decades, why did the Government opt for the tax-funded proposal outlined today, rather than an investment-funded one? Was such a proposal considered, and, if so, why was it thought less preferable than the one outlined today?

Mr. Hutton: We have broadly followed Lord Turner's analysis and recommendations. He looked at that proposal and rejected it, and so have we.

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the White Paper. I was particularly interested to hear about provisions dealing with the inequality experienced by women and carers, but I have a remaining concern: the need to persuade young people to save for their future and to provide them with information on saving. How can we prevent them from opting out of a national pension savings scheme?

Mr. Hutton: This is a very interesting area on which, if I am being honest with my hon. Friend, we need to do more work. The Government take seriously the question of improving knowledge of pension and financial issues generally. Now that we have the road map for the future on pension reform, we need to explore every potential avenue. I spent part of the morning at Merrill Lynch—an example of a very large City financial institution that is collaborating with local schools to improve financial capability and knowledge. We need more of that, and we would be happy to support it.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): Who will be responsible for the clarity of the explanatory leaflets for personal accounts, given that no advice is to be provided, because of the low cost to which the right hon. Member for West Dunbartonshire (Mr. McFall) referred? Indeed, I greatly share his concern about that issue. What will the Secretary of State's strategy be to ensure that employers, who currently contribute rather more than 4 per cent. to their employees' pensions, will not use this as an opportunity to reduce their costs and, therefore, provision?

Mr. Hutton: I agree with the hon. Gentleman on that latter point, and we will have to look very carefully at this issue as we introduce the reforms. When he has a chance to look at the White Paper—I realise that copies have only just been placed in the Vote Office—he will see that we want to continue to talk to people about these matters in more detail, given that we now have a longer time in front of us to prepare the legislation. Indeed, I suspect that the proposal will come before the House later than the second Session. If the hon. Gentleman is willing to work with us on this issue, I would welcome that. The question of leaflets will have to be considered in greater detail over the next few years, but my current thinking is that such a responsibility will rest with the national pension savings scheme, which will oversee such arrangements. But it is obviously very important, in the light of everything that has happened recently, that we learn the lessons of the last few years and do not repeat the mistakes.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): I warmly welcome the restoration by a Labour Government of the earnings link, which was so cruelly taken away by the Conservatives. Will transitional arrangements be put in place for women such as my mother, who are not eligible for the full state pension and would like to have the benefits of the proposed improved scheme?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that question. I obviously do not know the details of his mother's circumstances, but I very much hope that she will benefit from the restoration of the earnings link and from the other reforms that we are making. Reforms to the contributory principle will take effect from 2010, and I am afraid that if my hon. Friend's mother has reached retirement age by then—I suspect that she might have—she will not benefit, sadly, from that proposal.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Will the Treasury consider ways of assisting small and medium-sized enterprises, in particular, in meeting their 3 per cent.

contribution to the new pensions; and how can we ensure that that contribution will not be increased in future, as another stealth tax?

Mr. Hutton: I agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point. We have made it clear today that, as the White Paper spells out, the 3 per cent. employer contribution will be fixed in the legislation that we will introduce in the next Session. It will be up to subsequent Governments to change that, if they want to, but to do so they would have to come to this House to seek primary legislation. The White Paper makes it clear that we intend to consult soon on a series of transitional support measures that might be necessary to help employers with the introduction of the employer contribution. We hope to get that document out soon.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I very much welcome my right hon. Friend's statement today, representing as it does the breaking of a logjam in pensions policy. But will he not go a little further in doing something to help today's pensioners now? May I suggest that he give serious consideration to raising the basic state pension fairly rapidly toward the point that it would have reached had the Tories not broken the earnings link? If it is a question of affordability, I should point out that, if we can afford to subsidise the savings of the rich to the tune of tens of billions of pounds every year, surely this is affordable.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support, which is important to me. It is worth pointing out one fact. We are spending £11 billion more this year on pensioners compared with 1997, which is £8 billion more than an earnings link would have delivered. The Government have delivered on a very positive agenda for pensioners. This statement, however, is about long-term pension reform. Such reforms will start in 2010 and accelerate in the following decade. The decisions that we take today on improving pensioners' standards of living are matters for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): What comfort can APW workers take from this statement, who were excluded from the terms of the financial assistance scheme because of the responsible decisions that properly had to be taken by their trustees?

Mr. Hutton: I am very familiar with that scheme; indeed, some of my right hon. and hon. Friends have also raised this issue with me. Today, we are confirming an extension of the financial assistance scheme for eligible employees, but of course, in order for them to qualify for it, the employer needs to have been insolvent. We have not found a way to resolve the issues that the hon. Gentleman raises, but we stand ready to continue to consider them in the weeks and months ahead.

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend tell me what ages children will need to be to qualify their parent or carer for the weekly credit for child care?

Mr. Hutton: I think that the answer is 12.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): It is easy for politicians to make promises today that have to be paid for by electors tomorrow. Does the Secretary of State think that it is important that the younger generation be reminded about how much these proposals will cost? Assuming that they are introduced in 2012, what will be the cumulative cost of the restoration of the earnings link in its first 5 years of operation?

Mr. Hutton: That figure is buried in the White Paper somewhere. I know that there is a table with that information because I was doing my homework on it last night, but of course I cannot find it now—that is the way of the world. I agree with the hon. Gentleman on one point: we have always made it clear that we will make proposals only if they are affordable. I am convinced that these reforms are and will be affordable, and will not involve taxes having to go up to meet the commitments. That is important.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): I question the fairness of raising the retirement age. The average life expectancy for a man in my constituency is 69. If we raise the retirement age to 68, the average male in my constituency will have the equivalent of a gap year between retirement and death, whereas in other parts of the country the gap is a decade or more. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that steps will be taken, in parallel with raising the retirement age, to ensure that efforts are made to raise life expectancy in constituencies such as mine?

Mr. Hutton: We are aware of the issue to which my hon. Friend draws attention. The state pension age will reach 68 in 40 years' time and I am confident that his constituency and others will have a matching rise in longevity to meet that. The Turner commission suggested that we consider the issue of when pension credit becomes available, and the White Paper makes it clear that we are doing so, because that proposal might go some way towards addressing the concerns of my hon. Friend and others.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): The Secretary of State reiterated today what he said on 16 March, which is that he still proposes to consider the case of APW Electronics and others, on which there is a three-party consensus—led by the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham)—that something must be done. Can the Secretary of State tell us how many firms are in the position of having been forced to give up 80 per cent. of their pensions under duress before the scheme came into effect? Will he use his best endeavours to save the futures of only a small number of people?

Mr. Hutton: I do not know the exact figure, but only a few employers fall into that category. My right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen has been at the forefront of the campaign for people in that position. If it would be helpful, I would be happy to meet the hon. Gentleman and others to discuss the problem and try to find a sensible way forward. Unfortunately, I am not announcing today a way forward on that problem, but I am happy to receive a delegation to go through the arguments and seek a sensible solution.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the proposal to finance the restoration of the earnings link in the long term merely through so-called efficiency savings, as proposed by the Opposition at the last election, was never credible?

Mr. Hutton: Unfortunately, on a day of consensus, I have to agree with my hon. Friend. At least there is a consensus on this side of the House, which is always pleasant. We have a responsibility—as the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) said—to set out how we will fund such reforms over the long term. That was completely absent during the last election and we have now proposed a sensible package of proposals that will allow us to sustain our reforms for the long term.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The Secretary of State will be aware that hundreds of former Albert Fisher employees in my constituency have had their lives turned upside down. They will welcome the announcement of the widening of the criteria, but after so much heartache can they really trust the Government to come up with the extra funds of £2 billion without strings attached? If there are problems, will he agree to receive a delegation of former Albert Fisher employees?

Mr. Hutton: I am always happy to talk to the hon. Gentleman about any problem in his constituency and to meet him and his constituents to cover that ground. We are making a commitment to improve the financial assistance scheme and the money will be there to support the extension. I sense today that people have warmly welcomed our proposals. We are trying to put right an injustice and today's announcement will go a long way to resolving the issue.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for his promise to meet members of the APW scheme, because they—and we—will not go away. Having said that, as a former pensions Minister I think that today should be seen as an historic occasion. My right hon. Friend has produced the best opportunity for a lasting cross-party consensus on pensions policy that we have seen in the past 30 years. It is a truly remarkable achievement and he should be congratulated, and Lord Turner should be congratulated on laying the groundwork. I hope that today will be seen as the most significant day in pension policy for many years.

Mr. Hutton: I thank my right hon. Friend for those remarks. It is probably best for others to make such claims—but I agree with him! I am happy to have further discussions with him on the APW issue, and we will go every inch of the way to try to find a sensible solution.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): If I have understood the Secretary of State correctly, in 2044 the retirement age will increase to 68. Does he envisage that that age will have to increase? Will someone starting work today be guaranteed to retire at 68, or will the age have to be increased in the future?

Mr. Hutton: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, there is a limit to the range of my knowledge and wisdom on these matters and 40 years is probably as far ahead as I can safely predict.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): Given that many more people now have a fragmented employment history, moving from one employer to another frequently or doing two or three jobs at once, will the new system serve them well?

Mr. Hutton: That is a very important point. Many of the workers who are not currently saving for their own retirement are in that position. As we design the personal account scheme, one of its principal objectives will be to have sufficient flexibility and portability, so that it can be easily moved from one employer to another. I hope that that will be one of the hallmarks of the new scheme and I am happy to continue discussing that with my hon. Friend if she would find that useful.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my right hon. Friend on an excellent package. Perhaps the best aspect of it is that it will erode the injustice towards women that has been endemic in the pensions structure. He has given guarantees about the state system, but women are still disadvantaged in occupational pensions. Will he think seriously about having a gender impact assessment of the White Paper to identify those systemic problems and to get across to women that planning for their pensions is very much in their interest?

Mr. Hutton: My hon. Friend is right, and we have already informed the Equal Opportunities Commission that we will make a gender impact assessment of our proposals.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the White Paper and the manner in which he secured it. On behalf of my constituents who are members of the Richards pension fund—now part of the financial assistance scheme—I thank him for the extension of the scheme, which will be important to many of them. He will be aware that the scheme has serious problems of cost, complexity and delay, so what proposals does he have to improve the administration of the scheme?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind words, which are much appreciated. I said earlier that we are not satisfied with the current standard and level of performance. We are considering several options for improving that, but I do not really want to announce the details today. It is only fair and right to point out that some of the difficulties that we have encountered arise from the complexity of the situation, and we are heavily dependent on receiving information from scheme trustees on time. If that does not happen, it is difficult to act as quickly as we would like. We are looking at the administration of the scheme and I want to speed it up, because it is important for those who can benefit from it to get the financial support as quickly as possible. That might go some way to addressing the uncertainty and fear that they have about the future.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I warmly welcome the totality of the package that my right hon. Friend has announced, but will he give some consideration to the continued existence of the higher-rate tax relief? By and large, it tends to go to people who already save for their pensions anyway. Instead, could he not transfer some of that money to provide even more assistance and encouragement for people to adopt the new personal accounts? The people who will opt out are probably those at the bottom end of the earnings scale, and we could give them greater assistance if the higher-rate tax relief were abolished.

Mr. Hutton: We will certainly look at what my hon. Friend suggests, and I welcome his support for the White Paper. However, these are matters for which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has responsibility, and it is probably safer and better for me to stick to my own responsibilities.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): My question is along similar lines to the one asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts). The higher-rate relief costs the Treasury £18 billion a year in forgone tax revenues. Overwhelmingly, it is claimed by the richest in our society yet evidence from the Department for Work and Pensions suggests that tax relief on pension savings has almost no effect in encouraging people to save for their pensions. Therefore, will my right hon. Friend explain in more detail the matter raised by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill): how will the 1 per cent. tax relief in the national pensions savings scheme work, and what will it do?

Mr. Hutton: The 1 per cent. tax relief in the NPSS will be paid in the normal way that tax relief is paid into existing occupational schemes. My hon. Friend raises a wider point that several other hon. Members have also referred to and, although I do not want to repeat a standard answer, all matters to do with tax relief are for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I know that he will be considering those matters.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the announcements made by my right hon. Friend, especially those having to do with the financial assistance scheme. However, what will be the position of self-employed people in respect of the NPSS? How will it work for them, and how many self-employed people are expected to enrol in the scheme?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Again, it is very difficult to offer a precise estimate, but several hundred thousand self-employed people might choose to enrol in the NPSS. Obviously, they cannot be enrolled automatically as, by definition, there would be no employer contribution on their behalf. The estimate that I have given is not an exact science, but we are clear that self-employed people should have the right to invest pension savings in the low-cost personal accounts if they want to.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): May I add my congratulations to my right hon. Friend? There are many positive elements in the package that he has presented, and I especially welcome the substantial extension to the financial assistance scheme, which will be of great importance to my constituents and others who have worked at Kalamazoo. I understand that he cannot say precisely how many people will be effected by the extension, but they will want to be assured that the matter will be kept under review in the future. Finally, may I add my voice to those who have stressed the importance of speeding up the administration of the scheme? Some people have immediate needs, and it is important that they be addressed now.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We will continue to look at every aspect of the matters that he has raised to ensure that the scheme works as we want it to. We think that roughly another 20,000 people will be eligible for additional support under the financial assistance scheme measures that I have announced today.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): And finally, I am sure that the whole House is grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing the statement to run on, so that so many hon. Members could get in. However, my right hon. Friend will know that there are probably more existing and future members of the failed Turner and Newall pension scheme in my constituency than anywhere else. We are hopeful that, if necessary, the pension protection fund will come to that scheme's rescue, but the matter raises questions about employer contribution holidays, and about the relation between British law and the law of the other countries when multinational companies are involved. Does he envisage any changes to the operation of the PPF, or to the criteria by which it operates?

Mr. Hutton: No, the White Paper contains no announcements of changes to the PPF, which has only just begun operation. However, we will keep all matters to do with the reforms under very careful review.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the House for its response to my earlier plea about the way in which questions should be asked. Also, I am grateful to the Secretary of State for the way in which he responded to them.

Point of Order

1.34 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Earlier today, I asked the Minister for Schools how many children of secondary school age in Wellingborough had not been allocated a school place. I learned this afternoon that the number was a minimum of 11. I think that the Minister may have misled the House, very inadvertently, by suggesting that the number was zero.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): That is a matter that should be taken up in other ways. It is not for the Chair to deal with now.

Whitsun Adjournment

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Jonathan Shaw.]

1.35 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to take part in this debate, especially given that the earlier statement on pensions makes this an important day for all of us.

I want to speak about four matters that are important to my constituency, but I shall begin with an international problem that has not yet received a sufficient airing in this place. I hope that my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House, who is on the Front Bench this afternoon, will refer it to his ministerial colleagues in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and in the Foreign Office.

Last Monday, the European Parliament decided to allow the fishing deal between the EU and Morocco, which involves the waters off the western Sahara, to go ahead. As an issue, it does not arouse the same level of interest or raise the same hackles as the many and varied conflicts in the middle east, parts of Africa, south-east Asia or South America. However, the UN promised people in the western Sahara that there would be a referendum on their territorial independence. They have waited a long time, and it still has not happened. That is a disgrace.

To rub salt into the wound, the fish in the sea around the western Sahara—one of the area's most important resources—are about to be gobbled up by trawlermen from Spain and other EU countries. Thankfully, it is unlikely that British trawlermen will be involved, as we have so few left. The people of the western Sahara feel that they have been sold out.

I and other hon. Members have asked questions about the matter, and I have been dismayed to discover that the Government seem to take the view that, as long as the deal did not break international law or make a huge impact on the numbers of fish in the sea in that part of the world, there were no grounds on which to object to what the EU was planning.

Another problem has to do with the advice given to British Members of the European Parliament. I do not want to be party political, but Labour MEPs either did not vote or chose not to vote against the scheme, even though the vote represented an opportunity to express the clear position that the Government have adopted in respect of the western Sahara. Unless I am mistaken, that opportunity was not taken. The people in the western Sahara have been sold out by the international community for a generation or more and, as well as speaking words of support for them, we should put those words into action.

I turn now to the four local issues that I want to raise. I shall be brief, as I know that there are lots of other hon. Members who want to speak in the debate. First of all, there is currently a lot of talk about how we can make greater use of renewable energy sources. I am a great advocate of renewables, but the idea of building a barrage across the river Severn has recently been put back on the agenda by the First Minister of the Welsh Assembly. He is a member of my party and a friend of mine, and has said that it is time for the scheme to be reappraised. I do not mind a review of the decision made some years ago.

The original feasibility study started in the 1970s and carried on until the 1990s. I tried to struggle through all the different papers and the volumes of evidence, and I have two quick comments to make. First, there were strong environmental downsides to building a Severn barrage. The colossal proposal might cater for about 25 per cent. of our energy needs, but not least of the downsides was the irretrievable damage to the flora and fauna of the river Severn. Secondly, I am a strong supporter of the so-called nuclear option, as hon. Members may know, but in some quarters it is ruled out as being the wrong approach because of its sheer scale and the fact that it is designed to pump electricity into the national grid when what we want is microgeneration. I agree that we need microgeneration. The Severn barrage is a colossal scheme, paid for not necessarily by the public sector, but largely by the private sector. The come-back of that will be massive development, largely of housing, which will have a big impact on Stroud.

Local government reform is back on the agenda. We may all be tempted to yawn at the prospect of ritual sacrifice and to believe that whatever we say and do, nothing much will happen. I hope that on this occasion something will happen, because it is about time that Gloucestershire moved to some sort of unitary arrangement, especially given that those areas with unitary arrangements seem to have better, simpler local government. I ask my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House to pass my views on to the new Department for Communities and Local Government. If we are to be serious about local government reform, please can we make sure that the proposals are properly aired and that we consider the benefits, not just the faults, of the proposals? A return to the status quo is unacceptable.

I see advantages for Gloucestershire becoming a two-authority county, although there are arguments for one authority. The current arrangement of six districts and one county lead to great confusion. We must ensure that that confusion is put to bed once and for all and that we give people the service that they deserve. Health cuts mean that that requirement is greater than ever, because we desperately need to clarify the relationship between social services and health provision.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): The hon. Gentleman talks a lot of sense, as he always does. Does he share my despair at the removal of democracy from local people? Does he want democracy taken to the lowest level and to stop regionalisation?

Mr. Drew: Of course I do. Double devolution is a trendy term. As a town councillor for the past 18 years, I strongly believe that the first layer of government has a part to play, but we do not need three layers of government. We need two layers of largely local government. We need to empower urban areas so that they have that first layer of community, neighbourhood government. We need to see that through as quickly as possible with a democratic mandate. The Government talk about leadership, fitting with the local authority and value for money. I am happy to have that debate, but I am not happy to end up with the same fudge.

We need to sort out our rail service, especially the status of the line between Kemble and Swindon—that is the London line for me. In my constituency I am in the fortunate position of having a north-south line and an east-west line. Many years ago someone had the bright idea to single-track the line between Kemble and Swindon, and that was to extend all the way to Cheltenham. Whoever came up with that was hardly looking to the future because it is now the cause of significant delays. When trains run late other trains have to wait for the nine to 10 miles of single track to become clear. We are not talking about the usual cattle train moving people backwards and forwards; we are talking about 125s and a mainline service.

When I was first elected, the CBI said that its most important objective was to have a first-class rail service—in terms of service, not tickets—from London to Cheltenham. We have not seen any investment to achieve that, but that line has to be re-signalled in the next decade or two, so we may see it yet. I should like to see that front-ended and brought forward as a matter of urgency. I think that I am able to call upon the support of the Great Western, which has now won the Greater Western franchise. It seems interested in how we could redouble the line and get trains moving much more easily, frequently and without lateness being built in because of the lateness of other trains.

Finally, I congratulate the Government on doing what I think is right. I was very pleased with the Affordable Rural Housing Commission last week when it made important statements on how we need to get more affordable housing into our ruralities. It offered ideas of how we might do that, such as changing the planning system, investing more money and showing more inclination to make sure that when houses are built we build more affordable and social housing. Pleasingly, there was a particular mention of an idea that some of us in Stroud have been pioneering on community land trusts or what is technically called locally, Gloucestershire Land For People. We hope to do a deal with English Partnerships on the Cashes Green hospital site, which will yield many benefits. I am sure that many hon. Members now know something about community land trusts. The one great advantage is that the asset value is locked away so that people, while sharing in the appreciation of their property value, cannot sell the land. The land remains in communal ownership. The idea sounds rather socialist in principle, but is widely used in the United States, where there are good examples of community land trusts, and many other parts of the world. We are looking for an early decision that that would be the preferred bid for that site—I am about to become a director, so I should declare an interest. The people behind the bid have been given encouragement and resources. That would be a model for the rest of the country, so this is not just about Stroud getting a bit of a lift. We would be doing something that could be adopted more widely to provide the sort of answers that we need in order to provide affordable housing.

My hon. Friend has plenty to think about from me. I am sure that other hon. Members have views to share. I wish everyone a happy Whitsun.

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): I, too, have one or two issues to raise in this Adjournment debate. Although they are based on constituency examples, each one is part of a national trend. I am sure that hon. Members present will nod in recognition of the issue that they too have in their constituency. They may disagree on how to deal with the problem, but almost everyone present will share it.

The first one is in connection with the national health service. Tomorrow I have my usual Friday afternoon constituency surgery. One of the people who has booked in to see me is a ward sister from Chesterfield's Royal hospital. She is one of 133 people in her position at the hospital who were summoned in on Tuesday last week to be told by hospital management that their jobs were being restructured and that they could all reapply for them, but that over the next few months one third of them would lose their jobs. In short, 43 ward sisters are going to be made redundant. The hospital is well run, and hopes to manage the process without too much stress and pain by absorbing the cuts in its normal nursing staff turnover of 8 per cent. a year, through natural wastage and turnover rather than compulsory redundancies, although in the end that method may have to be used. None the less, 43 ward sisters will lose their jobs in Chesterfield over the next year.

The hospital is undertaking a similar exercise by making an analysis of other staff sectors to try to shed jobs to save money. The House can imagine the trauma facing 133 ward sisters who have been told that a third of them will lose their jobs and that more job cuts will follow in other parts of the hospital.

Why is the hospital in that position? It seems to have done everything that the Government wanted since 1997. The hospital became a trust. I do not support trusts; I opposed the hospital's move to trust status at the time, for the same reasons as I opposed the concept of school trusts in the Education and Inspections Bill. Introducing free-market, cut-throat competition is not the way to improve or deliver health services or to educate our children. However, my local hospital became a trust, as the Government wanted, and it has been incredibly successful.

In each of the past three years, the hospital was awarded three stars by the Government—the top rating. Last year, it was also commended as the top hospital in the east midlands—the best in five counties. Since 1997, it has done everything that the Government wanted, so the job losses that are being imposed are not the fault of the hospital management nor of the excellent NHS staff who are hitting every target, even after the introduction of competition. The chief executive told me recently about the worry of losing patients to NHS providers elsewhere and to private sector treatment centres such as the one at Barlborough, just outside my constituency.

The hospital has made further improvements in departments that were already doing extremely well, such as ophthalmology. It can now treat more patients, to the benefit of the Chesterfield Royal but at the expense of other hospitals in the area which will lose patients and income, and thus face even greater problems, which is why I opposed trusts in the first place.

The hospital has done everything it was asked, and done it extremely well, yet now people will have to be sacked, and services for the people of Chesterfield will be reduced. Why? The hospital was expecting a cut of 1.7 per cent. in the tariff for providing medical services; in effect, that was the Gershon efficiency review saving that public bodies in general, including my local council, were expected to make on a yearly basis. However, at the last minute the calculations were abandoned and the Government told the hospital that the tariff reduction, or the cut in funding, would be 2.5 per cent. Even worse than that last-minute increase in the deficit, the hospital was told that there would be a special technical adjustment to the tariff of another 2.5 per cent. In the space of only three or four weeks, a good, well-funded, well-organised and efficient hospital went from planning for a managed efficiency saving of 1.7 per cent. to trying to cope with a 5 per cent. cut in its funding.

That situation has been mirrored across the country, on a much bigger scale in some areas. Figures released today show that 12,000 job losses have been announced in the NHS since 1 March alone, which makes the 43 announced so far in Chesterfield look quite small, although it is no comfort to those who are losing their jobs in Chesterfield that health trusts elsewhere, including areas close to Derbyshire, are suffering much greater losses imposed at only a few weeks' notice.

The situation is the result of the Government's rushed introduction of market-based competition and their insistence on hospitals hitting centrally imposed targets on waiting lists, whatever the financial cost. Trusts are reaping the whirlwind because they have overspent in various sectors to enable the Government to hit their targets. Reform has been forced through at breakneck pace to hit the appropriate media headlines and to help create the Prime Minister's legacy.

The same is happening in other parts of the NHS, such as dentistry. A stream of people have visited my constituency surgeries or written to me over recent months to tell me that it is impossible to find a dental practice in Chesterfield that will take on new NHS patients. After the introduction of the new contract, several dentists have completely opted out and no longer treat NHS patients. About half the people of Chesterfield were not enrolled with an NHS dentist and the figures have got worse over the past two months. It appears that they will get even worse over the next year. Again, that situation is common throughout the country.

It is time for a long-term, sensible planning regime in the health service, rather than emergency cuts. We should put a brake on this disastrous process and pause a while to consider what is being done to the NHS. Meanwhile, NHS staff in Chesterfield and elsewhere need reassurance about the job losses they face at present, and those in the pipeline for later in the year, which threaten them even though they are absolutely blameless and have done everything asked of them by the Government.

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments about the NHS tariff. Does he think that there should be a common tariff across the country or should the costs of operations vary from one hospital to another? It seems sensible to have the same costs throughout the country. Does he agree?

Paul Holmes: There are different costs in different parts of the country, although there is weighting in the system to take account of wage rates; for example, in London and Derbyshire. There must be some variations. The point I was making is that NHS reforms must be carefully planned to ensure stability. In Germany, where the health service took a similar road, the process took 18 years, yet we are trying to do it in no more than 18 months. To make the NHS—the largest single employer in Europe—a more efficient organisation, we need to look at local accountability and decision making rather than jumping at the behest of centrally imposed targets from Whitehall. That is not the way to run the health service, the police service, the Home Office or many other Departments of State.

Council housing is a major issue in my constituency, as it is in many parts of the country, although it takes different guises, because, as a result of Government policy, many councils no longer control it. Every week, people contact my surgery or my Chesterfield office about the problems of finding social housing. Two age extremes typify the problem. There are young families with children who want a house. They may be living with parents or friends and as children come along the situation becomes impossible. They may be living in one-bedroom council flats on the first or second floor, which is wholly unsuitable for children, so they want a family house. They cannot afford to buy or rent in the private sector so they want a council house.

At the other age extreme are pensioners or people approaching pensionable age. They may be living in council flats. I know one couple who were the first occupants of a brand new flat on a new council estate in the early 1960s. They still live there, but their flat is on the top floor, so what was suitable for them when they were young—they had no children—is no longer suitable now that they are in their 70s. They suffer from arthritis and they have noisy young neighbours with a different lifestyle. They want to move to an old people's bungalow.

The problem for the council is that it no longer has bungalows or family houses to offer. Were it not for the right-to-buy policy, Chesterfield would have 19,000 council properties; there are actually fewer than 10,000 and the number is falling each year. I have never objected to the right-to-buy policy. I was elected to Chesterfield council in 1987 and was a member of the housing committee. Labour councillors were furious about Margaret Thatcher's right-to-buy policy, which had just been introduced. As I said to them, I could not understand why they were so angry. If they had thought of the policy of using public money to build social housing and allowing people who had lived in those houses for five, 10 or 15 years to cash that in as a discount and buy a house—something that those people would never have been able to afford to do under normal conditions—I would have seen that as a good piece of socialist engineering to give people access to the property market and property ownership. I have been told since—I discovered this only this year—that the Labour party was considering that in the late 1970s, but ruled it out of the manifesto as being unacceptable. How things have changed.

The problem with the right-to-buy policy from the 1980s and now is that the money is not invested back into providing more social housing. In Chesterfield, for example, 75 per cent. of the money from each right-to-buy purchase is taken away by the Government to spend elsewhere—or disappears into the Chancellor's coffers—rather than being invested in providing more social housing. Since 1997, there have been 600,000 right to buys across the country and the waiting list for council housing has gone up by—hon. Members have guessed it—a nice symmetrical 600,000 to the nearest round thousand. Those seem the social housing provision polices of the madhouse. Right to buy can provide social mobility and access to the property market, but the money must be reinvested if we are to avoid major problems.

The Government's answer is to force tenants across the country to leave the tender mercies of the council and have a registered social landlord, a housing association or a private finance initiative landlord—in other words, to privatise in one form or another. That costs more in the long run—just like PFI builds for schools and hospitals—because taxpayers foot the vast bulk of the bill and because people in the private or semi-private sectors borrow more expensively. However, it gets the money off the public sector borrowing requirement. It is a nice piece of voodoo economics or voodoo accountancy to massage the public spending figures. It is a piece of nonsense that is sold to us as choice.

When I have raised the matter in debates, in Prime Minister's Question Time and in private meetings with Ministers, I have been told over and over again that I should celebrate choice. I do celebrate choice. One area where I part company from some of my fellow members of the Defend Council Housing group in Parliament, of which I am the vice-chair, is that some of them would say that there should be no privatisation or opting out of council properties. As a teenager, I grew up on one of the biggest council estates in Europe, in Sheffield, and I can see that some council tenants in some parts of the country might well feel that their council has made such an appalling job of running their estate that they would rather have a different landlord. However, the vast majority do not feel like that and the vast majority of councils that have moved over to this system have done so because the Government put a gun to their head or because they faced Hobson's choice. Essentially, the decision is sold as, "You privatise, or you do not get your house repaired." That is the choice that is being presented. I cannot understand the logic of a Labour Government who go down that route.

Of course, once one has gone down that route there is no going back. If the people of Chesterfield do not like the way in which the council is running the 10,000, 12,000, 15,000 or 19,000 council houses at any one time, they can change the management. They did in 2003: they elected the Liberal Democrats. People can change the situation; that is what democracy is about. However, once they have gone down the road of having a housing association or a PFI landlord, that is it. There is no coming back. There is no accountability with those landlords, especially when a small housing association merges with another and another and becomes a big national organisation instead of the small, local, friendly, housing association that was sold to people in the first place.

Then there is the limited amount of money that the Government allow to be distributed into social housing via councils. What happens in that case? This has been mentioned in meetings we have had with Ministers. Of course, there is a limited amount of money and it is rationed. However, it is not rationed fairly according to which councils have the greatest need. The Government basically say, "Well, in the case of the hundred or so councils where tenants have voted not to privatise, that's tough. You do not get anything. You have voted and made your choice and we are going punish you. You don't get the cash." The ones that go half way down the road and have an arm's length management organisation will get what limited cash is still available via the Government.

That is no way to allocate the limited funds that are available for public sector housing through council provision. Of course, money is always short and has to be rationed and spent over a number of years, but that money should be allocated on the basis of the need of places such as Chesterfield, Birmingham, Cambridge, Camden and the other areas that have said that they do not want to privatise. The money should be allocated according to need, not according to whether people are willing to have an ALMO or whether they take the democratic choice to stay with the council.

What happens to rents in some parts of the country? In Chesterfield last year, not only did the Government take £6 million away from Chesterfield council tenants in right-to-buy receipts that went off into the Chancellor's coffers, they took £3.2 million from their rents to spend in other parts of the country. When I raised that with the Minister, he said, "Oh, but we only do that to affluent Tory shires." I had to point out that Chesterfield is not an affluent Tory shire. It is a working class coalfield community, except that, since 1992, there have been no coal mines left. It is a working class community that had lots of engineering and steel works—except they have almost entirely gone, as well. It is a community that had much higher than average unemployment. That is coming down, but it is still higher than average to this day. It has many social problems. It is not an affluent Tory shire. However, £3.2 million is taken away from council tenants' rents in Chesterfield every year—last year, the year before, the year before that, and next year—to spend elsewhere.

To my horror, I discovered that some of that money is going via the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, as was, to provide infrastructure in London for the Olympic games. Why are council tenants in Chesterfield seeing their rents go into that sort of spending? If Chesterfield borough council were allowed to keep half that money every year, it could provide the old age pensioners' bungalows to allow old pensioners to move out of family council houses, which would free them up for young people with children.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman has just said, because it suggests to me—I hope that he shares my concern about this—that Ministers are making decisions on matters that affect people's lives not on the basis of need, but according to stereotypical views of what the area is like and, by the sound of it, whether the council is controlled by the Conservatives.

Paul Holmes: I am not sure that Ministers would go down to the wire on that. As that was said in the meeting that I attended, it was a sop to the Labour members of the Defend Council Housing group who were there. It was as if they were saying, "It's okay. You don't need to worry. It's for a good reason." I am not sure whether, if one followed the small print, that would be how the decision was justified. As I say, it seems inexplicable that, last year alone, Chesterfield lost £9.2 million from its council tenants—from right-to-buy money and from rents. If Chesterfield borough council had half that money every year, we would not have a problem with housing people in Chesterfield. Instead, the waiting lists get longer. Whenever that is explained, people cannot understand the logic of a Labour Government following such policies. I know that many Labour Members agree with what I am saying.

There is a fourth option, which is Liberal Democrat policy and Labour party policy. The Labour party reaffirmed the policy of equal access to funding for all councils and council tenants at the last Labour conference and the one before that. However, the Labour Government have reaffirmed each time that they will take no notice whatsoever of their own members or their own conference, and will carry on with their divisive, iniquitous and socially unfair set of policies.

I could bring up many other issues, but I have an eye on the time and bearing in mind that there are lots of other Members who wish to speak, I will not. I will mention one issue in passing. I had the privilege of taking part in an Adjournment debate on Tuesday, which was held by the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), on the forced, compulsory merger of police forces to make an east midlands police force. I do not need to go into the details again because I went through them on Tuesday. I will simply summarise and say that we are seeing the merger of five county police forces into one super-force. That is happening all over the country. There was a sham consultation that was carried out to a ridiculous timetable. On 7 April, the five police authorities in the east midlands told the Government that they did not want to merge voluntarily. On 11 April, they were told that they were going to merge anyway. What was the point of the whole sham process that started last autumn when the Government knew what they intended to impose in their first place?

The changes are not going to be funded properly in any part of the country—certainly not in Derbyshire and the east midlands. Paying for the reorganisation will lead to reductions in the number of police officers on the beat. Above all, the change will lead to a loss of local responsiveness and accountability. I know the chief constable of Derbyshire. I can call on him easily. His base is not far away from Chesterfield. I know the chief superintendent of C division, which covers Chesterfield, and I am meeting her tomorrow to discuss all sorts of issues. How will I go on if the chief constable is in Northampton, or Leicester, or Nottingham? That will be just impossible—it is a nonsense.

Since a new set of Ministers has taken on most posts in recent weeks, I hope that we will hear some answers that suggest that the Government are going to change their inexplicable policies on these matters, although I fear that I hope in vain.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): I wish to raise one constituency matter and two international matters. The constituency matter on which I shall address the House is gun, knife and gang-related crime. The whole House will have read in the newspapers last week about the tragic stabbing of Kiyan Prince in north London. We in Hackney are familiar with the aftershock of such crime because in 2004, 16-year-old Robert Levy was stabbed to death by a 15-year-old.

I wish to say a few words about the matter because the problem with both gun and knife crime is that, when there is an especially spectacular incident, it is all over the papers for a day or two, but then people forget about it. However, the problem is ongoing. There is a rising tide of incidents in the inner city. The problem does not just affect London, because the number of incidents of gun, knife and gang-related crime is increasing in urban areas throughout the country.

We need to be aware that knife crime and knife homicide is a schoolboy's crime because the peak age for knife crime is between 14 and 21. The idea of playground quarrels that would once have resulted in a bloody nose ending with someone bleeding to death in the gutter, like Kiyan Prince or Robert Levy, is tragic. Such tragedies are also avoidable.

I praise the Government for the work that they have already done on knife crime. We are going to raise the age at which it is legal to carry a knife from 16 to 18. We will also give teachers more powers to search schoolchildren for weapons, and there is talk of experimenting with metal detectors in schools. All those measures will be important and helpful, but I stress that we will not have an impact on knife, gun and gang-related crime in the long run unless we address the youth culture in our inner cities. The saturation of that youth culture with music, videos and video games, all of which are riddled with violence, lies behind some of the shocking incidents, such as the stabbing of the young man in north London a few days ago. Welcome though law enforcement measures are, they will not alone solve the problem.

In Hackney, in the aftermath of the stabbing of Robert Levy, the police and community made a tremendous effort to address the situation. The police went into schools to teach young people about the dangers of knives and set up all kinds of mentoring schemes to give young people alternatives to their malign role models on the street. Very often, young teenagers are mentored in the ways of violence and crime by older men, so the police in Hackney are targeting those people so that they can get them behind bars. Meanwhile, the police are trying to work with young people and support their parents so that they can be given a different value system from that of the street, violence and MTV. The Government need to address the problem through not only law enforcement measures, but resources for such long-term work with young people and parents, whether that is done through local authorities, or through partnerships among the police, local authorities and the voluntary sector.

It is easy for hon. Members from other parts of the country to say, "We don't have the problem in my constituency. It is a localised thing in the inner city, so why should I concern myself with it?". I would say to that that we are seeing the type of gun crime that was once a feature of areas such as Brixton and Hackney in Nottingham, Yorkshire and as far afield as Aberdeen, so what those hon. Members see in the city of London today, they will see in other urban areas tomorrow.

Some of the wards in London with the most serious problems relating to gun and knife-related crime are on the edge of what will be the footprint of the Olympic park. The idea that we will bring millions of people in 2012 into an area that has systemic problems with gun, knife and gang-related crime on its fringes could—I say only "could"—prove embarrassing to all of us. For the sake of the mother of Kiyan Prince, the parents of Robert Levy, a whole generation of young people growing up in our city and this country's reputation, we cannot afford to let gun and knife-related crime be only the stuff of a few days' headlines before we all move on. We need sustainable work—both law enforcement and community work—that will help to save a generation of young boys who are being sucked up into a malign, lawless and violent culture.

I want to raise the international issue of Guantanamo Bay. Hon. Members might say, "It's been there since 2002, so why should we talk about it again?" However, it is important to put it on record that, in the past week, important benchmarks have been set relating to the debate on Guantanamo Bay. First, the UN Committee against Torture has investigated Guantanamo Bay and concluded that the conditions there constitute torture. The Committee has also called for the camp to be closed down as soon as possible. We have also heard in the past few days that four detainees at Guantanamo have attempted to commit suicide, which gives the lie to the notion that there is nothing wrong with the regime there. Last but not least, our Attorney-General has taken the serious step of making a public speech saying that Guantanamo Bay should be closed as a matter of principle. Lord Goldsmith was swift to say that he was speaking in a personal capacity, and we must accept that, but when someone in his position with such a distinguished legal career steps up to condemn what is happening in Guantanamo, the House must listen. The Attorney-General is not the only person who has called for the closure of Guantanamo. The UN Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, has called for that, as have Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch.

The problem with Guantanamo is partly what happens inside it, partly the dubious legal basis on which the Americans are holding the people and, finally, the negative effect that its very existence has on the war against terror. The Americans would argue that they are entitled to hold the people indefinitely without due process, as that would be internationally recognised, because they are at war. When it is suggested that, if the people are prisoners of war, they should be subject to the Geneva convention, the Americans refuse to accept that, but they cannot have it both ways. They cannot say that they are holding the people because they are at war, yet refuse to accept that the Geneva convention applies.

The Americans try to say that the conditions are fine and that the complaints of ex-detainees are unfounded, yet even the UN officials were not allowed to meet detainees without signing confidentiality agreements. Once the detainees actually leave Guantanamo—as did the British detainees, thankfully, due to the hard work of Lord Goldsmith and others—the stories that we hear about the treatment that they have endured are horrifying.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) said earlier this week, the Government should facilitate a visit to Guantanamo by a delegation of British MPs. The Government should also do more for British residents who are not necessarily British nationals who find themselves interned in Guantanamo. I know that it is not the practice of Britain to offer consular services to people who are just British residents, but it is also not the practice of Britain to stand on the side while people are undergoing torture. International institution after international institution, culminating in the UN Committee against Torture, have said that conditions in Guantanamo are tantamount to torture.

Tony Blair has to take advantage—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Lady is an experienced Member of the House and knows that we do not address our colleagues in that manner.

Ms Abbott: My profuse apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Prime Minister should take advantage of his special relationship with George W. Bush to raise the issue of Guantanamo in more emphatic and public terms than he has hitherto. The House recently debated the report on the 7/7 bombings in this country. As a House of Commons, we talk about anti-terrorism measures and legislation, policing, enforcement and law and order to ward off the threat of terrorism. However, as long as young Muslim men and women, wherever they might be, including in this country, see the camp at Guantanamo and people held outside the law, and hear the allegations of torture, it undermines both our fight to get community cohesion and the war against terror. We need to demonstrate that when we talk about civil liberties, freedom and enduring international values, it is not just talk but something that we mean. There is much more that our Government and Prime Minister can do to close down Guantanamo once and for all. That would represent an advance in the war against terror.

The second international issue that I want to raise is the situation in Nigeria. It is a special country to me. I have one of the largest Nigerian communities in London and I have been privileged to visit it twice within the past 12 months. A horrible disaster took place in Nigeria in the past few days that was not been as well reported as it might have been. A pipeline explosion killed more than 200 people on the outskirts of Lagos. More than 100 blackened corpses were strewn on the water's edge. The Lagos state police commissioner said:

"You can see the corpses. Some are burnt to ash. Others are remnants. We estimate" that more than 200 people died. Those people died not as a result of a natural disaster, but because they were tapping into a pipeline that runs close to Lagos to take away petroleum in jerry cans to sell. No more dangerous activity can be imagined, but the idea that there are people who are desperate enough to make money from such an activity points to some of the social and economic dislocation in Nigeria.

Oil has been both a blessing and a curse. It has been a blessing because it could make Nigeria a prosperous country, but it has been a curse because, as is the case in so many oil-producing countries, it has brought with it corruption and an undue reliance on the oil production sector. It is not just that people die from tapping into pipelines. One of the other tragedies of oil production in Nigeria is that, although the Niger delta produces some of the highest quality oil in the world and makes billions, the Nigerians who live there exist not only in the most abject poverty, but in an area that has terrible oil pollution. The water is polluted. They cannot fish or farm, and they do not have access to fresh water. The situation has been going on for years. The huge profits made in Nigeria have not helped the people of the delta.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): Does the hon. Lady agree that there needs to be far greater transparency in the payments made by extraction companies to developing countries? The brutal truth is that most of the money does not go to benefit the general population, but enriches a small elite.

Ms Abbott: I agree absolutely and wholeheartedly, and I shall come to that point because it is at the heart of my remarks.

The natural gas from oil extraction is flared night and day, which means that villages are illuminated night and day. That shows the crudeness of the oil industry. It does not bother to use the natural gas as a resource in itself because the profits to be made from oil are so vast. Who benefits from that? As the hon. Gentleman said, there is no transparency in the payments made.

The last time I was in Nigeria, we had a meeting with Shell. When I asked about oil pollution, the senior person in the company said that it was all caused by people tapping into its pipelines. I said, "Are you saying that there was never any oil pollution in the delta until people started tapping into pipelines?" She said, "No." I then asked, "Does Shell take no responsibility for the lack of infrastructure and schools, and the desperate plight of the people?" She said, "Well, no. We give money to the federal Government and local politicians. Our responsibility ends there." It is not good enough for a company with such strong British links to have that attitude to the environment and poverty reduction.

[Ms Abbott]

We have worked with Nigeria on debt relief and governance and we all welcome the return to democratic elections. However, we need to work with Shell and other oil extraction companies to tell them that it is not enough for them to wash their hands and to say, in effect, "We have paid off federal and local officials. What more do you expect us to do?" Shell bears a big responsibility for the plight of ordinary people in the delta. It is time it faced up to that responsibility. Anything Her Majesty's Government can do to help them do that will be important.

When I was in Nigeria, we heard about attempts by President Obasanjo, who is in his second term in office—in fact, he did another term as general in the long period when Nigeria was under military rule—to change the constitution so that he could have a third term. Fortunately, the Nigerian Senate debated that and voted his proposal down. That is a victory for democracy in Nigeria.

This Government have a proud record on raising concerns about Africa and trying to work with it on debt reduction, most notably with Nigeria itself, but we need to go further. The Chancellor recently made a speech on corruption, but we need to go further still. We need to impress on a country such as Nigeria, which has the potential to be very wealthy, that there are still outstanding problems with governance, transparency, and the fact that the people of the Niger delta and across the country live in such poverty when the region is Shell's most profitable area for oil production.

I make no apologies for raising Nigeria in the Chamber. Africa has so much potential. To visit Africa and see its raw materials and the potential of its people being wasted because of governance problems is tragic. I am grateful for the opportunity to draw those things to the attention of the House.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): For me, this is undoubtedly the blackest day since I came into the House 23 years ago. Today, the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust announced the loss of 600 NHS posts. One of the consequences of that is that it will almost certainly undermine for ever the viability of the Horton general hospital in my constituency to perform the role of general hospital. The posts have been lost because the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust had a £33 million cut imposed on it at the beginning of the year. It was told at the outset of the financial year that it had to make savings of some £33 million.

The House should pause for a second, as that means that 600 people have lost their jobs. Some of those posts will be lost as a result of natural wastage, but there will be 300 to 350 redundancies, affecting consultants, nurses from the Royal College of Nursing, ancillary workers, professionals allied to medicine, clerical staff, administrators and receptionists. They will lose their job because the way in which NHS funding works is desperately unfair to Oxfordshire and the Thames valley.

NHS reference costs for 2005, which were published by the Department of Health in April 2006, provide an efficiency profile for hospitals, and they show that the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust is the most efficient general hospital trust in England, with a turnover of more than £300 million. However, it has to abolish more than 600 NHS posts, largely because of the way in which funding is allocated. Thames Valley strategic health authority receives the lowest allocation of any SHA in the country: each person in my constituency receives an average of £1,125, while the English average is £1,138 a head. That difference may not appear to be very great, but the overall difference between Thames Valley SHA and the next SHA on the list is £120 million. If we moved closer to the national average, that would remove the need for the £33 million cut imposed on the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Everyone in the House will sympathise with my hon. Friend's constituents. Is he aware that in west Norfolk my local hospital has just announced a major redundancy package? Does he agree that that flies in the face of the Secretary of State's recent statement that all redundancies would be achieved by natural wastage or by delaying appointments? She has some explaining to do, as there is mayhem in some hospitals and PCTs.

Tony Baldry: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. The Secretary of State said that last year was the "best year ever" for the NHS, but her words ring hollow for people in Oxfordshire. Sadly, the fact that an acute hospital trust has lost 600 posts does not merit a single mention in any of today's national newspapers. Such is the loss of NHS jobs in recent months that it is regarded as commonplace. That is what the Government have managed to do to the NHS.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): My hon. Friend and I share the Horton hospital, which is part of the Oxford Radcliffe complex. Does he not agree that the cuts are worrying? Given the proven efficiency of that hospital grouping and the fact that, as he said, the fundamental problem is its overall unit funding compared with that for other bodies, what hope is there for the others?

Tony Baldry: Indeed. My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. I still believe in democratic principles, so perhaps public pressure and the petitioning of Parliament and the Government will have an impact. Ministers appear to live in a parallel universe, as they do not understand that NHS performance will be ratcheted down, year on year. The £33 million that Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust must find is additional to the £17.3 savings that the primary care trust—effectively, there is a single PCT in Oxfordshire—must find. Services in Oxfordshire are being squeezed in two ways: the acute hospital trust must make cuts, and the commissioning authority cannot provide as much money.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), my hon. Friends the Members for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) and for Henley (Mr. Johnson), and I have written to the Prime Minister. We sought to summarise our concerns:

"These cuts are the result of a staggering £33 million debt in the area's NHS. The debt crippling our health services could be wiped out if Oxfordshire's NHS were funded at the national average. It is not. Instead it is underfunded by twenty per cent. No NHS Trust in Oxfordshire was to be funded at the national average this year. The Government's own figures reveal that Oxfordshire receives the lowest funding per patient in the whole country. The Government's own audit shows that the Oxford Radcliffe NHS Trust is the most efficient hospital Trust in the whole of England and Wales. These are not our figures, they are not the Trusts; they are the Department of Health's own. This blatant bias is reinforced by the fact that your constituency"—

our letter was addressed to the Prime Minister—

"is funded per patient above the national average by almost the same amount Oxfordshire is underfunded. NHS staff should not pay for the Government's unfair funding system and nor should patients. Job losses will set back mental health services including Witney and Banbury, witness the loss of community hospital beds across South Oxfordshire, and leave the John Radcliffe struggling to deliver operations. Oxfordshire now has fewer qualified nurses than we did four years ago."

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I accept that these are difficult issues, and the hon. Gentleman is making the case for his constituency extremely well. However, can he remind the House of how much funding his area received in 1997, and how much it receives today?

Tony Baldry: The hon. Gentleman is welcome to come to my constituency. On 19 June we are holding a public meeting in Banbury, which he is welcome to attend. Indeed, I would invite any Minister to visit Oxford or Oxfordshire, as they are notable by their absence. It is a great pity that when the Prime Minister summoned NHS chief executives to Downing street to talk about the crisis in the NHS he deliberately excluded Trevor Campbell Davis, the very competent chief executive of the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust. There is no way in God's creation that the hon. Gentleman or his ministerial colleagues can persuade my constituents or the people of Oxfordshire that a service lacerated by cuts is better than the service that the Government inherited in 1997, when the Horton was a vibrant general hospital.

Let me explain the impact of the cuts. As my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) can confirm, it is not just a matter of losing a general hospital. Banbury has for a long time been at the centre of a catchment area called "Banburyshire". It includes most of the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry and a large part of the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples). Those villages and market towns have looked to Banbury as their natural centre for facilities such as medical services. Indeed, the general practitioner of my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry is a Banbury GP.

For over a century we have had a general hospital serving that community, and it has been part of the identity of Banbury and the surrounding area. With the loss of the general hospital, we will be forced to look to Oxford, over an hour away, for many services. The loss of the general hospital will have a serious impact on the sense of identity of the area. From villages north of Banbury, such as Boddington, Oxford is a very considerable distance away.

Among the services that will be lost are the 24/7 children's services. To take up the point made by the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), the reason why we have 24/7 paediatric care at the Horton is a consequence of the tragic death, way back in the mid-1970s, of a little boy called Ian Luckett. As a result, the then Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, Barbara Castle, set up a public inquiry, which deemed that there should be 24/7 paediatric services at the Horton hospital. Opening the inquiry, the chairman said:

"The reason there has been this third enquiry is because it is recognised by the Department . . . that there should be the fullest enquiry to ensure such a thing"— the death of a child—

"does not happen again."

The inquiry recommended that

"only severely ill children, fit to travel, should be admitted directly to Oxford hospitals."

The history of the matter is set out in an Adjournment debate that I held on 17 March 2004.

However, now we are to lose 24/7 paediatric services at the Horton. In other words, in my constituency we will have a worse health service than existed under Labour, under Barbara Castle, in 1974. We will not lose paediatric services alone. We will also lose obstetric services, out-of-hours emergency services and the special care baby unit. From now on, we will have only a midwife-led maternity unit. We have had a vibrant and viable maternity unit until now. Midwives do a brilliant job, but as all hon. Members know, any GP looking after an expectant mother where there is a scintilla of a suggestion of any complication will now suggest to her that she go to the John Radcliffe hospital, rather than the Horton general hospital, to have her baby. By undermining maternity services, we will lose obstetric services and undermine gynaecological services as well.

Mr. Boswell: I ought to declare an interest, in that my wife bore all three of our children in the Horton maternity unit. Does my hon. Friend agree that if there is to be a midwife-only service, if any complications that have not been anticipated develop, it will be extremely difficult to get access to specialist care within the necessary critical time?

Tony Baldry: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. Everyone in the House must recognise that even in the best conditions, it takes at least an hour to get from Banbury to Oxford.

We face a complete unravelling of services. Paediatric services, maternity and obstetric services, gynaecological services and surgery will all be undermined. What did the manager of the hospital say this week when he was challenged? He said that he looked to improved on-site care for the elderly and provision of community beds. Within a couple of weeks we have gone from having a general hospital with all the services that we have always expected a general hospital to give, to some super-community hospital with a collection of services at the whim of whoever is running the trust.

Mrs. May: In relation to the loss of maternity services and services such as paediatrics and obstetrics, does my hon. Friend share my concern that that is a pattern that we are seeing across the country? For example, Wycombe hospital has lost its maternity unit, and the special care baby unit is now at Stoke Mandeville in Aylesbury, which means that my constituents have to travel even further for that service. The same has happened in Bury. Across the country, people are losing services locally and losing choice.

Tony Baldry: My right hon. Friend makes a good point. There are a smaller number of acute hospitals such as the John Radcliffe, and the Horton's viability as a general hospital will be undermined. Worse, when I met the primary care trust's acting chief executive the other day, it was made clear to me that the commissioners oppose community hospitals because they are so strapped for funds that they will move anything they can from the acute centre to social care, for which there is a means test administered by the county council. Community hospitals and community beds will, therefore, also disappear and acute services will be under great pressure.

One has only to look at the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust website to realise that one of the consequences of the cuts is that £38 million will have to be saved in surgery. That means that no one will get an operation for at least six months. The whole point of managing surgery becomes trying to ensure that, to save money, people wait for the maximum time, but are treated just within the Government target.

The position is bleak. As recently as Prime Minister's questions on 19 April, the Prime Minister trumpeted an expansion of cardiac services at the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust. The consequence of the cuts is that cardiac ablation therapy to control an irregular heartbeat—the treatment that the Prime Minister received—will no longer be available to most patients at the John Radcliffe hospital.

General hospitals such as the Horton are being undermined, the John Radcliffe has to reduce its services substantially, the acute hospital trust has to make massive cuts in surgery and NHS skilled staff are being made redundant. That is crazy. My constituents and the people of Oxfordshire find it insulting when Labour Members try to pretend that that constitutes an improvement in the NHS or in services for my constituents. It demonstrates that Ministers and Labour Members are increasingly living in a parallel universe. I partly understand the reason for that. Ministers will not visit hospitals such as mine. Their officials wheel them out simply to see showcase improvements, so they get a false sense of what is happening.

The funding formula is skewed against counties such as Oxfordshire so unfairly that I suspect that many Labour Members are genuinely misled into believing that there is more money in the NHS than is the case. However, they should reflect on the fact that so many of the cuts are being made in London and the south-east.

My constituents will try to respond through every possible democratic means. We have started a petition, which appears in today's newspapers such as the Banbury Guardian and the Banbury Cake. People can sign it online at www.saveourservices.com. When, on one day, approximately 155 beds are lost at the Churchill hospital and 30 beds at the John Radcliffe, and we learn that Oxfordshire will have fewer qualified nurses than in 2002, I am sure that hon. Members understand why today is, for me, the blackest day since I became a Member of Parliament. I hope that the Government will reflect and realise that what they are doing to the NHS is unacceptable, and that the people of Britain will not accept it.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I should like to take the opportunity of the debate to consider a much longer-term vision for Swindon, the town that I have the honour of representing. Swindon's existence and prosperity are a tribute to the power of vision. In its first incarnation as a great manufacturing town, it owed everything to the great engineer and entrepreneur, Isambard Kingdom Brunel. When the railways, on which Swindon's prosperity was based, began to decline, the vision and foresight of a post-war Labour town council prompted it to buy a lot of land and to make the town very attractive to businesses. At a time when it was not a fashionable occupation for Labour councils, it wooed businesses to come to Swindon, and that has been the basis of our prosperity for many decades.

We have been open to the world economy, however, and we now face very particular challenges, from which there is no hiding place. Chinese exports to Europe have increase 100 per cent. in three years, for example, and up to 5 million European and American jobs will be outsourced in the next 15 years. Moreover, many people now realise that we face competition not only from low-wage and low-skill economies. Every year, universities in China and India turn out 4 million graduates.

Nowhere can escape change. Each of Swindon's major employers has experienced radical restructuring, including W.H. Smith, Asda and Zurich, and Motorola is now consulting on further redundancies. Even the most successful companies in our town are having to face these challenges. Swindon is a prosperous town at the moment, but that prosperity cannot be taken for granted. We must remain attractive to the employers who are going to bring in the high-skill, high-value-added jobs on which our future prosperity depends. That means not only that we need the right skills base but that the town must have an attractive environment.

The employees on whom those employers will depend are highly mobile, not only within the United Kingdom but throughout Europe and across the globe. Their skills are highly in demand and they can move anywhere, so we have to make the town attractive to them. If we do that, we will have a better chance of attracting the employers on whom the town's prosperity depends. I made this case strongly to the Government a few years ago, and I was able to persuade them to bring in an urban regeneration company, now known as the New Swindon Company. It is regenerating the town centre with that vision very much in mind, and about £1 billion worth of redevelopment will take place in due course. The University of Bath is planning to locate a major campus in Swindon, which will also be crucial to providing the basis for the high skills on which the town's prosperity depends.

We have to get the vision right, and we have to do so now, while these decisions are being taken. This not a party political issue. I represent the Labour party in North Swindon, but the town council is now Conservative dominated. However, all these decisions will have an impact long after everyone who is now active in local politics has departed the scene. We have to get it right. That is our duty as local politicians. But these crucial decisions are being made, primarily by the town council, without sufficient ambition for the town. We have to compete with other towns not only in the United Kingdom but in Europe and across the world. We have to be more attractive than towns elsewhere, but the town council does not seem able to grasp that vision. I want to explore this point in relation to cultural regeneration and to more general environmental concerns.

The town council has a vision for the town centre, working with the New Swindon Company, that will undoubtedly result in a significant improvement on what he have now. Any hon. Members familiar with Swindon town centre will know that that would not be hard to achieve. However, when the town council talks about building a desperately needed new library, why does it not talk about building one of the best libraries in Britain or Europe? If we consider the example of Tower Hamlets, we can see what an imaginative borough council can do. There is a wonderful new library there called the Idea Store. It is visionary and exciting, bringing in local people in a way that no one would have imagined 10 or 15 years ago. But Swindon does not think in that visionary, imaginative way. Swindon borough council has to learn from elsewhere, and to think about how it can compete with Tower Hamlets and everywhere else in Europe. We are also talking about building a new concert hall in the town, but we are not talking about a concert hall that would be capable of attracting world-class performers. We should be.

The Swindon local area agreement has just been signed off, and it represents an important step forward for the borough council. It is an improving council with a great deal of support from central Government, and the local area agreement brings together many local agencies in a worthwhile way. I have been urging the borough council for a long time to have a visionary theme to underpin its work, but what did it come up with? It came up with, "Swindon—the UK's best business location". Any town is likely to want to be that, but we must look a little more deeply to avoid a bland and meaningless phrase.

There is nothing in the local area agreement to suggest why Swindon is going to be the best business location. I very much hope that it will be, but we have to work at that, not just assert it and assume that it will be true. We have to produce the infrastructure and resources that will make it the best business location. The targets in the local area agreement are, of course, good and will improve the position on the ground in a range of different ways, but they are not very ambitious. They are, for the most part, pretty much in line with targets that the Government have set centrally. All that the local area agreement is doing is mimicking those targets. It is good, but not good enough.

For three or more years, I have been begging the council to develop a green vision for the town and to make it the centrepiece of the local area agreement, but I am afraid that I have been ignored. Everyone accepts that, in climate change, we face one of the greatest problems in the history of our species and that if we do not tackle it now, the consequences for our world will be incalculable. We all have to make a contribution: it is not just a matter for international agreements and national Governments; we have to act personally and in our local areas. We have opportunities to do that and other towns are doing it.

A Conservative council in Woking is doing fantastically good work in energy conservation. Why cannot the Conservative council in Swindon mimic what a Conservative council in Woking is doing? I am not sure that Swindon council is even aware of it. There is absolutely no evidence that it is on its agenda at all. Reykjavik, to take an example from Europe, is already piloting running its buses on hydrogen. When we are having a major regeneration and re-sculpting of the town centre, why cannot we find something as imaginative and visionary as that in Swindon? When Isambard Kingdom Brunel built the town, he had a wonderful far-reaching vision, which now seems to have been ignored.

I shall conclude with an example of how difficult it is to persuade Swindon borough council to be more ambitious for the town. Nearly two years ago, I held a meeting in the House of Commons, to which I invited the then leader of Swindon borough council, its officers and various other local dignitaries, as well as a distinguished galaxy of representatives from some of our leading cultural institutions. We had an interesting lunch, in which these distinguished representatives of some of our leading, world-class institutions came up with their ideas about how to transform Swindon with a cultural vision based on lots of exciting and stimulating concepts. No one would expect the town council to take ideas away from the lunch and implement them, but with so much expertise and incalculably valuable advice being freely offered, one would expect it to explore some of those ideas.

After the meeting, I wrote a note summarising some of the ideas that were proposed and sent it to the borough council. I asked how it would like to proceed and how I could help it, but to this day I have received no reply and, needless to say, none of the ideas has been pursued. A truly ambitious council would have taken those ideas and run with them. All the decisions facing the town now—what to do with the town centre, the new university, the redevelopment of a big site owned by the Science museum in Wroughton in the south of Swindon—desperately require a bold and ambitious vision if the town is to compete successfully with other towns in the UK and across the world.

Time is running out, as the important decisions are being taken as we speak, and the town stands to benefit from them, but it will not necessarily be good enough. We are not ambitious or competitive enough in Swindon. I am desperately worried that, unless the borough council wakes up now and realises that it is competing throughout the world with similar towns that are ambitious and competitive in their approach to the great challenges of the future, our prosperity may soon become a distant memory.

2.59 pm

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): I am pleased to be able to participate in this Whitsun recess Adjournment debate and to raise some important issues that are of major concern to my constituents in Bexleyheath and Crayford. Those mainly concern crime, antisocial behaviour, vandalism, graffiti, juvenile drunkenness, gangs and the availability of knives across the constituency—in fact, across the borough of Bexley.

Those problems, which mainly affect town centres in our borough and in my constituency, particularly Bexleyheath, Crayford and Welling, have spread to residential areas. There is an increasing problem—an epidemic—which is the No. 1 concern of residents in our borough of Bexley. People feel that not enough care and consideration are being given to those issues by national Government and that their quality of life is being affected.

The police, the national Government and the recently defeated Bexley council all said that they were concerned and talked a lot about the issues, but people locally feel threatened by behaviour of the sort I am describing—in the streets, the shopping centres and their homes—and that the Government have not addressed it.

The Prime Minister raised the respect agenda, but many in my area feel that it is just another gimmick. We have two good local free-sheet newspapers. This week, one, the Bexley Extra, has a headline "Boy, 15, Stabbed Opposite Church". The other, the News Shopper, has a headline "Teenage Rampage: Knife-Wielding Youths Riot on the Streets". Those are the things that worry and anger people in the borough of Bexley.

I listened with interest to the speech made by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), particularly the first part, which was about Hackney and the knives and the culture there. I endorse an awful lot of what she said, because we have the same in south-east London. It has already spread out, as she highlighted, to the suburbs, where there is great concern of a similar nature to that which she raised. I commend her views on the fact that we need things for the young people to do, role models and so forth. She made an important point and I am grateful to be able to follow that part of her speech.

I was also interested in remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), who is no longer in his place. He thinks that the Government are out of touch with what people on the ground feel about those issues. People feel that there is endless talk and no solutions. While there are certain areas of great improvement—we accept that there are more police and more community support officers—there is still fear of crime among people and concern about the consequences for their lives. It needs to be addressed much more seriously by the Government.

On the doorstep in the recent local election campaign, one reason for the unpopular Labour council being soundly defeated at the polls in Bexley was that people felt it had not addressed those issues of local concern. Of course, other issues were involved, such as the huge council tax increase of 40 per cent. over the last four years, which did not help. The Conservative campaign looked at positive policies to deal with those issues of disorder, crime and antisocial behaviour.

When I was a Member of the House 10 years ago we were concerned about other issues, such as noise nuisance, neighbour disputes and lack of concern. I was heavily involved in the peace and quiet campaign, which one of my constituents, Val Weedon, did so much to lead. The campaign is now called the Noise Association. We managed to get some action taken—action to raise awareness and to get environmental health officers, housing associations and central Government to realise that quality of life issues matter.

The quality of life issues at that time were noise nuisance, inconsiderate neighbours, bad behaviour and so forth, but now we have moved on. In our area, there is intimidation, graffiti and fear of groups. That is a tremendous worry for all sorts of people. Pensioners in particular no longer want to go out in the evening.

Bexleyheath has some good restaurants and pubs, as well as bingo and all sorts of interesting evening entertainment, but pensioners are frightened to go out because of the gangs, the youths and the drunkenness. Of course, the Government's new licensing laws have not made that easier. In Bexleyheath, binge drinking has increased and has become a culture. I am afraid that gangs of truants from school are also around during the daytime, intimidating pensioners on buses. There are many serious issues in the borough that are causing concern.

I want to mention a few areas where there have been particular difficulties. The Hadlow road area of St. Michael's ward has had seven years of unrelenting problems with youths on bikes and motorbikes, and of incidents involving damage to plants and other features in people's front gardens. The police and the ward's newly elected councillors are looking to have a police station in a local shop to provide a police presence. One of the problems in the past has been the inability of the police to respond, as they have been diverted to other areas of the borough or into town when a need arose. Local people have therefore been without their local neighbourhood police.

However, with community safety partnerships and community teams of police officers and community support officers in each of the wards, the picture is not all negative. I know that the Deputy Leader of the House will take note of the fact that we have had more police and community support officers. We must make sure, however, that they are dedicated to the wards in question and that they deal with the problems there, rather than being diverted elsewhere, as in the past. I hope that the residents of Hadlow road and its environs will see an improvement in the near future with the rolling-out of the neighbourhood teams.

Hampton House in Colyers ward is a troubled area where people feel insecure when the pubs empty late at night, leading to a lot of noise and nuisance, especially involving youngsters who are sometimes, regrettably, under-age. Residents have their doors or windows knocked on by people passing. While none of that is criminal, it is a quality of life issue, as people feel intimidated. Young mothers, families with young children or pensioners find such situations distressing, and more police need to be visible on the beat throughout the day and particularly in the evening.

Bexleyheath is a great centre and has facilities not just for pensioners but for many parts of the community. However, gangs of youths milling around are still a problem, and they sometimes come quite a distance, because, as we know, when a town has decent pubs or clubs, it attracts a lot of people. By the same token, there must be the transport to get those people home. Regrettably, as we have not been given the right number of buses and other transport facilities to get people home, the trouble carries on.

Recently, Crayford town centre, which is not an area that has had problems before, has suffered from gangs having car rallies or races around the local car parks. Again, that is intimidating and worrying and creates noise and nuisance. It frightens residents and causes disturbance in the evenings in a nice, quiet town. One could go on about such concerns. There has been wanton damage to parked cars in certain areas. Those issues must be addressed. The area now has an excellent new council under Conservative control, and Councillor Ian Clement, who is very much a community man, has already considered certain measures that he wants to implement.

I am sure that both the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) agree that we should adopt a zero-tolerance approach. We should say that we will not put up with the current situation, and that a range of measures are needed to deal with it. We may need more parenting courses, because parenting is a difficult task in today's society. It is difficult to bring up children when there are so many pressures on individuals, including children. Of course we want parents to be responsible for their children, but what is so worrying is that sometimes they do not know where their children are. My wife and I regularly tried to find out where our children were when they were teenagers. That was very important to us: we cared. I often had to rush home from here to pick up my son from some party, or rave, or whatever it might be.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): You should have joined in.

Mr. Evennett: I am a child of the sixties. I liked Motown and Dusty Springfield. That was in a different age, though.

We also need the police to be more user-friendly. In the past, people have been unable to contact them because a mobile phone is not answered or they cannot get through to the police station. Bexley is fortunate in having a good police force under Robin Merrett, who is doing a tremendous job, but it is vital that people can contact the police when they need to. When they feel concerned because there are yobs outside, for instance, they should be able to contact their community policeman. They should be able to find someone at the end of a telephone line to whom they can talk.

I agree with the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington: we must ensure that there are things for youngsters to do. It is no good telling them what to do, because those of us who are a bit older had different interests and wanted to do different things when we were growing up. They need to be consulted. Bexleyheath has a first-class dance centre and a youth centre where people work tremendously hard, offering kick-boxing and many kinds of sport, but there are not enough centres such as that. There are not enough different opportunities for youngsters to do something constructive rather than milling around in groups, possibly drinking.

We need less talk and more action. Under our last Labour council there were endless committee meetings, talks and discussions. As I have often said, I would sit around with a large number of police officers and councillors who would be put to better use doing something constructive, such as going out on to the streets and looking after the community. We need fewer committees, and more action.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Young people in my constituency have told me that they have not been terribly impressed by the Government's focus on the importance of "learning outcomes" from youth activities. Does my hon. Friend agree that young people who take advantage of youth services want to relax, have fun and engage with their friends? They do more than enough learning during the week at school.

Mr. Evennett: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The point about life is that it should be varied. We should have opportunities to relax and enjoy sport, for instance, without thinking about learning outcomes, which are complete nonsense—and I speak as a former teacher. I consider learning to be very important.

Andrew Selous: At school.

Mr. Evennett: Yes, at school.

We need determination and, obviously, a visible police force, but something else is needed. Bexley is a great place: it is the second safest borough in London. That is only comparative, however. It is no good pointing out that it is the second safest borough if people in it are feeling frightened or threatened. We must be realistic. We must accept that there are problems locally, and that antisocial behaviour has consequences such as lack of concern, lack of respect, crime and criminal damage. We have heard often in the House in recent days that crime is not as bad as it was, but crime in Bexley increased by 6 per cent. last year, which is not impressive.

I welcome the opportunity to raise these issues today, which are of great concern to my constituents. I accept that the Government have done some things to address them, but they have done an awful lot of talking, as well. There is a lot more to be done to improve the quality of life in our borough.

3.15 pm

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): I want to discuss the case of a constituent of mine. Earlier this year, Mr. Singh came to my surgery to discuss his long-running dispute with Thames Water about the installation of a water meter at his property and the subsequent enormous rise in his family's water charges. He told me that Thames Water was not given permission to install the meter, and that it gave him the impression in previous correspondence that a meter would enable him to save money on his water bills. That has not happened. Since the fitting of the water meter, Mr. Singh's water charges have risen excessively: from £159 per annum—the current rateable value for his house—to £469 per annum, which is an increase of almost 300 per cent.

Mr. Singh's is not a wealthy household in the home counties. There is no huge lawn to water or a swimming pool. His is a small household, consisting of only two adults and one child. The family tell me that they have always been very conservative in their use of water. They have no dishwasher, seldom run their appliances and try to make the most effective use of water by waiting a week before doing their washing. Since installation of the water meter, their usage has had to drop even further as they try to reduce their bills to manageable levels—but to no effect. With mounting bills, they now restrict themselves to the absolute minimum level of water consumption. They are genuinely afraid to turn on their taps and appliances, for fear of a further rise in the water bill. Certainly, since the meter was installed their water bills have trebled, while their already low usage has decreased. Clearly, there is a problem somewhere.

In response to Mr. Singh's complaints, I wrote to the chief executive of Thames Water to express my and my constituent's concerns about the water supply, and to request Thames Water's assistance in investigating and diagnosing the error that was clearly occurring. I also asked whether it could provide Mr. Singh with the leak detection and repair service that it claims to offer its customers. I know that the House will be surprised and somewhat dismayed to learn that as of this morning, I have received only an acknowledgment of my letter of 17 March. Perhaps it is not just water that is leaking from Thames Water's pipes.

We need to remember that Thames Water is the only privatised water company in England and Wales that continues to fail to meet its Ofwat targets for acceptable levels of leakages from its pipe system; indeed, it has failed to meet them for the past five years. I acknowledge that Thames Water has inherited some of the worst and oldest water pipes in the country, and that it is not easy to access and fix London's underground pipes, but the Ofwat targets are not excessive. Thames Water's own estimate of water leaked per year has in fact risen: from 688 million litres a day in 2000-01 to 915 million litres a day in 2004-05. That accounted for approximately a quarter of all the water leaked throughout England and Wales.

Let me be more specific. Each day, 915 million litres of precious water leak of out Thames Water's pipes. That amounts to 10,590 litres of water wasted per second. One third of the total amount piped into the water distribution system is lost.

I accept that totally eliminating water leakage is not economically practical, but Thames Water is not doing enough. Instead of concentrating its efforts and resources on reducing the waste of an increasingly precious and vital national resource, Thames Water could be accused of concentrating on squeezing further profits out of its customers. Instead of making its supply network as reliable and efficient as is practically possible, it focuses its considerable efforts on persuading householders to accept the installation of water meters, while also raising prices in an effort to reduce demand and ensure that it is able to fund dividend payments to its shareholders. Those dividend payments have been at least £130 million a year for the past six years.

I fear that Thames Water's actions will have the effect of pricing many people out of the hygienic use and consumption of water. Should that continue, it may result in a public health problem. Let us remember that consumers of water have no realistic option to change their supplier if they are unhappy with the service provided, the cost charged or quality of product. The Government have already recognised fuel poverty as a real issue that affects many low-income households across the UK, and the prospect of compulsory water meters raises the prospect of water poverty.

Despite the miserable weather that we have had this week, the south-east appears to be entering a period of drought. We are beginning to see hosepipe bans and hearing talk of drought orders being enforced. Water customers are being asked to restrict their usage, while enormous quantities of water are wasted by inefficient infrastructure. Surely something can be done to pressure water companies to increase their renewal and improvement of the pipe network. Let us remember that those companies have a statutory responsibility to supply water to their paying customers. Why should customers accept conservation measures that assist a private profit-making company which seems more interested in returning profits to its investors than in fixing leaks that waste such enormous amounts of clean, precious water?

The case of Mr. Singh raises concerns about our water companies in general, and Thames Water in particular. It is their responsibility to provide an acceptable level of service to all their customers who, I repeat, have no alternative water supplier. How can Thames Water justify relying on customers to reduce their consumption while allowing a third of the water supply to leak out of its pipes? And how can it be right to promote water metering when it hits the poorest households in this country hardest, and risks pricing low-income households out of the opportunity to use fresh, clean water in 21st century London?

As water becomes a more scarce resource, it must surely be the right time for further Government measures to improve regulation of the water industry. The water industry must get its own house in order before it can lecture its paying customers on what they should be doing to solve this crisis. The water companies must remember that they are not only there to look after the interests of their shareholders: they must balance that with the interests of the public they are there to serve.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute)(LD): I wish to take the opportunity today to raise a few constituency issues. I represent a large rural constituency, so transport is a key issue and will be the theme of all the issues that I shall raise. Faced with the threat of global warming and climate change, we need to use the taxation system to change people's behaviour and encourage them to use more public transport where it is available.

However, public transport is not a practical solution in many very remote areas. We need a road pricing system that allows us to vary charges, so that it would cost more to drive in congested areas where there are public transport alternatives but a lot less to drive in very remote areas where there is no alternative. Using potholed, single-track roads should cost a lot less than using busy motorways.

It is obvious that road pricing is still quite a few years away. Until it can be introduced, we need to modify the present vehicle taxation system to take account of the fact that some parts of the country have public transport alternatives while others do not.

I want to talk about vehicle excise duty and fuel duty. There is a strong argument for a lower rate of VED in rural areas to compensate for the lack of public transport alternatives. People would still pay fuel duty according to how much they use their cars, but they should be compensated by paying less in VED, which at present is a fixed charge. Moreover, we should charge a lower rate of duty on fuel sold at remote petrol stations. That would require an EU derogation that several other member states have already received. Britain did not oppose that, and I urge the Government to apply for the same derogation in respect of very remote areas in this country.

I shall give an example of why we need that derogation. Petrol sold at pumps on the islands of Mull and Islay costs about 15p or 20p more per litre than it does in big cities. The irony is that people who live in areas where they have to drive long distances, and where there is no public transport alternative, have to pay far more for fuel than do people who have to drive only short distances and who have alternatives. That is hardly fair, and a more equitable tax system would introduce lower fuel duties for a few very remote parts of our country.

Ideally, people should be able to use public transport instead of having to rely on their cars. The Government's policy is supposed to be to encourage people to do so, so it is a scandal that Royal Mail, a Government agency, should be withdrawing postbus services in my constituency. In the past month, it has announced the withdrawal of those services between Dunoon and Tighnabruaich, between Inveraray and Dalmally, and between Lochgilphead and Inveraray.

That is bizarre. A Royal Mail van has to travel those routes every day in any case, and the postbus service was based on the fact that passengers could be carried at no extra cost or damage to the environment.

The reasons that Royal Mail has given for the decision are also a bit strange. It has said that it is ending the postbus service on the Dunoon-Tighnabruaich route because it was too popular, but that the other two routes have been closed because they were not popular enough. We do not seem to be able to win—if Royal Mail wants to end a service, it will find a reason.

Royal Mail has said that the Government's move earlier this year to open up postal services to full competition means that it has to concentrate all its efforts on its core business—collecting, sorting and delivering mail—in order to survive. That is not joined-up government: surely all Government owned bodies have a duty to follow Government policy, which is to promote social inclusion and the protection of the environment. Clearly, it is a social inclusion matter if people are trapped in their homes because they cannot travel.

I urge the Deputy Leader of the House to speak to his colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry and urge them to intervene by telling Royal Mail to keep its postbus services.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): The hon. Gentleman should speak to the Transport Minister in the Scottish Parliament.

Mr. Reid: Royal Mail is a reserved power, and the responsibility of the Government here. The Scottish Parliament's Transport Minister has no control over it.

I urge Ministers to change Royal Mail's remit. All Government-owned bodies should have a social and environmental remit, as well as a remit to carry out their core business and balance the books.

I am concerned about the Post Office side of the Royal Mail. The planned withdrawal of the post office card account in 2010 will threaten the viability of thousands of rural post offices. I urge the Government to think again. The Government have also hurt post offices by taking away the TV licence business, encouraging motorists to renew their vehicle excise duty through the internet rather than at post offices, and by refusing to allow the Post Office to bid for the contract for conducting new passport interviews. They seem determined to close thousands of rural post offices, which will certainly be the result if those policies are not changed. The Government should be giving business opportunities to post offices instead of driving them away. Post offices fulfil an important economic and social role in rural communities and we cannot afford to lose them.

I referred to passport interviews. From the end of this year people applying for their first passport need to attend for an interview. The Government promised that nobody would need to travel for more than an hour to attend. From the proposals published by the Passport Office, for the highlands and islands that looks like being yet another broken Government promise. In my constituency the Government are opening a new passport office in Oban and there will be a set of satellite offices with webcam links to the main office, so that people can be interviewed down the webcam. Given the set of offices proposed it will be impossible for many of my constituents to reach the nearest office or webcam link within an hour, certainly using normal modes of transport, and I am sure that the Government will not be providing helicopters.

It is interesting that in setting the one hour limit, the Government were anticipating that everybody would use a car. Certainly it would take several hours by public transport to reach those offices. Even with a car, it will be impossible for people in villages on the west coast, such as Tayvallich and Achnamara, to drive within an hour to the nearest passport interview centre in either Oban or Campbeltown.

Norman Lamb: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Post Office tried to tender for the contract to operate as passport offices, but was denied the opportunity to do so, denying local people the chance of a local facility for renewing their passport? Does my hon. Friend agree that that seems crazy, given what is happening to the post office network?

Mr. Reid: My hon. Friend is right and he anticipates my speech. I was going to mention that very fact later on. Obviously, nearly everybody lives well within an hour's journey from a post office, so the answer was to conduct the interview at the post office. That would have the double benefit of being easy for people to reach and providing the Post Office network with a valuable source of income. That is what the Government should have done, if they had wanted to keep to their promise that people would be required to make a journey lasting no more than an hour.

People on Iona will have no chance of travelling for an interview within an hour, but there is no proposal for an office there. Travelling by car and ferry to the nearest office on Mull will take well over an hour. People who live in towns and villages on the Gareloch or on the east side of Loch Long are expected to travel to the main passport office in Glasgow—a journey that will take more than an hour. The journey to Glasgow by train, taking into account the time to reach the nearest station, will take over an hour. Given the state of Glasgow traffic, driving into the centre will take over an hour. I urge the Minister to take this information back to his colleagues in the Home Office. The Passport Office certainly needs to reconsider the proposed network of offices in the highlands and islands.

Although at present only people applying for their first passport need attend for interview, if the Government get their way and introduce compulsory identity cards, people renewing their passports after 2010—if the election is delayed until then—will have to do so, too. Everybody will need to attend such offices if the Government get their way.

I have concerns about the Government's proposals for a private finance initiative contract for the joint search and rescue helicopter service, which at present is operated extremely efficiently by the Royal Air Force, the Royal Navy and the Maritime and Coastguard Agency. It is a vital service that saves people's lives and it works well. Rescue services are not a suitable candidate for privatisation, so I urge the Government to think again. If something is working well, why change it?

Another concern is the proposed competitive tender for ferry services currently operated by Caledonian MacBrayne. The tender was forced on the Scottish Executive by European rules, but deficiencies in UK employment law mean that the tendering process will not be fair, and I urge the Government to look into them. UK employment law does not give seafarers the same rights as workers on land. The minimum wage does not apply to services outwith UK internal waters, which are not the same as territorial waters; internal waters are mainly river estuaries. Caledonian MacBrayne pays more than the minimum wage, but the rules do not apply to services from the Scottish mainland to most of the islands. The PFI opens up the possibility that a foreign-registered company could win the contract and although TUPE—Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations—would protect existing staff, the company could easily replace them as they leave over time with people employed on less than the minimum wage. There is clearly a loophole in the law.

There is another loophole in respect of vessels sailing in UK territorial waters. If the employing company is based outside the UK and does not operate in the UK, it can avoid employers' national insurance contributions. I do not understand why the Chancellor allows that loophole to continue, as he is clearly losing revenue. It also means that if Caledonian MacBrayne is to have any chance of winning the contract it will be forced to transfer all its employees to an offshore company based outwith the UK, perhaps in the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man. As well as the loss to the Treasury, UK rules, such as those on the minimum wage, will not apply.

I urge the Government to look into the matter. I do not understand why seafarers sailing on routes that are entirely within UK territorial waters do not have the same employment protections as workers on land.

The next issue I want to raise is the switchover from analogue to digital television. It is an exciting opportunity that opens up tremendous prospects, but we must be aware of the problems for many vulnerable people. I am pleased that the Government have promised to help such people, but under current proposals that help will have to come from the BBC licence fee, which is not an appropriate vehicle. The licence fee is a poll tax and whereas it is right for it to be used for the provision of BBC services, support for vulnerable people during switchover is a social need, which the Government should meet through general taxation. The BBC has proposed an increase in the licence fee to £180 in a few years if those costs are forced on it. That is excessive and I urge the Government to reconsider the matter.

I hope that the Minister will consider the issues that I have raised and that there will be Government action on them.

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): I have been interested to hear what all hon. Members have said today. In particular, I was struck by the comments that hon. Members have made about health care in their constituencies. It has been said that Labour Members—or at least Ministers—seem to be living in a parallel universe. My experience of the NHS in my home city of Hull is very positive. Just one example is a recent visit that I paid to the Hull and East Yorkshire eye hospital. A consultant told me that the time between his seeing a person who needs a cataract operation and his operating on them is now nine days. That is in marked contrast to the months and months that people had to wait in the past.

I am also aware of the local improvement finance trust projects in my constituency—taking place through the NHS and private finance—to build community-based NHS facilities to replace some of the old-fashioned facilities that we had in the past. Hull's NHS services have been chronically underfunded for many years, so I am delighted at the investment that has gone in since 1997 and I can certainly see that coming to fruition. When I talk to my constituents, they cannot speak highly enough of the NHS.

My theme today is health and, in particular, the wider agenda in relation to public health. I am delighted that we have had many opportunities to talk about public health since I arrived in the House. We took a historic vote on smoking in public places and I was delighted that so many Members backed the ban. I was also delighted that a new Member, my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh), introduced the Children's Food Bill in the private Members' ballot. I am delighted that several of the Bill's proposals were adopted by the Government, but there is still more to do. Yesterday, I was pleased to see the Third Reading of the Education and Inspections Bill, which contains provisions relating to nutritional standards in all our schools.

All those measures added together show that the Government are committed to the public health agenda. I want to talk specifically about the public health agenda in my home city of Hull. I am saddened to say that the Liberal Democrats in my home city are taking retrograde steps when it comes to improving the public health of the people of Hull. I will put the matter in context. The National Obesity Forum recently produced some figures showing that more than a quarter of English secondary school children are clinically obese. That is almost double the proportion from a decade ago. The National Obesity Forum says that a "public health time-bomb" is in the making because children who are obese in their early teens are twice as likely to die by the age of 50.

I am interested in that because Hull has some poor health statistics. We are high up in the cancer league tables. The number of teenage pregnancies has been high. Our educational achievements have not been as good as they should have been. Our housing stock is not as good as it could be. The unemployment situation has not been as good as it could be, although obviously it has got better in recent years. For all those reasons, the council, the NHS in Hull, and the voluntary and community sector are thinking carefully about what they can do collectively to improve the health of young people and children in our primary schools.

By the time Jamie Oliver took up the issue of healthy school meals, Hull was already ahead of the game. People in Hull had sat down quite a while ago and looked at some proposals in relation to the excellence in cities schemes, education action zones and the children's fund moneys that were available. Breakfast clubs had been set up in schools and fruit had been provided. Things were thus already happening, but Hull was unique because it took the bold step of deciding to introduce healthy free school meals for all children in our primary schools.

Hull could do that because of the Education Act 2002, which allows local authorities to go to the Department for Education and Skills and ask to change and innovate, if they think that they can make a real difference in their communities. Hull city council approached the then Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my right hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), and he agreed that we could innovate. The idea of free healthy school meals for all pupils in our primary schools thus went ahead.

The scheme has been an enormous success. Children have started to eat much more healthy lunches and they are getting breakfast when they arrive at school first thing in the morning. Fruit and water are also made available during the day, so there is a whole package of measures. The university of Hull is undertaking an ongoing review to examine the effects of healthy eating in our schools. Everyone is agreed that the scheme is an innovative and exciting way of trying to tackle some of the public health problems that can start early in a child's life. If children adopt healthy eating early in life, it is likely that they will maintain it in their teenage years and adulthood.

The cost of the scheme is about £3.8 million in 2005-06, and Hull city council has been able to bear that cost. The scheme fits in with the Chancellor's view of investing to save because I believe that such investment early in children's lives will mean that the NHS will be saved a huge amount later on because it will not have to deal with the problems of obesity, given that we all know that diabetes and cancer are more prevalent among people with weight problems.

The scheme in Hull has won the Caroline Walker Trust award for promoting healthy eating to improve public health. The Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), who is the Minister responsible for public health, recently visited Hull and discovered at first hand how much children are enjoying the free healthy food when she had a healthy school lunch at the Parks primary school. Hull has made it clear that it is happy and willing to share the good practice that has been developed in the city both nationally and internationally. It recently hosted an international conference to spread such good practice.

I am bringing the matter to the House's attention because, unfortunately, the Liberal Democrat group on Hull city council has decided that it wishes to return to the policy that exists in the rest of the United Kingdom, whereby children whose parents are on certain benefits become entitled to free school meals. The Conservative leader on the council agrees with the Liberal Democrats about opting out of the innovative and exciting scheme and has said:

> "We have consistently opposed universal free meals because it perpetuates a culture of state reliance".

That is a great shame because all hon. Members probably accept that the state has a role to support and empower people who often find it difficult to manage on their own. Since we have had free healthy school meals for all children, no one has been seen as any different and all children have enjoyed the food. The take-up rates for the healthy food have increased phenomenally.

Andrew Selous: Is the hon. Lady aware that some local authorities get round the problem that she identifies by giving the children swipe cards? If everyone has a swipe card, children who need free school meals can get them without identifying themselves as such, which lessens problems of stigma.

Ms Johnson: I do not have a problem with swipe cards, but society needs to address head-on the problems of unhealthy eating in all our communities. It is not just poorer children who eat junk food. Children from better-off families often eat it, too. They might have money available to go to Burger King, or wherever they choose to go to buy burgers or fish and chips. We need to recognise that we all have an investment in our young people getting a healthy start in life, and we should do that through healthy free school meals.

Lyn Brown: Does my hon. Friend agree that giving free school meals to all school children would help to deal with those who are not entitled to them, but whose families live on low incomes? That is one way for schools to ensure that all children have a healthy start in life, and the energy and material to think and work well at school.

Ms Johnson: My hon. Friend is right and makes an important point about those children whose families are just above the benefit level.

On the alliance that has formed in the city of Hull between the Liberal Democrats and the Tories, in the recent local elections, the Leader of the Opposition talked about "Vote blue, get green," but in Hull it is "Vote yellow, get blue." That is how it is in Hull these days. The lack of vision shared by the Liberal Democrats and the Tories—the lack of insight into what joined-up thinking can do to change the long-term health of one of our poorest communities—is a disgrace.

In the statement on pensions, the Liberal Democrats made lots of comments on how they disapprove of means-testing. I was struck by how ironic it is that they take the view that they do in the city of Hull. Perhaps that is indicative of the franchised approach that they take to national Government and local government. The two do not seem to marry.

If Hull loses the pilot scheme, we will not have the hard evidence that will come out of the project if it continues for the full three years and beyond, and we will not see the changes that can be made. Professor Derek Colquhoun of Hull university's centre for education studies is involved in looking at the project and giving an opinion on how well it is doing. He says:

"The data so far tells us that take up of school lunches among Hull's primary school children has gone up massively, from 36 per cent. to 64 per cent., since being offered free to all. This is significant as eating a healthy lunch is vitally important to improving health and educational achievement."

According to researchers, early indications are that children's readiness to learn is already improving. That is certainly my experience of talking to teachers in primary schools. They have seen a real change in the behaviour and willingness to learn of some of the young people in their classes.

John Dickie, head of the Child Poverty Action Group in Scotland, is a leading participant in the campaign for free school meals. He says:

"The lesson emerging from Hull is that improving the quality of school meals in itself is not enough. To really boost healthy eating in school the free provision of school lunches to all children is essential."

He goes on to call for Scottish Ministers to listen to the facts and follow what is happening in Hull.

Mr. Alan Reid: The hon. Lady mentioned Scotland. Is she aware that her colleagues in the Labour group in the Scottish Parliament voted against free school meals? The Labour party is not universally in favour of free school meals for everybody.

Ms Johnson: I am speaking on behalf of my constituency and the decision of the Labour council to introduce an innovative project and pilot to see whether we can achieve the benefits that all the agencies involved—the primary care trusts, the local authorities, and the voluntary and community sector—think will happen if it is seen through. Hull is leading the way. It is a great shame if we cannot get cross-party consensus that the pilot should carry on. We can learn a lot from Hull. It has led the way on a number of things. I could go through the list, but I will not. The Liberal Democrat council has not introduced a motion in full council, but it has certainly suggested that it will try to force through a return to means-tested school meals for children whose families are on benefits. That is a great pity, and the Liberal Democrats should be thoroughly ashamed of themselves.

3.55 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Following last year's report by the Science and Technology Committee on the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority, a number of issues have still to be resolved. First, when will the Department of Health release its report on the reform of the outdated Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990? When will a joint Committee of both Houses report on the scientific, medical and social changes relating to abortion since 1967? Despite huge advances in the scientific understanding of foetal development and serious abuses of the Abortion Act 1967, there is no mechanism to protect the foetus.

It is nearly 40 years since the 1967 Act was passed and science has made tremendous advances. Public opinion has changed, partly as a result of huge improvements in the imaging of the unborn child. Parliament is not reluctant to grapple with the issue. A communications research survey showed that nine in 10 MPs want the abortion law to be reviewed continuously in the light of advances in medical science. There is a political will to act—in the last election, all three party leaders called for a review of the timing of abortion—so why has action not been taken? Should we wait cynically for the next election? Are human life and dignity to be held so cheap?

Thirdly, animal-human hybrids and chimeras are not science fiction. They have crept up on an unsuspecting and unwelcoming public, and have caused worldwide concern. Indeed, the issue was raised in the European Parliament last week. The Donaldson report of 2000 stated that those creations are not covered by the 1990 Act, and rightly recommended prohibition. However, some people at the HFEA and the Department of Health want to legalise them for research purposes. Dark forces are plotting to make animal-human hybrids and chimeras acceptable. In its consultation on the 1990 Act, the Department of Health asked for views on "whether the law should permit the creation of human-animal hybrids or chimera embryos for research purposes only".

The HFEA's clinical and scientific advances group and its ethics and law committee have been asked to provide advice on the creation of human-animal hybrid embryos for research. I dispute the right of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority to provide advice on animal eggs and non-gamete human cells or to become involved in non-fertility matters. As its name suggests, its remit extends only to human gametes and embryos. It is not empowered to play with such monstrous propositions. It would be dangerous to extend its remit, because it is an undemocratic, unaccountable and self-interested body. It is time that the House brought those three supremely important issues—indeed, they are issues of life itself—under democratic control. I urge the Minister to pass that message on to the Prime Minister and the Department of Health, and to obtain answers on those three points.

In my constituency, much is happening. A major proposal to import a full 5 per cent. of the national energy requirement would result in ships on the Thames transhipping gas via Canvey island to provide energy for the national grid. My local paper said that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was encouraging

"planning officers to consider the crucial national benefit of such schemes and to look at Britain's urgent need for gas, as well as local people's concerns."

He appeared to be putting improper pressure on our local authority, and in some ways trying to bypass the usual planning procedures. That caused great public concern.

I respectfully say to the right hon. Gentleman, who is a good man, three things. First, we can accept no increase whatever in risk for Canvey people. Secondly, the matter must be brought to a public inquiry at the earliest possible moment—that is, immediately the council rejects it. Finally, we should do and say nothing that might increase the blight of our beautiful island, Canvey island, and of people's homes on that island.

I turn to the problem of antisocial behaviour. Castle Point has great kids. They are hardworking, they have great integrity, they are honourable, and their parents and our community as a whole can be enormously proud of them. They are our future, but they are spoiled by a few yobs who, fuelled by drink and with growing-up difficulties like we all had, cause mayhem for our community. They are making life for individuals miserable and intolerable.

Canvey island is plagued by antisocial behaviour and worse, especially in the King George park area. Groups or gangs of 50, sometimes 100 and, in recent weeks, 150 kids have been gathering together, showing off and causing mayhem. Cars have been badly damaged and one, I believe, written off. Fences and walls have been vandalised. There have been serious fights in the street and people have been hurt. Whole neighbourhoods feel under siege, businesses are hit hard and are suffering, the town centre is becoming a no-go area for decent people, and quality of life is being destroyed.

People feel intimidated, traumatised and afraid. People are standing in their front gardens late on a Friday night to try and ward off these gangs of youths. That is intolerable. It should not be happening. An evil racial element has again—it happened a few years ago—crept in, and must certainly be stopped.

I have been there personally on four of the past five weekends. I was there last Friday and it was pretty bad. I observed many kids with drink in their hands. I was there on Saturday. It was less bad then—not too bad at all. I patrolled the streets with the police on Saturday night, and I pay tribute to them. They are doing a difficult job in difficult circumstances. If they had better resources, they could do the job better. I pay particular tribute to Kevin Diable-White of Essex police, who is trying to organise the defence of the community and to find long-term solutions to the problem. He is doing a good job.

The statutory responsibility lies with the council and the police force. Things were very bad on Canvey island 18 months ago and a curfew order was introduced. That quietened things down, the situation improved and the curfew order was lifted. I complained at the time. Since the curfew order has been lifted, things have become much worse very quickly. Now we must get tough in Castle Point.

We need zero tolerance of yobs. We need to bring back the curfew order and try dispersal orders. The police must attend residents' 999 calls without exception and without excuse. That is not happening at present. The police must use my under-age drinking law more. Sadly, that is the most used law in the country, apart from road traffic regulations. On every occasion that the police use the law to remove drink from under-age children, they should use the whole of the law, which gives them the duty to bring in the parents and involve them. They must let the parents know what the kids are doing, so that the parents can understand and take responsibility and so that, where appropriate, the police can impose parenting contracts.

The council needs to provide decent facilities for all our kids. That may not stop the bad ones, but it will take the decent ones away from the action. All this must be done in close co-ordination with the community. As a sort of knee-jerk reaction, a teen shelter has been suggested for the King George park. Residents are extremely concerned about that. Any such decision must be made with the community rather than being inopportunely imposed on it in a way that simply exacerbates matters.

I called for a meeting of the local council, police and residents so that we can again listen carefully to residents. That should be a good start in tackling the problems, but the solutions will take a long time to develop and put in place.

Nationally, we need a deeper understanding of the cause of, and sustainable solutions for, antisocial behaviour. We cannot dismiss the fact that some kids are simply bad and need tough lessons. Of course, it cannot be denied that the prime responsibility lies with the parents, although it is difficult when there is only one. We all accept that sometimes parents can do their best and still experience problems with their kids. The Government must accept some blame for the increasing problems. Their reluctance to allow proper discipline from the earliest age has not been without consequence.

The over-focus on children's rights rather than their responsibilities from a young age is an increasing problem. The roll-out of the Government's Sure Start programme, with inadequate evidence of its impact on families, children and developing antisocial behaviour, is a specific example of bad Government policy. Another Government policy of getting mothers back to work and denigrating the role of the housewife may have wide and as yet unrecognised consequences for society. That is all part of the Government's politically correct agenda, and provides a backdrop against which the growth in antisocial behaviour occurs.

My local council on Canvey island and the mainland has been negligent because it has failed to provide and maintain a decent range of facilities for young and older children. It has removed children's play areas, forcing children, from six to 16, on to the streets and into culs-de-sac to play football and congregate simply because they do not have a park. At 4 o'clock, I have a meeting in Central Lobby with the Heritage Lottery Fund about providing two new parks for my area. One would go well in the Woodside area in Benfleet. I hope that I can make some progress on that. I will, of course, stay for the next speech.

Castle Point is a great community but we are suffering infrastructure breakdown. We experience massive and intolerable congestion on our local roads, overcrowding on our rail line and serious flooding, water, sewage and air quality problems. Residents cannot get their children into their local schools. Some live next door to a school but cannot get their children into it. Two schoolchildren who have lived in my constituency for nine months still go to school in Dagenham. That is ridiculous. What do those responsible do about it? They plan to build 1,000 more houses without any infrastructure. Our green land is under constant threat. We want local councillors to stand up for the residents, not be apologists for the developers or the Deputy Prime Minister.

We need new access to Canvey island and a new terminus railway station. Let me make a small but indicative local point: we need decent public toilet provision throughout the borough. The public toilets were closed without consultation. The council has changed its policy only after massive pressure from the public and press. It has done a U-turn—perhaps I should say a U-bend. It is beginning to reinstate the decent public toilet provision and disabled access that it took away. That is especially needed by elderly and vulnerable people. Perhaps we think that it is a light matter and we can laugh and joke about it, but it is serious for many people in our communities. I congratulate the Yellow Advertiser and especially Paul Peterson, who fought for decent toilets. The council should, as a gesture of good will, ask Paul Peterson of the Yellow Advertiser to open officially the new disabled access toilets that his fight has forced it to provide.

On a much more serious and fundamental issue, our democracy and election processes are held to be precious, but they have been damaged in Castle Point. It should be for the people, not for a small group with its own secret agenda, to decide who should represent them, and who should make vital decisions on planning, or on the sale—or the suggested giveaway—of major public assets, or on the award of contracts. Such decisions should be taken transparently in the council chamber, not in smoke-filled back rooms by a self-selected group of elected and unelected individuals. This is quite a sinister development. The public know about it, however—hence the extraordinary Castle Point election result last month, in which the Conservatives lost five of the six seats that they fought on Canvey Island. They were all safe Conservative seats in an area in which, in stark contrast, those same local people gave me the second biggest swing achieved by any Tory against Labour at the general election last year. If that swing had been replicated across the country, we would be sitting on the other side of the House today.

There is a clear message here. The people understand what is going on and they demand action from the authorities who are in control, including the Director of Public Prosecutions, whom I mentioned in the House earlier. I was emphatically elected by the people of Castle Point to deal openly and properly with these difficult matters on their behalf, and to stand above party political interests in defending our democracy and fighting for what is right. I can readily accept councillors criticising me for speaking out, but I will not stand by and do nothing. All that is necessary for evil to triumph is for good men to do nothing.

In Castle Point, our democracy has been abused. Our council and great political structures have been brought into public disrepute, and we must take action to regain public respect and trust. Writing in the Evening Echo newspaper this week, Tony Burnell sagely said:

> "I have long advocated that politics should be taken from local government."

I have long agreed with that.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I should like to say to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) that if he has constituents or anyone else waiting for him, I shall take no offence if he chooses to go to be with them now.

We have had our usual interesting debate on a wide range of issues this afternoon. Health and antisocial behaviour matters have been to the fore, although housing, transport and urban planning issues have also been raised, among others. I want to focus exclusively on education, however, and on what is going on in our schools, and I make no apology for doing so in a week in which the Education and Inspections Bill has dominated the proceedings of the House.

The first issue that I want to consider is the provision of schooling for children with special needs. I am aware that the Education and Skills Committee is undertaking a report on this important subject, and we look forward with great interest to reading its findings when they are put before the House. In almost five years in the House, I have noticed a real increase in the number of people coming to my surgeries to tell me that their children are on the autistic spectrum or that they have attention deficit hyperactivity disorder or any one of a range of learning difficulties. I have discovered from talking to other hon. Members across the House that this is a common theme.

There has been a real increase in the number of children with some form of learning difficulty having problems in accessing the curriculum properly, and this is a matter of great concern for Members on both sides of the House. I remember when the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke) was the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, he made a statement to the House on the subject. He expressed his concern at the way in which parents had to battle through the system to get the right provision for their children.

It is obviously deeply distressing for a parent to have a child with some form of learning difficulty or special educational needs, and schools need to do their very best to cope with those requirements. We have a system that fairly routinely forces parents to spend huge amounts of money to represent themselves, and it can take an enormous time—in some cases, many years—to get a proper resolution. When there are considerable differences in the type of provision available in different local authority areas, I think that there is great cause for concern. Particularly in view of how long it takes some parents to sort the issues out, we must remember that children have only one chance, and that if they miss vital years of their education without getting the right support, that is very wrong indeed.

As for the costs, I know of some parents who have spent up to £5,000 or £6,000 fighting and presenting their case to the local authority in order to get the right type of education for their children. I shall mention one specific case in my constituency. I have spoken to the parent, who is happy for me to discuss her case, which has recently been flagged up on the BBC education website. The parent, Michelle Chambers, has a six-year-old daughter with severe speech and language difficulties. Although the daughter is six, she has the language ability of a three-year-old child. When her mother recently accessed the school records, she was concerned to find out that her daughter had had to be physically removed from classrooms or restrained or taken to different parts of the school on some 37 different occasions between 13 January and 21 March.

I am concerned about several aspects of that case. The parents were not automatically told what was happening by the school. I understand that the local education authority, Bedfordshire county council, fully investigated the case when it was raised by Mrs. Chambers and it tells me that the correct procedures were followed. It is worrying in itself if the national guidelines for schools mean that children can be treated in that way over such a long period without the parents being informed. That is deeply wrong and unfair to parents. If they are to be fully knowledgeable and involved in what is happening to their children at school, they must know the facts about what is going on.

I know from talking to hon. Members throughout the House that language and speech problems can present real difficulties for many people. Part of the medical provision comes through the local primary care trust, but the principal authority for the child's education is obviously the local education authority. Time and again, it seems that there is a gap between the PCT on the one hand and the LEA on the other, often with considerable finger pointing going on between the two. I am concerned that vulnerable children are literally falling through that gap. In my own area, Bedfordshire Heartlands primary care trust has a £20 million deficit, which it has been ordered to rectify. It has recently had to remove one specialist, who provided help with speech and language training in Leighton Buzzard.

The hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) spoke about local area agreements. When I first heard about them, I made it clear to my local authority that I would judge the success of that Government initiative on the practical basis of exactly what it would do to close the gap between the education service and the health service for these vulnerable children who have speech and language difficulties.

Special educational needs are a very great concern. I do not think that we have it right yet, because of the fact that parents must battle for so long. There is obviously great concern about the number of special schools that have been closed recently. I was sorry that that Labour and Liberal Members were unable to back us on new clause 5 during the consideration of the Education and Inspections Bill yesterday, although it would only have ensured that the Secretary of State for Education and Skills kept special schools open unless sufficient places of the right quality were available in nearby schools. The disappearance of special provision is certainly very worrying.

The second education issue that I want to deal with is bullying in schools. Last night I saw Dame Kelly Holmes referring to that on television. I think that she is heading a campaign this week. What has struck me recently is the great difference in practice in schools' anti-bullying policies—and I am pleased to see that the Deputy Leader of the House is agreeing with me. By law, every maintained school in the land must have an anti-bullying policy—as I know, because I am a governor of a local school—but there is all the difference in the world between a policy that is perhaps checked by the school governors who look at it, ensure that it is fine and then put it back into the file, and one that is enforced as the school's central purpose with the head teacher putting life and meaning into it.

When children arrive in the schools with the very best practice, they are told from the very start exactly what bullying is. It is any form of behaviour that is distressing or causes anxiety to other children at the school. It is very far from just being physical. It can manifest itself in all sorts of ways and often happens outside lessons: in the corridor while waiting for a lesson, in the lunch queue or in the playground, and so on. Again, as a country we have not really got to grips with bullying in schools. I should like children, perhaps at the end of each year, to write down confidentially and anonymously their experiences of what bullying was like in the school. Perhaps that way, the school and the LEA would have some idea of what was really going on, and the head teacher and the governors could be presented with that information.

I should like to commend a school in my constituency—Vandyke upper school in Leighton Buzzard—for recently getting every child, bar a very few children who were concerned about bullying but who did not want to sign the anti-bullying contract for individual reasons of conscience, to sign its anti-bullying policy in front of the whole school. Signing a policy is one thing—it was a good innovation—but the real issue is whether it is put into practice and enforced.

[Andrew Selous]

I am disappointed by the attitude of parents when they are told that their child is bullying other children. Perhaps that is not something that schools can do a great deal about, but it saddens and depresses me hugely sometimes. If most decent parents are told that their child is bullying other children, first they feel incredibly sorry and upset about the effect on the children who are being bullied, and try to contact the parents of those children to express their sorrow and give them complete reassurance that they will do something about it. Obviously, they then work with the school to try to ensure that their child's behaviour becomes acceptable—and, of course, to get to the bottom of what it is in their own child that is causing them to bully other children.

My experience recently, however, is that when parents are confronted with the fact that their child is bullying other children, their first reaction is often to think, "Gosh, will it hurt my child's prospects? Will it damage their school report?" I am tremendously saddened when that sort of attitude is prevalent among parents. Perhaps when parents sign home-school contracts—which, again, we debated yesterday—it could be impressed on them that they have a duty to be thoroughly responsible. If their child is bullying other children in any way, they have an obligation to try to deal with it and to assist the school, thereby ensuring that our schools are safe and happy learning environments for all our children, where education can take place properly. None of us should underestimate the distress caused to children when they suffer any form of bullying.

The third and final area that I want to touch on is the level of basic literacy in our schools, by which I mean our children's ability to read, write and do basic arithmetic—the three R's, as they used to be called. A couple of weeks ago, I went round an upper school in my constituency with the headmaster and was taken to the learning support area to speak to the outstanding lady who heads that unit. The children at the school are aged between 14 and 16, and that teacher told me that in her estimation, about a quarter of them have difficulty with reading and writing. I was shocked by that statement. We have had a number of debates on the Education and Inspections Bill this week, but it strikes me that that is a national outrage.

I do not seek to make party political points here, because I do not think that things were much better when we were in power. I will make a deal with the Deputy Leader of the House: I will not blame the Government now, if he will not come back and say that it was our fault when we were in power. This issue should shock and anger us all. Here we are, the fifth largest economy in the world and a major western industrialised nation, and in some cases—

Norman Lamb rose—

Andrew Selous: I will give way in a moment. I looked at the figures before the debate: Sir Claus Moser said in 2000 that about one in five adults were functionally illiterate, while Digby Jones of the CBI has said one in seven. Whatever the figures—they vary in different parts of the country—they are far too high. It is, I am afraid, an incredible indictment of what is going on in our schools that so many children cannot read and write properly.

Norman Lamb: I agree with the concerns that the hon. Gentleman is expressing. Is he aware that this country has about the longest tail of under-achievement for students leaving school at 16? It is incumbent on us all to try to understand why that is. Does he also accept that that clearly relates to social class? There is discrimination in education. Educational attainment relates to where people come from, which is unacceptable.

Andrew Selous: I agree with the points that the hon. Gentleman makes. If about one in five or one in seven of our nation's children cannot handle basic reading and writing and basic numeracy—in some parts of the country, the figure is even higher, at 40 per cent.—that is unbelievably serious. For goodness' sake, what have children been doing in our schools for the 11 years between the ages of five and 16 if they leave unable to read properly?

Looking at the issue from first principles, it strikes me that when such a problem is identified when children leave lower school or primary school, there should be intensive—almost exclusive—concentration on teaching them to read and write. What is the point of taking them on and teaching them history, geography, religious education and all those other subjects if they cannot read and write properly?

I gather that in some schools in the Caribbean, and even in places such as Ghana, children do not move up a year unless they have mastered the basics of that year. I spoke earlier this week to our shadow Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), and to my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb), who has been instrumental in bringing the teaching of synthetic phonics into greater national focus. All credit to the Government, as they have taken on board many of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton. He told me that it is possible, through an intensive 10-week course, to give any seven-year-old child basic reading skills.

Earlier in the debate, we heard about antisocial behaviour from my hon. Friends the Members for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) and for Castle Point. If we cannot get these basics right in our schools, what hope do we have of conquering problems such as antisocial behaviour if children aged 16 or older leave without the basics—being able to read and write and get a job of any sort in the employment system?

Why is there no sense of anger about that? Why are MPs not picketing their local directors of education? Why are we not having tough conversations with heads outside this House? Why does this issue not dominate Education and Skills questions? The Public Accounts Committee's report last year, "Skills for Life: Improving adult literacy and numeracy", drew the following hugely understated conclusion about raising basic levels of literacy and numeracy:

"a large proportion of its resources"—

those of the skills for life strategy—

"are taken up by recent school leavers, many of whom might reasonably have been expected to gain their qualifications at school."

Given all the debates that we have had this week about structure, funding, independence and involving other organisations, we must get on top of that issue. We must drive down the percentage of children who leave school at 16 without those basic skills. Unless we can do that, we will not have a hope of dealing with the problems of antisocial behaviour about which we have heard this afternoon, or of increasing our national productivity and competing effectively with other countries in Europe, and with India, China and other countries in the far east, as we need to do.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Once again, I wish to raise the issue of the Hertfordshire Partnership NHS Trust, which provides mental health services. It is an important trust, which serves Hertfordshire and my constituency, and faces significant cuts this year and perhaps in coming years.

In case I sound churlish, let me say that the Government's record in mental health is moving in the right direction. Everyone, across the political spectrum, wants the best service delivered to some of society's most vulnerable people. Let me add the caveat, however, that the Government have probably slightly lost their way recently, especially in Hertfordshire.

As Members of the House and the wider public know, mental health problems come with a huge amount of stigma attached. One need only think of the headlines in The Sun when Frank Bruno underwent mental health problems—the headline "Frank Loono" was considered—and when Adam Ant had his problems. The behaviour of the media was disgraceful.

For that reason, I am glad that the Government are spending money on a campaign to raise awareness of mental health problems and to try to reduce the stigma—Shift. Unfortunately, that campaign receives funding of only £1 million across England, which is 2p per head. That pales into insignificance when compared with the 15p per head spent in Scotland, although that is not a huge sum of money either. I am afraid that those figures are not in the same ballpark as the money spent on smoking cessation programmes, important though those are.

The Hertfordshire Partnership NHS Trust was founded in 2001 and has operated since without going into deficit; it has balanced its books. This year, however, despite its good financial record, it was asked to make savings of £5.6 million—more than a 5 per cent. cut in its annual budget. I raised the issue in an Adjournment debate on 19 April, when I mentioned several of the services to be closed. I will not rehash those points today; the House is aware of them and they are recorded in Hansard. However, those closures are against the proposals in the Government's White Paper "Investing in Your Mental Health", which most Members of the House welcomed.

When I first raised the issue in that Adjournment debate, the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton) said:

"The Hertfordshire Partnership NHS Trust's total increased investment in its mental health services is £4.2 million over and above inflation for the three-year period from 2003 to 2006."—[Official Report, 19 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 204.]

That sounds good, until we remember that although the trust had an additional £4.2 million, the Government are now asking for £5.6 million back. What they gave with one hand they seem to be taking back with two.

When I raised that with the Minister, she said:

"I will come to some of the specific points that the hon. Gentleman has raised."—[Official Report, 19 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 204.]

Unfortunately, she forgot to do so. Undeterred, I raised the same issue with the Secretary of State for Health—who, I may say, knows me by name, which is probably more than some of my own Front Benchers do, so I have a great deal of time for her. When I asked my question, she looked me straight in the eye and said:

"I shall come to that point in a little more detail in a moment."—[Official Report, 9 May 2006; Vol. 446, c. 193.]

I had absolutely no reason to disbelieve the Secretary of State. After all, she calls me Charles in the Division Lobbies and always makes time for me. Unfortunately, she too forgot to return to the point.

Mrs. May: What were you doing in the same Division Lobby?

Mr. Walker: Only yesterday evening I bumped into the Secretary of State during the vote on the Education and Inspections Bill as we supported the Government against their own Back Benchers. When I suggested to her that she might want to answer the question about what was happening to the money in a little more detail at a future date, she smiled very sweetly and moved on quickly.

I am extremely disappointed that my local mental health trust faces such huge cuts over the coming year. If we are to believe Government figures given during a debate on 7 February, they account for a third of all the money being clawed back from mental health trusts in the United Kingdom. In response to a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), the Minister of State, Department of Health said:

"11 of 84 trusts are making expenditure reductions that amount to £16.5 million out of a total expenditure on mental health of more than £6 billion".—[Official Report, 7 February 2006; Vol. 442, c. 755.]

Well, £16.5 million across 11 trusts does not sound a lot of money—in fact, I am sure that it is a little more than that—but my trust accounts for a third of that amount, £5.6 million, with the other 10 trusts have to make cuts of £1.1 million each. I cannot believe that that is just or fair, particularly given that the Hertfordshire Partnership NHS Trust has never been in deficit in the five years for which it has been in operation. It has always balanced its books. What message do those cuts send to other trusts throughout the country that are struggling to balance their books? Not a very positive one.

Perhaps the Hertfordshire trust has been a little naïve. Why did it even bother to balance its books over the past five years? Perhaps it should have just gone into deficit, like so many other trusts. I am concerned about the fact that the trust is being asked to bail out other parts of the health service. That seems to contradict what the Secretary of State for Health believes. When I asked her about this—no, I did not ask her, actually; she just said it—she announced:

"we are reforming the way in which the NHS is run so that every hospital"

—I assume that she meant "trust"—

"takes responsibility for organising the best care within its budget. We will not expect others to bail them out."—[Official Report, 9 May 2006; Vol. 446, c. 196.]

That is simply not the case. As I have explained, my local mental health trust is being asked to bail out hospitals and trusts that are in deficit to the tune of £5.6 million. It is being penalised, and there seems to be no justice in the way in which it is being treated.

Of course, the Government will say that they have put local decision making in the hands of local health communities. That does not apply in this case. After all, it is the Government who fund the NHS, via the taxpayer. It is the Government who expect trusts to achieve financial balance, and demand that they do so. And it is the Government who, in this instance, are in essence asking for their money back.

I have raised my concerns with a number of charities, including Rethink, which as most Members know is a leading mental health charity. In its briefing, which was sent to Members of Parliament only a couple of weeks ago, it states:

"We believe that this is a national pattern in which wider health deficits are being addressed by shifting resources out of mental health."

That is a fairly damning and worrying statement that should concern everyone in this Chamber and at the Department of Health, and all those outside this Chamber who would doubtless like to be here now. Mental health cuts are the deepest cuts. Mental health has traditionally been underfunded, so every pound taken from it can almost be multiplied by two or three when one contrasts that service with the better-funded areas of health care, such as cancer and heart disease.

I wrote to the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central to ask her whether she was aware of the scale of the cuts and of the damage that they would do to local mental health services in Hertfordshire. She kindly responded on 5 May, saying:

"In deciding what proposals should be considered, the PCTs took account of...efficiency savings that could be made and that would avoid an adverse impact on front-line services".

Well, the cuts in Hertfordshire will have an impact on front-line services—a very severe one. The hon. Lady also said that PCTs took account of "proposals that were in accord with the principles and priorities set out in the recent consultation on mental health services".

I assume that she was referring to "Investing In Your Mental Health".

I have spoken to national charities and charities in the local health community, and they are absolutely convinced that the cuts will impact on people's health and increase the risk of suicide, and might lead to additional suicides. The hon. Lady went on to say that proposals were considered "that did not worsen any inequality in the delivery of services across Hertfordshire."

I am afraid to say that those proposals will lead to huge inequality in the delivery of services and have an enormous impact on many people's lives.

I ask the Secretary of State to intervene in this matter. She is a decent woman, and if she took the time to look at what is going on and to consider the fact that a trust that has never been in deficit in five years is being penalised for the deficits of others, she might change her mind. As Rethink said, the Department of Health is complacent about these cuts and the impact that they will have on some of the sickest people in society—people who are ignored by, and who feel marginalised by, society. These are vital, critical services for local people, and central to their well-being.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): I was pleased that the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) focused on mental health, which has always been the Cinderella service. It self-evidently deals with some of the most vulnerable people, and many of us are extremely concerned about cuts to the service.

I want to take this opportunity to raise a number of issues that are of concern to Norfolk in particular, but all of which have some wider significance. First, I want to discuss the very sad closure of RAF Coltishall in my North Norfolk constituency and the question of age discrimination. A constituent of mine, Mr. Tony Thorpe, is a civilian employed by the RAF at Coltishall and has worked there for nearly 11 years. He is 60 and was amazed to discover that the cut-off point for entitlement to redundancy payment is 57. Such employees are exempt from the normal right to statutory redundancy payments, and he was initially told that he would get no redundancy payment at 60. We should bear it in mind that, at that age, it is particularly difficult to get other work. He was subsequently told, however, that he would receive a discretionary payment of £1,500—a figure based on allowing £150 a year for each of his 10 complete years of service. That is massively less than someone who had served the same number of years but was aged 40—an age at which it is much easier to get other work. That is not an appropriate way to treat someone who has worked loyally for the RAF for more than a decade.

The law will change on 1 October, when the Employment Equality (Age) Regulations 2006 come into force under the European employment directive. The explanatory notes state that, among other measures, they will remove the upper age limit for unfair dismissal and redundancy rights, giving older workers the same rights to claim unfair dismissal or to receive a redundancy payment as younger workers. The Government will introduce those rights in October, but they are denying the same rights to someone who is being made redundant before then.

In 1999, the Government introduced a voluntary code of practice on age diversity in employment that was supposed to set out best practice principles. The Government have failed to follow their own code and are discriminating against loyal staff only months before they legislate to outlaw that unacceptable discrimination. Today, the Government accepted the argument that we will all have to work longer, so why should they discriminate against someone aged 60? I urge the Minister to pass on my concerns to his colleagues in the Department for Trade and Industry, because that injustice needs to be addressed immediately.

The next issue is a case study of what has been dubbed the "Tescoisation" of Britain. In Norfolk, Tesco already has 44 stores, but in a long-running saga it has attempted to secure a supermarket site in Sheringham, a thriving coastal town with an impressive town centre and shopping area. Last September, in the latest stage of the saga, the local authority planning committee emphatically rejected Tesco's latest proposal, voting 20 to nil against it. However, in April, councillors were forced into an extraordinary volte face. They decided no longer to resist Tesco's appeal against an earlier refusal after receiving legal advice on an agreement that had come to light on the sale of land by the council to Tesco. It had been signed by officers immediately after the 2003 district elections, when a new council had been elected but before members took their seats. The new councillors were not informed and a confidentiality clause was included that appears to have prevented them from explaining to an amazed public why they had changed their minds so completely compared with just a few months earlier. It appears that that legal agreement effectively prevented the council from pursuing any alternative proposal on council-owned land. Tesco managed to secure an exclusive right, without the public knowing, to pursue a supermarket application.

The public were amazed by the apparently inexplicable change of approach and it is untenable for local people to be left in the dark about a process that has been characterised by secrecy. I pay tribute to the council for being determined to get the full facts into the public domain, but I am concerned that years of secret negotiations between council officers and a major supermarket chain appear to have resulted in a legal agreement with a secrecy clause, leading to a volte face by the council without the public having any idea why that has happened. That is not an example of open and transparent decision-making. The whole planning process needs to be looked at to ensure that the public can have confidence in it.

Norfolk and Norwich university hospital is one of the Government's flagship private finance initiative projects. It was built immediately after the 1997 general election, and it pioneered, on behalf of the whole NHS, the new form of financing that the Government said was the way forward. The hospital now faces a financial black hole of about £15 million.

We have heard already in this debate about health service redundancies. My hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) told the House that his local hospital is to lose a number of nursing sisters. The flagship Norfolk and Norwich hospital faces the prospect of up to 450 redundancies—nearly 10 per cent. of its work force. That is obviously a massive concern to the people involved, but we must also be worried about the impact on patient care.

The trust has said:

"We do not believe that we can achieve the required level of cost savings to break even in 06-07 without the risk of severely compromising the ability of the hospital to deliver safe, high-quality patient care."

That is an extremely serious matter, so what caused the financial crisis? Was it chaotic management? Clearly not: we heard earlier from the hon. Member for Broxbourne that his hospital trust had met its financial targets every year, and the same is true of the Norfolk and Norwich. It has broken even every year, at the same time as implementing the sort of major change that the Government have encouraged. It is well run, but it was told about its budget settlement only two weeks before the start of the new financial year. That is a ridiculous way to plan the finances of a major hospital.

I want to highlight two issues, the first of which is the PFI contract. I referred the contract to the National Audit Office a couple of years ago, as it seemed to be very expensive and a poor deal for the NHS. Ultimately, the NAO agreed, finding that the Norfolk and Norwich hospital trust was paying an additional sum, or premium, for being one of the first PFI hospitals. When it was built, it was very difficult to secure private sector engagement, and the hospital had to pay extra.

The private partner in the project was the Octagon consortium. Two years after the hospital opened, Octagon refinanced and secured a windfall gain of £116 million, £82 million of which it retained. In its recent report on what is an extraordinary scandal, the Public Accounts Committee said that "the benefits to Octagon's investors have soared on refinancing to levels which are unacceptable even for an early PFI deal".

The report went further, adding:

"We do not expect to see another Accounting Officer appearing before this Committee defending what we believe to be the unacceptable face of capitalism...in the consortium's dealings with the public sector."

Those are the words of the PAC's Conservative Chairman, and they are a pretty strong condemnation of what happened.

Octagon's chairman is the well respected Lord Lieutenant of Norfolk, Richard Jewson. He and his colleagues should reflect on the PAC's findings very carefully. It is a major Committee of this House, and its findings must be taken very seriously by the Government and their private-sector partners. Both the Government and Octagon should reflect on the findings, and consider whether it is in their long-term interests to assist the Norfolk and Norwich hospital trust further in dealing with its severe financial difficulties. The public of Norfolk will expect nothing less than a further contribution from Octagon.

I call on the Secretary of State to intervene. Norfolk's patients should not pay the price of pioneering a new form of financing on behalf of the Government and the health service. The premium for this expensive PFI contract amounts to about £6.8 million a year—a significant amount.

[Norman Lamb]

Many hon. Members might be aware that the market forces factor is the device by which the economics of operating in different geographical areas are taken into account and, theoretically, equalised to ensure fairness around the country. The formula is a fiction. I understand that departmental officials have serious doubts about whether it is fit for purpose. It discriminates against Norfolk and Norwich hospital and results in an income reduction for it of some £5.2 million in this financial year. Addenbrooke's enjoys a 13 per cent. advantage under the formula over the Norfolk and Norwich, yet the cost of employing staff in Cambridge and Norwich is precisely the same. All areas have to pay the same, other than London, which pays London weighting. The Secretary of State has undertaken to look at the formula. I know that it affects other parts of the country adversely as well. I hope that she will report back speedily to prevent the worst impact of the cuts to which I have referred. There needs to be a fair formula.

Finally, most hon. Members will not be familiar with the construction of the BBL pipeline—a gas pipeline to Backton in my constituency. The site takes in about a third of the country's gas supplies, so is of fundamental, strategic importance. The pipeline is of enormous significance and the Government are desperate to get it built before next winter because they do not want a repeat of the gas shortages that we experienced last winter. Clearly, it is an urgent priority.

When such projects are undertaken local inshore fishermen receive disruption payments. The construction of the pipeline might have a serious impact on their work and livelihoods. According to the DTI, there is no legislation or set procedure to be followed regarding compensation payments. Apparently, it is a matter of good will. That causes me and many others serious concern. It is extremely important that the fishermen's interests be protected. If something of national, strategic importance is being undertaken, those affected by it should not be forgotten.

I have particular concerns about the process that was followed. In negotiations with the company, two people represented the fishermen, Andy Roper and David Shillings. While acting for the fishermen, Mr. Shillings was offered a payment by the company. I raised these concerns with the company, but was told that I had got it all wrong, that Mr. Shillings was a representative of the company, not the fishermen, and that he would receive a payment of £50,000. I was told that this was all set out in a legal agreement and was above board. One week later I received an e-mail from the company, apologising that it had got it all wrong and that Mr. Shillings was not a representative of the company, but was a representative of the fishermen. The company apologised for the confusion. Its explanation was literally incredible.

One person cannot represent both sides in negotiations. A representative protecting the interests of the fishermen self-evidently cannot be offered £50,000 by the company with which he is negotiating. That raises a central concern: did the fishermen who depend on the North sea for the livelihoods receive a fair deal? I have raised the matter with the Government, who simply say that it is nothing to do with them and that it is for the company to negotiate with the fishermen. However, I should like the DTI to look into the issue. If such essential projects have an impact on other people, such as fishermen, their interests and their livelihoods should be taken into account. There should be a statutory right to disruption payments and a legal framework to protect their interests.

I have raised four issues of major concern to Norfolk, but they all have wider implications. I hope that the Minister will refer all of them to relevant colleagues.

5 pm

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): I am grateful for the chance to contribute briefly to the debate.

My constituency is the eighth richest in the country; anecdotally, I am told that we have more PhDs per square foot than any other constituency. However, representing an affluent constituency brings its own problems, which I want to highlight. It is important that the Government understand that one of the most economically dynamic areas of the country needs their assistance as much as deprived areas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) spoke eloquently about the crisis facing Oxfordshire's health services. Today, members of staff at the John Radcliffe hospital have been told the number of redundancies and job cuts that will be made. I do not propose to repeat the points that my hon. Friend made about our health service; I shall focus on some infrastructure issues that cause great concern in my constituency.

The main trunk road running through the constituency is the A34. Two weeks ago, tragically, a young man was killed crossing the road. The ensuing chaos was extraordinary to behold; it was like a scene from a disaster movie. Traffic was backed up for miles and people travelling between Wantage and Didcot took four or five hours to travel just six miles.

The A34 dual carriageway is the only road linking some parts of my constituency and some of its economic areas. There are no plans to upgrade the road for the foreseeable future, certainly not for the next 10 years, yet it is of major importance, taking freight from Southampton to the midlands while serving as a local road for local businesses that have a national and international imprint.

I urge the Minister to impress on his colleagues the need for the Government to take a proper, strategic look at infrastructure in my constituency. Not only does it contain some the country's most successful businesses, but it serves the south-east. We take most of London's waste for landfill and Didcot power station provides power for at least a third of the homes in the south-east. We are also due to get the Oxfordshire reservoir, of which Members who take an interest in our current water shortage will be fully aware. The reservoir site is just south of Abingdon and it will be huge—four miles wide—and will provide water for London and Swindon. The scheme has been on the cards since 1990, but there is tremendous uncertainty about the plans. It will be a national decision, taken by the Government, but it will have a huge impact on my local community. There has been no discussion and the Government have given no indication of the impact of the construction of the scheme. There has been no discussion about the additional benefits that could come to my constituency, in terms of upgrading the local infrastructure, if the reservoir were to be built.

The other great problem that I face—many of my colleagues who represent south-east constituencies also face it—is the number of new houses being built. In Didcot, the main town in my constituency, we are getting 3,000 additional homes and we are due to get a further 5,000 if the South East England regional assembly has its way. Just north of Wantage, in Grove, which is already the largest village in Europe, another 2,500 homes have just been approved, doubling the size of the village. With up to 12,000 or 13,000 additional homes in that small part of the country coming on line in the next 10 or 20 years, it will be vital to deal with the infrastructure, and particularly the A34.

Finally, the reason why the issue is so important in terms of the Government's national interest is that, thankfully for the people living in my constituency, an enormous amount of scientific investment is being made. The Diamond Synchrotron is due to come on line in the next year, representing a financial investment by the Government of some £500 million. That will ensure that Harwell/Chilton remains at the forefront of scientific innovation not just in our country, but in the world. Up the road, nuclear fusion research is taking place at Culham. With the opening of the ITER site in the next few years in the south of France, that work will continue to have enormous importance.

All that scientific investment means that we have a huge number of spin-off scientific companies such as Oxford Instruments and companies based at Milton park, which are really driving the British economy. However, when I visit those local businesses, they come back to me again and again with one point: the gradual breaking down of the local infrastructure. The road network is of poor quality and, recently, the Government, through First Great Western, were planning to cut train services between London and Didcot. We are still fighting that battle and we are gradually saving those train services. I hope that we will have saved them by the time that the revised timetable comes out in the autumn.

Essentially, my contribution to the debate is to ask the Government to sit at the table with my local politicians and local businesses to create some kind of strategic plan for my part of the world. We look after London's waste; we power the south-east; in the next decade, we are probably going to provide most of the water for London; and we have thriving, dynamic businesses. However, we receive almost no Government investment or strategic help whatsoever.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): This is the third recess Adjournment debate that I have sat through as shadow Leader of the House and, although such debates are usually seen and mainly used as a good opportunity for hon. Members to raise issues that are relevant to their constituents, it is noticeable that a number of hon. Members have used today's debate to raise issues of concern outside the United Kingdom. It was good that the debate was opened by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) with just such an appeal in relation to the recent EU announcement on fisheries in waters off the African coast—continuing his interest in matters relating to the western Sahara. He has sat through quite a lot of the debate, but unfortunately he is not in his place at the moment.

I was going to confess to the hon. Gentleman that I did not know many of the details of the announcement that he referred to. However, I felt that his comments raised an important wider issue relating to the way in which the House scrutinises decisions that are taken in the European Union. He referred to the question of what advice had been given to individual Members of the European Parliament on the fisheries issue and on how to vote on it. One of the questions that we in the House need to address is how the House can express a view before Ministers take decisions in the European Union arena, because at the moment the House is not able to express a view. Ministers take decisions and then come back with the results of those decisions. Even then, there is not adequate scrutiny.

Various other foreign affairs matters were raised. For example, the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) spoke in detail about Nigeria, a country that she obviously knows well. She talked about the need to ensure that money invested in Nigeria is used to the maximum benefit of all people in the country. She also spoke about payments by oil companies, and I would add intergovernmental support to that particular list. We need to address the aid that is given to countries more widely and ensure that it is used for the benefit of all in the country that receives it. The hon. Lady also talked about the future of Guantanamo Bay. She and several of her hon. Friends have led a principled campaign on the camp since it was first established.

The hon. Member for Stroud raised several points relating to his constituency. I noted his concerns about the environmental impact of the Severn barrage, but hope that he agrees that the Government need to broaden their policy on renewables beyond an overemphasis on wind farms, especially onshore wind farms.

I was pleased to hear from the hon. Gentleman that First Great Western was expressing an interest in improving the London-Cheltenham line. I merely caution him that First Great Western's interest in improvements does not always turn into action through which those improvements are seen, as I have discovered during my campaign to turn back the devastating cuts in services for my constituents who use Maidenhead and Twyford stations on the main line and the branch line stations of Wargrave, Furze Platt and Cookham. I wish the hon. Gentleman well in his campaign.

I also wish my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) well in his campaign with First Great Western on services to Didcot. Some of the services for his constituents are those that no longer stop in my constituency. His constituents are able to travel on the fast line, whereas my constituents have to take services on the slow line. The battle will continue with the Government because infrastructure is important to our parts of the country. My hon. Friend talked about the importance of his constituency, but the Thames Valley area is economically important to the south-east and the country as a whole and good train services are a key part of its economic vitality. The hon. Member for Stroud, my hon. Friend and I share a common concern in battling against First Great Western, so I hope that we will all have some success in our campaigns.

The hon. Member for Stroud also talked about access to affordable housing in rural areas. That matter was also touched on, albeit from a slightly different angle, by the hon. Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes), who spoke specifically about the need for more social housing in his constituency. Access to housing is indeed a problem in many parts of the country. Many people think of it as a paradox that under a Labour Government, the amount of social housing being built has fallen dramatically. Far from providing for those people in need of social housing, this Labour Government have left them on one side, all too often forgotten. Of course, that is a legacy of the Deputy Prime Minister when he had a job to do and a Department to run, as opposed to his position now when he has a grand title, a seat in Cabinet, a Cabinet Minister's pay, a grace-and-favour home and a car, but no Department to run.

The problem regarding the building of affordable homes in rural areas to which the hon. Member for Stroud referred cannot be addressed simply by building lots of smaller houses. Such houses can create additional problems in an area because they are often not built to designs that are sympathetic to local villages and towns. They are often built without the necessary supporting infrastructure, and, in some areas, the market means that even smaller homes are still not affordable for many. The Government need a more coherent approach on housing provision and should consider not just cramming yet more houses into smaller spaces, but the infrastructure required and support for those who are getting a foot on the property ladder. I was worried to hear reports earlier this week that the Government were pulling, or reducing, their scheme on housing for key workers, so perhaps the Deputy Leader of the House will address that in his winding-up speech.

The hon. Member for Stroud also talked about local government reform. I will not comment on his specific points about the structure of local government, but simply say that history shows us that a Government who start to focus on local government reform are generally a Government in decline.

The role of local government in attracting business to local areas was raised by the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), who gave a spirited advertisement for the town and its need to continue to attract investment and employment into the area. He argued for vision for Swindon. I suggest that he should also recognise the need for realism. However, I am grateful to him for his effective endorsement of the concept of general well-being raised in a speech earlier this week by my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), the Leader of the Opposition.

In addition to the international issues raised by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington, she also mentioned the important problem of gun, knife and gang crime. I very much support her view that we need to look not just at the crimes themselves, but at the youth culture that leads to them. The evidence is that many young men feel the need to carry knives for their own protection. However, as long as they do that, I am afraid that such crimes will continue and will increase in number, and the culture will never change.

It is our challenge to change that culture, but it cannot be done by legislation. We have had many debates about criminal justice measures, and 43 pieces of legislation have been passed in nine years, yet the problems remain. We have never properly debated the causes of antisocial behaviour and how to tackle the culture that leads to that criminal activity.

Norman Lamb: Tough on the causes of crime.

Mrs. May: Of course, the Government came into office with the mantra, "Tough on crime, tough on the causes of crime." What we have is lots of legislation on crime, but nothing on the causes of crime.

The picture that the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington drew was echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) in an effective contribution that painted a vivid picture of the problems in his area and the lack of activity by the previous Labour council. I congratulate the Conservative group on Bexley council on its excellent results in the local elections on 4 May.

Antisocial behaviour was also raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink). Sadly, the problems identified by my hon. Friends are experienced elsewhere. Last Saturday afternoon, I spoke to residents in South road and High Town road in Maidenhead about the problems they experience from gangs congregating near Grenfell park and from people walking past their houses after they have left bars. They are often young people who have been binge drinking, a problem to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford drew attention.

My hon. Friend also mentioned police community support officers. I agree that we need more police on the streets but, failing that, we need more PCSOs. A recent petition that I and others ran in Woodley in my constituency got more than 600 signatures in favour of a PCSO there. It is only a pity that the Liberal Democrat-controlled Woodley town council has been reluctant to find the £15,000 necessary to part-fund a PCSO out of the £1 million it takes each year from local residents.

My hon. Friend rightly said that those problems are quality of life issues and that we must have zero tolerance of crime and antisocial behaviour. It is only by not accepting that sort of behaviour and by insisting that something be done about it that we can hope to overcome the problem. If we shrug our shoulders and pass on, saying, "Well, it's only antisocial behaviour," the problems are exacerbated.

Local policing will not be helped by the Government's moves to create large regional forces. As the hon. Member for Chesterfield said, those moves are often rejected by local forces. The Government's consultation on that has been shown to be a complete sham by the number of police forces that do not want to be merged and yet those mergers are going ahead.

On a different subject, the hon. Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) spoke about water supply, in particular leakages, but also the impact of increased costs on many people. There is no doubt that rises in the costs of utilities, together with rises in council tax, have hit many people hard, especially those who are on fixed incomes. She also referred to the water shortage in the south-east. Obviously, repairing those leaks would have a significant impact on that, but I suspect that she and those of us who spend part of our time in London should say a word of gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage, who told us that his constituency is going to have a reservoir which will help to solve London's water problems.

On the subject of water shortages, last night, I visited the 2nd Cox Green girl guides in my constituency. I answered questions about my experience as a Member of Parliament, and I encouraged the girls to think about politics as a career. I was asked a range of questions, but as we sat with the rain beating against the window, one girl could not help but ask why there was a hosepipe ban.

I suspect that water shortages are less of a problem in the constituency of the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid). He raised a number of issues that affect his constituents, most of them arising from the geographical position of his constituency. It is right to remind the Government of the problems experienced by rural areas, where the considerable distances that people have to travel make it more difficult for them to access services. They must pay high petrol prices, but the Government's attempts to drive people on to public transport simply do not work in such areas because, as he pointed out, public transport is not available. As a result, people in rural areas end up paying more.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the Royal Mail and the removal of the post office card account. He and other hon. Members will know that in recent months that has been raised time and time again in business questions, but the Government continue to duck the issue. May I remind the Deputy Leader of the House that the chief executive of the Post Office has said that the removal of the post office card account would result in the Post Office operating 10,000 fewer branches? The Government, however, have refused to address the future of the Post Office. They cannot continue to set their face against the issue. They must address it, as the removal of the card account will have a significant impact on the future of Post Office branches.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson) gave us an entertaining picture of the political scene in Hull, with particular reference to school meals. May I suggest that before she worries about cross-party consensus she should try to achieve consensus in her own party? She obviously feels strongly about healthy eating, which she regards as the answer to childhood obesity. I believe that there are two sides to the problem: it is not just about what children eat but about how much exercise they take. Sadly, under the Government, there has been a drop in physical activity in many schools. For many years, children have become increasingly sedentary, whether they are watching television, surfing the net or playing computer games, so we must ensure that they take more physical exercise and run around. In business questions, I said that the cramming of houses into smaller spaces reduced the size of gardens, so children did not have much space to run around and enjoy physical activity. I am sorry that that met with laughter from Government Members, as the policy of cramming too many small houses on to a site reduces gardens and open space, which will have an impact in future.

Reduced access to public parks will have a similar impact. No recess Adjournment debate would be complete without a contribution from my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point, who said that public parks in his constituency were important, as they gave youngsters space to run around. Other members of the population could walk and sit in them, and their enjoyment would improve their quality of life. He raised, too, matters of conscience on which he has strong views, particularly abortion and the use of human embryos. However, he raised one issue that was new to me—the creation of animal-human hybrids—and I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House listened carefully to the points that he made.

In yesterday's debate on the Education and Inspections Bill, we raised special needs education, particularly special schools, as my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) pointed out. He referred to the problems experienced by many parents of children with special needs when trying to access the right provision for their children. The process means that parents often have to spend a long time fighting for such provision for their children. For some, that ends up in tribunals, and often in paying for support at the tribunal. I shared my hon. Friend's concern about the case that he raised in relation to the daughter of his constituent, Mrs. Chambers. The fact that information can be kept from parents should be a concern for us all in the House.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue of bullying, which is a problem for far too many children. Like him, I do not believe we do enough to prevent and stop bullying. Sadly, whereas good practice in schools can improve the situation, bad practice can at best achieve nothing and at worst can make matters worse. We must do more to identify good practice with regard to bullying and to spread that good practice.

My hon. Friend also spoke about basic literacy in our schools. It is a serious matter, not just because of the impact that illiteracy has on children's lives as they go through school and the fact that it holds them back in further learning, but because of the problems that it causes when they reach adulthood in getting a job and in basic living—understanding Government forms or reading instructions on convenience food or medicine bottles—let alone how it affects their overall quality of life. My hon. Friend is right: we in the House should be more angry about the matter than we are, and I commend him for highlighting it.

Quality of life was also a theme in the contribution of the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb), who spoke about a number of constituency cases, notably that of his constituent Tony Thorpe, who was not eligible for redundancy payments following the closure of RAF Coltishall. The hon. Gentleman ably set out his constituent's case and the apparent unfairness of the current regulations. He also spoke about the treatment of North sea fishermen in the context of the work on the BBL pipeline. I trust that the Deputy Leader of the House listened to those specific points.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk mentioned a Tesco store in Sheringham. I remember Sheringham from my childhood. I remember playing crazy golf on the beach at Sheringham with much joy and delight, at least to me, if not to those watching and playing with me. The hon. Gentleman's comments about the Tesco store raised important points about the planning system, particularly about negotiations between the council and Tesco.

I cannot comment on the individual case because I do not know enough about the details, but there is an issue with regard to the planning system because it depends on public confidence. All those involved in the planning process have a duty to behave in a way that ensures public confidence in the system. It is an issue that I often raise with reference to the enforcement of planning conditions. If developers believe that they can get away with breaching or ignoring planning conditions, the whole system is brought into disrepute.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wantage, who squeezed his way into the debate at the end, spoke about a variety of issues. I have mentioned the transport issue. For areas of economic vitality, infrastructure is crucial. The Thames Valley Economic Partnership has pointed out that because the Thames valley is economically vibrant and doing well, transport infrastructure is not put into it. Of course, the opposite is true. If transport infrastructure is not put in, the economic vibrancy will start to fail.

My hon. Friend mentioned the Diamond synchrotron and other incredibly impressive scientific work being done in his constituency. Last week at the TVEP dinner, I had the benefit of listening to somebody from the Rutherford Appleton laboratory in his constituency, who waxed lyrical for some time about space exploration and the impressive scientific work being done there. He also told us one important fact: in 2029 an asteroid will come very close to earth. The good news is that in 2029 it only comes close to earth. The bad news is that in 2036 it may very well hit the earth. Like everybody at the dinner, those in the Chamber are probably making a mental calculation of where they will be in 2036 and whether that matters to them. I leave them to do that.

Several hon. Members mentioned the NHS. It has been raised consistently in business questions since I became shadow Leader of the House in December. The hon. Member for Chesterfield was the first to mention it in this afternoon's debate when he spoke about job losses at his local hospital, which is not a failing but a three-star hospital that has consistently delivered Government policy. Both the current and the previous Leader of the House have constantly criticised me in business questions for referring to job cuts in the NHS. I reiterate that they should get out and find what is happening in the NHS.

As several hon. Members said, real job cuts are taking place. There are 43 fewer ward sisters in the Chesterfield royal infirmary, 600 jobs are going in the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust and 450 jobs will be lost in the Norfolk and Norwich University Hospital NHS Trust. Cuts are also happening in mental health trusts, as my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) outlined when he mentioned the Hertfordshire Partnership NHS Trust. Berkshire Healthcare NHS Trust has to save £10 million. It hopes to do that without cuts in services, but how can it without affecting services?

My hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne referred to his somewhat cosy relationship with the Secretary of State for Health, which he appears to have developed on several occasions in the Division Lobby. He gave the impression that he had spent rather a lot of time with her there. Although I appreciate that we have joined the Government in the Lobby on a small number of occasions recently, my hon. Friend has either been spending more time there than with us—I doubt that—or he is a fast worker. However, job cuts in the health service are a serious matter. They will affect patient care, not only the lives of those whose jobs are taken away.

The hon. Member for Chesterfield specifically mentioned financial planning and what happens when the Government pull the rug away from under one's feet half way through the system. In the Thames valley area, the rules changed six months into the financial year and it was therefore little wonder that the trusts found themselves in financial difficulties. Yet the Government keep saying that mismanagement in the trusts leads to the deficits. That is often not the case, and the Government's actions cause the problems.

Mr. Walker: Does not my right hon. Friend think it remarkable that a trust that has balanced its books for five years without going into deficit is now being asked to contribute £5.6 million to other trusts' deficits?

Mrs. May: Yes, I do. It is also remarkable that the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust, which is the most efficient trust, has to make 600 job cuts as a result of the requirement to cut the amount of money that it is spending. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) spoke movingly about the impact of that decision, which is being made today, on not only those who lose their jobs but Horton general hospital in his constituency and services for his constituents generally.

The Government keep responding, as the hon. Member for North Swindon did today, by saying that more money is being spent on the NHS today than in the past, so everything must be all right. We all know that more money is being spent on the NHS today than in the past. Taxpayers know that, but they want to know how the Secretary of State for Health can say that it has been the best year ever for the NHS when staff are losing their jobs, community hospitals are threatened with closure and units such as the maternity unit at Wycombe hospital have been closed. That means that people have to travel further for services and their choice is being taken away from them. People have a simple question. They know that they have been paying more towards the health service, but what has happened to the money? The answer is that too much has been spent on the target culture and administrative changes.

I have been a Member of Parliament for nine years and, in that time, the structure of primary care in my constituency has been changed four times. Those changes not only disrupt services but take up money that is doing nothing to improve patient care. The Government need to open their eyes to what is happening out there in the national health service. People know that the money that the Government are spending is not going on the improvements that they were promised, and from which they believed they would benefit. This Government are out of touch and in paralysis.

5.35 pm

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): One of the pleasures of holding this position in the House of Commons is that it gives me the opportunity to listen to so many contributions from colleagues on both sides of the House, as they speak from experience and with passion and conviction. I want to deal with as many of their points as possible in sequence, but I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I deal first with what I thought was the outstanding contribution among the many excellent speeches made today.

The hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) talked about the problems relating to special educational needs, a matter in which I have both a professional and a private interest. He spoke movingly of the struggle that individual families face, and I am glad that the subject has been raised. It is important that the report from the Select Committee be taken seriously and I know that its members will have listened to him and to others with expertise in this field. That will mean that they will be able to produce a very informed report.

The hon. Member also raised bullying in schools and, like him, I praise Dame Kelly Holmes for lending her considerable weight on that issue. He hinted about the way in which the issue was being tackled. I believe that this relates to leadership in schools and that the problem can be dealt with. Indeed, it has been dealt with most effectively in my own constituency by a relatively new head teacher called Donald Macdonald of Liberton high school. He takes personal responsibility for the issue and talks to parents himself, rather than delegating the task to the deputy head or to other teachers. He takes what other hon. Members have described as a zero tolerance approach.

The hon. Member also mentioned literacy levels, but I shall not respond by saying where the improvements have been made. We need to look at how the problems are to be tackled. I heard similar criticisms before I came to this role, when I was the Minister with responsibility for small businesses and construction. Those concerns are shared equally by Digby Jones of the CBI, by Brendan Barber and by the Federation of Small Businesses, among others. Although I believe that we have turned a corner on this issue, we should unite to drive up standards further, along the lines suggested by the hon. Member.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) requested that I take up the issue of the European Union and the Moroccan fishing settlement. I shall ensure that my colleagues in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Foreign Office learn of his concerns and write to him about them. He also mentioned his criticisms of the Severn barrage. I know that that issue divides Members of Parliament just as it divides communities. He said that he was pro-nuclear and I know that he will be making a submission to the Energy Minister, who is considering that matter.

My hon. Friend also touched on local government and on his belief that the Government must implement their reform of local government, especially in his area, which has a two-tier council structure. Again, I will ensure that my colleagues who are dealing with that issue are made aware of his comments. He and other hon. Members mentioned railway lines. In his case, it was a single line that was causing problems. That must be frustrating for him, as he will be aware that we have doubled spending on the railways in the past five years to £4.3 billion, and that we now have the fastest growing railway in Europe. Last year, it carried more than 1 billion passengers, which I understand might be the highest figure on record. However, there is still more to be done. He praised the Affordable Rural Housing Commission and supported community land trusts, and I know that that will be welcome as well.

The hon. Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) raised a number of issues. I am sorry to hear that his local three-star hospital is reporting the steps that it wishes to take. The true picture is very different from the one painted in the media. There have been other reports where the number of job cuts has simply not been realised. Although the facts are not something that many Opposition Members seem interested in, let me give him some for solace. Of course, all the extra spending in the health service has gone on helping to recruit more nurses, doctors and consultants. In his own health area, the last figures that I saw indicated that there were something like 3,500 more nurses serving his constituents and the wider health area than in 1997, and more than 1,000 doctors and more than 300 consultants.

The hon. Member referred to the problems that he says are being faced in dentistry. He will know that we have increased investment in dental schools and education by more than 30 per cent., but to ensure better value for money, we have also increased the number of dental students by 34 per cent. The facts are clear: 4,600 more dentists are now practising in general and personal dental services than in 1997. Although adult registrations with dentists fell by 1 million between 1992 and 1997, under this Government they have increased by 1 million, but there are still issues that must be addressed and I am grateful to him for raising the issue.

The hon. Member spoke of people's inability to secure social housing. I chaired the housing committee in Edinburgh some years before his service in local government. I never shared the misguided support for the indiscriminate sale of council houses. I am pleased that £150 million has been spent by the Government to reduce homelessness, which is down by 70 per cent.

I thought that the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) was uncharacteristically critical of the Deputy Prime Minister. If she looks at the record that I think he will be judged on, she will see 230,000 more affordable houses and a £2.2 billion budget that has gone to secure 30,000 social houses a year towards 2008. Those are important benefits, when we need to address the issue of housing for those who are priced out of the high-value housing market.

The hon. Member for Chesterfield also mentioned the police merger, but that has been the subject of extensive consultation. One thing was clear before that consultation was embarked on: there were too many police authorities. The arrangements are not fit for purpose in the 21st century and they must be reorganised, and I am sure that, at the end of the day, we will have a more effective police service in his area and elsewhere.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) raised an issue that concerns all hon. Members: knife crime. It is important to ensure that the steps that we have taken so far are made even more effective. We have added a number of knife types to the offensive weapons list. We have raised the minimum age at which knives can be bought from 16 to 18. There is now a knife amnesty, which runs until 30 June. The last knife amnesty took place exactly 10 years ago, and I understand the more than 30,000 weapons were handed in. Of course, the message from us all is clear: carrying knives is an offence. They are offensive weapons. They merit penalties for possession, including imprisonment. I am glad that that was raised.

The Government have been clear and consistent on Guantanamo Bay. It would be better if the Guantanamo Bay base closed. The US Administration know our position.

My hon. Friend also raised Nigeria and the pipeline explosion that killed an estimated 200 people who she said were responsible for illegally tapping into that pipeline. Nigeria is a country in which we have taken a particular interest and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was there earlier this week. We are determined to ensure that our aid to that part of Africa and elsewhere is proportionate to our being the fourth largest economy in the world.

The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) raised the issue of the NHS trust in his area and his concerns over the reported number of threatened job losses that the acting chief executive of the trust is telling him about. It is important, again, to know that there have been several thousand additional NHS front-line staff—nurses, consultants and doctors specifically—since 1997. That is all part of that investment whereby spending on the NHS will triple between 1997 and 2008. I regret that neither he nor his hon. Friends voted for any of that additional money to the health service. I do not have to remind his constituents of what would have been the impact had the Conservative budget continued.

The hon. Member raised the issue, as did the right hon. Member for Maidenhead, who is speaking for the Opposition today, and implied that, although a lot more money may have been spent, the quality of service and delivery of services have not improved. Let me give him and the House the improvements in the two primary care trusts in his area—North East Oxfordshire and Cherwell Vale. In 1997-98, there were 6,912 operations carried out in North East Oxfordshire PCT. That figure has risen by a quarter to 8,536. The figure for the Cherwell Vale PCT was 10,847 operations in 1997-98. In 2004-05, it had risen by almost 50 per cent. to 15,152.

Tony Baldry: May I make a request of the Deputy Leader of the House? All I ask is that we find a Minister who will come to Oxfordshire to see the reality, rather than living in this fantasy world. Will a Minister come to Oxfordshire and explain to my constituents how losing a general hospital is in some way an improvement and an advance?

Nigel Griffiths: The hon. Member spoiled the strength of his appeal with talk of a fantasy world and by not accepting the facts. I was surprised at the strength of his language in saying that that was the blackest day ever, in the face of such figures and a trend that I am confident will continue.

The hon. Member mentioned the reorganisation as well as the position of general hospitals and of maternity—

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Nigel Griffiths: How could I refuse?

Mr. Burns: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, because there is an issue that causes problems here. He told us how many operations there were in that PCT area in 1996-97 and how many now. Can he tell us how he worked out the number of operations carried out in 1996-97, because there was no such thing as a PCT at that time?

Nigel Griffiths: I looked at the same geographical area and the information covered by it. The figures will have been added up from the hospitals in operation then and divided between PCTs. That is a fair question, if I might say.

On hospital closures, I know from the major hospitals in my constituency, including the sick children's hospital, which I visited last Saturday, that the relentless pressure on technology, as well as the need for multi-million pound suites of technological equipment and for large teams of specialists, are driving the health service towards not just a more expensive delivery of service, but centralisation, because the critical mass can be achieved only by harmonising.

I recognise that that causes problems and it gives me no pleasure to hear from the hon. Member for Banbury, who is genuinely representing constituents' concerns, that his constituents may have to travel for an hour to a local hospital. That has been accepted over time in rural areas, and it is a pity if people see it as a diminution of the modern health service. I am not convinced, however, that such technological development, with highly skilled surgeons, nursing teams, anaesthetists and so on, does not tend to dictate that fewer highly expensive facilities are provided that do more and more effectively. I hope that he can have that dialogue with my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Health. It is, however, a genuinely vexing issue.

The hon. Member also mentioned one or two other issues, and I shall not make the political points that I might have done—[Interruption.] Can I get away with saying that, in relation to cardiology services, 2.5 million patients are now receiving specialist drug treatments compared with 300,000 in 1997? I do not know how much of that is related to extra funding, how much is related to technology and so on. Without making a political point, I am glad, as he will be glad, that 2.5 million people are receiving that treatment. Of course, since 1997, heart disease is down by 38 per cent.

Mrs. May: If cardiology services have improved so much, why did more than 100 patients have their operations cancelled at the John Radcliffe hospital, which is part of the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust, at the turn of the year? They were not put on a longer waiting list; they were just told that the hospital did not provide that operation any longer.

Nigel Griffiths: I am sure that staff at that hospital did not sit down and say that they were going to consign 100 patients to some terrible condition from which they are going to die. I do not believe that modern clinicians, surgeons and cardiologists do that. The right hon. Member is using that case selectively, without appreciating the full facts. No doctor or consultant would deprive any of her constituents of an operation or treatment that they thought necessary. They are getting more funding to carry out such treatment now than ever.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) raised a number of issues relating to regeneration. I know that he will make further representations, and I was pleased that he raised the issue of a new library, as the staff of Edinburgh's Sighthill library, which is near my constituency, have just been given a UK-wide award for best public service delivery of the year.

As the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) warmed to his subject, he became less heated and more persuasive, having started at a pretty fierce pace. It is unusual for me to praise a Member for that. Of course, we share his concern about gangs of youths, which was also raised by other Members. We have put through legislation that is helping to control that problem, and that was acknowledged. Some criticism was made relating to whether the police could provide better enforcement, and I am sure that we all have that dialogue with our police forces when we get complaints from local residents. I know that chief constables such as mine listen and respond in relation to their policing technique. There are many more police to deal with the problem now. I will not give the figure. It should also be recognised that there have been 4 million fewer victims of reported crime over the past nine years, along with a substantial drop in the number of burglaries and cases of violent crime. We want to ensure that that trend continues. I have listened carefully to what has been said by the hon. Member and others, and I will ensure that, notwithstanding his other duties at the moment, the Home Secretary is aware of the concerns that are being voiced.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) raised a case involving a constituent that I am sure is not unique. I should also be surprised if the chief executive did not respond fairly promptly. I know that she would not hesitate to refer the matter to Ofwat if she did not receive a satisfactory response. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs will happily respond to any issues that she may wish to raise with him.

The hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) advocates road pricing. I am sorry that I could not enlist his support for the conversion of the Liberal Democrats in Edinburgh, who campaigned against it with environmental groups. I may refer them to him for a bit of education. I will certainly check whether the Scottish Liberal Democrat Minister responsible for transport, Tavish Scott, can intervene with a subsidy to help the ferry service about which the hon. Gentleman is concerned. He may not have budgeted for it, but the hon. Gentleman issued a heartfelt plea.

There are a number of serious issues relating to the Post Office. For me, the most serious is the poor treatment that it receives from Liberal Democrat councils such as Aberdeen. Unlike my colleagues in Edinburgh, who have ensured that people can pay rent, service charges and trade waste charges in their local post offices, I am afraid that the Liberal Democrats in Aberdeen refuse to take up that service. After I raised the matter when responding to an Adjournment debate some time ago, they said that they would think about it. That was before the election, so it was at least a year and a bit ago. I am sorry that there has been no movement on that. We have shown in Edinburgh how it can be done, and that it is the best way of supporting a local service.

The best way to support the card service is to do what the Government have been doing: spending, I understand, almost £1 billion on the service over its duration, until towards the end of the decade. The service has been strongly endorsed by the Government and funded by them to the tune of the colossal sum of about £100 million a year. I understand that it is only one of 23 or 24 card and payment services that are available to post office customers, and I urge them to explore those other services as well.

The hon. Member referred to the search and rescue helicopter service. I will certainly draw that to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. The hon. Member mentioned digital changeover, and called for taxpayers' money to help. I do not know whether that is an uncosted Liberal Democrat budget promise. He raised another tax issue with his plea for a reduction in the tax on petrol in rural areas. Again, I am keen to see the costings. I am not sure whether the matter was raised in the recent Budget debate, but I will check the minutes. I am sorry that my Labour colleagues in the Scottish Parliament in Edinburgh seem to have been misled, seduced almost, by the Liberal Democrat practices down in Hull that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson) highlighted. She made an excellent speech about the need to tackle obesity. That sounds like a pilot project well worth extending throughout the country, and I hope that my colleagues in the Department of Health will note what she said.

There were a number of other contributions, but time is tight, so I will endeavour to—

It being Six o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Health Services (Gloucestershire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Steve McCabe.]

6 pm

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): I first want to place on the record my thanks to Mr. Speaker for selecting as the subject for this Adjournment debate health services in the Forest of Dean and Gloucestershire. The background to the debate is that on 10 May, which was rightly named "black Wednesday" by my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), 12 hospitals or similar facilities and hundreds of beds and jobs were threatened with closure by the local health trust.

As those closures will affect all the Gloucestershire constituencies, we tried to start an all-party campaign against them. Four of the six Gloucestershire MPs—my hon. Friends the Member for Cotswold and for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) and myself—are opposing the closures. I see that the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) is in the Chamber, and I know that he, too, has many concerns about the closures. We are stronger when we are united; it is just unfortunate that we have been unable to get all six Gloucestershire Members on board for a united campaign.

In my constituency, both the community hospitals—the Dilke Memorial hospital and the Lydney and district hospital—face closure, and the closure of Colliers Court, which deals with mental health, is also proposed. I am very grateful to our local press, which has run strong campaigns on this issue. The Forester and its editor, Viv Hargreaves, ran a "Save our Services" campaign, and The Citizen and its editor, Ian Mean, ran a "Save our Hospitals" campaign.

So that the Minister completely understands why people in Gloucestershire are so concerned about these closures, it is worth considering briefly one or two of the recent headlines in the local papers. The Citizen ran "A Black Day for Health Care in the County", The Forester ran "Meltdown in the NHS", and the Forest of Dean and Wye Valley Review ran "The Bitter Pill". As recently as yesterday, one paper ran the headline, "Take Your Medicine—the only way to beat off the threat to the Dilke and Lydney hospitals is to bring down the Government." That is perhaps going a little too far for the moment, but that headline certainly represents the strength of feeling in my constituency. In the light of the tremendous public concern, the broadcast media have also been excellent. ITV, the BBC and our local radio stations have covered the issue very well. I want also to pay tribute to local campaigners who have rallied to defend our services; there are too many to thank individually.

On 11 May, my hon. Friends the Members for Cotswold and for Tewkesbury and I wrote to the Secretary of State for Health a letter that we, with a delegation of nurses from Gloucestershire, hand-delivered to the Department of Health. We are still waiting for even a holding reply. People in the office of my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold spoke to the Department last week and at the beginning of this week, but we cannot expect even the reply to a request for a meeting until next week—during the recess.

The Secretary of State has already had a meeting with the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda), and I had thought that the Department was perhaps playing party politics. Then I discovered during yesterday's Westminster Hall debate on community hospitals that the hon. Member for Stroud, too, has written to the Secretary of State and has not had an answer. We expect a reply soon, and with no disrespect to the Minister present, we also expect to have a meeting with the Secretary of State. I would be grateful if the Minister gave some indication of when we will get a reply, and a meeting.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am happy to make common cause with the hon. Gentleman. I have not said that I will not see the Secretary of State; in fact, I have been lobbying her very carefully in the past few days. The hon. Gentleman might be surprised to hear that I have had a reply from the chief executive of the strategic health authority. On tracking down the figures, it has emerged that in the past four years, Avon and Wiltshire received £175 million in additional funding, of which Gloucestershire has, of course, had none. We might want to raise that point with the Secretary of State, and the hon. Gentleman will doubtless be willing to join me on that particular bandwagon.

Mr. Harper: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that point; we would welcome his joining us in our meeting with the Secretary of State. That interesting information perhaps highlights the concerns that constituents have when they see that the various areas within a strategic health authority are not being treated fairly and equally, which is all that they are asking for.

The White Paper on community hospitals makes it clear that community hospitals that are under threat of closure should not be lost in response to short-term budgetary pressures. Both the Dilke and Lydney community hospitals in my constituency are threatened with closure for exactly that reason, and I want to know what the Government intend to do about that contradiction.

I raised that issue with the Prime Minister yesterday, and instead of answering my question he changed the subject. I hope that the Minister will do better. The Prime Minister is quick to claim credit for any good news in the NHS, as he attempted to do in his response to me yesterday, but if he is personally responsible for all that goes well, it follows that he must take responsibility for what goes badly. If he is responsible for new hospitals opening, he is also responsible when community hospitals are closed.

It is not only hospitals that we must be concerned about, but the services available in the community. I received an e-mail yesterday from a GP in my constituency, who pointed out that there is a complete embargo by the PCT on replacing staff who leave and on employing new staff. In the West Gloucestershire PCT, which covers my constituency, six health visitor posts and two community nursing posts are being held unfilled. That does not fill us with confidence that services that are being cut in hospitals will be replaced by services in the community.

The Minister will know that I continue to raise, through parliamentary questions, the issue of the policy of the Department of Health on deficits in the NHS. The cuts proposed in Gloucestershire have been prompted by deficits, but there is a contradiction at the heart of Government policy, and I hope that the Minister can clear it up. The January 2006 operating framework for 2006-07 said:

"All NHS organisations should plan to recover deficits for previous years and balance their books for 2006-07."

However, the Secretary of State wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) on 12 April, stating that the Department expected

"all organisations that are overspending to show improvements during 2006-07, and by the end of the year everyone should have monthly income covering monthly expenditure."

Those two statements outline different policies and both cannot be true. My hon. Friend tried to get an answer to that conundrum at Health questions on 16 May. The Secretary of State was absent, for a good reason, and the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) skirted around the issue and did not answer the question.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison), in winding up for the Opposition in the debate on community hospitals in Westminster Hall yesterday, pressed the matter again. The Minister of State intended, I am sure, to answer the question yesterday, but unfortunately ran out of time. I plan to give the Minister adequate time to deal with the question in this debate, and it is critical to my constituents and others in Gloucestershire that she does.

The strategic health authority for Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire is operating under the impression that financial balance must be achieved across the year and all historic deficits must be cleared. That message is being driven down to the primary care trusts. Moreover, Gloucestershire—to reinforce the point made by the hon. Member for Stroud—is losing £6 million this year, which is being taken away to bail out other areas, and we are expected to cut services to fund that. If the Minister does not confirm the position set out by the Secretary of State in her letter to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire, the cuts bandwagon will continue rolling and will pick up speed.

I now come to consultation. The health White Paper also says:

"PCTs taking current decisions about the future of community hospitals will be required to demonstrate to their SHA that they have consulted locally and have considered options such as developing new pathways, new partnerships and new ownership possibilities. SHAs will then test PCT community hospital proposals against the principles of this White Paper."

I have to say that many people in my constituency have a very cynical view of consultations. They believe, with some justice, that decisions are already taken, that lip service will be paid to their views and then the PCTs will plough on regardless. Just yesterday, I heard that an official from the PCT turned up at the Dilke hospital, and when asked what he was doing, said that he was there to oversee the closure. That is before the consultation process has even started.

The Department's own guidance says that "there is a statutory duty for NHS bodies to consult the local overview and scrutiny committee on a substantial change...committees should also note the duty to 'consult and involve' patients and the public conferred on NHS organisations".

The NHS has also issued guidance on service changes. It says that proposals for reconfiguration of services should involve the development of options with people, rather than for them. They should also focus on the redesign of services, and not their relocation, and take a whole-systems view that explores the contribution of all health and social care providers, working together to build sustainable solutions for the whole community. None of that has happened. The proposals for cuts came out of the blue and at short notice. They took everybody by surprise.

The Department's guidance also states that the local NHS body must also make it clear when the consultation period will end. Full consultation should last for a minimum of 12 weeks. In their headlong rush to cut services, the PCTs are determined that consultation should last only five weeks, but I can see no justification for that. Moreover, the PCTs are also threatening us. The chief executive of the West Gloucestershire PCT told The Citizen newspaper on 23 May:

"We have no option but to speed up our plans to change services...Every month that goes by without savings being made increases the level of savings required later in the year."

That is blackmail, pure and simple. It is not acceptable to me or to my constituents to say that more services will be cut if we demand a proper consultation period. I hope that the Minister will spell out the Government's view of the matter, as I am sure that the PCT will take note of it. Does she agree that the people of the Forest of Dean and Gloucestershire are entitled to a consultation process of at least 12 weeks, or does she support the blackmail strategy adopted by the PCTs?

I wanted to talk about whether the changes are "substantial"—a description used but not defined in the relevant regulations. I do not have time to go into detail, but some of the proposal headings deal with changes in service accessibility, the impact on the wider community and especially on transport, the number of patients affected and the method of service delivery. I therefore contend that the proposed changes are indeed substantial.

In addition, I want to put it on record that if the overview and scrutiny committee considers that the proposal is not in the interests of the health service in its area, it may refer the decision to the Secretary of State. If the consultation process lasts only a meagre five weeks, I strongly urge the committee to do just that.

The NHS guidance also says that, when the overview and scrutiny committee considers whether a proposal is in the interest of the local health service, it should also consider the extent to which patients, the public and stakeholders more widely have been involved in planning and development. Only by securing full involvement activity will an NHS body be able to take a considered view of whether its plans are in the interests of the health service for which it is responsible. I contend that so far, none of that activity has taken place.

[Mr. Harper]

One other aspect is worth mentioning. The Minister will know that existing PCTs will be dissolved in September this year—a fact that does not exactly promote long-term thinking, as existing board members and senior managers will, understandably, be worried about their future. I, and a number of my hon. Friends, would prefer such decisions to be taken by the people who will be around to implement them and deal with their impact. They should not be taken by people who will be able to wash their hands of the whole thing in September and move on to something else.

The Department has answered my parliamentary questions by confirming that the new PCT to be established in Gloucestershire from 1 October will not be bound by any decisions that have not been implemented by that date. I think that it would be better to wait, and I would be grateful if the Minister would say whether she and the Government agree.

It is worth spending a little time on explaining why the cuts, especially to the community hospitals, have generated such anger in the Forest of Dean. Local people feel a tremendous sense of ownership of their hospitals, and for a very good reason. Both hospitals have friends organisations that have raised tremendous sums, and that money has been spent on new equipment and on financing new buildings. When the PCT threatens to close hospitals that have been built, at least in part, by the community's own efforts, there is justifiable anger.

I do not have time to go into tremendous detail, but it is worth noting that the friends of Lydney hospital have raised about £840,000 since 1990. The money has been spent on equipment for the hospital, and in several instances has contributed to significant hospital building. When the A and E department was built the friends contributed £225,000, and when GP beds were being developed the friends contributed £280,000. The community truly views that hospital as its own, and views with anger the proposal to close it.

Gloucestershire's share of health funding is only 88 per cent. of the national average. The demand for health care in Gloucestershire does not reflect that. The change in the formula in 1997 increased the weighting for deprivation and reduced the weighting for the age of the population. I do not expect that to be fixed now, or even that the Minister will comment, but it is useful to put down this marker for the 2007 comprehensive spending review, when it can be addressed.

A delegation of GPs from my constituency came to see me yesterday after they had a meeting with Lord Warner at the Department of Health. They are working on a set of alternative proposals for the Forest. I understand that the proposals were of great interest to the Minister. However, if we do not slow down this headlong rush to cuts, it will be too late to implement those proposals, because some of the facilities will already have been closed.

Yesterday, when the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Leigh, replied to the debate on community hospitals, he said,

"People want services to be available closer to where they live, and they want health and social care to become more seamless with more personalised and integrated care."

He continued:

"the White Paper laid out clearly our intention to move toward more local and community provision."

It seems to me that the proposals of the primary care trust move in the opposite direction.

The Minister also said:

"It is incumbent upon every one of us, as leaders in our communities, to lead that debate"— that is, the well-informed debate called for by the NHS Confederation. I am pleased to have played my small part today in holding this one. He also said that during the summer a statement would be made about the amount of capital that the Government would make available for new community facilities. It would be criminal if that statement was made after the facilities in Gloucestershire had already been cut.

In response to the hon. Member for Stroud, the Minister said that the Government were planning

"an announcement on the White Paper in due course, which will apply to all kinds of services...it will cover the breadth of services. We want PCTs to look carefully at the White Paper; it is not just words, and we want them to see clearly the direction of travel and provide the kind of services that his constituents and mine want on the ground."—[Official Report, 24 May 2006; Vol. 446, c.511-513.]

I agree with that, but if the Minister who is here today wants that vision to take shape in Gloucestershire, it is not enough to say the words; she needs to act.

At the moment the primary care trusts are heading in the opposite direction. By the time the Government make any announcement, the cuts will have been made. I urge the Minister to intervene and send a clear instruction to the strategic health authority and the primary care trust to stop, listen and think again. If she does that, she will have my thanks and that of my hon. Friends. If not, the people of the Forest of Dean and Gloucestershire will not forgive her, or this Labour Government.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) on securing this debate on health services in the Forest of Dean and Gloucestershire. I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) to the debate.

I appreciate that this issue is of great concern to the hon. Member for Forest of Dean and his constituents and I will do my best to respond. Within the framework of the national health service plan and other national guidance, responsibility for planning and developing local services lies with local health organisations. I am sure that he would agree that that is important and has been a change. It reflects the fact that there are different needs in different communities around the country. The health needs of one area may not be the same as those in another part of England. Even within a PCT area there can be considerable different challenges for different communities, which is why we place great emphasis on the issue of health inequalities. In particular, we look at health outcomes—life expectancy and the numbers of people being treated for cancer and heart disease—as one way of addressing different health needs. That is something that PCTs have to do.

People might need to spend less time in hospital than 20 or 30 years ago, because as technology advances and medicine changes, conditions can be treated more effectively and quickly, thus enabling patients to return to the comfort of their homes and the support of their families. That has been a welcome development for many people over the last decade or so and the momentum continues, which is one of the reasons that so many more people can be seen as out-patients rather than in-patients.

More people want services outside hospital, closer to their homes. One concern about community hospitals in many parts of the country is that they were designed for a particular model, whereby older people spent more time in hospital rather than being supported in their own home. Some of the lengths of stay in community or cottage hospitals are unacceptable. They demonstrate a lack of joined-up thinking between PCTs, social services and other organisations that support older people by giving them a better quality of experience after their hospital treatment in their recuperation and rehabilitation in an environment closer to home.

Mr. Harper: The Minister makes a sensible point, although my discussions with clinicians in the two community hospitals in my constituency do not suggest that she would find the experience she describes. She referred to integration between health and social care, but none of the changes was made in consultation with social services and the county council—they came as just as much of a surprise to them. We certainly do not have that joined-up thinking in Gloucestershire.

Caroline Flint: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to make that point, but I am trying to draw a bigger picture of the changes in demand for health services and their provision in the 21st century as a backdrop to some of the current discussions about how we should spend our money in the health service. Despite the challenges for community hospitals and the changes being discussed on the ground, we still see a role for them, in the right place, fit for purpose and, we hope, providing a range of services, some of which will enhance existing provision and some of which will be new, in a different environment, to meet patients' needs.

Mr. Drew: As the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), said yesterday, the key criteria set out in the document of 16 February, "Moving care closer to home", will be used to assess the value and viability of community hospitals. We want more detail about those proposals and I agree with the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) that we should not rush them. Will my hon. Friend the Minister tell us whether payment by results will be taken into account? That will be crucial in judging the viability of community hospitals, and indeed of the maternity unit in my constituency.

Caroline Flint: Payment by results is one of the reforms we introduced to ensure both that there are tariffs for care and a clearer framework in which to plan and provide services. I shall be happy to write to my hon. Friend about community hospitals and maternity care, where we are considering how we might expand the system. I am sure that he agrees about the importance of getting things right so that at each step of the way those commissioning and providing services understand what they can gain from the reform and how they can implement payment by results in the future.

It is down to primary care trusts working with others in the local health community—strategic health authorities, local government, community groups, Members of Parliament and councillors—to discuss and decide how best to deliver local services. All areas, including the Gloucestershire health community, have seen significant improvements in services and they are all continuing to improve.

Halfway through the 10-year NHS plan, there are tremendous improvements. Since 1997, the maximum waiting time for in-patient treatment has fallen from 18 to six months; the maximum waiting time for an out-patient appointment with a consultant has fallen from 26 to 13 weeks; and 98.8 per cent. of patients are seen, diagnosed and treated within four hours of arrival at accident and emergency departments. Some of our successes may have led to people forgetting what the situation was like 10 years ago, when waiting in accident and emergency departments lasted more than four hours and waiting for operations lasted more than six months—in some cases it took years. It is important to put that on the record. We are dealing with an adjustment in a period of improvement, not a period of regression.

We have a performance management system and a performance assessment system that requires the NHS to deliver both clinical and financial targets, and there cannot be a trade-off between meeting those requirements and reducing deficits. I know that the Gloucestershire health community is committed to providing sustainable, high quality services for its patients, and that the proposals are about securing patient services for the future while at the same time achieving financial stability.

That is really important for all those working in health care locally, including people who are working in organisations that are in deficit. Those deficits are not new. We have exposed deficits and made the situation much more transparent. The people who work in those organisations have to live with deficits on a year-by-year basis and the organisations that are balancing their books have to live with the year-by-year challenge of being asked to help out the organisations that are in deficit. That is traditionally how the NHS has run and managed its finances, but it is not acceptable any more. It leaves a cloud of uncertainty and insecurity hanging over everybody.

This year will not be the first year in which changes have been happening to services or services have been delayed because of the trade-off at the end of the year and the deficits that have existed for a considerable time. We have to get things right so that we can better plan for the future and give more security to staff and patients in planning their services, and so that we do not have a year-on-year trade-off to deal with debts. That is why it is important that financial deficits are dealt with. However, alongside that there is a parallel discussion about the sorts of services that we want and need for the future.

Mr. Harper: I am grateful for what the Minister has said. No one is arguing that the deficits should be allowed to run on for ever, but there is a contradiction. Under the current structure, strategic health authorities and PCTs are trying to be in balance for the whole of this year, to clear all the historic deficits in this year and to cut another £6 million across Gloucestershire to pay for the top-slicing that the strategic health authority is performing to bail out areas that are in the worse shape. If the Minister is confirming that that is the case, I should tell her that that is not what the Secretary of State said in her letter to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). She said that all that those concerned had to do was to improve the situation through 2006-07; they were not required to clear all the historic deficits. Those are two different things and they have a dramatic impact on what is happening on the ground. We need some clarity on that.

Caroline Flint: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's question. The strategic health authorities remain responsible for the performance management of their organisations and they have a duty to ensure that all trusts in their area achieve financial balance. The aim is for the NHS as a whole to return to financial balance by the end of 2006-07. A minority of NHS organisations might be unable to achieve a balance within that framework. However, all organisations that are overspending will be expected to show an improvement during this financial year and, by the end of the year, every organisation should have monthly income covering monthly expenditure. I am happy to write to him on that point if further clarification is needed and if that helps him and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud.

The primary care trusts are investing in community services to increase the availability of care and treatment for patients in the Forest of Dean. I understand that there is a proposal to close Dilke Memorial hospital and an anticipated closure of Lydney and district hospital, too. However, in the longer term, the PCT is proposing a new community health facility to be developed on a new site in the Forest of Dean.

The hon. Member for Forest of Dean mentioned the consultation period. Cabinet guidelines are 12 weeks, but Department of Health guidance to primary care trusts and SHAs allows some variability, because clearly some issues may not require a 12-week consultation. I understand that, in this instance, the overview and scrutiny committee agreed to a shortened consultation period, but, again, I am happy to write to him on that.

Mr. Harper: The mental health trust consultation has started, but the consultation on community hospitals has not even been discussed by the overview and scrutiny committee—

NHS Maternity Services

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Michael Foster.]

9.30 am

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am delighted to have obtained this debate on maternity services. Perhaps I should first declare a non-pecuniary interest, in that I am an honorary vice-president of the Royal College of Midwives. It awarded me that position, which I am honoured to hold, after the Select Committee on Health, which I chaired in the early 1990s, produced what I would describe as a groundbreaking report on maternity services.

My purpose in calling for this debate is fourfold. First, I want to mention the "Making it Better, Making it Real" consultation on health care services for children, young people, parents and babies in Greater Manchester, east Cheshire, High Peak and Rossendale. However, I want to make particular reference to in-patient services at East Cheshire NHS trust's Macclesfield district general hospital. Secondly, I want to draw attention to the continuing staff shortages affecting maternity units, of which I know the Minister is aware. Those shortages are exacerbated by the current funding deficits in the health service. Thirdly, I want to question this Government's commitment to making good their manifesto pledges on maternity services. Finally, I want to propose the implementation of measures designed to arrest the current shortage of midwives and deliver high-quality maternity services for all women.

However, I begin by focusing at constituency level and on the consultation on the reconfiguration of service provision. Some may consider the recruitment of staff to small units a problem that affects the quality of and generates risks to continued service provision. In addition, questions have been raised about the financial viability of smaller units. I say to the Minister that those issues do not exist at the East Cheshire NHS trust, where a vibrant facility is continually providing high-quality care within the income calculated under payment by results—a policy introduced by the Government.

The services provided by the East Cheshire NHS trust are needed by the population of eastern Cheshire, which, by the way, includes the constituency represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton). The trust also serves the population of High Peak, the Buxton area, and north-west Staffordshire, represented by the towns of Leek and Biddulph.

The maternity and children's services at the Macclesfield district general hospital are sustainable, affordable, efficient, safe, highly regarded and recommended, and those facts are known to the strategic health authority. Those facilities are integral to the delivery of district general hospital services on the Macclesfield hospital site. They are responding to increased demand, and are providing a local service to a geographically large and isolated part of Cheshire, Derbyshire and north Staffordshire. I remind the Minister that the Government believe that services should be provided to people as locally as possible.

Both children's and maternity services have sustainable models for the delivery of the European working time directive. The proposed model for paediatric services is innovative and approved by national and local training organisations. I emphasise to the Minister that services such as paediatrics, obstetrics and maternity have no vacancies at Macclesfield district general hospital and are rarely closed to admissions. If they are closed, it is never due to lack of staffing, but due to excess demand. Does that mean that there is a danger that such in-patient services will be removed to a hospital much further from the community that they serve? I hope not.

The service is sustainable under the new financial rules. Financial analysis across all specialties shows that income for obstetrics and paediatrics under payment by results covers expenditure. The payment by results rules expect the non-activity-driven paediatric services—that is, the community-based services—to be paid for at cost by the commissioners. The service does not require any capital development to provide future services. The hospital and community service is provided by the integrated paediatric consultant team, reducing the infrastructure costs involved with separate teams.

All services have undergone a Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection review. Regular visits from the training organisations have resulted in praise for the service and an increased demand to manage more junior doctors—not fewer—at Macclesfield district general hospital. The most recent quote from the Mersey deanery, following the annual assessment visit last October, stated: "Best hospital so far". That recommendation came from a teaching hospital. The demand on services has increased against a background of a changing age profile, about which we all know. Women are choosing to deliver their babies at the East Cheshire NHS trust. Parents and, yes, general practitioners are choosing to bring ill children to that trust.

Only last week, a mother of three from the Buxton area, whose family are patients at Macclesfield district general hospital, spoke at a public meeting of her fear that her son, who has asthma, would lose open access to the children's ward. When she was 38 weeks pregnant, she transferred from Stepping Hill hospital, Stockport, to Macclesfield district general hospital because, "Bigger hospitals forget about people; we need smaller units." Stepping Hill is the hospital to which people would be directed if the in-patient services were transferred from Macclesfield district general hospital. That is an example of the people who use the service speaking, and that is what is critical about the consultation, which ends in a day or two's time and which I hope will be noted by the Government.

Some 96 per cent. of those questioned in the 2004 national young people's patient survey rated the overall care at Macclesfield district general hospital as excellent, very good or good. Of that 96 per cent., 33 per cent. said that it was excellent. That is a high degree of approval.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): Will my hon. Friend further confirm that mothers who live in the large rural area that surrounds Macclesfield—in west Derbyshire, north Staffordshire and particularly in my constituency of Congleton—do not wish to lose facilities at Macclesfield district general hospital, which is a mere 10 miles from where they live, to Stepping Hill hospital, Leighton hospital or University Hospital of North Staffordshire?

Visiting those three hospitals would involve long journeys for those mothers. The arrangements for parking are difficult—and anyway, many such parents have no transport of their own. Should people in rural areas have a worse service than those in urban areas?

Sir Nicholas Winterton: My hon. Friend raises important issues, some of which I shall touch on in a moment. She refers particularly to transport. Transport from the Congleton area—and from Macclesfield, for that matter—to Leighton hospital is not only fairly limited in its frequency, but expensive and inconvenient. How would the House like to see a mother perhaps with two other young children going from Macclesfield, Congleton or many of the rural villages that surround those towns all the way to Stepping Hill in Stockport, or to Leighton hospital near Crewe? My hon. Friend raises important issues, and I intend to come on to one or two of them later.

Eastern Cheshire primary care trust's demographic assumptions indicate a reduction in the number of children between the ages of nought to five of about 10 to 15 per cent. Over the past four years there has been a reduction in the number of children born but an increased demand on the services of Macclesfield district general hospital. The influences on the level of demand are, of course, wider than the total number and relate to morbidity, expectation of the users and the services available. East Cheshire NHS trust is working with the Eastern Cheshire primary care trust to develop appropriate in-patient and community services.

To pick up on what my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton said, the impact of the removal of in-patient children's services and consultant-led births would be disproportionate in a hospital the size of Macclesfield district general hospital. The immediate impact would be to remove all children's planned and emergency surgery, which would result in the removal of all adult ear, nose and throat provision, because 44 per cent. of ENT provision at the hospital is for children. Another department would therefore be made vulnerable and would inevitably close.

Gynaecology emergencies would be redirected to surrounding hospitals. It has been estimated that midwife-led births are appropriate for approximately 350 women, representing only 18 per cent. of deliveries. The loss of activity would have a significant adverse impact on the financial viability of the remaining services provided by the Macclesfield district general hospital.

The loss of income is assessed at about £8 million. I know that money is important to the Minister, but although the loss of income is assessed at £8 million, expenditure reductions are anticipated to be only about £5 million. That creates a 4 per cent. additional recurrent financial pressure on the East Cheshire NHS trust if paediatric, maternity and obstetric in-patient services are removed. The risk to recruitment and retention of all other specialties would be high indeed. That has been highlighted to me by one of the consultants at the hospital, Dr. Mark Nicol, who is an accident and emergency consultant and lead clinician in strategy at the district general hospital.

Services are provided to the whole of eastern Cheshire; the High Peak, in particular Buxton; and the north Staffordshire area—the townships of Leek and Biddulph. Some women from Stockport choose to give birth at Macclesfield district general hospital because it is a delightful hospital with a super reputation.

I now come again to a matter raised by my hon. Friend. Public transport in a rural area, such as Macclesfield, Buxton and north Staffordshire, is in short supply. I refer in particular to my hon. Friend's constituency. There are no direct bus routes from Congleton, or Knutsford for that matter, to Stepping Hill in Stockport. The last bus from Stockport to Macclesfield is at 5.10 pm. I remind the Minister that one in six people in rural areas do not possess a car; how are they going to get to the hospital? The Minister might say that the ambulance service will take them, but it is already inadequate and does not meet any of its attendance targets now, let alone with the huge additional burden that would be imposed on it if in-patient facilities were removed from Macclesfield to other hospitals.

The paediatrics and maternity service is staffed by seven full-time equivalent consultants, and the team covers acute and community paediatrics. There are close links with the Eastern Cheshire primary care trust, which provides services such as school nursing, child health surveillance, immunisation and vaccination.

Sadly, in the consultation, Macclesfield district general hospital appears in option D, which is not the preferred option. So far, however, option D has been supported by 70,000 people who have signed a petition and 25,000 people who have completed and sent in cards to the authorities. It is supported by people in east Derbyshire and north Staffordshire, by all the consultants and clinicians at the district general hospital and by all the general practitioners. It is supported by Macclesfield borough council, Congleton borough council, Cheshire county council and the Macclesfield branch of the Royal College of Midwives. That shows the support for Macclesfield district general hospital and the in-patient services that it provides, and if the consultation is to be meaningful, to be taken seriously and to be trusted, the overwhelming evidence in support of option D will, I hope, carry weight with the authorities.

I now move on to maternity services more generally. Sadly, the maternity care that women and their families receive continues to be adversely affected by a long-standing shortage of midwives in large parts of the country. I pay tribute to the Royal College of Midwives, which, from time to time, provides information to Members and to me, as one of its honorary vice-presidents. In 2005, the number of NHS midwives fell for the first time in five years. On 30 September 2005, the head count stood at 24,803 midwives, down by 36 on the previous year—yes, that is only a small number, but it is down. Although there is better news on full-time equivalents—the Government's preferred work force measure—the figure edged up by only 95 in the same period. Between 1997 and 2005, the number of full-time equivalent midwives in the NHS in England rose by 896, from 18,053 to 18,949—a rise of just 5 per cent. over eight years. As the Minister will be aware, that compares somewhat poorly with full-time equivalent figures for the overall nursing, midwifery and health visitor work force, which increased by 23 per cent. over the same period.

Sadly, the midwifery work force is ageing. Analysis conducted by the Health and Social Care Information Centre reveals that the average age of a midwife increased from 33 in 1997 to 40 in 2004, that the age profile for midwives is much older than that for all NHS staff and that nearly half the midwifery work force in some strategic health authorities is in the 46-69 age group. In addition to the NHS work force statistics, the Royal College of Midwives produces an annual staffing survey. The most recent figures—as at 1 July 2005—show that 78 per cent. of maternity units had vacant midwifery posts. That is the situation nationally, although not, I am pleased to say, in Macclesfield. Some 59 per cent. of vacancies were unfilled for more than three months. Vacancies represented 5 per cent. of the establishment, rising to 9 per cent. in south-east England and 12 per cent. in London.

Although Government vacancy statistics for midwifery are lower than the RCM's figures, there is good reason to suggest that the Government have understated the extent of the shortage of midwives. In an answer to a parliamentary question asked by the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb), the then Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne), stated that the Government counted only vacancies

"that trusts are actively trying to fill that have lasted three months or more".—[Official Report, 18 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 242W.]

Even so, if a midwife leaves her job, the vacancy is not a vacancy unless it has lasted for three months and the trust is genuinely trying to replace her. A declining number of midwives could be left to staff a unit, but according to the Government there would not officially be any vacancies in that unit.

I move to the issue of work force pressures. Midwives are the primary carers for women experiencing normal pregnancies and births. That essential role has been a constant since legislation for the regulation of midwifery was introduced in 1902. The pivotal role of midwives was highlighted by the Health Committee in its report in the early 1990s in which we emphasised the importance of the continuity of care; of an identified midwife dealing with a pregnant woman throughout her pregnancy and delivery.

Over the years, midwives have adapted to the changing NHS environment. As the Minister knows, every midwife is responsible for maintaining her existing skills and ensuring that she becomes competent in any new skills required for practice. In short, midwives have been required to adapt and extend their role, and increase their work load in response to a series of policy and socio-economic drivers. The national service framework for children, young people and maternity services compels every NHS trust to meet certain commitments regarding minimum levels and standards of care in maternity services. I repeat, from personal knowledge, that the district general hospital in Macclesfield well meets all those standards.

The Government's manifesto promises:

"By 2009 all women will have choice over where and how they have their baby and what pain relief to use."

It goes on to say:

"We want every woman to be supported by the same midwife throughout her pregnancy."

That was one of the major recommendations of the Health Committee report on maternity services.

Childbirth has become an increasingly interventionist and medicalised practice. Increased intervention in childbirth increases the demands placed on the midwifery work force. The length of post-natal stays has increased in line with rising intervention rates, and that places an additional call on midwifery time. Moreover, the additional requirements resulting from increased intervention rates come at a time when the overall number of births is also on the rise. There was a 5 per cent. increase in the number of births in England in 2003-04 compared with the previous year. That places yet more demands on midwives, as does the increase in the number of women experiencing childbirth both later and earlier in their lives.

The proportion of pregnant women who are teenagers or women aged 40 years and over is growing. Between 1991 and 2003, the number of women in England aged 40 or over conceiving almost doubled from 11,497 to 20,128. In the same period, conceptions in women under 20 also rose. Older and younger women who are pregnant tend to be at greater medical and social risk than pregnant women aged 20-39. Consequently, their care needs tend to be more complex and intensive.

I return to an issue that I mentioned at the beginning—NHS funding deficits. The current funding difficulties in the NHS in England have exacerbated midwifery shortages and the various pressures on the midwifery work force. The Royal College of Midwives has undertaken what it would describe as a snapshot survey of heads of midwifery in England, in order to assess the impact of funding deficits on midwifery services. According to the RCM survey, more than one in three managers reported that their maternity services budget had been cut—that is serious—and more than one in four that their training services budget had been cut.

More than one in four respondents reported that their midwifery staffing establishment had been reduced. Half of all trusts had been operating a recruitment freeze. One in four managers reported that their trust had been replacing senior midwives with more junior colleagues, and a similar number said that support staff had been substituting for midwives. I am sure that the Minister will take that information very seriously. One in four respondents report that they have reduced the number of home visits by midwives. At a time of urgent need for more midwives, not fewer, the RCM has received reports that a number of strategic health authorities are set to cut the number of midwifery training places. Again, that bodes badly for the future.

Of particular concern is mounting evidence that post-registration midwifery training will no longer be financially supported and that, for example, the 18-month conversion programme in Oxford for nurses wishing to train as midwives will be stopped "for this year only". The arguments for cutting 18-month training places are clearly financial and the move is a short-term knee-jerk reaction that will have long-term ramifications for the midwifery profession.

It is also a matter of grave concern that a number of birth centres throughout the country have closed or are under the threat of closure. Birth centres can play a significant part in increasing choice for women during pregnancy and childbirth and in ensuring that maternity services are delivered in what we would all describe as a more home-like setting. Closing birth centres will therefore make it harder to implement the Government's own policies on maternity services.

Although midwives have embraced changes in accordance with Government policy, such as shifting services closer to where people live and providing more diverse services, the funding deficits, allied to continuing staff shortages, are making it harder for midwives to implement those policies in practice. That much has already been acknowledged by the Government, and I give them credit for that. In recent oral evidence on NHS charges given to the Health Committee, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), who sadly resigned recently as a Minister, had to concede that staffing shortages affected delivery of quality maternity care, saying that

"one-to-one midwifery support is part of the National Service Framework, it is a commitment we made in our manifesto. The brake on us delivering that is the lack of midwives and we are working hard, as in other areas, to increase the numbers of people in that area. I think it has increased by 2,200. Progress is being made on that score but it is slow."

She went on to say that the only reason why women did not receive one-to-one care was because there were not "enough midwives to be able to provide it".

The Government are aware of some of the problems facing maternity and midwifery, but inertia on their part has also contributed to a lack of progress in implementing the manifesto and other policies affecting maternity care. The national service framework was published more than 18 months ago, yet there is still no sign of an action plan for the implementation of its maternity standard element, nor is there any evidence that the Government have properly and fully costed it. While the Government could have taken forward the implementation of their own manifesto commitment, they have instead—I regret to say—indulged their obsession with tinkering with structures, while services are being cut. That is proving to be a very expensive distraction.

It is as yet unclear whether payment by results will ensure a fair and consistent basis for funding maternity care. When the crunch point comes for maternity services, will the result be a fair, accurate and fully funded tariff, or will commissioners conclude that there are insufficient funds for maternity care, and so opt to pay for a reduced quality service? I hope that that will not be the case. The wider question is: how can anyone be sure that payment by results will result in "payment being linked to activity and adjusted for casemix"

rather than in perpetuating existing inadequacies in the system for funding maternity care? When asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Anne Milton) what assessment had been made of the likely impact of payment by results on the number of home births and caesarean sections, the then Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill, replied that no such assessment had been made and gave no date or time frame for when this work was likely to take place.

It is not clear whether the tariff used for applying payment by results will reflect social as well as medical costs. Coming from Macclesfield, I am well aware that there are not only medical costs but in some areas also social costs. Pregnant women and new mothers from socially disadvantaged groups tend to require greater support in respect of advocacy. In some areas, translation and interpreting services are required, as well as closer liaison between midwives and other health and social care professionals. Will the Government guarantee that the tariff will reflect the different costs incurred by women with different medical and social needs?

When will the Government be able to say how maternity services will be commissioned in the future? While practice-based commissioning is central to the Government's reforms, it does not follow that this will be the most appropriate level at which maternity services will be commissioned. Clearly, different commissioning functions will need to be delivered at different levels, according to factors such as population size, purpose and strategic significance, and the interrelationship between these factors will vary between services in the same locality. Thus, the integrated nature of maternity services implies that commissioning will need to take place at a different level than, for example, the commissioning of elective hospital services. Furthermore, midwifery services have increasingly engaged with the wider public health agenda and have played a significant role in working collaboratively with commissioners—a bigger-picture role that must not be lost as a result of the new commissioning proposals.

Finally, let me explain the way ahead as I see it. The Government have a major job to do in order to get maternity services back on track and to rebuild trust with women who use maternity services and all those clinicians and others who work in the services, particularly the midwives who care for women. Current NHS deficits should not be addressed by cutting maternity services budgets or cutting the number of training places for student midwives; they should be increased because there is a proven need for them. Increasing the number of student midwives would also help to address the growing age profile imbalance in the midwifery service work force. The NHS cannot afford to lose any midwifery posts through redundancy. To help stabilise the situation facing maternity units in England, the Government should give trusts a more realistic time scale in which to address their deficits. They must address them, but they must be given time to do so. In addition, the Government must fully fund pay modernisation, as there is evidence that trusts are using the funding crisis to try to avoid their obligations under the "Agenda for Change" agreement. Moreover, three Secretaries of State are on record as stating that "Agenda for Change" is fully costed. Is it fully costed? To reduce the excessive demands on an already overstretched work force, the Department of Health must urgently address continuing midwife staff shortages. If the Government do not attract and retain significantly greater numbers of midwives, they will sadly fail to meet their manifesto commitments.

The Department of Health should publish without delay the plan of how it will implement not only the maternity standard of the national service framework for children, young people and maternity services, but all other relevant commitments made in this important area, including the manifesto commitments. It is unacceptable that 18 months after the publication of the national service framework so little has been achieved.

The national tariffs relating to maternity services must be developed in a way that reflects all the costs associated in providing care to women and babies with diverse clinical and social needs. Commissioners should explore the potential for contracting midwifery group practices to provide antenatal and post-natal care services in deprived areas. I am not just concerned about my own area, where the need is great; there are many more deprived areas of the country where such services are important. The midwifery group practices must provide antenatal and post-natal care services in deprived areas in the event of a GP opting out of providing such services. The midwifery group practices are important.

I pay tribute to those who played such a major role in the Health Committee when I chaired it and when it produced the report on maternity services to which I have referred. That was during the period 1990 to 1992, which is a long time ago. I still greatly respect the help given to me by the late Mrs. Audrey Wise, who was as emotionally involved and committed to the report as I was, Mrs. Alice Mahon, who stepped down from Parliament recently, David Hinchliffe, the Labour Member who chaired the Health Committee with such distinction until the end of the previous Parliament, Rev. Martin Smyth from Northern Ireland and the right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke). This House remains concerned about these important services.

I have tackled both the national and local aspects of the issue. I hope that the Minister will appreciate that I am committed to saving the in-patient paediatric, maternity and obstetric services at Macclesfield district general hospital, and that I am strongly supported by Dr. Ian Spillman, the leading paediatric clinician, Dr. Val Lether, the lead obstetrician in Macclesfield, and all the other clinicians and consultants, who unanimously believe that it would be wrong to remove the in-patient services. The situation facing maternity services and the midwifery profession nationally also requires Government attention.

10.8 am

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) on securing the debate and on his excellent tour de force. One of my predecessors, Sir Cyril Smith, speaks highly of his work, which has taken place over 35 years, and I am privileged to follow his remarks. The hon. Gentleman spoke about maternity services in general and how NHS policy can impact on those services in his local hospital in Macclesfield. I echo and support his general remarks. He is far more knowledgeable than I am on the issue.

I wish to concentrate on the "Making it Better, Making it Real" consultation, which, as the hon. Gentleman said, covers not only the Cheshire PCTs, but much of Greater Manchester, and which has an effect on my constituency. The proposals are currently out for consultation, and the consultation period ends this Friday. The recommendation in the report is to cut the number of maternity units and child care services from 13 to eight or nine.

I am not opposed to change—indeed, I accept that some reconfiguration is needed—but like the hon. Gentleman I am very concerned about the proposals. Not one of the options given includes providing maternity, child care or obstetric services at Rochdale infirmary. With Bury excluded and Burnley general hospital also set to lose its maternity services, a large part of Greater Manchester and Lancashire will be left without easy access to child care and maternity services. Not only that, but for many reasons—whether lack of transport, poor public transport or high levels of deprivation—those areas need such services.

The proposals do not make economic sense. The unit at Rochdale infirmary is purpose-built and was opened in January 2001. By contrast to at least one of the strategic health authority's preferred options, no new investment will be needed to keep the unit open. It is very popular. The number of deliveries at the unit has risen since it opened from 1,776 to 2,270 last year. It is the only one of the four hospitals in the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS trust to have admissions rising year on year. The background against which that is happening is one in which the population of Rochdale is set to rise by 6.7 per cent. by 2028, whereas that of the other towns in the area, such as Oldham and Bury, is set to fall.

There are some specific facilities and practices at Rochdale infirmary that are worthy of special mention and should be retained. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the importance of antenatal services in deprived areas, and the antenatal ward is open 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Referrals are made by professionals, but also by the women themselves, and since opening the number who attend for antenatal services has risen from just over 3,000 in 2002 to nearly 6,000 last year. If the strategic health authority proposes to close Rochdale's maternity and antenatal services, which are unique in the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS trust in that they are the only ones to be open 24 hours a day, thought needs to be given to how that facility will be provided.

There are many examples in the post-natal ward at Rochdale infirmary of care being given to babies that is only provided in other areas by special care baby units. That includes the care of pre-term babies as young as 34 weeks' gestation, and low-weight babies, weighing as little as 1.8 kg. The staff have real expertise that is not recognised in the title they are given. It is incorrect and controversial to say that staff become deskilled in small units because they do not care often enough for the more unusual cases. The example of Rochdale infirmary shows that that is not so.

As I said, the Rochdale infirmary unit is the only one in the trust with a rising admission rate, and it has a large number of admissions from outside the Rochdale area. Last year's figures, for example, included 45 babies from Bacup, nine from Rossendale, 61 from Whitworth, 26 from Todmorden and 87 from Oldham. More than half of the 87 women from Oldham made a definite choice of Rochdale rather than Oldham. The other half went there because the unit at Oldham was closed. In fact, the unit at Rochdale was closed 16 times last year, not because of lack of staff—the hon. Gentleman referred to that—but because it was full and could take no more people. As he said, the national service framework states clearly that it should be a priority

"to deliver easy access to supportive, high quality maternity services designed around the needs of women and their babies".

Given the popularity of the Rochdale infirmary unit, I believe that it could and should be maintained.

The consultation document gives four criteria for choosing the options, none of which includes Rochdale. The main criterion is safety. The document states:

"there needs to be sufficiently large critical mass of patients in order to maintain the skills of the staff."

No figure is given, but it has been stated that 4,000 deliveries could be a safe figure. I dispute that.

A report by Reform, an independent, non-party organisation, gives evidence that larger units do not automatically provide better quality care or a safer environment for maternity and neonatal care. The report states that larger units are less likely to be able to provide high-quality care because they are more difficult to manage efficiently. It states:

"there must be an end to the drive towards larger, more centralised delivery units across the UK. The current trend to merge medium size 2,000-3,000 delivery maternity units into giant 5,000-6,000 plus delivery units is not evidence based. Competition between such medium sized units should be the driver for higher standards."

I believe that the report describes what is happening in Rochdale, and it would be a travesty if the unit were to close.

The second criterion is equity. The consultation document states that disadvantaged and vulnerable groups will be able to access health services easily. It adds that the services will need to reflect the geographical spread of the population, reasonable travelling times, choice and type of service, and choice of location for service users. However, that is not addressed in the current options. If we look at a map of the review area and include Rossendale and Todmorden, we see that a huge geographical area will be left without maternity and paediatric in-patient services if the proposals are accepted.

Rochdale experiences a higher level of ill health than the national average. In September 2004, it had more than 400 families living in accommodation supported by the National Asylum Support Service. The teenage pregnancy rate in Rochdale is greater than the national average. It is one of the areas worst affected by deprivation. All those factors point to the need to retain a locally based service.

The hon. Gentleman referred to recruitment and retention of midwives—a key point. I said that the closures in Rochdale were because the unit was full, not because of a lack of staff. The number of midwives leaving Rochdale has remained low for many years, and the usual reason for leaving is retirement. There are no problems with recruiting staff to Rochdale infirmary's maternity suite, in contrast with the situation in both Bury and Oldham, where there have been problems with recruiting and retaining staff. In my view, if something works well, we should not change it.

On patient satisfaction, there has been a huge campaign in Rochdale, similar to the one described by the hon. Gentleman, by people supporting the efforts to keep the maternity and paediatric unit open. More than 37,000 signatures were collected for a petition saying that the unit should be maintained, and during the Easter recess more than 80 people travelled from Rochdale to Westminster to present the petition to the Prime Minister.

I shall quote some of the comments from the customer satisfaction questionnaire that were given to me by the midwives. They include:

"the maternity unit can't close, it would be a waste of a very good unit...the service I received from everyone was first class and very professional ...this department is a credit to the hospital...this hospital has a maternity unit to be really proud of."

Those are examples of people's satisfaction with the unit.

Before the Pennine Acute Hospitals NHS trust was created, Rochdale infirmary had a three-star rating. It was the first hospital in the country to be awarded magnet accreditation. It is already a centre of excellence in the fields of midwifery, obstetrics and paediatrics. The care given is exemplary and second to none, and the population of Rochdale are speaking out strongly against closure. When the consultation finishes on Friday, I hope that there will be another look at the proposals, that some sense will be applied and that there will be a move to ensure that a maternity service is retained in that part of the conurbation of Greater Manchester.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Martin Caton (in the Chair): Order. Exceptionally, I shall call you, Mr. Drew, even though you missed almost the whole of the initiator's speech. However, I ask that you complete your remarks by 10.30 so that the Front-Bench spokesmen have adequate time.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): Mr. Caton, I wish to speak as well, and I was here for many of the opening remarks.

Mr. Martin Caton (in the Chair): I apologise, Mr. Horwood. I did not see you standing.

10.21 am

Martin Horwood: I congratulate the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) on securing this important debate, and I apologise for missing some of his opening remarks. It is a shame that we are discussing this subject in the context of such a dire financial crisis in the NHS. By way of background, I should tell hon. Members that the financial crisis in the Cheltenham and Tewkesbury primary care trust has produced a deficit of precisely zero. In fact, that PCT has never been in deficit. What is more, the Gloucestershire Hospitals NHS foundation trust has been an efficient and relatively low-cost provider of health care services, and our mental health care trust is a three-star trust and about to be in the first wave of foundation trust status applicants among mental health service trusts. Our local managers have done absolutely everything right in financial terms, yet we are suffering.

A review of the maternity strategy in Gloucestershire was already under way. In the words of the consultation document, the strategy

"encompasses all elements of care that a woman and baby need from pre-conception, through antenatal care and birth to post-natal care; reflects the needs of the population; takes into account the views of users, professionals and other stakeholders."

Those are fine words.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I apologise for arriving late, Mr. Caton. I was stuck on a train. I know that the hon. Gentleman will clearly make the points that I would have made. Does he recognise, as I do, that this is the third review? For the Stroud maternity unit, it is the third review in 10 years. Can we stop the reviewing and actually deliver services? It is about time someone listened to what the people want, which is not another review or closure of services. Does he agree with that?

Martin Horwood: I agree entirely. The hon. Gentleman, who represents a neighbouring constituency, faces a direct threat to the maternity services in his constituency, as I do in mine, where the context is a financial crisis caused not by financial deficits in Cheltenham and Tewkesbury but by deficits elsewhere in Avon, Gloucestershire and Wiltshire, particularly in the neighbouring Cotswold and Vale PCT. Those deficits are leading to a huge range of closures and cuts in services, from health visitors to adult mental health services, from community nursing to overnight care for children in Cheltenham, from cuts in access to acute care to the closure of the Delancy rehabilitation hospital in Cheltenham.

Of course, added to that list is the euphemistically named "rationalisation", which, over time, will put obstetrics and gynaecology services on one site. My neighbour in Stroud and I are under no illusions as to what that means. The inevitable site for the rationalisation is Gloucestershire Royal hospital in Gloucester, which means that there is a direct threat to the Stroud maternity services and to St. Paul's maternity unit in Cheltenham, despite the fact that it is an excellent purpose-built facility like the one in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen). My children were born at St. Paul's, and my family can bear personal witness to the excellent care and first-class facilities that it offers.

The closure of the maternity unit would strike at the heart of our town. Without it, there will be no more Cheltonians, in the old-fashioned sense of the word, because almost no one will be born in the town. Only about 1 per cent. of Cheltenham people are born at home so almost no one will be a Cheltonian ever again if this unit closes. Instead, people will have to face a dangerous extension in drive time, during a very stressful period, through an unfamiliar urban landscape in Gloucester city, which could add dangerous minutes.

I put the example of my son, Sami, who was born within minutes of getting through the door of St. Paul's maternity unit, to the chief executive of the foundation trust and asked what would have happened if we had had to add another 20 minutes to our journey. Would he have been born on the Golden Valley bypass between Cheltenham and Gloucester? The chief executive's reassuring reply was, "Nature would have taken its course." That will not be of much reassurance to my constituents. Inevitably, they will suffer the injustice of losing a service that is much valued and supported, despite the fact that there has been no financial crisis in our primary care trust area.

We are promised a consultation period, but we had a consultation period on children's services last year, which revealed overwhelming public opposition to the closure of overnight care at Battledown children's ward in Cheltenham, and 27,000 people signed a petition against that closure. All three primary care trusts and the local NHS foundation trust categorically agreed that a nurse-led unit, at least, would survive and that 350 children a year would not be transferred to Gloucester from Cheltenham under a pilot scheme. Despite all of that however, those proposals were discarded at a few weeks' notice due to the pressure of the current financial crisis. Little wonder, then, that 13 local NHS trust governors described the process of public consultation on significant change as having been reduced to "absolute farce". As my hon. Friend mentioned, the fact that there is only one local service left reduces to nonsense the concept of patient choice between different local services. Sadly, I fear that maternity services will go down the same path.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Thank you for your forbearance, Mr. Caton. I was sorry to miss the remarks of, in this case, my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton).

I would like to make two points, one of which follows on from my intervention on my near neighbour, the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood), dealing with the continual review of these services. No one can quite understand the psychological damage that that does to members of staff who are for ever looking over their shoulder, wondering whether they will have a job or a service to deliver. The sad thing is that Stroud maternity hospital was set a whole series of measures that it had to meet to survive. It has more than met those. In fact, it does not want too many more births because that will put it under significant pressure.

The danger in the current review is that the hospital faces the centralisation of services and staff feel somewhat forlorn and thrown aside because of the threat to the work that they did to meet those requirements. The threat comes from the acute trust, in its various forms in Gloucestershire, which is a matter that I have already taken up with the chief executive because I think that it is wrong.

The second issue is that Stroud hospital, while not being unique, is somewhat unusual in that it provides cradle-to-grave care. If we take the cradle away from an important community hospital, we shall immediately create a chink in the armour that is the health service in Stroud. Our area does not have an acute hospital—we lost that in its previous incarnation, which I could say a lot about—but we have maintained very effective community services.

If women choose to have their babies in a community setting, but the community facility is then taken away, many will then choose to have home births. We know that there would be no saving: the figures have already been done. In fact, it is likely that the cost will increase as the number of home births goes up. That may be a good thing, and it may be the choice of those mothers, but it is not very satisfactory when the arguments on financial grounds are driven by the idea that centralising can save money. I know that there are medical considerations, but we seem to have overcome those. We are now faced with the brutal reality that it is a question of cost, not choice. I hope that the Minister listens, and that she already understands the view in my area. I hope that we can kill stone dead the idea of closing Stroud maternity hospital.

[Mr. David Drew]

10.30 am

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) on initiating this debate. It is an important subject, and I pay tribute to the Select Committee report of years ago, which was followed by the Cumberlege report "Changing Childbirth". The hon. Gentleman did not mention that in 2002 the Health Committee decided to set up a sub-committee to review what progress had been made since those days. The work goes on, and he got us off to a good start.

I was interested to hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Martin Horwood) said. I got quite nostalgic, because my two babies were born in St. Paul's, which was an excellent and popular unit. I did not live in Cheltenham, I lived in Tewkesbury, but Tewkesbury mothers chose to go there, and it would be a real loss to the local community were it to close. I do not understand the reasons for it, and I wish him success in keeping it open.

The hon. Gentleman raised many points that I would have raised myself had I had full rein. I agree wholeheartedly with everything that he said, and he provided a comprehensive analysis of the subject. The underlying factor in maternity services is the shortage of midwives and the inability to increase their numbers. The Select Committee report in 2002 raised concerns about retention rates, high drop-out rates, and thehigh drop-out rates on some midwifery courses. The Government's response was to commission Professor Mavis Kirkham and team at a cost of £70,000 to carry out a study called "Why do Midwives Stay and Why do Midwives Return?", stating that the results would inform future midwifery recruitment and retention policy.

It will be helpful if the Minister tells us whether the report has been produced, what assessment has been made of it, and what future plans there are to increase the number of midwives. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, there has been an abject failure in the Department. One can in no way say that there has been success, when in 2005 the head count fell by 36. We all know that the head count is the Government's preferred way of accounting, and the Minister please should not insult us by returning to whole-time equivalents just because it happens to suit the occasion.

It is easy to bandy figures about, but the availability of midwives underpins so much more. Some services have suffered, and poorly staffed units are leading in some cases to closures. The 2002 report received considerable evidence to show that poorly staffed units often have an increased rate of caesarean sections. That procedure is more expensive and places a greater demand on national health service resources. It has not been mentioned much today, but we should try to tackle it. The rate of caesarean sections in this country is about 24 per cent, and the World Health Organisation says that it should be about 14 per cent., so there seems to be a problem with the way in which we are managing things.

Hon. Members have illustrated today that if units close, choice decreases. Often, the midwife-led units suffer. Other impacts include a lack of time to devote to the detection of domestic violence, which often starts during pregnancy. Our report highlighted that midwives are ideally placed to identify domestic violence and link up with other health workers. However, many midwives simply do not have time for that, nor do they have any extra time to give to ethnic minority women and to public health matters such as encouraging pregnant women to give up smoking, which I am sure the Minister is keen to encourage. A recent local development that has worried me greatly is that antenatal classes have been axed. I shall cover some of those matters in more detail.

The cuts in antenatal classes are particularly worrying because that is where many women obtain information about where to give birth and what will happen when they do, and about post-natal support such as for breast feeding. That service has been cut ostensibly because of lack of numbers, but it is clear that no attempt has been made to commission services from elsewhere and organisations such as the National Childbirth Trust and even independent midwives would be keen to step into the breach.

What is even more worrying is that many women decide at antenatal classes where to give birth. Until that point, they may not have been aware of a local birthing or midwifery unit and it is insidious to reduce demand for a birthing unit so that in future years, or even months, NHS managers will be able to turn round and say that there is no demand for such services.

It is extremely worrying that women will not receive information about giving birth because if they know what is going on they are more likely to have a pleasant experience. Some people would say that childbirth is never a pleasant experience, but there are differences in how people feel about giving birth and how they cope with it. Antenatal education can help with that. Women are left to obtain information from a variety of sources, which is okay if they are educated and can afford to buy books and magazines, but more difficult for those who are struggling on a budget and do not know where to go for help.

It is more common for a woman to arrive at hospital feeling frightened and vulnerable, which can lead to her not having a good birth experience. That brings me to one-to-one midwifery care. Much is made of that and most midwives would say that one-to-one midwifery care enables a midwife to stay with a woman and to provide support from the onset of labour and probably even before that, during pregnancy, and to be present during the birth, but one-to-one care is shown in the figures if the midwife is simply present at the end to deliver the baby. The reality is that in busy obstetrics units many midwives look after more than one woman during labour. That is a disaster waiting to happen.

I tabled some parliamentary questions to try to obtain a definition of one-to-one midwifery care and had a spectacular lack of success. A certain Mrs. Blair opened the new Royal College of Nursing building and happened to mention that she had had two midwives. She was lucky, but she did not seem to think that it was unusual. It might help if someone made it clear that Members of Parliament and their wives should have the same treatment as other people.

One-to-one care is more likely to be achieved in a birthing centre. Other advantages of midwife-led units are that care is provided by midwives who can specialise in supporting women through normal births with a minimum of intervention and an explicit philosophy to provide a friendly, individualised, women-centred and family-focused service which can deliver high-quality care. The problem seems to be that on paper the costs are a bit higher. What often happens is that the wider picture is not taken into account and there is evidence to show that women delivering in birthing units have a lower rate of intervention and less need for aftercare. That is not factored into the equation, but it should be.

I have talked a little about the rates for caesarean births. The Government have decided to publish success rates for certain cardiac surgeons, but when the Health Committee suggested that they should publish obstetricians' success rates for caesarean sections, we were told that there were no plans to do so. Now that we have more openness in other areas, it would be useful to develop that idea.

I am rapidly running out of time. I end by saying that the lack of midwives means that there is little time to devote to breastfeeding. Next week is national breastfeeding awareness week. It would be useful if the Minister could tell us when the breastfeeding co-ordinator will be replaced—the post has been unfilled since February. Perhaps we shall hear some good news next week.

10.40 am

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) on securing this debate and on the eloquent way in which he raised the issues. I wish him well in his campaign to keep mother and child in Macclesfield hospital, and also in promoting option D.

I welcome the Minister to her new responsibility for maternity services. May I say how sad we were to hear that the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy) had resigned? Despite her obvious defence of Government policy, one felt that one could hold a constructive debate with her. I hope that that will continue.

To say that midwives and those who work with them make an invaluable contribution to the NHS and to our national life is to state the obvious. We have all been touched by a midwife. However, contrary to what has been said by the Health Secretary, it has not been a good year for maternity services. Unfortunately, as we have heard, they are rapidly becoming the latest victims of NHS deficits.

According to a survey by the Royal College of Midwives carried out last September, 78 per cent. of maternity units in England have been experiencing staffing shortages. Vacancy rates in England stood at almost 5 per cent. of establishment, the figure rising to more than 10 per cent. in London. Of those vacancies, almost two thirds represent long-term vacancies of more than three months. My hon. Friend went into some detail about why the Government may be understating the extent of those midwifery shortages, so I shall not go over that ground again.

Meanwhile, according to last month's work force census, the number of full-time equivalent midwives—the best way of measuring their availability—has risen by only 5 per cent. since 1997, during which time spending on the NHS has almost doubled. That suggests that midwifery is one of the poor relations within the NHS.

The big question on many people's lips is, "Where has all the money gone?" Even on the Government's head-count measure, the number of midwives working in the NHS fell between 2004 and 2005. It is generally accepted that the Government have bombarded the health service with targets. That has spawned a massive growth in bureaucracy, because the targets have to be monitored and measured; and that bureaucracy has soaked up a lot of the new NHS money and prevented it from reaching front-line services. Maternity services certainly seem to be suffering as a result.

The challenges facing maternity services are growing, not diminishing. The number of births in England in 2003-04 was 5 per cent. higher than in the previous year. Women are experiencing childbirth both earlier and later in their lives, and younger and older women tend to be at greater medical and social risk. That is one of the factors that has contributed to the need for more medical intervention in childbirth, which has resulted in longer post-natal stays and greater pressure on hard-working midwives.

Now is the time to have more midwives—that is generally accepted—yet we believe that staffing shortages under this Government are now compromising patient care. In July 2005, the Healthcare Commission report on maternity services highlighted the problems of overcrowding, the shortage of midwives and the fact that staff are too busy to give advice on the feeding and bathing of new babies. The RCM and others pointed out this week that the current financial crisis in the NHS is adding to the woes of the profession. Indeed, in a snapshot survey of heads of midwifery carried out by the college, one in three managers reported that maternity service budgets had been cut and one in four respondents reported that midwifery staffing numbers had been reduced; and almost half of all trusts have a freeze on recruitment. If the Minister believes for one moment that NHS deficits are not affecting front-line services, I strongly recommend that she examine the RCM data.

The shortages have a knock-on effect for the midwives who remain in the NHS, as their work load increases so that the system can cope, they become more stressed and morale suffers. Such dedicated professionals deserve better support. The impact of deficits on front-line services can be seen in the scaling back of antenatal classes and neonatal home visits in some areas, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) has highlighted in the House on a number of occasions.

[Mr. John Baron]

Elsewhere, specialist neonatal care units are suffering; there is no shortage of evidence of that. We have heard about a case in which a Coventry woman who went into premature labour was driven more than 100 miles in an ambulance because there were no available facilities anywhere in the midlands. The woman, who was expecting twins, ended up in Manchester, in pain and feeling very isolated. That story made the local press.

The Government recognise, to a certain extent, that there are problems. In their last manifesto, they made a clear commitment—referred to by one or two speakers today:

"By 2009 all women will have choice over where and how they have their baby and what pain relief to use."

The manifesto went on to say:

"We want every woman to be supported by the same midwife throughout her pregnancy."

However, I ask the Minister how the Government can hope to implement their manifesto promises, or meet the standards already drawn up, when there is a shortage of midwives. As the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree admitted recently in evidence to the Health Committee, although one-to-one midwifery support "is a commitment we made in our manifesto...The brake on us delivering that is the lack of midwives...we do not have enough midwives to be able to provide it".

Perhaps the Minister can tell us how many women are currently being offered one-to-one maternity services. Or perhaps she would care to comment on the Jentle midwifery programme run at the Queen Charlotte's and Chelsea hospital, which invites couples to part with £4,000 in return for 24-hour one-to-one care. I do not for one moment criticise women for seeking the best possible maternity care in the NHS, and I understand that the aim of the scheme is to reinvest profits in front-line services, but it would be absolutely outrageous if some mothers were being charged for a service that Labour says ought to be theirs by right, while those who cannot afford to pay are being left behind by the Government. Having offered a policy at the last election, Ministers should be implementing that policy for all mothers, irrespective of their ability to pay, but staff shortages stand in the way.

How can the Government offer women greater choice in where they give birth when the National Childbirth Trust has drawn our attention to closures of community-based birth centres? At least 10 of approximately 100 centres across the UK are either closed or facing closure. As we all know, those centres allow maternity services to be delivered in a less medicalised, more home-like setting and therefore promote choice, but choice is now being curtailed as cash-strapped primary care trusts withdraw midwives to cover shortages in acute hospitals. An alternative to giving birth in hospital is home birth, but one in four respondents to the RCM's survey of maternity managers reported a reduction in the number of home visits by midwives.

There can be little doubt that we need to tackle the current financial crisis and develop longer-term strategies for recruiting more midwives into the profession and for retaining the ones that we have. I would like to ask the Minister a few questions, and if she cannot answer them in the time available to her, I hope that she will do so in writing. First, what plans does she have to raise the status of the profession, for example by enabling more midwives to prescribe from the nurse practitioners' extended formulary? Giving midwives greater responsibility and status would promote the profession and give encouragement to those working in midwife-led units, which are already very popular with women.

I refer the Minister to the reports produced by the Nursing and Midwifery Council and the RCM that point to the ageing profile of the work force, and the problems that that will create in a few years' time.

We also need to tackle the high attrition rates in midwifery training courses, which can be 20 per cent. or higher. At the last election, the Conservatives were pledged to enhance access to bursaries, which would have more closely reflected the cost of living. Will the Minister comment on the need for greater financial support to be given to trainee midwives? I also ask her to make a short statement on her policy in respect of the NHS community midwifery model proposed by the Independent Midwives Association and supported by other childbirth charities.

In conclusion, I simply say that maternity services are vital for our future and deserve our support, and I ask the Minister to clarify what action the Government will take to address urgently the shortage of midwives in the NHS.

10.50 am

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton) on securing the debate, and on his role as an honorary vice-president of the Royal College of Midwives. My namesake Caroline Flint was once president of the RCM, and during my political activities since I was a student we have sometimes been mixed up with each other. Being approached as an expert in this area is something that I have experienced on a couple of occasions, and I have had to correct people by pointing out that I am not that Caroline Flint. However, I have met her, and she has done a fantastic job in representing midwives, as well as in her professional work.

I should also say that I am covering this Adjournment debate for the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), who will take on his new ministerial responsibilities for maternity services and children's services from the former Health Minister who is now the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety. However, obviously I am interested in this area, and I am happy to listen to the discussion.

I am pleased to be able to say that, although there is room for improvement—that is why the national service framework was initiated—80 per cent. of women in a survey last summer said that they were happy with maternity services. We have invested £1.4 billion per year in maternity services, and in 2001 we made a capital investment of £100 million to modernise facilities and improve the environment in which maternity care is delivered. I understand that East Cheshire NHS trust's share of that investment was approximately £1.3 million, which was used to build a state-of-the-art antenatal centre.

We are committed to trying to improve choice for women—and for fathers and families—and to meet the needs of future generations. Several hon. Members have raised the fact that more women are having babies later in their lives, but there is also the fact that younger women are having babies. I have a particular concern about that, because as public health Minister I am responsible for health inequalities, and about 60 per cent. of infant mortalities are linked to young women—I would describe some of them as young girls—who have babies perhaps too early in their lives.

However, there are also issues to do with other women who, because of technology and other changes, are able to have babies when they might not have been able to have had them in the past; in vitro fertilisation treatment is one example. Also, because of new technologies and better services some women with different types of disabilities are now able to give birth to their own children, which 10 or 20 years ago might not have been possible. We are dealing with a changing landscape. Ten or 20 years ago, some services in relation to children required longer stays in hospital. My youngest child was 18 yesterday; 18 years ago new mothers might have been expected to stay in hospital for three or four days. These days, mothers can be out of hospital within hours of having had their child, if everything has gone well. The diseases and conditions that children faced 30 years or more ago are also, thank goodness, no longer as prevalent. We have to address this changing landscape.

The number of midwives has increased over the past few years. The number of training students is up 44 per cent. since 1997, and there is good news in other areas such as obstetrics and gynaecology. However, the Department is aware that there are concerns in this area, and I will take back to it some of the points made about shortages and other worries. That is one reason for our considering what better support we can give midwives. Through the 57 trusts, we have piloted midwife support workers as possible members of the team, to carry out some of the activities for which a qualified midwife is not needed but which are important aspects of the experience for women, thus freeing midwives for the aspects of supporting women in childbirth for which only they are qualified.

I take on board the concerns raised by the hon. Gentleman about changes concerning payment by results; such concerns are one reason why we are proceeding with it only for some of the key acute services and why we are still considering, and discussing with many organisations, how payment by results would link to maternity services. I am pleased to tell him that the working group on developing models of payment by results is attending to issues of social complexity, and I assume that some of the issues that he raised will be taken into account.

We have established the maternity standard implementation advisory group, which represents stakeholders that include the royal colleges, service providers and the voluntary sector. The hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) mentioned a role for the voluntary sector in antenatal classes. I am somewhat surprised to hear about the cutting of antenatal classes and will be happy to pursue that and write to her further, because they are important in the process of ensuring that all women have as healthy a delivery as is practicable. Importantly, as she said, the opportunity to explore issues such as smoking and weight and how to look after the baby once it is born has a huge public health impact. Those services are very important to some women. That is a reason for my being keen that health, and questions of how such services are provided, should be a part of the development of children's centres.

Martin Horwood: Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: I am afraid that I cannot take any interventions because I have hardly any time.

We have also been working on developing a minimum maternity data set, which will provide more accurate and reliable information on which to plan services. That is why it is important to hear from colleagues during Adjournment debates. Sometimes our overview does not pick up on particular local circumstances. As I have said, we are working to improve our overview of what is happening on the ground, as opposed to what we may sometimes think is happening.

I am pleased to say, because it is something that falls within my responsibilities, that in January we published a revised handbook for health care professionals on responding to domestic abuse.

Martin Horwood: Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: I am not going to take any interventions; I am sorry.

The handbook deals, I think, with a helpful process in which midwives and other health professionals can find out if a woman, and possibly her unborn child, are being abused during the pregnancy. Rates of domestic violence during pregnancy are too high. Not long ago in Lambeth I met people from a domestic violence support group who were already receiving referrals of women who had had conversations with their midwives about such matters in a sympathetic way.

As I said before, and keeping in mind the points raised by the hon. Member for Macclesfield, we are looking at how to develop services, and wide-ranging consultation is going on. Services in Macclesfield are part of the relevant options.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Will the Minister give way on that, briefly?

Caroline Flint: Yes, briefly, as it the hon. Gentleman's debate.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Will the Minister give an assurance that the consultation is meaningful? The pram push organised by the Macclesfield branch of the Royal College of Midwives attracted more than 2,000 mums and other people pushing prams, which was clearly a sign of huge interest. Is the consultation serious, and will it be heeded?

Caroline Flint: All public consultations are serious and should be meaningful. As the hon. Gentleman knows, they provide opportunities not just for people in the health service but for the community and local government to offer a view. If oversight and scrutiny committees are concerned about an issue, there is an opportunity for referral back to the Secretary of State.

The process is about considering how best to provide services, in what environment—with regard to safety—and, importantly, what more community-based services should be available throughout the country to support people who are expecting children, and to provide services for those children. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the exercise is not just a question of saving money here or there: it is about trying to look, for the whole of his area, for the best way forward in providing such services.

One final point—

Mr. Martin Caton (in the Chair): Order. We now have to move on to the next debate.

Cycling

11 am

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to have secured this debate. Debates on cycling policy are certainly not regular occurrences in the House, although I hope that will change, and the main purpose of my introducing the debate is to ask why cycle use has not in general increased in this country, despite the steps that have been taken to encourage it, and to make some suggestions of what we need to do to change that position and to bring UK cycling levels up to those enjoyed in some other European countries, for example.

Before I discuss the general policy, I want to spend a couple of minutes on an issue that is causing great concern to cyclists and cycling organisations, which is the proposal for changes to the highway code. Consultation on the proposals closes tomorrow, so the debate is timely. The Minister is, I am sure, aware of those concerns, as I imagine many other hon. Members will be, as about 11,000 e-mails and letters on the issue have been sent out by cyclists.

I will not set out the concerns at any great length, but will describe them briefly for the benefit of those watching or listening to the debate, or who read it in the future. It is proposed to change the wording of the recommendations on cycle facilities under the highway code. The Cyclists Touring Club, or CTC, which has provided a briefing note to many Members, for which I am grateful, believes that the new wording means that "the use of cycle facilities will no longer be discretionary for any cyclist who wants to protect him/herself from the threat of adverse legal action."

It is suggested:

"If a cyclist was injured and there was a cycle facility nearby...the driver's insurer would have all the pretext they needed to argue that any compensation due to the cyclist should be reduced on the basis of 'contributory negligence'."

That threat is not just an academic nicety. Existing highway code rules have been used against cyclists in such a way, and cyclists have lost thousands of pounds as a result of not wanting to challenge such claims of contributory negligence when they are made against them in legal action following an accident.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I know that my hon. Friend is a frequent cyclist, as am I, although I do not think that we have to declare interests in such debates. Does he encounter, particularly in urban areas—perhaps when he cycles in his constituency—badly designed or poorly maintained cycle routes or paths? It can often be safer for cyclists to use the main road. To have any damages to which they are entitled reduced because of that choice is a perverse interpretation, is it not?

Mark Lazarowicz: That is a good point. I do not want to start sounding like the Jeremy Clarkson of the cycling fraternity, but we could all think of examples where a badly designed cycle path, one that is badly maintained or one that is blocked by traffic is more dangerous to use than not. All cyclists are aware of the position described by my hon. Friend. It is important not effectively to encourage the idea that cyclists should be corralled into a small, often badly-maintained section at the edge of the road, and that they should not be entitled to use the rest of the road, like other road users, if they consider it appropriate to do so.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): As we are talking about the highway code, one cannot, as a keen cyclist, avoid the issue of cycle helmets. I happen to disagree with the CTC and think that people should wear helmets—I would never cycle without a cycling helmet, and I cycle all the time—but I worry about how, having been put into the highway code, that subject has become a cause célèbre. People are almost going out of their way to advise others not to wear a helmet. Surely, the Department needs to pull people in and get some resolution on the issue. I find it difficult to encourage my children to wear a helmet, because it is not the done thing. Does my hon. Friend agree that the issue needs to be resolved one way or another?

Mark Lazarowicz: My hon. Friend raises a good point. There have been lengthy debates on the wearing of cycle helmets, although I do not want to go into them now. Like him, I cycle regularly. I not only try to use cycle facilities and cycle paths, but wear a helmet and encourage my children to do so.

It is important that our approach should not only be rational, but encourage and facilitate cycling, the appropriate use of facilities and the wearing of appropriate protection in the right circumstances. We should not end up—to coin a phrase—driving people away from cycling because of ultimately self-defeating restrictions. The general thrust of what my hon. Friend says has a lot of merit.

I call on the Minister to ensure that, after the consultation period, any wording in the new highway code that could give rise to unwarranted contributory negligence claims against cyclists is removed. Moreover, he should take the opportunity to include clearer advice to drivers on how to interact safely with cyclists—for example, on how much space to leave when overtaking them, and on the importance of leaving cycle lanes unobstructed and not blocking up facilities such as advanced stop lines, which have been provided in many urban locations but are frequently ignored by a number of motorists.

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): Would it not be to the advantage of us all if advanced stop lines were made compulsory rather than simply advisory, so that if a motorist stopped within one, they would be committing an offence? At the moment, they would not be.

Mark Lazarowicz: That is a very good suggestion, and I hope that the Minister will consider it. There is also, perhaps, a role for those who employ drivers, including large public sector bodies. They could do a lot to train their drivers to recognise the importance of observing not only road traffic regulations in general, but cycle stop lines in particular. As my hon. Friend rightly points out, those are frequently ignored.

I turn to the wider issue of the steps that we need to take to achieve a real and significant increase in cycling in the UK. As the excellent background note from the CTC points out, cycle use has not increased in spite of ambitious targets. Although 68 per cent. of all trips and 58 per cent. of all car trips cover less than 5 miles, cycling accounts for less than 2 per cent. of trips made in Britain. That compares with a modal share of between 10 and 20 per cent. in many other European countries, and of up to 50 per cent. in some cities in the Netherlands.

I am aware that the figure for Britain may be a little misleading, as it does not take into account some of the increase in cycling on off-road routes. That is not included in the overall statistics. In some towns and cities, there has been notable success in increasing cycling's share of overall transport use. However, that must mean that it has gone down in other cities, towns and communities. The overall picture is still pretty clear.

David Taylor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for yet again being so generous in giving way. He referred to off-road cycling. He may refer to the organisation later in his speech, but will he pay tribute to Sustrans for all the work it has done to encourage and develop the national cycling network? I and others have used large sections of it—the coast to coast route, the Pennine way and so on. My observation, although anecdotal, is that usage of that network, particularly in my constituency, is rising steadily. That has to be good.

Mark Lazarowicz: Indeed it is, and I pay tribute to what Sustrans has done. Part of one of its routes runs through my constituency, near my home, and I regularly use it. It is also well used by other cyclists. Unfortunately, however, the overall picture is that we are nowhere near reaching the cycling levels of our European neighbours.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): Is not one of the problems—and perhaps one of the reasons for that trend—the fact that not everyone has the joined-up thinking of organisations such as Sustrans? At the same time that Sustrans is planning its safe routes to schools and safe routes to work campaigns, there are proposals for out-of-town railway stations, for example, which would encourage everybody to travel to the station by car, unlike in Cheltenham Spa, where I have regularly cycled to the railway station. Such counter-trends might be responsible for the figures to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mark Lazarowicz: I do not feel able to comment on the position in Cheltenham, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman will understand, but the general point about ensuring joined-up thinking on the issue at all levels of Government is essential. Those local authorities that exhibit joined-up thinking are the ones that have achieved increases in cycle use, while others have not.

How do we increase cycle use in the UK? I agree with those who say that above all we must tackle the perception—in some cases, the reality—that cycling can be dangerous. The danger is often exaggerated but nevertheless is, I am sure, the most significant factor in deterring, in particular, new cyclists, younger cyclists and children from cycling, and parents from encouraging their children to cycle. Part of the solution to tackling that perception must be a much more extensive network of cycle paths, routes and facilities in urban and rural areas.

A lot has been done, but we all know from personal experience of existing cycle networks with major gaps in them that, having travelled along a route that one wants to take, one has to join the normal street network at a particularly busy and apparently dangerous point. Experienced cyclists can perhaps cope, but those who are not experienced are deterred by those gaps in the network. They are also deterred by the localised gaps to which my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) referred, which require cyclists to dismount or stop every few yards. To be blunt, that can make the cycle path quite useless and can occasionally increase the danger to cyclists as well.

We need to change that, and we need a significant extension of cycle facilities, crossing paths and cycle lanes. Depending on what is appropriate to a location, that is the approach we need to encourage a change in perception and to make cycling much more widely taken up in this country. If we do not provide cycle facilities that are of use to cyclists, they might not use them and motorists might get uptight because they think money is being wasted on those facilities. Unnecessary hostility could arise between cyclists and motorists—and sometimes pedestrians—because of facilities not being properly planned and thought through.

We need a comprehensive process that ensures the right approach for each road and location, and there are opportunities to achieve that. The Department for Transport is finalising guidance notes on pedestrian and cycle planning and shared-use facilities, and a promising first draft has been produced. However, the issue is not just about routes, lanes and cycle facilities. Cyclists, like pedestrians and the wider population, also benefit from traffic reduction measures, speed reduction measures, 20 mph zones and home zones. By reducing speed, those measures make the roads safer for cyclists and pedestrians—and indeed motorists—and could also help to improve the vibrancy of local streets and shopping centres, strengthening community life in our towns and cities.

Mr. Drew: I thank my hon. Friend for being so kind in giving way again. One thing that would instantly make cyclists feel safer is getting motorists to stop using mobile phones. When I cycle, I feel that the people who pose the most danger to me are those who continue to use mobile phones. I know that that is being dealt with in the Road Safety Bill and that additional penalties are being considered, but until we get people to stop using mobile phones, they will often be oblivious to cyclists and cyclists' lives will be in danger.

Mark Lazarowicz: My hon. Friend makes a good point not just for cyclists, but for general road users, including motorists. He and I are in danger from that practice.

David Taylor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again. Is he surprised to learn that in every survey of categories of antisocial behaviour, greatest concern is registered not over litter, dog fouling, aggressive teenagers, drug dealing or neighbour noise, but over speeding in urban and rural settings? That problem needs to be tackled and the Government could generate some much needed popularity by addressing it systematically and effectively.

Mark Lazarowicz: As always, my hon. Friend makes a good point, which I am sure the Minister will take up.

How can we achieve a comprehensive approach throughout the UK? It would be appropriate to require every local authority to carry out an audit of an existing network to see how they could create a comprehensive cycle network fit for cyclists in the area. Some authorities have done this and some have a good record, but others do not. That is why we need to do something to improve those authorities.

There is great variation between different UK towns and cities in the facilities provided for cycling, and as a result great variation between cycling's shares of overall transport usage. In my city of Edinburgh, the percentage of journeys to work by bike has doubled and continues to increase. It is still only a small percentage, but that is a move in the right direction. It is partly due to the fact that, for 20 years or more, there has been a consistent policy of promoting cycling and facilities have been provided to encourage it, accompanied by the very effective Lothian cycle campaign, Spokes, of which I am proud to be a member.

That campaign ensured that the council was put under the microscope when cycle facilities were not as good as they should have been. There is always a need to do more and a need for more spending locally and nationally. Edinburgh and other cities—Cambridge is a good example—have shown where a difference can be made, and there are a number of such examples in London as well.

Local leadership is important as it can ensure that in all developments—for example, those in transport, roads and housing—cycle facilities are built in from the start when it is cheaper to do so, rather than added later. Too often, cycling is not incorporated when developments start, when it could be quite easily, and planning authorities must be encouraged by appropriate guidance from central Government to ensure that that happens.

The process must occur at a more local level as well. We need many more examples of people "thinking bike" in relation to new developments, buildings or whatever. Bluntly, we need only look at Parliament for examples of how that has not happened. During the past year, some, doubtless necessary, security improvements have been made around the perimeter of Parliament. Those could have been used as an opportunity to improve cycle access into and out of the Houses of Parliament and to improve conditions for cyclists travelling past, but we have created a situation that is even more dangerous for cyclists. We could start by putting our own House in order.

I have spoken for longer than I intended, but I have taken quite a few interventions. We have to do something about the biggest single factor that influences the trend in cycle use in the UK, which is the provision of resources. I acknowledge the substantial capital funding that has been put into cycling by the Government. The funding programme for the development of a comprehensive strategy in six cities in England is particularly welcome, but I regret that my constituents will not be able to share that success: in Scotland, there has been a cut of more than a third in cycling spending from £12 million to £8 million a year.

In the same period, transport spending has increased from £800 million to £1,200 million a year. For the most part, that increase lies with new motorways and similar roads, which are being promoted enthusiastically by the Lib Dem Minister for Transport and Telecommunications in the Scottish Parliament. I hope that our Lib Dem colleagues will say something to encourage a change of approach in Scotland.

Whatever is happening in different parts of the UK, we must try ensure that, instead of pilots, studies and local projects, there is a comprehensive approach to cycling policy at all levels of central Government and local government so that there is an increase in cycling and in the resources needed to encourage and support it locally. We need capital funding, of course—there have been increases there—as well as a steady and secure revenue funding stream. That could be particularly important in providing more training for cyclists.

Training is important not only in schools, but for people at work, and it could be organised through and encouraged by employers. Training could be given in universities, colleges and other organisations with a large number of people who could be encouraged to cycle. More training would also, I hope, go some way toward discouraging those cyclists who break the rules of the road, ignore traffic lights, and endanger pedestrians and other cyclists who comply with the law. I condemn such behaviour. As one who cycles and also drives a car, I know that such irresponsible behaviour gives all cyclists a bad name. We should try to discourage it.

Cycling has countless benefits and should be encouraged. It is one of the most environmentally friendly forms of transport and it could contribute to reducing greenhouse gas emissions. Motor vehicles are one of the most important contributors to those emissions, and are likely to be for many years to come. A shift to cycling in our towns and cities would also reduce congestion. Cycling is a healthy activity and it could help us to tackle the problem of obesity, particularly in children, about which we are all concerned.

I congratulate the Government on what they have done so far and urge them to take account of cyclists' concerns about the changes in the highway code. I also urge them to build on what they have done and to adopt a joined-up approach involving civil servants, central Government and local government to achieve a shift in resources and a change in attitudes. They should work together to help to make cycling as popular as it is in many of our European neighbours.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on securing this timely debate. As he said, it is timely because tomorrow is the deadline for comments on the changes to the highway code.

I also congratulate the Cyclists Touring Club on raising the profile of cyclists. Far from being annoyed, as its briefing note suggests, by the e-mails and letters that I have received from CTC supporters, I am delighted to receive them. For too long, cyclists have moaned about facilities, but have not punched their weight in terms of political pressure by lobbying MPs, Ministers and their local authorities. The CTC says that more than 11,000 cyclists have e-mailed their MPs in response to its campaign about the highway code. That is absolutely brilliant, but I have a complaint: I do not think that I got my fair share.

Cyclists should now mobilise locally to put pressure on local authorities to produce local transport plans that provide for a cycle-friendly infrastructure. With cycling at an all-time low, it is unacceptable for local authorities to look at their local transport plans simply in terms of ensuring that there is no reduction in cycle use or achieving satisfactory minimum targets. The current state of affairs will not change unless there is pressure from local communities and the Department for Transport to make cycling a higher priority.

With political activism at such a low ebb, well-organised local cycling groups could achieve a great deal on issues such as increased congestion and tackling the obesity epidemic. In that context, I want to mention Leek Cyclists Club, which is running some excellent events in August to celebrate its 130 years of existence—it was established in 1876. I hope to be supporting those events. I like the fact that the club is putting on a range of activities, including sportive rides, time trials and family rides. Continental cyclists will be involved as well. The proceeds will go to the local air ambulance service and to the first responder service. I hope that the club will not confine its activities to such events, but enthuse others and get much more involved with local schools to promote cycling, and with the local authority to ensure that more is done locally.

I agree that under-resourcing is an issue. I must accept some responsibility for securing an allocation of only £5 million a year to Cycling England when I was in the relevant Department. The hoped-for £70 million was never on the cards; it was not going to happen. However, the creation of Cycling England has been a huge step forward.

It is also important that we now have the new, accredited, national standard for cycling training, which is extremely welcome, as is the three-tier level. It will equip not just children but adults with training for on-road cycling and dealing with real traffic conditions, rather than involve just going round bollards and so on. Such things are great fun, but they do not always equip people for cycling on the road.

It is hugely important to improve cycling skills and safety, as well as to give people much-needed confidence, because it can make a huge difference on the road. When I was in the Department, I was amazed to discover that the cycling proficiency scheme that I knew as a child no longer existed; it stopped 10 years ago. It is no wonder that fewer and fewer children cycle to school. Parents have to be convinced that their children will be safe cycling to school. Training is a vital part of that equation, although it will not necessarily overcome the overwhelming perception that cycling is dangerous.

The "Bike It" scheme, which is particularly geared towards schools, will help to create a greater perception of safety, because it is working on personalised safety routes from home to school and on ensuring proper secure storage for bikes at school. It is important that when people embark on cycling they try to work out a safe route where they can deal with the hazards along the way much more securely.

I met a group of enthusiastic child cyclists in one school who happily cycled in rain, snow or in any other conditions. Some were young and others were slightly older, but they all found the process incredibly empowering. They told me that they did not have to wait for their mum or dad to get the car out of the garage, because they could cycle to school at any time, and that gave them huge independence, as well as increased physical fitness, which is a welcome side effect. That independence is important, because nowadays children are often shepherded to school and to shops, dance classes and so on. The fact that children could go out on their own in safety—along a safety route—meant that they felt independent, and they enjoyed that feeling of freedom.

I am sure that the proposed changes to the highway code are intended to improve the safety of cyclists. However, many cycle lanes are poorly designed or badly maintained. John Grimshaw of Sustrans demonstrated that to me when he took me to Bristol along such routes. Given that cyclists are just about the most vulnerable road users, it is important that they can make their own choices about whether to ride along a cycle route or along the road without fear of adverse legal consequences.

Of course, a minority of cyclists behave badly and illegally, flouting traffic laws, and I find them as annoying as anyone else does, but let us be realistic. Many motorists also flout traffic laws, not least by using mobile phones. Unbelievably, some people also use mobile phones when cycling. I cannot understand why they do that; it is appalling. However, the highway code should not be drafted as though all cyclists are irresponsible. Most are not. They want to cycle safely and survive in what are often difficult traffic conditions. No one wants the risks to cyclists to increase, or cyclists to be penalised for deciding not to use a cycle lane. I think we all know examples of cycle lanes that go just a few yards or that come to an abrupt end at a junction or, worse still, at a roundabout.

Mark Lazarowicz: Does my hon. Friend agree that a short stretch of cycle lane can be extremely dangerous in that, at the end of the lane, the act of joining the main route puts the cyclist at much greater risk than if they had not entered the cycle lane in the first place?

Charlotte Atkins: That is absolutely right. The point at which a cyclist joins the rest of the traffic is a clear area of real danger, and the evidence shows that most accidents occur at junctions. Often, that is just because motorists do not see cyclists. It is vital that we change the culture in this country so that it is much more akin to that in France, where cyclists are noticed. In London, a critical mass of cyclists has been created, so motorists are more aware of cyclists there, but we have much more to do in other towns where cycling is not so prevalent.

I want to make a plea for far more active promotion of the scheme that enables people to obtain tax-free loans from their employers to buy bikes. A similar scheme involving computers has been very successful in the past, and such schemes make absolute sense.

An excellent employer in my area, Britannia building society, has often been criticised for the number of cars that spill out of its car park on to the road. The car park is overflowing and the building society is having to build a new car park, but if it could only encourage some of its employees to cycle to work, that would free up space in the car park. The building society is very well placed, just outside Leek. If the canal towpaths could be opened up for cyclists, its staff could enjoy a leisurely cycle ride to work in one of the most beautiful parts of England—a perfect start to the working day.

Sustrans has done tremendous work in my constituency by opening up cycle ways, one of which is the Biddulph Valley way. That cycle route is ideal not only for employees, but for children going to school. Sustrans seems to have an amazing facility to take public money, increase it twofold or threefold and use it incredibly effectively throughout the nation.

In conclusion, I should like to ask the Minister a few questions. Will he review all local transport plans in respect of their proposals to boost cycling? It is vital that we consider what local authorities are doing countrywide, not just in the towns that Cycling England is promoting as its project towns. Will he examine again the proposed changes to the highway code and take on board the concerns of both the CTC and cyclists? Will he promote much more actively the tax-free loans for bike purchase and work with employers' organisations to increase cycling among their staff? Will he do much more to expand cycle training for adults as well as children through "Bike It" and other local initiatives?

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) both on obtaining the debate at a good time and on obtaining it at all, because it is important in its own right that we talk about improving cycling.

My bicycle for many years has been a sturdy black mountain bike. I have done my best to cut out short journeys by car, and walk and cycle to replace them. This is the time of the year when I love to get the bike out on a warm summer evening or a sunny weekend day and cycle into the beautiful countryside around the Stafford constituency. The pace of life on a bicycle is wonderful, and one enjoys sights and sounds along countryside roads and cycle ways that cannot be caught when driving. It is a beautiful experience, and I urge everybody to do the same.

David Taylor: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Kidney: I am happy to give way if my hon. Friend wants more details about the routes around the Stafford constituency.

David Taylor: Will my hon. Friend confirm that when he undertakes short journeys in his constituency, he does not have a driver who carries his shoes and papers to his destination?

Mr. Kidney: I can give that confirmation. Looking along the rows of seats, the score in the category of Daves who support cycling is Labour 3, Tories 1.

There is good support for cycling in Stafford, thanks in large part to the LA21 team at Stafford borough council, particularly the outstanding Karen Davies who leads it so well. We enjoy family cycling days that are organised by her team. Under the Back 2 Bikes recycling scheme, people give up their damaged or old cycles, which are repaired and made available to new users. They are rented out, hired out or even loaned to people who cannot afford to buy a bike. We do what we can in my constituency to support cycling.

My reasons for cycling are mainly to keep my weight down—we attend far too many dinners in this place—and to keep my carbon dioxide emissions from transport to a minimum. If people cycle often, they enjoy health benefits and multiply the benefits to the health of our nation and our environment. There are, of course, additional social, economic and environmental benefits. For example, if people were to cycle rather than drive their vehicles in city and town centres, we would have cleaner air. That would mean less incidence of asthma and more pleasant surroundings for people who want to shop, window shop or simply stroll. It would make areas more attractive to people who want to shop and visit as tourists. Cycling provides all those wider benefits.

Cycling can help with rising obesity by increasing regular physical exercise, and it addresses the growing concern about climate change by contributing to reduced emissions of greenhouse gases. It can boost the retail sector, promote tourism and open up the countryside to more visitors. It can reduce the pressure on an over-congested road network, and, most important, it can be fun.

It is necessary to stress the downside. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith spoke about the perception of danger, but in fact there is danger on roads from congestion, big vehicles and drivers who are less than attentive to their duties as drivers on busy roads. However, it is clear that the positives far outweigh the negatives, and the debate rightly aims at pushing the Government to do more to promote cycling.

Like my hon. Friend, I believe that we ought to direct this debate to local authorities as well. They now have good levels of funding, thanks to the Government's generosity. They have local transport plans for strategic planning in their areas of roads, cycling and transport generally, and we want them to give the same priority to cycling as we are urging on my hon. Friend the Minister.

My hon. Friend gave some examples of local authorities that have been successful in promoting cycling in their area. There has been a marked increase in recreational cycling, and cycling remains an important transport mode for many people, but, according to the Government's walking and cycling action plan for 2004,

"across England as a whole, we have not succeeded in raising cycling levels significantly above the 1996 baseline."

There is one bright, sparkling spot of success that contradicts that conclusion: the national cycle network, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor). The figures that I have are for 2004, when there were more than 201 million trips on the national cycle network, an increase of some 11 per cent. in just one year. The Sustrans report for that year states:

"Traffic-free urban routes are crucial to the increased usage of the Network. Whilst the Network grew by 9.3 per cent. in urban areas between 2003 and 2004, cycling...trips on these routes grew by 16.0 per cent.".

No doubt that is why the Department for Transport describes the national cycling network as "the strongest success story in walking and cycling"

in that very walking and cycling action plan of 2004. That is one good example of action to improve safety and security, and to reassure cyclists that their activity is safe as well as healthy. We must consider other ways of giving the same reassurance and support to cycling. Part of that strategy will mean more dedicated cycle lanes.

My hon. Friends the Members for Edinburgh, North and Leith and for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) touched on the revisions to the highway code. In any collision between a car and a cyclist, it is inevitable that the cyclist will come off worse than the driver of the car. The onus is much more on the driver of the vehicle to take care, and cyclists' worry about revising the highway code is based on unscrupulous drivers and insurance companies using the highway code to try to make spurious counter-claims against cyclists who get hurt in collisions. They are right to possess that fear. The law on driver insurance needs to be changed so that non-motorised road users can claim injury damages from drivers who hit them, unless it can be shown that they were reckless in causing the collision that led to their injury.

When I was a solicitor, which is an increasingly long time ago, I experienced making claims in countries other than Britain for people who were injured in road collisions. Countries such as France already have rules that put the onus on drivers and their insurance companies to compensate other people who are injured by the actions of vehicles. Their pedestrians and cyclists have stronger protection by law, and I urge that approach on our Government.

Another important consideration for the protection of cyclists is the education of motorists. We heard about the bad habit of driving while using a mobile phone, and about drivers who do not see cyclists even though they are in front of their eyes. In my constituency, I have seen drivers driving too close to cyclists as they try to pass them, and opening their car doors as cyclists go past, because they forgot their duty to look over their shoulder. We must draw motorists' attention to their responsibilities.

Recently, I saw some Government-sponsored advertisements on the television that were successful in drawing attention to the presence of motorcyclists on our roads. We need much more of the same for cyclists as part of the Government's publicity campaign. I should also like more use of 20 mph zones, where all traffic slows down. They give cyclists a fairer chance of a safe journey.

The Commission for Integrated Transport looked throughout Europe at transport best practice in 2001, and as part of its report it found that area-wide 20 mph limits are "the one critical success factor underpinning best practice in promoting walking, cycling and public transport as alternatives to the private car".

Living Streets, a charity that promotes safer streets, is part of the Safer Streets Coalition, which comprises organisations including CTC. It wants safer roads for all road users. When I met Living Streets, it argued that there are three big reasons for making 20 mph the default speed in most streets. It said:

"It is the one thing that will do most to cut casualties, make streets vibrant and people centred, boost sustainable transport."

I agree with those arguments, adopt them myself and urge them on the Minister.

I also received the great sheaf of letters that my hon. Friends mentioned, objecting to the highway code changes. I have had letters about another campaign—CTC-inspired, I think—to integrate cycle and rail transport. It is a policy, as one of my constituents called it, of doorstep to destination. It was urged on me that the Government should have a national policy framework that puts cycling and rail use together, covering things such as station access and parking, and storing cycles safely at stations. In the nine years that I have been going to platform 1 of Stafford station to catch my train to Parliament, I have seen the growth of a safe parking area for cycles on the platform. As it has grown, so has its use, and there is a large number of bicycles there every Monday morning when I am waiting for the train to Euston.

The letters that I have received also urge that the national policy framework should cover on-board cycle carriage facilities, information about cycle use and carriage, the possibility of cyclists reserving places on trains for their cycles, and the wider use of consultation and monitoring. Again, I ask the Minister to consider those options.

We already have policies on safe routes to schools, and those should clearly include cycling. It is particularly important that we reassure parents that it is safe for their children to cycle to school. That is why 20 mph limits are important, particularly around schools, and why safe parking and storage for children's cycles is vital in schools. In my constituency, I speak to students in schools and listen to representatives of schools councils, and there is tremendous interest in safe parking and storage facilities for cycles. However, there is not always enough money for every school that wants such facilities to have them, and I hope that we can put that right. It is also important, as my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands said, that pupils have proper, structured instruction on safe cycling.

My hon. Friend also mentioned employers, and I have seen examples of good practice in my constituency in terms of green travel plans. A small number of employers have taken the issue on board enthusiastically and developed plans to reduce demand among staff for coming to work in their own cars. Staffordshire county council gives good support and advice on that and has a small amount of money to assist employers in making changes, such as giving priority to parking for cycles, providing showers for people who cycle to work and so on. However, a bit more money to get such schemes up and running would be useful.

Mark Lazarowicz: Would my hon. Friend care to speculate on ways in which we in the House of Commons could improve the record of employers and, indeed, Members on cycling to work? How could we assist and encourage them to do so?

Mr. Kidney: I entirely adopt my hon. Friend's comments about making it easier to get cycles into this place and making the streets around the building more accessible, and I would certainly like more Members than Ministers to have access to showers here if they cycle to work. In fairness to our colleagues, however, I should say that I see a lot of them cycling to Parliament each day as I walk here from my flat in London, and I congratulate all those who do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) mentioned wearing cycle helmets, which is the final thing that I want to raise. I always wear my cycle helmet when I am cycling, but a resident who lives just around the corner from me, in Newport road, went out on a recreational cycling run with some friends without wearing one. Sadly, he fell over the handlebars, landed on his head and received a dreadful injury, as everybody can imagine. I therefore urge all cycle users to wear a helmet and all parents to encourage their children always to wear a cycle helmet. When my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) introduced a private Member's Bill to make it the law for everybody to wear a helmet, it was disappointing that there was a split in the cycling lobby over whether that was a good or bad thing. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud, I urge the Minister to bring the cycling organisations together and to try to reach a consensus on a law to make helmet wearing the norm for all cycle users.

Those are the points that I urge on my hon. Friend Minister. If he wants to enjoy the pleasures of cycling around my constituency, he would be welcome any time.

11.49 am

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on giving us the time and space to debate this important issue. I speak as a cyclist and chair of the all-party cycling group.

I shall speak on behalf of an oppressed minority who spend much of their time in the gutter, who always seems to be in the wrong, and who are told that they are a danger to themselves, and possibly to pedestrians, and that they are definitely an annoyance to taxis and should get out of the bus lanes. However, we are clean, green and healthy, and cycling is the future of transport. The number of cyclists has doubled in London since 2000. Indeed, we have reached a critical mass in the capital, and motorists know that we are there.

The more cycling there is on the roads, the safer they become, because the real danger is the metal boxes—the cars. We must encourage cycling and change attitudes to it. Cycling presses so many policy buttons. It helps with the environment, helps to make our lives easier, helps to ensure that our roads are no longer full and helps with the obesity epidemic. Cycling is the answer to so many of our problems, and I urge the Government to give greater priority to this important policy issue.

Mr. Drew: I am pleased that my hon. Friend is now chair of the all-party cycling group. Cyclists have always been ahead of their time and the Clarion cycling clubs—people forget that they were the early socialists—formed the wedge that allowed us to have freedom of access. Going back 100 years, which would help socialism in this country, would give predetermination to the vital role of the bike in our society. Does she agree that that is a jolly good thing?

Emily Thornberry: It is a jolly good thing, as well as a timely reminder of our history and the close links between the socialist movement and cyclists. We hope to continue to push that forward.

I was talking about London, and particularly how things have changed there and how in so many respects it shows the way. The speed of transport in central London is 9 mph, which is the same as it was at the turn of the last century when transport consisted of horses and carts. The statistics from Transport for London show that the time it takes to travel 4 miles is 22 minutes on a bicycle, 30 minutes on the tube, 40 minutes in a car and 62 minutes on a bus. It is much faster to make a 4-mile journey in London by bicycle, and cycling in London has already doubled.

Another problem is that we are victims of some of the wackier suggestions and criticisms that are levelled against us. Unfortunately, some of those come from another place. A recent suggestion was to ask the Government whether they would be willing to consider carefully whether "a new requirement that cyclists display on their clothing a clearly readable personal registration number and carry a registration card containing relevant information would confer benefits that outweighed the bureaucracy and costs that such a system would entail?"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 27 April 2006; Vol. 681, c. 256.]

May I urge the Government to ignore that advice? It is crazy to suggest that cyclists should carry numbers on their clothing so that they could be identified, and it would be equally insulting and crazy to expect pedestrians to do that. Cyclists are a special class and we need support. We do not need that eccentric criticism.

There was also a suggestion in another place that 1,000 pedestrians in London were injured by cyclists last year. May I put an accurate defence of cyclists on the record? Last year, more pedestrians were hit and injured by mopeds than by bicycles. In 2004, one pedestrian was killed in a collision with a cyclist, but that is the only recent known death. Motor cyclists, of whom there are a similar number on the road as cyclists, killed 20 people and seriously injured another 200 last year. The number of direct pedestrian deaths caused by cars in the same year was 388, with another 5,000 people seriously injured and 20,000 moderately injured. On top of that, there were another 2,000 deaths on the road, all caused by motorised transport. It is a simple fact that the more cycling there is on the roads, the safer our roads become.

May I take this opportunity to put in my ha'penny-worth on the highway code campaign? More than 11,000 cyclists contacted their MP about the matter. Several thousand sent in responses to the highway code consultation last weekend and succeeded in jamming the Driving Standards Authority's e-mail server, so several hundred cyclists have been unable to submit their views. However, I presume that I know what they are saying. They are asking the Government, "Please do not make it our responsibility if we are injured or hurt by cars on the roads," because without the cars there would not be those injuries.

In fact, if there were to be a policy initiative to help and protect cyclists, I would still strongly recommend that the Government continue to put money into cycle training, which is important, and not only for children. I had cycling training a few months ago—I have been cycling on the roads in London for nearly 30 years—and I was amazed at how helpful it was. I was told that it would simply be assertive cycling training, and those who know me were surprised that I needed that, but assertive cycling made me think about cycling in a different way.

For example, I was taught not to cycle in the gutter; we are entitled to cycle on the road like anyone else. I was told not to cycle right by parked cars, but to move away from them, so that when a parked car's door opens, the cyclist does not get hit. When cyclists stop at traffic lights, they should stop in the middle of the road. They should make eye contact with drivers behind them, because once eye contact is made, drivers begin to think of the cyclist as a person, rather than an annoying blob. That is what is taught through cycle training, and anyone and everyone can benefit from it. It is a way for us to convince people that cycling can be safe, clean, green, healthy and good for us all.

Finally, I would like to plug a couple of events. This afternoon in Room 8, at 4 o'clock, John Grimshaw is talking about his vision for enabling access to cycle paths by bike and for leaving permanent routes available after the Olympic games to cyclists who want to cycle round east London. Everyone is welcome at that meeting. I must also plug bike week, Bike2Work and the parliamentary bike ride on 21 June, which starts at 9 o'clock outside St. Pancras station. We chose St. Pancras to highlight the importance of integrating transport, including rail and bike transport, and to highlight the unfortunate lack of facilities for bicycles at Europe's largest rail hub. Everyone is welcome.

We cycle to Parliament, but, unfortunately, visitors to Parliament will have difficulties parking their bicycles, although the all-party cycling group is working on that, too. It has had meetings with Westminster city council and the parliamentary authorities, and we keep our fingers crossed that we can make some progress.

[Emily Thornberry]

Once again, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith for giving us the space to debate this issue, and I look forward to the Minister's response. I hope that cycling continues to go up the agenda.

11.58 am

Mr. John Leech (Manchester, Withington) (LD): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on securing what has turned out to be a very interesting debate on cycling. I confess that I had hoped that my first transport debate would be on something very specific, so I was alarmed when I saw the title "Cycling", and I thank him for giving me some idea of the issues he wanted to raise.

I would like to comment on a few issues. The hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Stafford Mr. Kidney) raised concerns about proposed changes to the highway code. I add my support to the campaign to avoid those changes, which could discourage people from cycling. The hon. Members for Stafford and for Stroud (Mr. Drew) raised important points about the compulsory wearing of cycle helmets. In the short term, making helmets compulsory would probably reduce the number of people cycling, although a debate is needed on whether such a move would improve the safety of cyclists in the long term. That is an important question.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith made a good suggestion about forcing local authorities to audit their cycle facilities, but if there are no additional resources, we might find that although local authorities recognise that cycling facilities seriously need to be installed, they might not be able to install them.

On the point about resources, the hon. Gentleman raised concerns over funding cuts for cycling in Scotland and made special mention of the Liberal Democrat Minister for Transport and Telecommunications. However, I should point out that, thanks to the Liberal Democrat manifesto commitment of 2003, the new ScotRail franchise has been negotiated so that bikes can be carried on trains, which will encourage the use of bikes.

Similarly, under that Liberal Democrat Minister, spending on public transport as a proportion of overall transport spending will rise by 70 per cent. between 2003 and 2007, compared with an increase of less than 50 per cent. under Labour's stewardship. Perhaps the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith ought to speak to his colleagues in Scotland as well as preaching to the Liberal Democrats about their commitment to cycling.

No one will dispute that we should encourage more people to cycle. The benefits are clear: cycling keeps people fit and healthy—it is nice to see so many fit and healthy Members here today, who are all committed to cycling—cuts congestion, reduces pollution and makes our streets safer because there are fewer cars out there. Unfortunately, cycling has been in decline since Labour came to power. During the first two terms of the Labour Government, bicycle trips fell by 22 per cent. Equally worryingly, the length of the trips that people make has gone down. According to figures produced by the CTC, which were mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, only 2 per cent. of road trips in Britain are made by bicycle. We all agree that that must change.

To be fair to the Government—no one has mentioned this—one of the main reasons for cycling rates not being as good as they are elsewhere is our pretty poor weather. According to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), the sun is always shining in Stafford.

Mr. Kidney: Since 1997.

Mr. Leech: I should invite the hon. Gentleman to come to Manchester with his umbrella, because it is usually raining.

Mark Lazarowicz: I am not going to dispute the hon. Gentleman's description of the British weather, but it is important to do away with the myth that one must have a perfect climate to encourage cycling. The Netherlands does not have a climate drastically different from that in much of the UK for much of the year, but it has a much higher cycling level. Before anyone says that that is because the Netherlands is flat, plenty of places in urban areas in the UK are pretty flat too. Let us not get caught up with the idea that bad weather is the reason for people not cycling more in the UK.

Mr. Leech: I accept the point made by the hon. Gentleman, but he will accept that more people are encouraged to cycle during better weather than during poor weather. I vividly remember when I was only a cyclist and not a car driver, always dreading the thought of waking up—

Emily Thornberry: There is no such thing as being "only a cyclist". One does not graduate from being a cyclist to being a motorist.

Mr. Leech: I take the hon. Lady's point, but she did not let me finish mine. I was going to say that when I was only a cyclist, as opposed to a cyclist and a motorist, I used to dread waking up and hearing rain on the window before I prepared for my 6-mile cycle ride to work. It certainly discouraged me from getting up in the morning when I thought the weather was going to be poor. I am sure that poor weather is the only reason that the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) has a car following him to work with his suit and shoes, because he does not want to spend the rest of the day in a soggy suit and shoes. Instead of having a car following him, perhaps he ought to get a wardrobe—

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Order. You are drifting, Mr. Leech.

Mr. Leech: I apologise, Mr. Hancock.

I accept that this is not just a question of the weather, which is why the Liberal Democrats have a five-point plan for cycling. First, we need to create an environment that accommodates and supports cycling.

Most roads are less than inviting for cyclists. Even where cycle lanes have been introduced, they are often too short, or only advisory. I am sure that other hon. Members will have been as frustrated as me at seeing cars constantly parked in the green cycle area, forcing bikes on to the main part of the road. More and better consultation on cycle lanes is needed to ensure that they are put in the right place and that they suit cyclists' needs. I am sure that there are cycle lanes in the constituencies of other hon. Members, as there are in my constituency, that are rarely used because they are in the wrong place and inconvenient.

We need to ensure that there are adequate facilities for the safe storage of bikes. I recently received a complaint from a constituent who told me that there was not a single cycle rack within a half-mile radius of his office, and that the council had told him that there was nowhere suitable in the area for a bike rack. Remarkably, there appear to be plenty of metered car parking spaces, but there is nothing suitable for a bike rack.

We need to be smarter when using the planning process to encourage cycling to work. It is all very well forcing developers to put bike sheds in their new developments, but how many members of staff will use them unless there are adequate changing facilities in those developments? Surely we should ensure that such facilities are included, as part of encouraging the use of bikes.

Perhaps Members of Parliament need to do a little more. Rather than give 20p a mile for cycling and 40p a mile for cars, perhaps we should turn that round and give 40p a mile for cycling and 20p a mile for cars.

Emily Thornberry: Does the hon. Gentleman seriously think that if Members of Parliament were to be given another 20p a mile, more of them would cycle to Parliament?

Mr. Leech: Perhaps not, but that might discourage car use. If hon. Members got less mileage for using their cars, they might be discouraged from doing so, and perhaps they would be encouraged to use a bike. Who knows?

We also need to improve integration of public transport with cycling provision. I have already mentioned ScotRail being forced to allow passengers to carry bikes. I know someone who has been forced to buy a car because he cannot take his bike on the train. Without being able to cycle to the train station and at the other end cycle from the station to work, he cannot take that route.

Charlotte Atkins: Why did not the hon. Gentleman's friend buy a second bike?

Mr. Leech: I cannot answer that except to say that perhaps he did not want to leave a bike overnight somewhere. Given the crime rate in parts of the country, I could understand that.

We must encourage young people to cycle regularly. Most people cycle when they are kids, and one of the most disappointing statistics is that they do not continue to do so. In my opinion, the main reason for that is the fact that among younger people cycling is seen more as a recreation than a form of transport. We should be more successful at persuading people to continue cycling if we get more children into the habit of cycling to get from A to B, as well as for recreation.

The best way to achieve that is to persuade more young people to cycle to school. When I became a school governor, I was appalled to find that there was not a single cycle rack at the school. Was it any wonder that people did not cycle to school when they had nowhere safe to leave their bike? Fortunately, the situation has improved, but all too often schools do not make the necessary provision for bicycles.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): I apologise for being late, Mr. Hancock. I was caught up in Committee elsewhere. The hon. Gentleman is making an important point, but may I commend to him the system operated in Milton Keynes? We have a red way system, which is an entirely separate grid road system designed especially for walkers and cyclists. That has been an enormous help to people who want to cycle to school. Does he believe that that system should be used more widely when we build new communities?

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Order. I remind Mr. Leech of the time.

Mr. Leech: Thank you, Mr. Hancock. Yes, I agree that that should be encouraged, especially in new developments. Developers should be forced to provide such alternative routes for cyclists and walkers. As well as people enjoying cycling, we have to emphasise the health benefits of cycling for adults and for children. That might sound straightforward, but the message is clearly not getting through to people.

Finally, we need to make roads safer to give people the confidence to get on their bikes. According to the CTC, the biggest discouragement to cycling is the perception that it is dangerous. Sometimes that is a perception; sometimes roads clearly are dangerous. In some cases, the answer is having cycle lanes where they will make a real difference, but getting cars off the road and getting people on to public transport are equally important, as is tackling speeding traffic. The Government have failed to tackle the congestion in our towns and cities effectively. No wonder people have given up cycling, when our roads are full of fast-moving vehicles.

Cycling is a healthy, environmentally friendly and inexpensive mode of transport. More needs to be done to provide better facilities and support for existing cyclists, and to provide the conditions to encourage many others to get back on their bikes.

12.11 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on securing this timely debate, given that the review ends tomorrow. I, too, was a keen bicyclist when I was younger. There was one sport that no one has mentioned, which is bicycle polo. All that is required is an old bike, equipment such as an old hockey stick or cricket bat and any old ball, and it is a good use of grounds—football or rugby grounds, or whatever—that are too hard to play those games on.

[Mr. Owen Paterson]

A minimum of only two players is needed on either side. It is a vigorous game that leads to exciting accidents, and I commend it to those who know nothing about it.

Bicycling is the Cinderella of transport activity. We have 3.6 million people who bike on a weekly basis. Well over 1 million commute daily, and 40 per cent. of people use their bikes for leisure. The British Cycling Federation has 14,000 members, the Cyclists' Touring Club has 50,000, and Sustrans has 37,000. A lot of people will be interested in our debate.

Activity seems to be extraordinarily patchy across the country: 28.2 per cent. of people in Cambridge commute, while 0.2 per cent. commute in the Rhondda. The hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) made an interesting point about danger. There is a perception of danger, which is partially backed up by the facts: casualties per 100 million km travelled in the UK are eight, while in the Netherlands they are 0.8. Against that, 2.3 per cent. of journeys are made by bicycle in the UK and a massive 27 per cent. in the Netherlands. She made a valid point not only about the perception of danger but about the real danger associated with cycling.

Cycling is a major business. It employs 20,000 people in the UK and there are 4,000 bicycle shops. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) mentioned the health benefits, which appear to me to be massive. The British Heart Foundation says that cycling at least 20 miles a week reduces the risk of heart disease to less than half that for non-cyclists who take no other exercise.

Emily Thornberry: Is it not possible to mount an argument that a regular cyclist is Britain is more likely to live longer, and that far from being dangerous cycling is life-enhancing?

Mr. Paterson: I am most grateful to the hon. Lady, because she takes the words out of my mouth. The National Forum for Coronary Heart Disease Prevention says that regular cyclists enjoy a fitness level equal to that of a person 10 years younger. If one third of all short car journeys were made by bike, national heart disease would fall by between 5 and 10 per cent.

The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) mentioned space and commuting. Cyclists require far less space to get about than car-borne travellers. For example, a 4 m wide cycle path can carry five times the number of people catered for in cars on a road that is twice as wide, according to Friends of the Earth.

The Conservatives have a strong record of supporting cycling. My right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) and my hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) have given spectacular publicity to the activity. The former said:

> "We must give people, particularly those living in our towns and cities, serious travel options that don't involve the car. Around a quarter of all car trips are under 2 miles in length. If we're serious about tackling climate change—and incidentally about improving public health too—we need to help make it possible for people to walk or cycle on these shorter journeys."

He was going right back to our strategy of 10 years ago.

In 1996, the Conservative Government produced a national cycling strategy that set the ambitious target of doubling the number of cycle trips by 2002 and quadrupling it by 2012. The strategy listed a series of actions to be taken by the Government and by local authorities to enhance the activity of cycling. Sadly, I do not have the time to mention them, but they were effectively endorsed by the new Labour Government in the 1998 transport White Paper. However, everything fizzled into the sand.

We did not achieve the results that were promised. Targets became aspirations. The most damning document was the Government's review, published in March 2005. In many ways it is a symbol of what happened to the huge ambitions that the Government had when they came in, which were scaled back and changed when they hit reality. They set off with a national cycling strategy, and we were to have a national cycling forum, but that was reduced in number, as were the targets. Indeed, we did not meet the targets; according to the Government's review, the number of cyclists in England fell by a fifth in the past decade.

Considering how much depended on local government input, it is extraordinary that none of the best value indicators took account of cycling, as one of the main delivery agents was bound to be local government. Nor was it in the Audit Commission's comprehensive performance assessment, because cycling did not have a category of its own; it was lumped in with transport.

There appears to be a conflict on funding. Although cycling is covered by a number of Departments, they seem to be muddling around with the funding. There is Department for Transport funding; there is Department for Education and Skills funding; and there is the travelling to schools initiative. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is involved. Indeed, Hull's local initiative on cycling is one of the success stories, although it does not appear to have changed the outward profile of the Deputy Prime Minister. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is involved through the Countryside Agency, with its quiet lanes and rural transport partnership initiatives; the Forestry Commission is involved; and so is the Environment Agency. The Department of Health mentions cycling in its action plan on diet, physical activity and obesity; and then there is Sport England.

What measures have been taken since the review to co-ordinate better that kaleidoscopic group of Departments? They all have the best intentions, but they do not seem to be well co-ordinated.

There are some interesting examples. I mentioned Hull, and my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) mentioned Milton Keynes, but perhaps the most interesting is Bristol, where a 14 km bus priority lane increased cycling more than any initiative targeted on cycling itself. What is the Government's current policy? Three options were mentioned at the end of the review—working exclusively through non-governmental organisations, reforming and refocusing the national cycling strategy board, or working more closely with local authorities. I would be interested to know the current state of play, because in a somewhat Irish manner the conclusion appeared to be in the introduction to the review, which said that the intention was to create a clear steering board of funding Departments to co-ordinate the Government's cycling strategy and to direct the work of Cycling England. I will be grateful if the Minister can tell us how that was brought together.

I want to touch on the vexed question of cycle helmets. Like many hon. Members, I have received numerous letters from constituents. For instance, Mr. Adrian Hanson-Abbott of Wollerton said that he is worried about having compulsory cycle helmets. He thinks that they are poorly designed and that some are positively dangerous. He also raised the conundrum of the insurers of a driver who had been negligent and injured a nine-year-old boy wriggling out of liability on the ground that the parents had not made the child wear a helmet. This is a vexed area that the hon. Member for Stafford was right to raise.

Cycle helmets are compulsory in Australia, New Zealand, Spain, Iceland, the Czech Republic, Canada and 20 states in the United States, and there is clear evidence that a good, properly designed helmet will reduce brain, head and facial injuries. My worry is enforcement. Several hon. Members have mentioned mobile phones. We have enough trouble enforcing existing traffic laws without putting a huge extra burden on police. There is also a valid problem of deterrence, and it would be unfortunate if compulsion deterred people from wearing helmets.

I would also like the Minister to comment on research on helmets that work. The CTC briefing, which was most helpful, said that helmets are currently designed for impact speeds of about 13 mph, whereas 93 per cent. of serious and fatal accidents for cyclists occur on roads in collisions with vehicles, and 22 per cent. with HGVs, where the speeds will obviously be far more than 13 mph. The work should be on better technology and cycle helmets that really work. I wonder whether there has been any discussion of that with the equestrian industry, which has done an enormous amount of work on riding helmets. Finally, has the Minister also examined the merits of reflective clothing?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on securing this interesting debate. I also congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) and for Islington, South and Finsbury (Emily Thornberry) on their contributions. My hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands did a lot of work when she was a Minister in the Department and I should like to recognise that. I also recognise the tremendous work that the all-party cycling group does to promote cycling and address the issues that relate to it.

Many people have an interest in cycling, whether they cycle or not—although I suspect that we have all been cyclists at some stage. The Government want to encourage more people to cycle; the basic advantages of cycling are convenience, health, cost, environment and enjoyment, as hon. Members have mentioned. To put it simply, cycling contributes to a better quality of health. As some hon. Members pointed out, there has been a decline in cycling, and people continue to use their cars even for short journeys. Between 1999 and 2001, one quarter of all car trips covered less than two miles. In many cases, those journeys could have been made by cycle and we want to promote that.

The Government are committed to reversing the decline in the number of cycling trips. If we are to attract people out of their cars and on to two wheels, we have to make cycling safe, easy and as convenient as possible. That means seeing cycling as a solution to problems of accessibility, health, affordability and the environment. That is why Cycling England, our advisory body on cycling, reports not only to my Department but to others with an interest in cycling, such as the Department of Health, the Department for Communities and Local Government, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Department for Education and Skills. That is also why I will host a meeting of Ministers next week to discuss how cycling can help to deliver a range of Government targets across Whitehall.

Encouraging cycling means having the right facilities at schools and places of work, and training youngsters to enjoy riding a bike. There are many good examples of improvements and good practice in cycling. For example, as one of my hon. Friends made clear, there has been a considerable increase in cycling to work in London thanks to investment and commitment from Transport for London and the development of the London cycle network. I cannot recall seeing as many cyclists on the roads in recent months as I saw this morning on the way in. Perhaps that has something to do with the good weather, but there are tremendous numbers of cyclists on the road.

The Mayor announced last year that the number of recorded cycle journeys on London's key roads had doubled in the previous five years, from 59,000 in 2000 to 119,000 in 2005. Even more impressively, London has experienced a reduction in casualties among cyclists, as other road users have become more aware of their presence. Transport for London reports that since 1990 there has been a 35 per cent. reduction in cycling casualties. That shows that, with the right support and infrastructure, casualties will not necessarily rise if cycling increases.

As has been mentioned, there are also good examples of increases in cycling in the rest of the country, such as in Hull and York, where the national trends have been bucked and a successful cycling programme has been implemented. We undertook a review of the national cycling strategy in 2004, which led to the appointment of Cycling England, the new advisory body made up of experts from the main cycling organisations. Cycling England has been given an annual budget of £5 million, which is in addition to nearly £55 million that has been provided for cycling through local transport plans and Transport for London. Outside London, there has been an increase from £29.5 million in 2001-02 to £36 million in 2005-06.

One of the key elements of Cycling England's work plan is six cycle demonstration towns. Cycling England is investing some £8.4 million in Aylesbury, Brighton, Darlington, Derby, Exeter and Lancaster over the next three years. I return to an earlier point about incorporating cycling into the design of new housing developments and towns. One reason why we picked Aylesbury was the expansion in housing that will take place there soon and the opportunity to incorporate cycling into the design of the new housing development and expansion there.

Work has already begun to showcase best practice in design and planning in relation to the promotion of cycling. The aim is to test the hypothesis that if we spend levels per head of the population equal to the levels spent in European cities where there has been a significant increase in cycling, we can achieve similar increases here. I assure hon. Members that I take a personal interest in those developments, and I will visit each of the cycling demonstration towns. We have already had a meeting in London to discuss their progress, which will be regularly monitored.

Journeys to school were mentioned. Only 2 per cent. of children cycle to school. Increasing that figure is important not only to increase cycling but to reduce obesity levels and generally invest in healthier future generations. Some £2 million was invested in 2005-06 to extend the links to schools programme, which several hon. Members mentioned, on top of £10 million of Government investment in the previous year. That money has drawn in additional funds, so that £31 million has been spent on the project. So far, more than 300 schools have been linked to the national cycle network by more than 230 km of new routes, of which about 70 per cent. are traffic-free.

Cycling England has a number of other initiatives under way, and is developing and promoting a new national cycle training standard to replace the old cycle proficiency test—I took that test in a previous life, as other hon. Members might have done—so as better to equip children with the skills they need to ride safely on today's roads. Cycling England is also working with health authorities, improving the skills of local authority practitioners through a free advisory service backed up by training programmes and improving the marketing of cycling schemes.

Tomorrow I shall attend Cycling England's first annual forum. I am looking forward to discussing its achievements to date and meeting many of the partners who are helping to deliver new initiatives on cycling.

Mr. Leech rose—

Derek Twigg: I will not give way, if the hon. Gentleman does not mind, as we are short of time and I want to get some comments on the record.

Although local authorities are the key to unlocking increases in cycling, we have also enlisted the help of a wide range of cycling organisations and NGOs to work with us. The CTC is helping to deliver improved cycle training by leading a project to provide grants and bursaries to help build the capacity to roll out the new national cycle training standards. Sustrans is delivering the very successful links to school programme, British Cycling is helping us and the cycle industry is contributing to the "Bike It" project, which my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands mentioned. I congratulate Cycling England on bringing together so many experts, and I am very much enthused and impressed by the way in which all the organisations are working together and by the amount of work and commitment that they are putting in.

I reiterate that local authorities are the main key to unlocking increases in cycling. Many are already doing a fine job and have been boosted by increased funding. We now need the rest to follow. Cycling England is in a good position to help authorities to spend their money effectively and efficiently, as it is about to launch a free expert advisory service. I encourage authorities to seek such help if they need it. Cycling England is also well placed to promote co-operation between several Departments, of which I hope to see more.

Alongside authorities, we need more employers to adopt cycle-friendly policies and introduce cycle-friendly facilities for their workers. Pioneering work has been done on that issue by GlaxoSmithKline, the BBC and the London cycling campaign to promote cycling to work. In Glaxo's case, the impact has been impressive, with the number of registered cyclists rising from 50 to more than 300. The BBC has also achieved high levels of people cycling to work. The Department has played its part in that, having negotiated with the Office of Fair Trading to implement a cycle-to-work tax benefit scheme that allows employers who purchase cycles for employees who commute to work to save the VAT on the cost of the bicycles and to make other tax savings. Cycling England aims to promote the scheme more widely in 2006, and the cycle scheme providers estimate that 100,000 cyclists might participate and benefit from it this year.

Research shows that many cyclists are prevented from cycling to work or hampered by the fact that their employers are less than cycle-friendly. We have to show more companies that a healthier, fitter work force is more productive and profitable. Many cycle commuters use their bikes for only part of their journey to work, combining cycling with public transport—mostly rail. Such journeys are important because they allow bikes to be used as part of a longer journey. As Minister with responsibility for both bike and rail, I am keen to encourage such journeys wherever possible. We will continue to encourage all train operating companies to provide facilities at stations to help facilitate more bike-and-rail journeys. We also recognise that there are pressures—

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Minister, but the rules are the rules. I thank all hon. Members who took part in the debate.

Milton Keynes

12.30 pm

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): I welcome the Minister to her new appointment. I congratulate her and promise not to be too harsh on her today. If I am remembered for one thing during my time as Member of Parliament for North-East Milton Keynes, I hope it is my campaign for i before e —infrastructure before expansion. That is the key to the future expansion of Milton Keynes.

The phrase "i before e" tells people two things. The first is obvious: that the infrastructure must be in place before the city expands. It also says that I am not opposed to the expansion per se of Milton Keynes. It is vital that our young people have somewhere to live and that they have houses that they can afford. As an aside, while I am on affordable housing, the £60,000 house, which has been much publicised by the Minister, is misleading. People think that they can buy a house for that sum; they do not realise that it represents the building cost and not the purchase cost. In Milton Keynes, a £60,000 house is more likely to cost £130,000.

While I assume that the Minister will not disagree with my i before e campaign, I sense that we differ. She wants Milton Keynes to expand on her terms, with or without the consent of local people, while I am determined that local residents should have the final say on how, and at what rate, it should grow. With that in mind, she may be interested to know that last week I presented a petition to the House signed by more than 4,000 residents. It is relevant, and it declared "that for any community to be 'sustainable' the plans for its expansion must be supported by existing residents and that Milton Keynes Partnerships' 'Public Consultation' process was not long enough to fully involve the Citizens of Milton Keynes in the decision making process regarding the 2031 Milton Keynes expansion plans. The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to set up a local referendum to decide:

If the expansion planning and delivery should be returned to those who are democratically elected to represent and service the people of Milton Keynes and the surrounding area."

The petition sums up my view exactly. Without genuine local support, the Government's sustainable communities plan is destined to fail in Milton Keynes. I am not calling for a referendum on every decision, but the local authority, which is democratically elected by local people, should be allowed a genuine say on how the city will grow. According to a recent survey, that is a view shared by 88 per cent. of local residents.

. In simple terms, I believe in a bottom-up approach, but the Government prefer the top-down approach. If the Minister does not want to take my word for it, she need only consider last week's local elections in Milton Keynes. Just over a year ago, my constituency was represented by a Labour Member of Parliament, yet last week Labour polled less than 15 per cent. of the vote there. I am convinced that one of the reasons for the Conservative revival in my constituency is that we are the only major party promoting the active involvement of local people in deciding how the city will expand.

The Government's approach is rather different. I sense that the Minister and her colleagues are rather nervous about what might happen if, God forbid, local residents have some form of control over their future. The Government prefer the autocratic approach via unelected and unaccountable quangos. In Milton Keynes, we are talking about English Partnerships and its local delivery vehicle, Milton Keynes Partnership.

The Government occasionally, via the Milton Keynes Partnership, like to give the impression of local involvement. After all, there are three elected members of the local authority on its board, complete with a generous salary, but they have no authority. While I accept that such a situation is becoming the norm for the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, it is not the way forward.

The Milton Keynes Partnership recently consulted the local population about its six options for growth for the city. Even though, according to the survey that I mentioned, 78 per cent. of people in the city had no idea that the consultation had taken place—either because it was so poorly advertised or so short—the residents who did respond flatly rejected all six options. Presumably, it is a case of going back to the drawing board. Of course, the advantage of being an unelected, unaccountable quango is that one can press on regardless of local views.

Milton Keynes cannot just do its own thing, and there must be co-ordination with other regional organisations. To be fair, I should say to the Minister that Jane Hamilton and her staff at English Partnerships are very professional, but often their hands are tied as they cannot serve two masters and, however sympathetic they are to the needs of Milton Keynes, they know that their principal loyalty is to central Government, not the city. Let me give the Minister just one example of what I mean. Between 2004 and 2008, via English Partnerships the Government will rob Milton Keynes of £494 million by selling off the city's land bank, and put back just £201 million. Therefore, there will be a net outflow of nearly £300 million, stolen from the city by Government via an unelected, unaccountable quango.

Assuming that the Minister supports my i before e campaign, I am sure she will share my concern at the detrimental effect that this drive to squeeze every penny out of the city is having on the local community. For example, numerous green reserved sites across the city are now being considered for sale for residential development. Walton high school in my constituency—an excellent school that both the Prime Minister and the Chancellor visited in the run-up to the general election, presumably to bask in its reflected glory—recently wanted to expand its sixth form on to a reserved site next to the school owned by English Partnerships. The site was originally valued at £12,000, but the school found that English Partnerships had revalued the site at its residential value of £234,000, thus making it unobtainable by the school. I am pleased that, having raised the matter in the House, that decision has been reversed. However, it is a classic example of e before i —of expansion before infrastructure—rather than of i before e, which is what I am calling for.

I shall address the financing of the expansion shortly. I acknowledge that some infrastructure improvements have been promised—for example, the upgrading of central Milton Keynes railway station and the improvements to junction 14 of the M1, both of which are due for completion in the next few years.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, and I echo his call for infrastructure before expansion in Milton Keynes, as I issue a similar call in respect of neighbouring Aylesbury vale.

Does my hon. Friend agree that it is particularly perverse and objectionable that a quango in the form of Milton Keynes Partnership should propose a whole series of options upon which it fails to consult and among which there is not numbered an option which would allow for expansion east of the M1? Does my hon. Friend agree that that is a lacuna, which ought to be put right?

Mr. Lancaster: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point, which I agree with. All options should be considered. Indeed, when the six options were published, it was notable that there was a caveat to the effect that it might well be decided not to proceed with any of the six options, and that an entirely different option could be chosen. Such is the way that quangos seem to operate in the city.

Let me return to the infrastructure improvements. I mentioned those to junction 14 of the M1 and central Milton Keynes station. Although they are welcome, they are a mere drop in the ocean in relation to what the city requires. I sense that they may be mere titbits thrown to the city to keep it quiet. It will come as no surprise to you, Mr. Hancock, that normally such announcements are made just before a general or local election.

One of the biggest problems that the city faces, however, is uncertainty. Although the current expansion plans run to 2031, the Government refuse to commit to infrastructure projects beyond the short term, making it very hard for the city to plan with any certainty. It was announced just before the local elections that the Government now support the east-west rail link through the city, but when pushed after the local elections Baroness Andrews admitted that that would take place only if private funding could be found. The Government need to take a longer-term view on growth and sustainability, and to support the local communities in planning their future by providing long-term certainty in infrastructure funding. Such an approach will strengthen community commitment to the growth project and help make the Government's sustainable communities project genuinely sustainable.

Mr. Hancock, time is marching on and I would like briefly to look at the financing of the expansion of Milton Keynes. Under current arrangements, section 106 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 allows a local planning authority to enter into a legally binding agreement or planning obligation with a land developer over a related issue. The Milton Keynes tariff is using that legislation to develop an agreement with landowners and developers in the expansion areas and contribute a flat rate per dwelling of £18,500, or £33.4 million per employment space. The total will fund the strategic and local infrastructure that arises from the developments. So far, so good.

Unfortunately, that system raises key concerns for the local authority. First, the total budget will not fund the total cost of all pieces of infrastructure. There is a 25 per cent. gap in the funds required, and it increases each time Government standards increase, because increased standards for schools, for example, are invariably more expensive. Secondly, to fulfil the tariff agreement, all Departments must be prepared to guarantee that the requisite additional funds will be forthcoming. If the council is unable to secure the additional funds that it requires, the delivery of the tariff and associated items of infrastructure will be at risk. Thirdly, Departments must be able to guarantee that the overall revenue costs will be available to public authorities to support service delivery once the infrastructure is operational. Fourthly, there are genuine concerns that the tariff is designed to operate in greenfield areas and that it is far from straightforward to operate a similar vehicle in relation to infill and brownfield developments. Those are some of the problems associated with the current system.

As the Minister is aware, the planning gain supplement is the Government's proposal for capturing the land value uplift through the centralised collection of a proportion of that uplift. Once again, however, there are key concerns for the local authority. First, there is the issue of the net loss of revenues to the local area. Naturally, I believe that the uplift created in Milton Keynes should be retained there, not distributed across the region and the country. I have explained how the Government are robbing Milton Keynes, and the planning gain supplement is set to see that continue. Secondly, the planning gain supplement proposal will mean a loss of local autonomy over the revenue received from planning contributions, because the central and regional collection of funds will dislocate the decision-making process. The funds should be determined and distributed locally, using local criteria. Thirdly, the local authority and I believe that the planning gain supplement will not improve the transparency of the planning system, but will weaken community engagement in the growth agenda because funding decisions will be taken remotely, not in the locality.

All those factors simply add to the feeling that decisions will be made more remotely from Milton Keynes. If I am right that the Government's sustainable communities project must enjoy the support of local people to be successful, none of the factors that I have highlighted will be a step in the right direction, because they all appear to move decision making from Milton Keynes to central Government.

I have highlighted the fact that there is a massive outflow of cash from Milton Keynes via English Partnerships, and it appears that the planning gain supplement will add to that. The local authority believes that capital receipts should be used to supplement the tariff and fill the gap between the total project costs of infrastructure and the tariff available. If the Minister can answer only one question today—I have given notice that I would like it answered—I hope that it is this. Exactly what percentage of the planning gain supplement will be returned to Milton Keynes so that it can spend that money? Without that figure, there is no way that the local authority can plan for the long term.

I could touch on many other financial issues, not least the lack of fairness in revenue funding for Milton Keynes, the lack of recognition given to the population expansion in the city and the fact that funds are given with one hand and taken away with the other through the floors policy. However, if the Minister takes only one thought away from this debate, I hope that it will be that if the Government continue to alienate local people from the decision-making process in the sustainable communities plan, last week's poll in Milton Keynes will probably be the high point of Labour popularity there.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): I welcome the Minister to her new role.

12.44 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government (Angela E. Smith): I congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) on securing the debate. I also thank him for giving me my first opportunity to speak in the House on behalf of what is a new Department. Although he referred a couple of times to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, he will recognise that this is a very new Department, and it is exciting to be part of it. It will do things very differently and consider how to bring communities and local government together.

The issue of private housing is a crucial one for this generation and future ones. The hon. Gentleman has highlighted one of the most pressing issues faced by us all, and we have an obligation to ensure that everyone has a decent place in which to live. I am grateful that he has given me the opportunity to clarify some of the issues relating to the expansion and administration of Milton Keynes. If he wishes to be reassured about some of his concerns, I hope that I can reassure him. I should say at the outset that I am constrained in what I can say at this stage about the future scale and direction of the expansion. The matter will be considered in the emerging south-east regional spatial strategy, which is known as the south-east plan, and it is something that we will consider in due course.

To set the debate in context, the south-east is the most successful English regional economy and it competes on a world stage, but that success brings with it demands and pressures on housing. In order for the south-east, including Milton Keynes, to remain competitive and to develop in a sustainable way, we have to address the need for housing. From the hon. Gentleman's comments, I know that he would not want to deny the right to decent housing to any constituent or potential constituent.

The Government are not putting the south-east under development pressure. The pressures exist now, and the important question that we must address is how they are best managed. There is no doubt that we have not been building enough homes generally. The hon. Gentleman will know that the country has seen a massive increase in the number of households, and the latest forecasts predict that that trend will continue. Two thirds of new households created are in the south-east, but we have also seen the lowest levels of house building in the post-war period. In the south-east, actual build rates have been lower than planned, and that is especially true in Milton Keynes, which has since 2001 provided more than 1,300 new homes fewer than it should have. Although it is in some ways the largest provider of new homes in the south-east, it is also the largest under-provider. We have to consider that problem and address the demand.

When we consider the impact of that demand, we see that house prices have risen by about 160 per cent. Recent research shows that, if we do not build more homes, two thirds of couples in their 30s will not be able to afford a home of their own in 20 years' time. That is why it is so important that we invest in new homes and communities. I am concerned that those who suffer most are often those on lower incomes. It is often our key workers who fail to get a foot on the housing ladder. However, many people campaign, sometimes understandably, in opposition to new homes proposed in their area. The other consequences of not building new homes in relation to the impact on the local economy and business, however, are often ignored and not given the same credence and credibility as the issues raised by those who campaign against new homes.

We are seeking to create new and sustainable communities. That is why proposals for Milton Keynes have been subject to extensive independent testing and evaluation. In 2003, we published the sustainable communities plan, which identified Milton Keynes as part of the Milton Keynes and south midlands growth area. The sub-regional strategy was published in March 2005, following almost two years of public consultation and a public examination by an independent panel.

The approved sub-regional strategy anticipates that Milton Keynes will accommodate about 45,000 new homes by 2021, with further scope for about 23,000 by 2031. Under the approved strategy, the majority of development will be accommodated within the existing central urban area of Milton Keynes, while other development will be provided through sustainable urban extensions. The growth proposals for Milton Keynes have been shown to be realistic and achievable.

This is not just a social issue. There is a fundamental right to a decent home, as I said, but there is also an economic imperative behind the demand for new homes. The hon. Gentleman spoke about businesses being the lifeblood of any community. Businesses nationally and in Milton Keynes tell us that the economy is being held back by the lack of new homes. I am sure that he is aware that Milton Keynes already has 16,000 more commuters coming into the area daily than are leaving it.

Mr. Lancaster: Will the Minister give way?

Angela E. Smith: I shall just finish the point that I want to make, then take a very brief intervention. I want to address the points that the hon. Gentleman made in his speech.

Many of the commuters whom I mentioned want to live in Milton Keynes and contribute to the economy not only by working there, but by spending money there, living there and being part of the community.

Mr. Lancaster: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, but she has been speaking for five minutes and has not even begun to address the issues that I raised. I said at the start of my speech that I accept that Milton Keynes will expand—that is a given—but the rate at which it expands is a different matter. Please will the Minister get on to my points, rather than just repeat the arguments that the Government have already made?

Angela E. Smith: I understand the hon. Gentleman's impatience, and as I develop my comments, I shall address his questions, but it is also important to set the matter in context in terms of where the demand for new homes is coming from and how that demand should be managed. It is a shame that he has taken up more time with his intervention, but I give him an assurance that I will address all his points.

It is worth making the point that Milton Keynes's economy and learning partnership, which includes all leading economic and learning partners, has been supportive of the growth agenda. Continued economic success relies on new homes.

The hon. Gentleman referred to his petition, which I read and noted. It complains about the lack of public consultation and suggests that consultation was not long enough to involve the citizens of Milton Keynes fully in the planned expansion. That reflects a misunderstanding of the process. There was a consultation period, and my information is that he is incorrect to suggest that there was no support whatever for the plan. My understanding is that there were those who opposed it and those who supported it. But that is not the plan that goes forward; that is part of the evidence—the examination—that will be given, along with that of other organisations.

Other organisations have not consulted on the evidence that they are putting forward. For example, the local council is also putting forward information for examination, but that has not been subject to public consultation. There was no statutory right or duty to undertake public consultation; it was an additional consultation, although it was helpful that it was undertaken. It was not the case that no one supported the plan; my understanding is that there was both support for it and opposition to it.

The hon. Gentleman may be aware that the South East England regional assembly recently submitted to the Government its draft south-east plan, covering the 20 years to 2026, and that that is also now out for public consultation. I encourage everyone who wants to move Milton Keynes forward and wants it to be successful, regardless of their point of view, to use the available opportunities to add to the debate in the current south-east plan consultation. When the council starts preparing its new planning policy for the area—it is important to recognise that the council prepares planning policy—it will be its responsibility to translate the strategic guidance in the south-east plan into specific proposals at the local level, so there will be strong involvement for the local council.

The hon. Gentleman was critical of the Milton Keynes Partnership in that regard, but the partnership involves the council, and it has representatives from the local authority and the council. My understanding is that after the local elections there will be representatives from all three political parties. That is a democratic route by which local people can make their views known.

I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is so dismissive of the role of local councillors in the Milton Keynes Partnership. My understanding—I have been in post for only two days—is that the committee strives to be open and to involve the local community in its activities. Since its launch, the committee has played a key role in expansion and prosperity for Milton Keynes, and it will continue to do so. Key figures from local life, who understand the major issues facing the area, are involved. Of course, we are talking about a delivery vehicle; it is in the legislation that we should review all local delivery vehicles over a five-year period.

The hon. Gentleman also said, using rather emotive language, that English Partnerships was robbing Milton Keynes of money. It is correct that, in the time frame that he mentioned, receipts from EP land sales exceeded the none the less substantial expenditure in Milton Keynes. It is worth noting that English Partnerships operates on a national canvas, so the money that comes in goes to English Partnerships generally; it does not necessarily belong to Milton Keynes. Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman chose a particular time frame. The land being sold now was acquired for Milton Keynes by the Commission for the New Towns, which was the previous body. It is not that Milton Keynes is being robbed; it is just a natural progression. If he uses a different time frame and goes back to when the land was acquired, he might find completely different figures.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to funding. I am glad to have the opportunity to address that issue, because communities are more than just housing; they must be sustainable. Mistakes were often made when new towns were built. Some people who grew up in new towns feel very strongly that mistakes were made and that the necessary infrastructure was not always provided. However, in government, we have consistently said that our approach is to ensure that we have the necessary infrastructure investment in place to support housing growth. We use a mixture of funding from mainstream programmes, investment by the private sector and top-up funding from the growth areas programme.

The hon. Gentleman acknowledged that money was being made available. I am sorry that he was rather dismissive of some of the investment available, but I shall give him some examples: almost £37 million from the growth areas fund, including £7 million for Milton Keynes hospital to consolidate its present site; £32 million from the community infrastructure fund, including £24 million for Milton Keynes and Wolverton stations; and £8 million for upgrading junction 14 of the M1. There is ongoing investment from a range of mainstream programmes, including an extra £20 million revenue and £20 million capital for health programmes in Milton Keynes. In addition, the Milton Keynes "Prospectus", known locally as the tariff, will attract private sector funding estimated at £315 million, alongside the Government's funding for infrastructure.

Mr. Lancaster rose—

Angela E. Smith: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman if he wishes, but it may mean that I cannot answer the other points that he raised.

Mr. Lancaster: The Minister mentioned health care in Milton Keynes. Since things are going so well, will she tell me why it was announced only today that the Fraser Day hospital in Milton Keynes will close?

Angela E. Smith: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman an answer on that issue. If he had given me notice, I would have asked my colleagues in the Department of Health. The fact is that there is significant additional investment, and if he has concerns about those issues, I hope that when investment is proposed in the House of Commons, he will always vote for it. Too often, Opposition Members request money but are reluctant to vote to deliver it in the House of Commons.

In the time remaining, I shall try to address the hon. Gentleman's additional comments. On the tariff, he spoke about a gap of 25 per cent., but private sector investment of about £300 million will be brought in. Assessing the cost of infrastructure is complex and involves several uncertainties. To address them and to ensure that we have the appropriate infrastructure, we are undertaking the 2007 comprehensive spending review. There will be a cross-cutting review to determine the social, transport and environmental infrastructure implications of housing growth in different locations. The 2007 review is an opportunity to consider those issues.

The hon. Gentleman also said that the tariff is designed to operate in greenfield areas, and that it is not so straightforward in brownfield areas. Milton Keynes Partnership designed the tariff for use mainly on greenfield land, but it is for Milton Keynes council to discuss the operation of the tariff with the partnership, learn lessons and determine how it might be delivered for other sites.

The hon. Gentleman also raised several concerns about planning gain supplement. I appreciate that he gave me notice of the question about what percentage will go to the council, and I am sorry to disappoint him, but I am not able to give him the exact figure. As I am sure he is aware, the consultation concluded on 27 February. Responses are being considered, and I assure him that when the announcement is made, he will be kept informed.

Milton Keynes is a success story. It has grown into one of the country's most exciting and prosperous areas in just a few years. It now has an opportunity to create a new chapter in its history. The Government are supporting Milton Keynes with funding, investment—we take on board the comments about ensuring that the infrastructure in place—and delivery arrangements to enable it to embrace that future with confidence.

Mr. Lancaster: On a point of order, Mr. Hancock. Since the Minister is failing to answer many of my questions, will she endeavour to write to me after this debate?

Angela E. Smith: As far I am concerned, I have done my best to answer the hon. Gentleman's questions. I may not have given him the answers that he was looking for, but I have answered the questions. I shall go through his speech, and if I have failed to answer any of his questions, I shall of course take them up in writing with him.

Composting

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): I am delighted to have the opportunity to introduce this short debate on composting as part of our waste strategy. It is timely, as this is composting awareness week, which is organised in the UK by the Composting Association, as it has been since 2001. That international event involves Canada, the United States, Australia and the European Compost Network. Its aims are, first, to encourage the public to think about composting and learn more about the subject and ongoing efforts to recycle more, and to try to persuade them to compost, as I do. Secondly, there is a need for the industry to encourage site operators to build links with the community and explain the benefit of composting to educate people about its value and to answer any questions.

This year's event operates with the theme, "Add power to your flowers...Compost!" The Composting Association is running a series of events across the country, and distributing leaflets. Last year, it ran some 300 events. It is important to raise the profile of composting, which is part of a natural cycle that has much to contribute to our waste strategy.

Composting is already an important part of that strategy. It is driven in part by the European Union landfill directive, which recognises that emissions of methane from landfill sites are an important contributor to climate change. Methane is 20 times more dangerous than carbon dioxide, and the more we can reduce emissions, the more we can combat climate change, which is a key priority for the Government.

I want to congratulate local authorities, which are often scapegoats in the House of Commons. They have worked extremely hard on recycling and have reduced the amount of biodegradable municipal waste sent to landfill. They have big targets, but I am confident that they can achieve them. As an example, I commend my county council, Nottinghamshire. Last year, it composted some 40,000 tonnes of green waste, which represents 25 per cent. of the domestic waste stream.

The authority hopes to sign a big new private finance initiative contract later this month. It works closely with the Government and acknowledges the advice and support it has received from Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs officials. It has written to the Minister to ask him to join the celebration of that new contract, which will be an important step change for Nottinghamshire.

Composting has been increasing: in the early 1990s, there were only a handful of sites producing just 150,000 tonnes of compost, but there are now more than 200 producing more than 2 million tonnes per annum. There is also a big and real issue over the composting of domestic waste. To compost domestic waste effectively and safely, we must introduce in-vessel composting. There are about 20 such units, but the Environment Agency suggests that we might need 200.

As I said at the outset, this is a timely debate. Yesterday, the Waste and Resources Action Programme released its third business plan, which includes organics and composting as key focuses. Interestingly, WRAP recognises the retail sector as an area where important gains in recycling could be made. Far too much food is wasted. The amount could be reduced at source, but it could also be dealt with through recycling.

Chris Mole (Ipswich) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend encourage the Minister to review the desktop study that led to the widespread exclusion of kitchen waste from compostable streams and which has led to significant confusion for households? It seems to me that the assumptions about the level of pathogens that might be reintroduced through agriculture were overstated.

Paddy Tipping: I tend to agree with my hon. Friend. Clearly, there is a balance to be struck between safety and increasing composting.

We were all scarred by the outbreak of foot and mouth disease, and following that strict animal waste regulations were introduced. My hon. Friend will recall the discussion in the House of Lords when it was suggested that because compost would have to be subject to extreme temperatures to kill pathogens it would be of no value. Like him, I am not confident that we have got the balance right. I want to press the Minister and his officials on that point. I know that discussions are taking place this afternoon, so this is a timely debate.

It is important that compost is certified as being of an appropriate standard. The Composting Association has worked with WRAP to bring forward the BS1 PAS 100 standard. The importance of certification and the safe use of compost on the appropriate site are important to us all.

The composting industry faces a number of challenges. The Environment Agency suggests that more than 200 new composting, anaerobic, digestive and biological treatment facilities producing 40,000 tonnes a year are needed to manage the UK's biodegradable waste stream, but the rate of growth does not suggest that that target will be met.

I want to raise with the Minister five issues that he and his officials are aware of. If we can overcome them, we can make progress towards ensuring that composting really is a big and effective part of the waste stream. The first is home composting. Good local authorities understand the importance of promoting home composting. It is far better environmentally to compost in the garden than to have green waste schemes, although such schemes are valuable. Local authorities with good practice are not able to discount home composting against their recycling targets. I know that that is a difficult issue, but if we want to promote good practice we must do further work on it. I am delighted with the work that WRAP has undertaken and about which it has had discussions with the Department. I hope that those discussions can be brought to an early conclusion.

The second issue is one with which the Minister has been directly and helpfully involved. Community composting is valuable in that it raises awareness and involves the whole community, although there have been difficulties with exemptions from waste licences. He intervened last year to allow discretion or a disregard to enable community composting schemes to go forward. That was valuable, and I know that work and discussions are still taking place in the Department. The cost of waste licensing will be crippling to many smaller community composting schemes and it is important to make progress and to reach decisions.

It is also important to introduce new in-vessel schemes as quickly as possible, but there are difficult issues involved. To set up a new composting plant, one needs planning permission, a waste management licence and, importantly, veterinary approval. As those approval processes are separate, it can take an awfully long time for a new plant to gain all three strands of permission. There must be a better way of doing things: it must be possible to run those three strands together so that it does not take so long to get approval for new sites. A failure to do that will be a failure to achieve our targets; we will not be able to divert biodegradable waste from landfill sites quickly enough.

There is also uncertainty about the financing of new plants. In-vessel composting plants are expensive and high-technology. We tend to think of composting in fairly rudimentary terms, but new techniques require carefully thought out plants. Most such new plants, including the one in Nottinghamshire, are financed by the PFI. Only large, perhaps international, waste companies can afford the time, energy and finance required to introduce new proposals. In the banking and finance sector, composting is still seen as a risky proposition. It is quite difficult for a small business to find the necessary finance to introduce smaller-scale schemes. Some certainty that composting will have an important role in waste strategy, and that the end product will be seen not as waste but as a valuable product, will be important to the introduction of new plants.

I return to the key point that I made earlier: we must persuade people that composting and composted material are valuable and safe. Composting can be used in many ways, and there is no reason why composted material could not play a large part in the remediation of sites. I would like to see a great deal of recycled and composted material used for the Olympic facilities. Composting used on agricultural land and in gardens might have to be of a higher quality, but we need to ensure that real and acceptable conclusions about the safety of compost are reached in discussions between the Department, the Environment Agency and representatives from the sector. Unless we can have a good regulatory framework on which there is agreement so that compost can be spread appropriately on golf courses and agricultural land, we will face difficulties.

I started by saying that the debate is timely because this is composting awareness week. By coincidence, it is also the last day of the consultation on the Government's new waste strategy. I say firmly to the Minister that the Government have achieved an awful lot in terms of recycling. Ambitious targets have been set and are beginning to be met, but we can do more. I want this debate to be a final representation to the consultation.

This matter is fairly straightforward. Composted material has been used widely by farmers for more than 4,000 years. Composting is a natural cycle and something we can all support intuitively, but perhaps we view it in over-complicated terms. Compost has been used for more than 4,000 years, so I want to ensure that the next waste strategy has composting at the heart of our recycling strategy. That strategy should be about not only recycling and diversion from landfill, but combating climate change.

I am grateful for the opportunity to talk about the benefits of composting as somebody who spends some of his time in his garden composting. I speak not only from the head, but from my feet and hands on this subject.

1.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) on securing the debate. He rightly pointed out the timeliness of it, and had he not suggested in his closing remarks that we should consider the debate as the final contribution to the Government's consultation on the review of their waste strategy, I would have made the same suggestion. He got that in just in time. I have a great deal of sympathy with the five points that he went through and assure him that we will consider them carefully and respond to them as part of the review process.

Like my hon. Friend, I am an enthusiastic home composter. I am fortunate enough to have a garden, which helps. There are some challenges, as I am sure that he will realise, in some parts of the country where that is not always so easy, but compost makes a great contribution to the paucity of London clay when it comes to growing flowers. The debate is an appropriate title for national composting week.

As my hon. Friend also rightly pointed out, we will have to up our game significantly in the next few years if we are to meet the demanding landfill targets, although he was also correct to point out that local authorities and individuals—this is about partnership—have done extremely well in recent years in increasing the amount that we recycle and compost.

We have trebled recycling in this country since Labour came to power in 1997. My hon. Friend's local authority in Nottinghamshire has done extremely well. I had the figures to hand—I seem to have mislaid them—but I think that it was up by 30 percentage points for recycling and composting. In doing so, it has easily exceeded its targets, so many congratulations to those involved. Just before the debate, my hon. Friend handed me an invitation, hot off the press, from Nottinghamshire county council to celebrate the signing of its new contract. I would be delighted to do so if I am still in post, and my diary commitments allow.

As my hon. Friend rightly pointed out, one of the big challenges that we face in getting our response to the consultation on the waste review right is the financial framework. He talked about planning and funding, which are major obstacles to providing the infrastructure that we will need, as the Government realise. As I am sure he is aware, we changed the planning guidance about a year ago and are still considering how successful that has been in creating a better climate on the ground for the provision of major infrastructure. I hear from the industry that that has not made as much difference as they would have liked, but clearly we will want to revisit the subject of planning. I will take his point about the parallel processes that have to be gone through to get a biodigester up and running. That seems odd to me.

My hon. Friend also kindly reminded hon. Members that concerns were raised with me by the community composting organisations in the voluntary sector about the proposed level of new fees under the licensing system. I intervened and we are currently reviewing that, and I hope that we will have something to say about it later in the summer that will make it easier for them to enter the market. I am determined that there should be an enhanced role for the community and voluntary sector—we say that explicitly in the review of our waste strategy—not just because it is doing good work on the ground and we think that it has the potential to do more but because it has a special educative function. It involves local communities in an important practice.

The point that my hon. Friend made about education and following best practice is extremely important. My own local authority in Devon had a successful campaign over recent years to encourage people to home compost. As a result, composting rates have risen considerably. As has been said, performance across the country is patchy. Some local authorities, such as my hon. Friend's, are doing extremely well, whereas others have not done so well, and there are historic reasons for that.

One of the most important things that we need to achieve in our response to the review of our waste policy is getting the framework right. There is no doubt that there are some perverse incentives in how the current targets are set. The weight-based targets have, to a certain extent, boosted composting, because, like the rush for gas, in many local authorities there has been a rush for green waste collection. While green waste collection is a good thing to do, it has also, in some cases, been favoured by local authorities because it is an easy, quick and cheap way of getting their weight, recycling and composting figures up.

There are also challenges in respect of markets. My hon. Friend rightly pointed to the excellent work that WRAP has done in recent years, and will continue to do, to improve and grow markets. I am heartened by the general level of consensus that there has been during the review of waste policy about what needs to happen. It has involved a range of people, from the industry and political parties to green groups. If there are no markets for the stuff, things will not happen and will not be sustainable.

My hon. Friend raised an issue about the Olympics. If he thinks it a good idea, I shall write to the Minister responsible for the Olympics pointing out the importance of the sort of infrastructure that he described. His comments about the Olympics touched on another important point—the importance of procurement generally, not just in Government but across industry. He will be aware that we set up the sustainable procurement taskforce under Sir Neville Simms shortly after the previous election. It is about to report, and I think that it will have some important things to say about the importance of procurement policy in driving up the demand for recycled products. I know that that is not strictly to do with compost, but it is in the broader sense of the term; if we could drive up the demand for recycled products, that would give a boost to recycling and composting.

I have described the framework. I abandoned my notes, because I felt that my hon. Friend's speech warranted that. I accept the points that both he and my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Chris Mole) made about the highly precautionary nature of the animal by-products regulation. I am acutely aware of that matter. I remember a ridiculous case—I think it was in south Wales—a year or so ago in which local authorities said that they could not accept teabags as part of composting because of the animal by-products regulation. There is always a danger of overreacting.

As was kindly acknowledged, one can understand the adoption of a highly precautionary approach in the aftermath of foot and mouth. Such an approach is right. Not simply because of the composting issue but because I have a desire to be proportionate generally in Government and as a Minister, I am always asking my officials to push the case in Europe for the issue to be reviewed. As we understand more about the level of danger and so on, there might be an opportunity for scaling back, which would be helpful in terms of the current restrictions on composting.

I shall give the ball park figures for what has been invested through WRAP and the waste minimisation and recycling fund. We invested £294 million over the three years to 2005-06. WRAP has done much important work trying to develop markets for compost, which includes the development of a recognised standard for good quality, green waste compost. Another advantage of creating more markets for that sort of compost is that it will take the pressure off peat; it is a win-win situation if we can preserve the peat bogs and encourage the reuse of valuable material.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood said, we are considering waste as a resource. If he has read the consultation document on our waste policy, he will I am sure have digested the fact that we want to move away from waste being treated as waste; we want to manage it as a resource. As a result, our waste policy will fit more closely with our general policy on sustainable production and consumption.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Order. We move to the next debate.

NHS Services (East Sussex)

1.26 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): It is good to see you in the Chair, Mr. Hancock, and I am grateful for the opportunity to start the debate three or four minutes early—and I thank the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), as well for his help in that.

Of course, this subject is very important to my constituents. The Minister—I am glad to see that she is still with us after the reshuffle—will know that when opinion polls are taken, people say that the quality of the health service is at the top of their list of priorities. To be fair, the Government have put money into the health service over the years, and they have also managed to cut waiting lists; I want to recognise the good before turning to what may be a problem.

This is a time of uncertainty. We are seeing reorganisation in the health service in East Sussex that may be necessary to some extent—for instance, there is tremendous pressure on accident and emergency departments—but I hope that the Minister recognises that it can create uncertainty and divert people's efforts away from delivering front-line services to considering bureaucratic structures. For example, she will know of moves to change the structure of the strategic health authority to make it a south-east authority, and of the proposal to merge primary care trusts in my patch. The mental health trust is coming together, and the ambulance service looks as if it will be larger than Sussex. All those trusts—only the acute trust will be left untouched—will be going through yet another cycle of reorganisation. I wonder how many more there will be. I have been an MP for only nine years, but the health service seems to have been in permanent revolution during that time. That is not sensible for the people involved in the health service or for my constituents or patients generally. We will also have payment by results, which will have interesting consequences.

Let me refer in parenthesis to the economic position of Lewes. The town is at the centre of my constituency; it is a relatively small town, but it benefits from a large degree of white-collar work, which allows it to continue to prosper. Much of that work is based on the health service. The town houses the headquarters of the local PCT and the ambulance trust, other health bodies have links with it and the county council is based there. It would be most unfortunate if, as a consequence of reorganisation, health service jobs were lost to the town. I hope that when the Minister is considering such reorganisations and possible changes to the location of headquarters, she will bear in mind the importance of maintaining a white-collar base in Lewes.

In particular, I want to talk about the impact of the job cuts in Sussex that are fast coming down the track. I said at the start of my speech that I recognise that the Government have put more money into the health service—they have—and the Chancellor has put in more money than ever before. It is therefore difficult to understand the reason for the headlines in my local papers. One headline in The Argus says "200 jobs cut to save the NHS £8 million", and another says, "NHS in jobs crisis". One in the Mid Sussex Times says "325 jobs to go at hospitals". Across the acute trusts in particular, we are seeing large-scale redundancies. For instance, the 325 redundancies at the Brighton and Sussex University Hospitals trust comprise 7 per cent. of the work force. The 250 jobs that are to go in Eastbourne at the East Sussex Hospitals trust form 5 per cent. of the work force.

By any standard, those are huge cuts. More than that, they will be random cuts, because the trusts are sensibly working on the basis of trying to avoid redundancies and allowing for natural wastage. Of course, that means that the cuts will come in haphazard fashion according to when people happen to leave—they may, in fact, be in the wrong places. There is no guarantee of a straightforward, sensible and clinical—in both senses of the word—approach to what happens. Instead, the job cuts will fall rather randomly. That will have an effect on front-line services.

It is not difficult to gainsay the suggestion that with 7 per cent. of the work force going within a year, there will be no impact on front-line services. Clearly there will be an impact. Will the Minister explain how—I genuinely do not understand—when the health service has more money than ever, job cuts of such a magnitude are being made in our trusts? It is not a matter of one trust that has been badly managed. Trusts across Sussex, as referred to in my local paper, are affected.

The cuts are having other unwelcome consequences. I spoke last night to Dr. Andrews, the chairman of the East Sussex Hospitals trust local negotiating committee. He told me that things are moving to a stage at which even the most basic drugs are running out in hospitals, including antibiotics. Those are not expensive drugs, but basic drugs. He tells me that hospital doctors scout around for alternatives that can be used to treat patients, but which are often not the most desirable in clinical terms, and are often more expensive; they are just what happens to be there. The cash-flow problems of the hospital are now leading to wastage, with secondary clinical decisions sometimes being made which, although I am not saying that they are wrong, are not necessarily the doctors' first choice. More money is spent in an attempt to save money, which is counterproductive.

Experienced staff are being replaced with less experienced staff—we have of course seen that happen in schools—because they come cheaper, being further down the grading scale. However, by definition they do not have the knowledge and detailed experience that is necessary for our hospitals. The consequence is that we have less experienced staff.

All those developments are very worrying to people in my constituency. With respect to the Brighton and Sussex University Hospitals trust—the one with the biggest deficit and the biggest problem—I am happy to concede that a part of the process may have been limitations in previous management decision making. I am happy to accept that that has been a part of the process if the Minister wants to argue the point. However, now that a turnaround team has been sent in by the Department, the trust's historic debt, which is significant at £10 million, should be wiped off, provided that the trust can agree with the Department of Health and the turnaround team a process for going forward that will prevent further debt from mounting up.

That seems to me to be a compromise. If the trust is expected to deal with the historic debt as well as with the accumulating debt, the consequences for patients will be severe. Wiping out the old debt seems a way to bring some intellectual and financial rigour into the process while recognising that there will be a significant downside for patients if things are allowed to continue as they are.

That is not to say that money is not wasted in the health service. I particularly object to large pay-offs being made to individuals for reasons that are not entirely clear. I draw to the Minister's attention the case of the former chief executive of the East Sussex Hospitals trust, Annette Sergeant, who was given special leave on 21 June 2005. She left the trust on 16 October 2005, officially in the health service. I do not know the ins and outs of that decision, but if Annette Sergeant was doing a good job why was she elbowed out of the trust? If she was not doing a good job, why was she given a big pay-off and found another job in the NHS? Neither outcome seems to make sense. She was either up to the job or she was not. Will the Minister confirm that Annette Sergeant received a pay-off in excess of £250,000 to leave the trust before taking up another job in the health service? How can that decision be justified in relation to public expenditure?

"to pursue new career opportunities"

I mentioned that there is no reconfiguration of the acute trusts in the sense of changes to boundaries, but the Minister will know about the document produced by the Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority, "Creating an NHS fit for the future". That document sets out some sensible analysis. By the way, Candy Morris is a very competent person to lead that organisation; I am impressed by her. However, the consequences of some decisions may well be very unwelcome for local communities. The decisions cannot simply be rushed through. In particular, there is a suggestion, as the Minister will be aware, that the hospitals in Sussex and Surrey, which by and large are all equal acute trusts with equal A and E facilities, will in effect become part of a two-tier system, with some hospitals having more A and E facilities than others.

There is particular concern in the eastern part of my constituency that Eastbourne district general hospital will be downgraded, may lose some of its A and E facilities and will probably lose its maternity unit. There is concern that because the East Sussex Hospitals trust runs both Eastbourne and Hastings, some procedures will be delivered in Eastbourne and some in Hastings. That is not satisfactory.

As local GPs have said, the key issue about core services is that they want key emergency cover, both medical and surgical, at both hospitals, not at one site. I do not believe that surgical emergencies should go to Hastings if they arise in Seaford or Polegate in my constituency. There is also a question about whether that saves any money. I am not sure that it does and it certainly creates problems of its own. The transport implications are significant. I understand that the ambulance trust has written to express concern about the idea that people from, say, Seaford, Polegate or Eastbourne will have to travel to the hospital in Hastings for a particular sort of care. The distance between Eastbourne and Hastings is significant and the road system will not impress the ambulance service trying to get there. It is a single-carriageway road with many bottlenecks along it. The idea that because a trust happens to cover a particular geographical area, its services can be spread out so that only one centre deals with a particular function, seems to me to be inherently flawed, but it appears central to the logic of the strategic health authority paper.

We have already had some indication that services will be reduced at Eastbourne. My colleague in Eastbourne, Stephen Lloyd, who stood as a candidate at the last general election, fought to prevent cuts in children's services when they were first mooted. The instinct of the trust throughout has been to deny that services are about to be cut or removed, only for that to be confirmed subsequently. It now seems likely that the maternity department at Eastbourne will be removed and that mothers will be expected to go to Hastings. Almost 4,000 children were born in the trust area last year, so assuming that it is a case of half each, 2,000 people will be expected to go from Eastbourne or, even worse, from Seaford or Polegate—even further away—to Hastings to give birth. That is unacceptable.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), who cannot be here today, is also concerned about the matter. Indeed, I think it is fair to say that the concern is shared by all East Sussex MPs, including—I do not want to misrepresent him—the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Michael Jabez Foster), who is one of the Minister's colleagues. I think that he, too, is concerned about some of the proposals. It would therefore be helpful if the Minister gave precise details of the timetable for any proposed changes, where they are in the system at the moment and what form of consultation will take place on them, with specific reference to the East Sussex Hospitals trust and how those issues dovetail with the strategic health authority document.

May I remind the Minister that there is an issue about patient transport, particularly from rural areas such as Seaford in my constituency, if people are to be expected to get to Hastings? In a written answer from one of her colleagues on 8 November 2004 to a question that I asked, the Government stated:

> "The principle which should apply is that each patient should be able to reach hospital in a reasonable time and in reasonable comfort, without detriment to their medical condition".

However, the answer also stated:

> "A clinical need for treatment does not imply a medical need for transport."—[Official Report, 8 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 543W.]

I accept that as a statement of fact. However, I am concerned—I hope that the Minister will recognise this point—that as facilities move further and further away from patients in particular cases, the distance, time taken to travel, need for transport and cost all become greater. All those are downsides in terms of patient care that I am sure the Minister does not want.

There is concern that despite the Government's stated policy—and perhaps even intentions—the NHS is becoming more centralised. I have given examples of how trusts are reconfiguring services within their boundaries, and I have suggested that the reorganisations in place will create bigger units rather than smaller units, but the situation is even worse than that. In my patch, there are two primary care trusts—they will probably shortly become one—both of which have financial problems. The Eastbourne Downs PCT anticipates an overspend of £7 million this year. What is the consequence of that £7 million overspend? The consequence is that it is delaying references to the acute trust for work to be done in hospital. It is keeping within the Government's maximum times for operations, but delaying them for as long as possible within the Government's framework. That is not sensible for patients. The other consequence is pulling services out of communities, rather than diversifying them out to communities, which is what the Government say they want, and I share that view. Instead, services are being pulled in. The consequence in Seaford, for example, which is a town of almost 25,000 people, is that there are virtually no services in the town, all the intermediate care beds have long gone and people who want intermediate care are now referred to Firwood house, north of Eastbourne. That is a long way away, and quite impossible to get to by public transport. Put simply, the NHS service in Seaford is unacceptable.

As I said, there are 25,000 people in Seaford; it is the largest town in my constituency. All we have in terms of NHS delivery is a GP centre with few facilities and a so-called day hospital which seems to me to provide peculiarly few facilities. In September 2005, I wrote to East Sussex County Healthcare NHS trust, as it then was, about this matter and pointed out that in my view the hospital was underused. In response, the chief executive Lisa Rodrigues pointed out how it was used, which was as a base for a community mental health team, and said that there were a number of out-patient clinics—that number is reducing, by the way—and some use of the building by older people's mental health services. That is not a great deal for a town of 25,000 people, is it? I have long believed that building to be horrendously underused, and in need of reconfiguration. It could be the basis of a good community use that would take the pressure off the NHS and the acute trusts in Eastbourne—and indeed Brighton.

I wrote to Candy Morris of the strategic health authority about the matter, and she quite properly took it up with Lisa Rodrigues. I am afraid that Lisa Rodrigues said in her reply that she did not know what the building was, which does not exactly give confidence that the trust knows what it is doing with its buildings. I have asked Candy Morris to look further into the matter.

What Seaford needs is a new hospital. We need a hospital to deal with minor injuries, as Lewes has; Lewes Victoria hospital has a well-respected unit. We need a hospital in Seaford that can carry out minor operations. We need a focus for the community teams, such as chiropodists, to operate from. The Minister may say that that would involve a spending commitment and that the money would need to be found from somewhere. Of course that is the case, but my argument is that, with A and E admissions going up by 11 per cent. a year and services being withdrawn from communities, that would be a good investment, and it would take pressure off the health service. The Minister's own policy is to have more localised delivery of services, more community facilities and more walk-in centres. I agree with all those things. Seaford is a case in point, as there is a huge gap.

A hospital dealing with minor injuries and minor operations would be an important facility for the town and a good use of NHS public money. The PCT has done some work on the matter, but it has a £7 million overspend and is now up to its neck in reorganisation, so unfortunately that work has all gone on hold and nothing much is happening. We are not making as much progress as we should with that.

There is also a problem with boundary disputes between the county council and the acute trust in terms of bed blocking. I have raised that issue in previous debates, as have other Members, including the hon. Member for Eastbourne. There are still 74 people on average in hospitals held by the East Sussex Hospitals trust—that is 9 per cent. of beds or two wards—who no longer require acute care and who are there largely because the county council has not taken responsibility for them and found residential care home places for them. The Minister and her predecessors have looked at that issue, but nothing much seems to be happening. For that situation to continue would be a terrible waste of NHS money, so it would be useful if it were sorted out.

The other boundary dispute is between different PCTs. Newhaven Downs, which is the rehabilitation centre in my constituency, has been mothballed since last November. It is an upgraded facility that cannot be used, so people are expected to go much further away for intermediate care. The move is simply a cost-cutting measure. The Minister's boss, the Secretary of State for Health, said recently that community hospitals should not be closed for financial reasons. She is absolutely right, but that is, in effect, what has happened at Newhaven Downs. Will the Minister look into the position there and put pressure on the PCT to reopen that facility? Seaford people have lost facilities at the All Saints centre in Eastbourne. They have also lost Homefield cottages and are expected to go to Firwood house, having also lost Newhaven Downs. That is simply not good enough.

I have raised a number of issues to which I hope the Minister can respond. The picture is not all doom and gloom, but there are a number of serious problems that need to be addressed.

1.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) on securing this debate and on the constructive way in which he began his contribution. I hope that that will allow us to have a balanced and useful discussion about the things that are working in our health service, as well as about some of the things that are perhaps not working as well as we might like them to.

As the Minister with responsibility for public health, I am interested in how we can better look at services that could be provided outside hospitals and in communities and, importantly, at how, through more public health spend, we can swing the pendulum and get ahead of illness rather than always treating sickness—only about 2 per cent. of the NHS spend goes on prevention currently. It is quite difficult to argue that corner, when so much of what happens in the health service is tied up in our hospitals and treating sickness. Please do not get me wrong—we all want to know that when we are ill we will receive the treatment that we need. That is vital and is one of the reasons why, when we came into government in 1997, the public were telling us that their top priority was dealing with waiting times. The second issue was the number of people dying too soon from cancer and heart conditions. Rightly or wrongly, that focused our attention and minds.

Now we are in a better place in terms of waiting times and treatment for those serious conditions. That allows us to consider how better we might deliver a health service that addresses prevention and, importantly, the long-term management of people with serious conditions. As we know only too well, despite the amount of money that might be spent on someone who has had a heart attack or has chronic heart disease, we do not get the best value for our money if there is no service to support them—usually much closer to where they live—to look at their lifestyle and what changes they can make, as well as through other activities.

I visited a YMCA in central London just the other day, where I met some people who had had heart treatment in the past few years who were doing exercise. They all had their own personal trainer. The trainers were young people learning to do physiotherapy or fitness activities in a sports environment—so, two birds for the price of one. The people at the YMCA told me that, at the end of about three years, they were beginning to see the value of that investment. Without it, some of those people might have gone back into hospital more times than was necessary. That is at the heart of the discussion, but as the hon. Gentleman rightly points out, it presents us with some difficult decisions and raises questions about how we are going to change the culture and the way in which, traditionally—and hierarchically—the NHS has provided for people's health. At the same time, within whatever structure we have, the hard work of NHS staff and social care staff, who work with people locally, whether in hospital or outside, will be key to any improvement.

I shall talk a little more about job cuts, but I hope that in future some of the staff who are currently hospital-based will be based partly in the hospital and partly in the community. Alternatively, they may move into the community, where, through technology and changes, we can make better use of community hospitals or develop GP health centres to incorporate facilities and services currently provided in hospitals, while recognising that we need the best hospitals and staff in the world to deal with more serious, complicated cases that require operations and treatment.

We are dealing with the improvement of health, but the hon. Gentleman raised the point, totally fairly, that financial deficits in a minority of trusts in England have been allowed to accumulate in one way or another, or that there has been a game of pass the parcel from one part of the health economy to another to mask the problem. That has been exposed for what it really is—a system allowing a situation to continue whereby no one was getting hold of debts or understanding why they were arising.

Do the debts relate to mergers or the way hospitals are run? The hon. Gentleman made a very good point about delayed transfers, for example. He referred to an average of 74 people in this situation, and I have that figure as well. Every day a person is delayed in hospital, social services made a payment of £100, but it costs £300 for every day of delay. That raises issues of sustainability and the close relationship that has to be maintained with social care services.

We are trying to consider how to keep our older people, and our older, older people—it is quite hard to define "older"—out of hospital. We have had fantastic success with primary care trusts, which have considered what they call their falls policies to establish how they can prevent accidents, provide better help in the home and support people in different ways to keep them out of hospital, while ensuring any necessary time in hospital is kept to a minimum. That is one example of a factor that contributes to financial pressures if it is not dealt with. There are examples throughout the country of trusts that are balancing the books and are being innovative in running services by using IT and new technology and by using their staff better. They use highly qualified staff for the jobs they were trained for, while finding other roles for support staff who are also important, but do not necessarily require the same qualifications.

Norman Baker: I accept what the Minister says in part. I would point out that a large number of trusts in Sussex have financial problems. Is she convinced that the funding formula is correct, given that a huge number of "older, older" people—as she puts it—are prevalent in my area? Polegate, for example, has the eighth oldest population in the country.

Caroline Flint: I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman says, but the funding formula takes into account geographical issues and age of population. In many respects, the age of the population in his area, and that part of the south of England, is taken into account. That is reflected in the funding. We consider other health needs as well.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not disagree that the average life expectancy of someone in Doncaster—without being too partisan in referring to my own area—is considerably less than that of someone in parts of Sussex. We have to address those health inequalities. He makes a very good point, which shows why we have to consider what other services we need in his area to meet people's needs. As we are all living longer, there will be more 75-year-olds in the future. How can we help them stay fit and healthy as long as possible? If I were in that position, my desired option would be to look after myself in my home.

I want to touch on the issues relating to jobs. The hon. Gentleman highlighted stories from his local newspapers in relation to this subject. It is true that the hospital and the trusts in question are considering cutting some posts. The Brighton and Sussex University Hospitals trust has said that it is looking to reduce the 5,000 jobs at the trust by 325. I understand that it thinks that it can make up a huge number of posts by introducing a vacancy freeze and through the reduction of agency and bank spend and the better use of technology.

The East Sussex Hospitals NHS trust, which also employs about 5,000 staff, is looking to restrict filling around 250 vacancies. I am told that in an average year, 500 posts fall vacant through natural staff movement and retirements, so we hope that the situation can be managed as fairly as possible and without compulsory redundancies.

This issue raises questions about how those hospitals are going to provide services, given that they may not fill posts or use agency staff as much as they have in the past. There are good examples of other trusts reducing their reliance on agency staff and better managing their permanent staff teams to achieve good results for patients. Seeing a different face every day because the trust overuses agency and temporary staff is not good for patients, particularly older patients, or for their sense of continuity of care. Of course, there is also an important safety issue there.

The changes to the structure of the SHA and PCTs are meant to help to create a stronger framework for the area and improve commissioning. We are looking at making savings by reducing the number of organisations, and putting the money back into front-line services so that funds can be better spent on the services that people most want. Alongside that, we must discuss what services people want in their local communities. That will be addressed in the consultation later this year—I understand that there will be discussions on contributions to the document for the end of May, to be published in the autumn—which should take into account many of the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised.

The hon. Gentleman talked about Seaford day hospital; I am sorry that the person whom he mentioned did not recognise the name of the hospital. It provides mental health services and older people's mental health services, providing three—sometimes four—clinics a week. It also provides working age adult services, providing five—sometimes six—clinics a week. I understand that the hospital is also used as a base by staff who come into the town to treat Seaford residents. That demonstrates another way in which services can be provided without a permanent base. Those staff use the hospital to support people, but most of the treatment takes place in people's homes, which is a good idea. It is also used by the Eastbourne Downs PCT physiotherapy service, which runs clinics every weekday.

So, I understand that the building is used by three services, involving two NHS organisations, to deal with a wide range of mental and physical health needs. That is a good idea and is to be welcomed. I understand, from the Sussex Partnership NHS trust that it will continue to use the building in that way and that there are no plans to reduce capacity there. The trust believes that the building is well utilised. I will ensure that the hon. Gentleman's view that it could be used more is fed back; he should contribute to discussions about planning local services.

The work being led by the SHA in partnership with the four local health communities, including the one for east Sussex, is about trying to ensure that local people and stakeholders have the opportunity to get involved in developing the plan. As I said, that will be supported by a discussion document to be published by the SHA towards the end of May. I understand that it is also working on settings for care options, and will consider access and travel issues as well as clinical and economic viability. The SHA expects to begin the full public consultation on the developed options in the autumn. I hope that that gives some clarification regarding the timetable.

The hon. Gentleman made some important and constructive points. Part of the debate that we must have is about raising people's expectations of their health service in the future, as well as what they are used to. Sometimes people defend what they are used to partly out of affection for a service that they have used and partly because it is the only thing that they see in town and they are fearful of what will happen if it goes. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be a constructive and critical friend to his local health services, and a leader in developing discussions about the sort of health services that we could have.

Social Housing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Steve McCabe.]

9.30 am

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): May I say how much I welcome the opportunity to debate social housing? The subject is highly topical, although not for reasons that we would support, but we none the less need to take advantage of that topicality.

I welcome the fact that the Minister is still in place, as she has been extremely supportive and courteous in working with me on the problems of overcrowding, which I shall refer to later. She has visited my constituency and met a number of families who live in wholly unacceptable conditions, which is the thrust of the debate.

Social housing gets a bad press that is not shared by any other public service—so negative is its image that "Little Britain" and Catherine Tate have created an industry out of it. Although it has been mocked and ignored, and more recently treated as if it were in some way a cause of poverty and social exclusion rather than a central line of defence against them, nothing less than a catastrophe has been allowed to unfold.

It is necessary briefly to say that none of those factors can be used in defence of the housing disasters of the past—the great but badly designed monolithic estates, the paternalistic and sometimes poor-quality housing management, and the concentration of families with complex needs in single-tenure neighbourhoods. Serious mistakes have been made over the years, and they have given cover to those who were allowed to dismantle so much that was good over the past quarter century.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I am listening to my hon. Friend closely and must say that there is always the risk of throwing the baby out with the bath water. We have three big regeneration schemes in my constituency—West Hendon; Spur Road, Edgware; and Grahame Park, Colindale. The net consequence of significantly increasing density, which will have a great impact on local services and communities, is a net loss of affordable homes. The London borough of Barnet, which is responsible for those schemes, is missing a trick. We have to do something about the chronic shortage of housing and the overcrowding in our area, but those schemes do nothing to ease the problems.

Ms Buck: I totally endorse what my hon. Friend says. I fear that Barnet is doing no favours to its own people, and it is also failing to make a wider contribution.

I am saying to the Government that the opportunity afforded by the Chancellor's stated interest in the case for social housing to be included in next year's spending review is almost a last chance to put right the failures of the past. It was comforting to hear the new Secretary of State in this Department emphasise the importance of social housing. I hope that people's ears are open to the case that needs to be made.

Many good things have been done by the Government on housing since 1997, of which the decent homes initiative is the most important. Thousands of my constituents have benefited from the major improvements and renovations that have taken place under that programme, which are much to be welcomed. However, the overall failure to address the problem of housing supply, most especially but not entirely in London and the south-east, has not only caused untold misery for those families rendered homeless or trapped in chronically overcrowded accommodation, but been a false economy to the public purse. It has shifted much of the cost, such as for temporary accommodation, on to housing benefit; contributed to the destabilising of communities; and, sadly—this is why the debate is so relevant—stoked the racism that is a consequence of the competition for scarce resources in an ethically mixed and fast-changing city.

As the director of Shelter rightly said yesterday, the shortage of affordable homes has led to a "blame culture" in which people turn on each other in their frustration and despair. Although the consequences might have been seen most graphically in Barking and Dagenham, we should be under no illusion that such sentiments are confined to one area.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Of those Labour Members present today, several represent metropolitan constituencies and one is a distinguished former council leader; I am a provincial among them. The pressures in London are obviously particularly great. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government, despite their pretty sound record generally, must avoid what the National Housing Federation has called a "pile 'em high, sell 'em cheap" policy in responding to those problems? They must balance quantity and quality in responding to people's needs and aspirations as regards the environment and new housing.

Ms Buck: Again, I agree with my hon. Friend, and I shall set those points out from my own perspective.

Ironically, the choice-based lettings system, which is increasingly used to supply housing, and which I wholly support in principle, is making the intensity of the competition that I have described toxically transparent. For example, a rare three-bed property in my constituency was advertised through the choice-based lettings system two weeks ago and it attracted 244 bidders from the already heavily filtered top-priority category A list alone. Given that only six three-bedroom properties have been advertised in the current financial year, most desperate people, even on that list, face an almost endless round of unsuccessful bidding, which is an injection of pure poison into already deprived neighbourhoods.

On the shortfall in supply, targets for tackling rough sleeping and for cutting the number of households in temporary accommodation, both of which are entirely admirable by their own lights, simply squeeze the balloon that is housing need—reducing need in one place, only to see it to pop up elsewhere in the system.

Before I summarise the priorities for action, let me sketch out some challenges. I shall make specific reference to London. The number of social housing lettings has been falling for a decade, and the number of vacancies has fallen because fewer people can afford to buy. In London, the ratio of lower-quartile house prices to lower-quartile earnings has more than doubled, compared with a 50 per cent. increase in the country as a whole. The right to buy is having a continuing impact, reducing the pool of lettings by about 12,500 a year, while the number of completions is substantially down across the country, although I recognise that it is up in London by about 2,000.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing the debate. Is she aware that the problems for inner-city areas that she is describing also affect rural areas such as Montgomeryshire? For example, house prices in my constituency have increased by 157 per cent. in just six years, while the average household earns just £23,000 a year. Does she agree that the problems and the solutions, which I hope she will outline, are very much the same for rural areas? Such areas need to close the gap between the housing that families require and the housing they can afford.

Ms Buck: I certainly take the point that rural areas face a serious challenge on housing need. Although London is at the sharp end of the problem, the pressure is distributed across the country, which is illustrated by the fact that, since 1997, the number of people seeking social housing has increased by about half across the country, but by 77 per cent. in London.

The 2004 spending review was projected to deliver an extra 10,000 new social homes annually by next year, but that was substantially below what the Kate Barker report recommended, and it is less than half of what we need. Despite the Mayor of London's welcome commitment to meet housing need, there will be a continuing shortfall in the years to come. The Greater London authority housing requirement study estimated that 10,700 larger affordable homes—those are at the heart of the problem in my area—were needed every year, but the supply is unbelievably low, at 500.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): I agree with my hon. Friend about the commitment to reach the target of 10,000 new homes a year, but in London, as she has outlined, we will not reach anything like our target at current rates, given the need for larger accommodation and the level of construction inflation.

Ms Buck: Sadly, I agree with my hon. Friend, which is why I welcome this chance to make the case in relation to the next spending review. The need is urgent, and provision is lagging well behind need.

The Housing Corporation recently made a welcome contribution to recognising the need for family accommodation by upping its share of the social housing allocation for family homes from 27 to 34 per cent., but that is still way below what is needed to meet new demand in the system and to make inroads into the backlog.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is particularly important to consider what the Housing Corporation says, because it provides social housing? For many families, affordable housing is no longer affordable, and there is a real need not only for affordable housing, but for social housing for many of those families.

Ms Buck: I agree. Social housing is at the heart of my case, although affordable housing to buy is also priced out of the reach of families who in other circumstances might be able to afford to go into the private market.

As a consequence of the devastating shortfall in supply, particularly of family-sized accommodation, severe overcrowding rose by almost half in London between the 1991 and 2001 censuses. More than half of all severely overcrowded households in the country are in London, and the social sector has for the first time overtaken private rented as the most severely affected. The fact that 500,000 London children live in severely overcrowded homes makes me ashamed.

Ms Keeble: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for being generous in giving way. Does she agree that there is a real problem in that figures from the former Office of the Deputy Prime Minister clearly show that overcrowding is greatest in areas where there are large numbers of black and minority ethnic communities, especially Asian communities? That is particularly the case in Newham.

Ms Buck: That is right. In fact, my next point is that, despite the pernicious lies of the British National party and the perhaps more understandable willingness of desperate, badly housed families to believe its propaganda, it is black, ethnic minority and Muslim families who are over-represented in the severe overcrowding and homelessness figures, and indeed across the board in terms of housing need, so in a way we have the worst of all possible worlds.

I have made the point about overall supply and, in particular, the supply of family-sized accommodation, but it is also important to say that the supply must be balanced out across London as a whole. That is my area of concern; others will make the case for the country as a whole. The geographical distribution, even of the increased provision in London, does not meet all needs. In fact, there is a danger that it is about to make the situation worse. Despite the fact that Westminster city council—Westminster is one of my two boroughs—has to deal with what is, unbelievably, the third highest overcrowding level in the local authority rented sector, we are unable to obtain adequate direct investment or to access properties through sub-regional allocations.

I am told that housing opportunities in cheaper partner boroughs to my expensive inner-London ones will help to soak up the slack, yet even though I have just put forward two desperately needy families who want to move to Barnet, where they have family ties—Barnet is a borough in the sub-regional partnership—I am told by Westminster that no three-bedroom properties will be available in the sub-regional partner boroughs of Barnet and Enfield this year. Overall, Westminster and its sub-regional partners can expect only 90 properties to be made available to meet the needs of more than 3,000 people on the waiting list alone.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning Barnet, which is my borough. The problem is that Peter is trying to rob Paul. In my constituency, there is a desperate shortage of the housing that we are discussing, so frankly I am not surprised that Westminster received the response that it did, because there is no housing for our own people. Such properties simply do not exist in Barnet.

One of my main concerns is that, although there is housing investment in parts of London, other parts of London—where there is a chronic housing shortage, where people want to live, where jobs are available, where there are transport links and where, as a consequence, land prices are slightly higher—are being starved of investment. That is a completely false economic argument. We must invest where the jobs and transport links are and where people want to live, not where those things do not exist.

Ms Buck: That is right. I can understand the logic of saying that we will not invest substantially in building social housing in the middle of Knightsbridge—that would be wholly sub-optimal in development terms—but it is critical that we provide social and affordable housing opportunities across London and that they are not concentrated purely in poorer areas. That is because, among other things, we are trying to get away from lower-income households being concentrated in lower-income neighbourhoods. Let me give two illustrations from my area, and I shall conclude by running through some of my priorities for action.

Mrs. M sent me a letter:

"We are a family of five. We have been living in two single bedrooms since 1993. The boy is fifteen, the girl is nine and the little one 3, living, playing, studying and doing homework in the same room of 2.5 metres by 3 metres. The boy has learning difficulties, the mum has rheumatoid arthritis and diabetes... you cannot imagine how difficult it is to live with 3 kids in the same room."

The father and husband of a second family wrote:

"As you will recall, our family of six—myself, my wife, two daughters and two sons—have been living in a flat with two single bedrooms since 2001. Both my wife's health and my own have deteriorated as a result of living here and my children, the oldest of whom is 14, should no longer be sharing a bedroom. Unfortunately, our landlord is indifferent to our situation... in their waiting lists we are placed in Category B along with 66 other people, and, as such, we can expect to wait for 12 years"— that is, 12 years during which six people share two small bedrooms.

Remember, that family are not even in category A. The transfer list for that social landlord in my borough says that the longest category A priority wait for a two-bedroomed flat is nine years; the longest category B wait is 16 years. Those are not my worst cases, which involve families of five in a single bedroom. However, at least those cases are defined as statutory overcrowding.

I come to my final example. Mrs. A and her husband are sharing a small two-bed with their three teenage children. Mrs. A's landlord, the Peabody Trust, told me last summer:

"She has been on the Trust's transfer list since March 1997... she is waiting for a 3 bed property and her case receives priority because of her medical circumstances and overcrowding. Unfortunately, last year, the Trust only let one 3 bed property in" the whole borough. The Peabody Trust continued:

"Mrs. A refers to an empty 3 bed on the Dalgarno estate which needs work doing to it... The Trust has to make some difficult decisions when dealing with such properties and in this case, the property will be sold".

Of course, the Peabody Trust is hugely engaged in selling property. Sales are also made by Genesis and a number of other registered social landlords in my constituency.

What is the solution? I do not often echo Ronald Reagan, but I shall in this instance: the solution is not easy, but it is simple. The issue is supply, supply, supply. We have to increase the supply of socially rented homes, especially those suitable for families, although genuinely affordable shared ownership options and greater availability of smaller units can also relieve pressures on families by offering opportunities to adult children. In the 2007 comprehensive spending review, we need to commit to meeting the Barker target as a minimum.

The 2007 comprehensive spending review might give us more money to build, but we can also buy on the open market. That is my preferred emergency response to the crisis. We can support investment in conversions and extensions, such as loft conversions, of existing properties. One reason why that is hard to do is that many London boroughs, including my own, have taken a relative reduction in housing revenue accounts. On current trends, Westminster's housing revenue account will go into deficit in 2010. We need more assistance to enable such programmes to be carried out by the local authorities, the arm's length management organisations and us.

We have to stop the sale of housing association properties, especially the desirable street properties, on the open market. We have to ensure that we do not promote home ownership at the expense of those in desperate need of affordable rented accommodation. Too much extra investment in recent years has gone on promoting ownership rather than on tackling need.

We must not only make the concept of mixed communities a reality, but ensure that, as we rightly mix tenure in what are currently concentrations of social housing, we simultaneously mix social housing into areas that are overwhelmingly owner-occupied. To echo the points made by a number of my hon. Friends, we need social housing growth everywhere.

We must invest more in tools that will help us to identify under-occupation, promote the cash incentive scheme and make mutual exchange work effectively. That will help us to make better use of existing housing stock. We have been extremely complacent about the effectiveness of such programmes. They can help, but are not sufficient and will not solve the problem on their own. They need proper incentives to match those offered by the right to buy and they need to case manage individuals through the system to encourage them to downsize and exchange.

An estimated 160,000 households living in the social sector could buy in the intermediate market if that sector were providing family-sized accommodation. Intermediate housing tends to concentrate on one and two bedrooms, which is not what families need. The sector could provide this, and it should.

I plead with my hon. Friend the Minister that we must not load the burden on to rents, as London already has the highest rates of child poverty in the country and research clearly shows that higher rents are a factor in work disincentives and poverty. Rising rents in London have already contributed almost £90 million back to the Treasury, which is grossly unfair given the pressures London tenants are under.

We should expand the pilot for turning temporary accommodation into permanent, which would be good value for money and hugely important for unsettled families. The £20 million scheme that is in place is a drop in the ocean. Also, let us find alternatives to the property market as a means to develop assets for those who cannot realistically afford to buy.

Finally, I wish to say something on council leaseholders. Hundreds of relatively low-income council leaseholders in my area, such as on the Warwick, Amberley, Church Street and Lisson Green estates, face major works bills, which can be as high as £68,000 and which in some cases are substantially more than the purchase price of their property.

Home ownership has turned out to have an enormous sting in the tail for many such families, and while right-to-buy discounts and rising property prices have to be seen as part of the context, the reality is that the bills are arriving now and many lessees are devastated by them. There is a further shift towards sub-letting, as families decide that the £425 a week that they could make in housing benefit for renting their properties to homeless families might help to get them off the financial hook, but that does not make sense for the public purse or the wider community.

It is essential that the Government find ways to support initiatives to help the lower-income households now getting caught in this trap and that they recognise that there are costs involved, such as in the form of funding cost caps, interest-free loans, deferred payments, tax breaks on savings schemes for major works, or in some cases funds for buy back.

I apologise for my speech taking so long, although I hope that Members recognise that I have taken a number of interventions. I conclude by saying that social housing is the public service that has been left out in the cold for a quarter of a century, and in my view we are reaping the whirlwind. Please let us take this opportunity to start making radical reparations.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. Janet Dean (in the Chair): Order. May I remind Members that we have until 10.30 for general debate, before I call the Front-Bench spokespeople? There should be ample time for all who wish to speak to do so, if Members moderate the length of their speeches.

9.52 am

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The hon. Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) has made a powerful case for her constituency and for inner London. Also, it is good to see the Minister in her place, although I am a little concerned about her health and I hope she will last out the debate. As one who is still traumatised by Tottenham Hotspur being poisoned at the weekend, I am a bit concerned about everyone.

The hon. Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North rightly talked about inner London, as that is where her constituency is, but may I take the House on to a shire district? In my district, we estimate that we need 700 new social homes each year just to keep up. The biennial Government grant—the grant under the 2004 comprehensive spending review—has meant that we in Cherwell can build only 288 new homes, which is a long way short of what is needed.

We know from parliamentary questions and answers that delivery of affordable housing after 2007-08 will depend entirely on the 2007 comprehensive spending review and the future bidding round held by the Housing Corporation.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tony Baldry: I want to be brief and many of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues wish to speak. I do not want to get castigated for taking up time, and the points I want to make are of reasonably narrow compass.

Let us look at what happened in respect of the 2004 comprehensive spending review. A press release issued by the former Office of the Deputy Prime Minister in July 2004 stated that this was one of the most generous spending deliveries ever, providing an extra 10,000 homes a year for social rent and, on top of that, delivering more than 40,000 homes for essential public sector workers and low-cost home ownership in areas of higher housing demand over a four-year period. The fact of the matter is that although that was a £1.5 billion award, it did barely anything for shire districts such as mine.

Ministers have recognised that there is an aspiration for home ownership. In a constituency such as mine, where we fortunately have zero unemployment, pretty much everyone who comes to see me at my constituency surgery and looking for housing is on a low income. They are in work and have almost always lived in the area all their life: having gone to school in Banbury and grown up there, they now work there. They want to get into housing and would aspire to own their own home if they could.

The Government have put forward shared equity schemes, which are really exciting. My only concern is that under the proposals made by the Deputy Prime Minister and the Chancellor in their pamphlet "Extending Home Ownership", the aspirant owner has to take on a mortgage of 75 per cent. of the value of the property. Hometrack has worked out that in Oxfordshire as in London, only about 2 per cent. of those on low incomes could afford a shared equity property on that basis. Practically none of the people on low incomes will be able to take up shared equity.

In my patch, notwithstanding that we are likely to have it trumpeted that the settlement will be generous and so on, if it is anything like the 2004 settlement, practically nothing will happen. We will then be told that there is to be shared equity, but that will also be a false dawn because no one will be able to access it.

I do not understand the economics of housing. Huge numbers of people in my patch are going into the private rented sector, so the state is paying private landlords considerable sums through rent and housing benefit. Housing benefit is still money from the taxpayer and I do not understand why more of the benefit cannot help to ensure that families can access home ownership. The proportion that a family on low income have to put up would be reduced and far more of those hard-working families in my constituency—often with husband and wife both working on low incomes—could access housing of their own rather than being trapped, as many of them are, in permanent shorthold assured tenancies.

Many of my constituents are confronted by a dilemma: they either go to the district council and are told that they can be put in temporary accommodation for an indefinite period, and eventually one of the few new, affordable social homes might become available, or are told to go to the private sector. As soon as they go to the private sector, they are told that they are by definition adequately housed and they fall off the list.

I make my plea to the Minister: over the next year or so, may we perhaps have a gathering of the Council of Mortgage Lenders, Ministers, the Housing Corporation and others to see how we can make shared equity schemes more accessible to a larger number of people? The Treasury should not simply, under a different pot, spend more and more on housing benefit and lock people into private rented tenancy in permanent shorthold assured tenancies that they really do not want.

In a constituency such as mine, if we could make the finances of shared equity work better, we could lever in a lot more money from individuals, families and mortgage lenders. There seems to be a disconnect that I do not entirely understand, but something tells me that we could do a lot better.

9.59 am

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I shall be as brief as possible because it is important that all colleagues are able to get into the debate. It cannot have escaped your notice, Mrs. Dean, that the majority of Labour Members participating in this debate represent London constituencies; that is because of the nature of the housing crisis in London which my Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) outlined very well indeed.

I represent an inner-London constituency where property prices are going through the roof all the time. Anyone wishing to buy a property in my constituency, such as a two-bedroomed flat above a shop on a main road, would need about £200,000. I saw an ex-council, three-bedroomed flat on an estate advertised yesterday for £350,000. So-called "shared ownership" properties are so expensive that the possibility of anyone on less than a head teacher's income getting one is remote. In reality, there is a massive housing crisis. Little is being built and some council property is still being sold, fortunately at a slightly lower rate than in the past.

As my Friend said in relation to the choice-based letting scheme, people on the housing waiting list go into a bidding frenzy every Thursday when the local paper comes out. Most of them are sadly disappointed. People come to my advice bureau in tears saying that in two years they have managed to visit one property with 20 other families and did not even manage to get an offer at the end of that process. Such cruelty goes on week in, week out.

To some extent, I welcome the choice-based letting system. However, we should be careful because those who are not computer literate, whose first language is not English and who do not feel confident or comfortable using telephones often simply do not bid. Such people just wait, but they will wait for ever because they have no opportunity at all. While I am not against choice-based letting, we should be cautious because those whose first language is not English are, in my experience, in danger of losing out as a result of it.

The Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) mentioned some of the problems in his area, and I have much sympathy with those, particularly the point he raised about the perverse levels of cost and the way in which investment can deal with the situation. I suspect that my local authority, Islington council, like most other London bodies, houses few people off the waiting list into any new development or vacant property. People tend to be directed into the private sector or into leased properties where the council or housing association take on the lease. Such leases are phenomenally expensive.

Ex-council properties that have been sold under the right to buy are then bought up by property companies or housing associations, or they are leased. The rent for such properties is often up to £300 a week. People in desperate housing need are put into them and the rent is paid by housing benefit; usually 100 per cent. of it is paid in that way, although that is not true in all cases. The family involved then often live in a poor quality property that is badly managed, very unsuitable and, in some cases, downright dangerous in my view. A huge rent is paid by the public sector.

If any member of such a family then manages to get a job—clearly we want people to get jobs and careers—they cannot afford to take it, because they are suddenly saddled with a bill of £15,000 a year in rent alone, and they have lost income support and other benefits. We are building a mad benefit trap that costs the public a huge sum to prevent somebody from working and keep them in a grossly substandard and inadequate form of accommodation. A lot of that money could be spent far more effectively on building new homes for rent for the people in desperate housing need throughout London.

I shall just quickly make two or three points because I recognise that many other Members wish to speak. First, on planning issues, the Mayor of London has rightly said that he wants 50 per cent. of all major developments given over to what he terms "affordable housing". I understand that aspiration, and I support it with one or two reservations. I do so because I want far more homes for rent to be available, but I do not like the use of the word "affordable" because the definition of it is loose. It means whatever anyone wants it to mean. Developers seem to think that something is very affordable when I do not think that that is the case. I would much rather say that we desperately need "places for rent at a fixed level in the public sector".

My local authority, Islington council, was controlled by the Liberal Democrats until last Thursday. Sadly from their point of view it now has no overall control, which represents an enormous step forward for Labour. One issue in the election was the Liberal Democrats' persistence on the policy that they would demand a proportion of social housing only on development sites of more than 14 units. In my borough there are few large development sites; most are very small. The Labour proposal was to go right down to the bottom and insist that all development sites have a proportion of social housing, which is eminently sensible. I hope that that is the new council's policy.

With major developments, developers do not think about the housing needs of people who are desperate to be rehoused; they think of their profits. Arsenal stadium sadly closed last week and the football team is moving to the new stadium. The old stadium site is being redeveloped as Highbury square. The developers, with the agreement of the Liberal Democrat council, are going to put 711 one-bedroomed private flats on that site. That is crazy. There is a desperate need for family housing to keep communities together. What happens is that single people and couples move to one-bedroomed flats and then cannot move to anywhere else in that community, so we end up with a community of either childless couples or old people. Those with children are forced to move out of inner London. I am sure that that occurs in other inner-London constituencies.

My last point is about the need to invest in development. The Library produced an interesting briefing for today's debate, which makes grim reading. The number of new council properties being developed throughout the country this year is somewhere around the zero mark, and the number of housing association properties being developed in the whole of London, which is at a record high for the past 10 years, is just 6,000. We need major investment in housing for rent either by housing associations or local authorities. We should give local authorities the freedom to invest in building properties for rent if that is what they want to do, not skew Government financing of housing investment so that it is impossible for local authorities to build for affordable rent.

If we do not tackle this crisis in London—and it is a crisis—what will be the long-term effect? More homeless people, more people living in grossly overcrowded accommodation, and more children growing up in grossly overcrowded flats. Is it surprising that young people and teenagers who are forced to share bedrooms with their siblings—often siblings of different sexes—do not like to spend time at home because there is simply no space? Is it surprising that families break up? Is it surprising that those young people hang around in the streets because they do not want to be at home in the evening, and encounter all kinds of problems as a result? If we do not deal with the housing crisis in London urgently and invest in the needs of the people, we will be exporting the poor out of London, and creating social divisions and misery for those people who manage to find somewhere—often somewhere expensive and inadequate—to live.

I hope that the Minister fully understands the crisis facing us in London, and the pain that we see across our desks at advice bureaux every week when people ask, "Is it so unreasonable to want a decent flat with a bedroom for each of my children so that they can grow up like all the other children do?" It is heartbreaking to hear what people go through. I hope that the Government will skew investment into new building rather than frittering it away on the profits of private landlords and property companies, which is what we are doing through the perversity of the housing benefit system.

10.9 am

Mr. Andrew Slaughter (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) on securing the debate. She is an acknowledged expert in this field, and her constituency neighbours mine. I do not intend to repeat much of what she said, but I welcome the return of her forensic skills to this issue. The loss to aviation policy is great, but the gain to social housing in London is greater still.

I also compliment my hon. Friend on the timing of the debate, which comes after a series of contentious local elections, for which many of us have spent the past six months knocking on doors in our constituencies. Actually, some of us have spent 18 months continuously doing that—to the extent that many of my constituents are probably seeking an injunction to stop my doing it again in the near future. Along with the cases that we hear of in weekly constituency surgeries, that brought home the real human tragedy caused by housing problems in inner London, particularly as we saw at first hand the conditions in which people live in London in the 21st century.

My hon. Friend gave several examples of the problem. I shall not give details of cases but simply say that they range from the extreme—the consequences of a mother with four children living in a one-bedroomed flat are traumatic and almost unimaginable—to the more common situation, which is perhaps worse because of its chronic nature, in which a whole generation has grown up in overcrowded housing.

It is normal in social housing in my constituency for parents to bring up two or three children in a two-bedroomed flat. The issue that they raise with me is the availability of housing now that their children are leaving college and want homes of their own. In other words, an entire generation has become accustomed to using living rooms as bedrooms, to children of different sexes sharing a bedroom, to daily life, whether it involves doing school work or enjoying recreation, in a space that is so confined that it does not allow for normal living.

It could be said that that situation was common for our parents' generation, and that in fact the population density of inner London has decreased—although it is increasing again. However, there was always some hope in the past, as the market was far more flexible. Today, little hope can be offered to most of my constituents who live in crowded conditions.

The situation is highlighted against a background in which so many things are improving in housing. I cannot remember an election when I have had fewer complaints about housing repairs and conditions, or local authorities and their performance. All those things have improved markedly, and in large measure that is due not only to the local authorities but to the Government, particularly for their decent homes programme, which has transformed entire estates and individual properties and brought them up to a good modern standard after many years of neglect. Even though the programme is not complete, people can now be given a date on which they will have new kitchens and new bathrooms, or their homes will be made weather-tight and more efficient and cheaper to run.

It is also true that several factors that in the past contributed to a lack of social housing have been addressed. One rarely hears about voids; that is, the amount of time it takes to re-let properties. There are initiatives on empty homes, and better allocation policies. Local authorities and housing associations, although they are a mixed bag, have taken action, in so far as they can.

It is right to say that steps have been taken by the Government to introduce more innovative proposals, but not only the Government have been involved. The Mayor of London's policy that 50 per cent. of new units must be affordable is greatly to be welcomed. Indeed, the only thing that I would say against it is that the figure is too low. The move away from building one and two-bedroomed homes to building three-bedroomed and larger homes is also welcome, but as my hon. Friend said, it has not gone far enough.

Proposals such as the relaxation of planning powers to allow extensions to be built on existing properties are often floated. They should be investigated further, as the solution to a problem is often as simple as providing an additional bedroom. I think of a family with an autistic child who lived in a good-quality pre-war council house with a garden. They loved the house and the area, and used the garden for the child's benefit, but they desperately needed an additional bedroom. The solution was staring us in the face, but planning powers at that time simply did not allow an extension.

There are ways of approaching this issue laterally or obliquely, but in the end, as my hon. Friend says, we have to deal with it by supply. That is the only real solution. We know that 54 per cent. of overcrowded families and 60 per cent. of families in temporary accommodation are in London. I have raised that issue publicly and privately with the Minister and her colleagues, and when I ask questions about affordable social housing, I tend to get answers about affordable owner-occupation housing. That is an important issue for young couples who are forced to move out of London and for people who need some form of intermediate housing, but at the end of the day the human misery I see every day and every week in my constituency relates to the lack of supply of affordable rented housing, as my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) said. [Interruption.] I am being prompted to sit down, and I shall do so shortly.

I shall conclude with something slightly more hopeful—and something less hopeful; let us not be too optimistic. One local authority that I know intimately because I was a councillor there for 20 years—until last week—is Hammersmith and Fulham. It has an extremely good record on this issue. It is a very small and congested inner London borough, but between 1998 and 2006, 2,000 units of affordable housing were constructed, which is 70 per cent. of all housing constructed in the borough, with another 1,000 units in the pipeline.

In that borough, 99.3 per cent. of capacity was addressed, compared with 2.8 per cent. in Hillingdon, 3.5 per cent. in Bromley and 3.8 per cent. in Redbridge. Many councils either do not have the skills or the will to do that. They need to have their arms twisted to do it far more, but in the end there are some councils—I am afraid this often does come down to party politics—that are not prepared to do it.

On behalf of my constituents who live in overcrowded conditions, I greatly regret that the control of Hammersmith and Fulham changed hands last Thursday. I looked back at the debate that my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) secured in this Room on 28 March on the subject of overcrowding, and a very intelligent speech was made by the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove), who was very supportive of many initiatives. He based that speech on a visit he had made to a housing development in Hammersmith and Fulham the day before, and said that it was welcomed by residents in the area and all political parties. Every single affordable housing development in the borough of Hammersmith and Fulham was opposed by the Conservative party during the past 20 years. That does not bode well for what will happen there now. The reasons change, but every single development was opposed.

Planning powers and Government intervention are required, but we are talking about not only individual human misery but social engineering. We are talking about the poor and those who live in social housing effectively being told that they are not welcome in the inner city or in areas that are otherwise prosperous. The gulf between the private sector—owner-occupation, and even private rented accommodation—and social housing is so great, it is impossible, even for those on two or three times the average income, to bridge.

The driving need is for an increase in social rented housing and a form of intermediate social housing. Unless that need is addressed, particularly in London, we are not only condemning another generation to live in appalling and inhuman conditions but changing the nature of London as we know it: a multi-racial, multi-class and vibrantly mixed community. That is my fear, and that is why housing will be such an important issue during the next 10 years. It is a big issue. The solution, as my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North said, may be simple, but it is difficult to achieve. I hope that the Government will now give it the attention it deserves.

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) on securing a debate on this important issue. I, along with other hon. Members, particularly from London, have raised this issue on a number of occasions, with questions to the Prime Minister and in Westminster Hall debates. We have tried to highlight the issue by consistently stating that it has been overlooked on the political agenda and in debates about what should be the Government's priorities.

A number of people have made the point that the Government must be clear about what they mean by affordable housing. In the past, it has been interpreted as a need for schemes to assist people to purchase houses. However, for many people in London, even with the discounts available through various Government schemes, those homes are just not affordable. Often, they require a deposit that is out of the affordability range of most people in desperate housing need.

I am relieved that people such as the Chancellor want to see a case made for affordable housing. I am delighted that we are starting to get some response to the debate, but I appeal to the Government to take it on board from us that the clear but unstated hatred of and lack of trust in local authorities to deliver in this vital area must stop. They are the vehicle for change, and they can deliver the social housing that will change communities and provide the opportunities that families are currently being denied. We must remove the roadblocks in the way of local authorities' delivery of that change.

My hon. Friend is right when she says that supply is the issue. I gave figures for my local authority whereby housing applications for 2004-05 were running at similar levels to those of 1999. The acceptance rate was more or less the same, but the figures for those waiting for housing were up by almost 60 per cent. Demand is not growing and outstripping supply—it is the supply that is wrong.

The figures in my area also mask the underlying problem of those who are trapped in their family homes. Every week, my surgery is full of examples of three generations of a family who live in a house that the Labour party built. The grandchildren and the parents of those grandchildren are trapped in that home, and they are unable to move into housing in the same way as their parents were before them. The grandparents are looking to the Labour party and saying, "We want you to build houses for our children, so that they can have the opportunities that we had to bring up our families."

We have seen right to buy decimate the supply of social housing, but the sad fact is that at the other end, we have not seen any investment in the stock—to the point at which local authorities are building almost no properties at all.

There is also a problem with the way in which we construct the finance for building new social housing schemes, and I believe that we can release much of the equity in new-build for reinvestment in the public sector. Too often, when my local authority sells a parcel of its land to the private sector and then negotiates under section 106 a proportion of the development of that land for social housing, the developer walks away with a huge profit from the sale of the rest of the site. I have spoken to housing associations that say, "We can manage those schemes from beginning to end; we can sell the properties, bring the profits back into the public sector and reinvest them in further schemes in the local area."

We are frittering away our resources through the way in which we set up the finances for the development of social housing. We must tell local authorities that we want them to be more innovative, with self-financing schemes in some respects. We could consider placing a proportion of the rents under a prudential scheme, so that they finance some of the interest that must be paid. We must consider those schemes urgently.

Regeneration of the Kidbrooke area in my constituency will result in 4,400 homes where there are currently just under 2,000, and about 2,000 of them will be affordable. Some will be part buy, part rent and others will be for rent through the social sector. However, it is still not too late to have a greater proportion of social housing in that development. Most of the land is in public ownership, and the financing package could be reviewed to provide more social housing for local people who desperately need it.

People in the eastern corridor of London see beautiful houses being built in the Thames gateway and are fed up that they and their children do not have access to those houses because they are priced out. They are frustrated, and demonstrated that frustration clearly in the recent local elections. That fuels the lies of extremists such as the British National party who want to exploit the situation and people's feeling of desperation. They have done that successfully because we left the opportunity open to them and failed to address the problem of housing demand and the people who desperately need housing.

We must expand the housing stock and provide the opportunity for money to be invested in houses to accommodate larger families. In return, families may have to sign away their right to buy for a period or even in perpetuity so that investment in housing can be made with the confidence that it will not disappear from the public sector. We must look at such schemes.

Overcrowding is fuelling antisocial behaviour and is a block to improving standards in education. Young children who are at school will not sit and watch "EastEnders" with their parents if they live in an overcrowded house and sleep in a bedroom with their younger sister or brother. They will go out on the streets with their friends. They have nowhere to do their homework. We must cut the vicious circle. Only a Labour Government will deal with the problem and people need to receive that message loud and clear. The Government's duty is to tell people that housing is a priority and that Labour will deliver for them once and for all.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs Janet Dean (in the Chair): Order. I remind hon. Members that they have only until half-past 10.

10.27 am

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): Time is short so I shall be brief. I refer hon. Members to my Adjournment debate on 28 March for comments about Hackney, where overcrowding contributes to a population churn of more than 40 per cent. in some areas, which has a disastrous effect on public services.

I want to focus on some key points that I would like the Minister to address. Why is there no explicit measure of efficiency for the Housing Corporation based on the cost of people living in a home rather than the cost per house? That defies common sense and has an impact on all the issues that hon. Members have raised. Will she give a commitment that bid support in future will reflect the number of people living in a home rather than the cost per property?

There is also a lack of targeting for large-bedroomed houses in the current London housing strategy and I should be grateful if the Minister commented on that also. Will she look at Housing Corporation funding rules, because we have the crazy situation locally where for every pound that a local authority provides to a housing association the Housing Corporation removes a pound? That defies common sense and needs to be tackled.

I must mention the test case in my constituency concerning the Haggerston West and Kingsland estate. We are hoping to receive good news about providing more three and four-bedroomed properties after a long campaign of more than 10 years by residents, myself and local councillors, particularly Councillor Jamie Carswell, who have fought to ensure that residents receive the housing they need rather than the one and two-bedroomed properties that Treasury rules seem to impose on them.

10.29 am

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Although my contribution will last only a minute so that the Minister can speak, everything that has been said applies to the rest of England. I stress that a massive housing shortage is building up in other parts of England. We must not assume that problems of low pay, special needs, inflation in the private sector and the inadequacies of that sector do not also apply to the rest of England; they do.

I have three pleas for the Minister. One is that she should deal properly with overcrowding, and bring forward consultation on standards, because we cannot let the shortage of housing continue to force people to live in such unacceptable conditions of overcrowding; also, perhaps she could ensure that proper consultation takes place about special needs and the impact of that issue on housing standards.

My second plea is that the Minister should again examine the preventing homelessness agenda. I believe that it is leading to a real problem of hidden homelessness. People are being diverted into private sector renting, and although they should be diverted after their needs have been assessed, they are being diverted as soon as they apply, so that they never appear on the figures. I am very concerned about that. I am also concerned about standards of training among some of the staff who do the work.

My third plea is that the Minister should attend to what is happening in growth areas such as mine. Lots of new housing is being built in Northampton, but it is all private sector housing and developers are subject to a requirement to provide percentages of affordable, not social, housing. As part of the growth agenda we need to ensure that there are, built in, adequate supplies of social housing to rent, not just shared equity properties, about which something has already been said. It should be understood that there is an economic factor. We need a good housing mix in the new communities that are being built.

I hope that the brevity of my remarks will not be taken to reflect my view of the severity of the problems.

10.31 am

Mr. Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): I shall try to keep my remarks short to allow the Minister as much time as possible to respond; I am aware that Labour Members may want to raise additional points during her response.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) on securing the debate. I know that she has long had an interest in the issues, and has been raising them for some time. I also congratulate the Minister on keeping her post during the recent turbulent period for the Government. I am delighted that she is still speaking on these issues.

Decent housing should be a right, particularly for children but also for all citizens of the country. Poor housing leads to poor health and decreased opportunities in education and employment. In the past century the supply of social housing meant that people who were unable to enter the private renting or home ownership sectors had a realistic chance of being housed. In a time of prosperity such as we are now enjoying, why are so many more people in the UK suffering from inadequate housing, or, indeed, homelessness?

The fact is that successive Governments have sold off the vital resource of social housing for rent, without replacing it. Capital has been moved from housing as capital receipts have disappeared into the Treasury; of £5.5 billion realised from sales of council housing only £3.3 billion was granted through the Housing Corporation in the 2004-06 grant round.

The effects in human terms of housing shortages can be seen every day, and hon. Members have referred to individual cases from their constituencies. In rural areas such as my constituency of North Cornwall there is little prospect for most families of staying in their home village or small town. We heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who is no longer in his place, and from the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), about instances in their areas. Despite excellent work by housing associations, local authorities and charities to raise the issues and to squeeze the maximum amount of affordable housing and social rented housing from new developments, the shortage of properties to rent is still keenly felt.

In addition to the effect on individual families and households of such circumstances, communities become unsustainable. Vital services suffer, with falls in school rolls and closures of post offices and shops.

[Mr. Dan Rogerson]

Voluntary bodies such as the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, the coastguard and retained fire services find it hard to recruit in the areas that they serve, as the age profile changes, with a bias in favour of the capital-rich who can afford to live there.

That frustration is alienating people from the political process. Electors are losing faith in the Government's ability to deliver solutions. We have already heard how that alienation has had another dangerous effect in urban areas. In the recent local elections, we saw a small but significant rise in support for far-right organisations and representatives. In some areas, people who have traditionally lived in strong communities have found themselves unable to do so as the housing shortage pushes them away. Such people are looking for someone who will listen or at least be seen to be listening. They hear a message from an organisation that says that it will work outside the political establishment, which has patently failed to deliver. That offers a scapegoat in other communities that suffer from inadequate housing, as we have heard. My father's roots are in the east end of London and my grandfather worked in the docks for the whole of his working life, so I am familiar with the strong communities that exist in the east of London.

The lack of replacement housing has also been felt in the type of social housing that remains. The right to buy has taken away the larger homes, as well as homes in areas with better transport links and areas that were desirable for all sorts of reasons. The choice-based letting system has reduced the choice for tenants. It has also reduced the flexibility for local authorities to allow for transfers in the system, and for moves up and down the ladder of dwelling size.

The 2007 spending review must begin to address that problem in a more meaningful way. At the end of last year, the number of families waiting for a council house stood at more than 1.5 million, which is a 50 per cent. increase since Labour came to power in 1997. Figures provided by Shelter, in its excellent and shocking report "Building Hope", show that 116,000 homeless children are trapped in temporary accommodation. The Government have set themselves the target of halving that figure by 2010, but the number of new social rented homes that will be delivered on current trends will not allow that to be achieved. Further research undertaken at the behest of Shelter by the Centre for Housing and Planning Research at Cambridge university says that we will need an extra 30,000 new social rented homes each year between 2008 and 2011 to meet that urgent need.

The lack of accommodation is forcing people to move into inadequate housing in the private sector that is often entirely inappropriate to need. Rents there are higher and housing benefit cannot cover the cost. That puts pressure on the Treasury, and the hon. Member for Banbury asked whether that was a sensible use of Treasury money.

Ms Keeble: Will the hon. Gentleman also reflect on the fact that private sector tenancies do not provide security? For a single parent with two children to be homeless after six months in one of those short tenancies is a real problem.

Mr. Rogerson: Absolutely. The hon. Lady makes a good point. There was a case in my constituency recently in which a young family who had just celebrated the birth of their first child were served with a notice to quit their shorthold tenancy. That was an incredibly stressful time for them. Despite the council's best efforts to look after that family, they simply joined a list of so many people waiting for housing.

The lack of accommodation pushes people into poverty and can also keep them reliant on relatives for temporary accommodation. We have heard from Labour Members about such situations. Such accommodation is called temporary but is, in effect, semi-permanent. Overcrowding is worsened, and that is not helped by antiquated definitions that do not take account of the real needs of children and parents for privacy and space to work and play. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) for her Adjournment debate earlier in the year, about which we have already heard some comments.

Future developments to increase the overall supply of housing may allow the capital-rich individuals and families to benefit further by taking advantage of new market housing or even moving into buy to let. Significant housing investment could have a dramatic effect on the lives of people and their communities. The letter from the Prime Minister to the new Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government on her appointment says:

> "Thirdly, you will need to deliver the Government's policy in response to the Barker review of housing supply. Helping hard working families and first time buyers get their foot on the housing ladder should be a key priority."

Obviously, it is good to hear the Government setting that out. Even if one is being generous to the Prime Minister and his comments—not many have been in recent days—that letter did not appear to say much about social rented housing; it discussed families getting a foot on the housing ladder. I would like the Minister to say more about the emphasis that will be placed on new housing.

The hon. Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North, in her excellent opening speech, discussed creating a genuine mix of tenure to ensure the availability of social housing in all areas, urban and rural. She made some excellent points. Again, my party and I would agree that new investment must not be financed by rent hikes. The affordability of such properties is the key to their value in meeting the need. Several hon. Members have pointed out the difference between affordable housing and social rented housing, and I was glad to hear them do so because it is a key point.

In the 2007 comprehensive spending review, the Government have an opportunity to turn around years of underinvestment in affordable housing. The Treasury's website states that the review involves > "a more strategic approach to asset management and investment decisions, ensuring the UK is equipped with the infrastructure needed to support both public service delivery and the productivity and flexibility of the wider economy."

What could be a more important investment decision underpinning education, health, regeneration and the needs of the economy than setting forth an ambitious plan for new housing appropriate to the needs of the people? The Chancellor has spoken a great deal about renewal; this is his opportunity to act.

10.41 am

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) on raising this topic. Every time I come to debates on housing, Members crowd in, trying to make a contribution. It strikes me that the subject ought to be debated on the Floor of the House, perhaps in a full-day debate. I know that the Whip is not in his place, but I hope that the Minister takes the message back that housing is a live issue. When Members of Parliament discuss housing, one can see that to them the subject is not just statistics; they talk about families sitting in front of Members in their surgeries. Nothing is more frustrating for us than to hear about the continuing need of families who want housing. We know that we will write letters, phone people up and follow up cases, but there is probably little hope of such people accessing the housing that they need. One of the worrying effects of the frustration that people feel was seen in the local elections—people voting for the British National party and so on.

One of the least expected consequences of the 1997 election was that the building of social housing declined substantially. As a Conservative Member, I did not expect that to happen. Although the number of social housing completions is now picking up, the scale of the problem makes that a drop in the ocean. We know that there is a major problem. Owner-occupation, higher house prices and the world of equity withdrawal is one side of a coin that leaves many people who cannot afford to get into that world with difficulties in accessing housing. The homelessness figures and the fact that more than 100,000 families are in temporary accommodation show that there is a real problem. The number of first-time buyers has collapsed from a normal yearly average of about 500,000 to about 320,000 last year, and those who cannot afford to become owner-occupiers become those on the list for social housing.

I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) joined the debate to provide the shire counties angle. There is no Member of this House who does not have housing problems in their constituency. One or two Members mentioned the economics of housing, but I am not sure that there are any; it simply seems to be a complicated and complex area. My hon. Friend's suggestion that we examine the whole issue in relation to the way in which housing benefit works is eminently sensible.

Council housing has been little mentioned in today's debate. I remember a debate in Westminster Hall on council housing and the fourth way. Sometimes the former Office of the Deputy Prime Minister was a little more concerned about stock transfer than about dealing with council housing. One of the interesting things that I drew from the Library brief is that the demand for council housing has picked up substantially, by more than 50 per cent. In the south-east of England the relevant figure is 77 per cent. and in London it is 71 per cent. Despite that, there are 700,000 voids. Although a perfect system is not possible, if 1.5 million people are waiting for housing and there are 700,000 empty properties, it should be a great priority of public policy to fill the voids where possible.

Clive Efford: Will the hon. Gentleman also support a move to allow local authorities to purchase private sector properties that are left vacant for a long time? In my constituency, a number of properties have been left vacant for too long and have become derelict, but the local authority could bring them back into use.

Mr. Syms: The hon. Gentleman has put his finger on the problem that many empty homes are not accessed by the local community. I am in the fortunate position of being a spokesman for a party with no policies—apart from on the environment—but we are undertaking a detailed policy review. We are also a very broad-based party, so if the hon. Gentleman has interesting ideas on housing that he wants to feed into that review, they will no doubt be taken into account. Given the pressures that we face, particularly in London, it is difficult for communities to be unable to access the many empty homes that they see. There are many initiatives to deal with the problem, including ones to bring flats over shops and elsewhere back into use.

A lot more can be done on many of the estates that have been criticised. There could be more mixed tenure on some of them, and Castle Vale in Birmingham is an example of what can be done. If we manage estates and put a bit of tender care and investment into them, we can make them more attractive places for people to live. Design was also mentioned, and we cannot talk about housing without focusing on design and what can be done to improve some of the existing housing stock.

There is a major problem, which needs substantially more debate. There are no easy answers, however, and public policy must include a range of measures to deal with the issue. None the less, all hon. Members are very much aware of the pressures faced by many families in our constituencies.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Yvette Cooper): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North (Ms Buck) on securing the debate and on her tireless work on housing issues over many years. I certainly welcome the expertise and help that she has given me over the past year or so while I have been working on housing issues. I know that she will continue to campaign on them in the House and in her constituency.

As hon. Members will know, the Chancellor said that social housing will be a priority in the coming spending review, so the debate is timely. They will also know that we have made it clear that we need to build more homes for the next generation. That means more social housing, more shared equity housing and more private housing. Although I shall talk mainly about social housing and the issues that hon. Members have raised, I should make it clear at the beginning that the need for more social housing to be built should not be met at the expense of the need for more shared equity housing and more private housing to be built. We need all three.

We must be clear that the long-term, underlying problem—whether we are talking about social housing in London, affordability in Northamptonshire, or the issues that have been raised in respect of Banbury and other parts of the country—is the gap between housing demand and housing supply. In the past 30 years, we have seen a 30 per cent. increase in the number of households and a 50 per cent. drop in the level of new house building. That is unsustainable. Current projections show that about 200,000 new households will be formed each year as a result of an ageing, growing population and, primarily, as a result of more people living alone, but we build about 150,000 to 160,000 new homes every year. That gap is simply unsustainable, and if it persists, the proportion of 30-year-old couples who can afford their own home will decline from more than 50 per cent. today to nearer 30 per cent. in 20 years. If we think that there are pressures on social housing now, imagine what they will be like in 20 years if we do not build the additional homes that we need.

Many people who are waiting for social housing would prefer to be able to buy their own home or a share of their own home, but they will not be able to afford to do so if long-term house prices keep rising beyond their reach. The wider issue, therefore, is that we need to build new homes for the next generation. That has been controversial in many parts of the country and with other political parties, but we must recognise the country's long-term needs and the huge and serious consequences in terms of the demand for social housing if we do not address them. There will be problems with overcrowding, affordability and constraints on people's aspirations for the next generation and the future if we do not address that long-term need.

Clearly, we need to proceed in a sensible way. We must ensure that we fund the necessary infrastructure and increase environmental standards as we do so, but I say to local authorities across the country, including the London boroughs, that they need to recognise their critical role in the planning and housing systems and in supporting the new homes that we need for the future. That is why the Mayor wants to increase the number of new homes in London, and why the Thames Gateway development and other growth areas are so important.

Jeremy Corbyn: Is the Minister's Department prepared to intervene in major developments in London or elsewhere if there is insufficient housing for affordable rent included in the scheme, and to insist that there should be such housing? Is she prepared to ensure that major applications are called in for that purpose?

Yvette Cooper: We have a call-in process, and on occasion we call in developments on that basis if there are concerns about the level of affordability not meeting the requirements of the local plan and national planning guidance. Although we have those powers, however, we think that responsibility for that lies primarily with local authorities. It is important to recognise that there is considerable flexibility within the planning system that many local authorities do not use. They should use their planning powers to support and promote development and good design, and to ensure that there is a proper mix of affordable housing, including social housing.

I shall talk about social housing in particular, because that has been the main focus of the debate. As part of our preparation for the spending review we are conducting extensive analysis of the future need for social housing and considering not only overall supply and the level of need, but aspects such as mixed communities, the location of social housing, work incentives and the problems of high levels of worklessness in large social housing estates. Some work has been on that done by Kate Barker, and some by Cambridge academics and Shelter. We are also looking at the backlog of need for social housing and people in temporary accommodation and the need to ensure that they can have settled and secure accommodation.

Hon. Members will be aware that we have increased investment and the number of new social homes by 50 per cent. over a three-year period, and we have said that we need to go further. We must recognise that there have been major calls on housing capital investment, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Slaughter) said. In 1997 we inherited a £19 million backlog of repairs and maintenance and there was a need for a massive programme of investment in our social and council housing across the country. Had we not introduced the decent homes programme, we would be here today debating hon. Members' constituency cases of people living in homes without central heating and with no prospect of getting it, or in homes in a shocking state of repair with the windows falling down and leaks in the roof, and no prospect of getting them repaired. We are not having those debates because we have invested so much in decent housing.

Mr. Love: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for giving way and for her comments so far. We talk about building 10,000 homes this year, but everyone knows that that will not be achieved; Barker suggested building 17,000 homes a year, and the Cambridge study suggested an additional 10,000. Can the Minister reassure Labour Members that the Department recognises that there is a substantial gap there? Until that issue is addressed, problem cases will continue to come to our surgeries, and, perhaps more important, housing will become a much larger political issue, and we may well face the consequences of that in the next general election.

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. We have said that we need to increase social housing. We are already increasing the level of new build of social housing, but we have made it clear that we need to go further and that that will be a priority for the spending review. We have taken Kate Barker's recommendations extremely seriously, but we are doing further work on the issue to assess what levels of investment will be needed in future. That is why I said the debate is timely: it can feed into the work not only in the Department but across the Government.

Ms Keeble: On the point about central heating, there need to be clear specifications as to what is acceptable heating. I deal with many cases in which if people have storage heaters or if a previous tenant, perhaps an old person, said that they did not want central heating, the house is ring-fenced and does not get the improvements that it needs. There are still questions about what qualifies for some of the specifications, and the problems remain.

Yvette Cooper: We have set straightforward, decent homes standards, but I am happy to talk further to my hon. Friend about the detail.

We must recognise that construction costs and, in particular, land costs have increased. Part of the reason why land costs have increased is that there is a rising housing market at a time when we are simply not making available enough land and building enough homes. The land costs feed into social housing costs, creating pressure on the social housing budget. That is why all these issues must be seen as part of a wider issue about making available land for new homes and tackling the pressures in the housing market.

We recognise that we are left with significant challenges. We need to increase supply and consider social housing as well as shared equity and private housing. That requires investment, which creates serious challenges for Opposition parties, given their position on the third fiscal rule. Investment in infrastructure is also required, which is why the consultation on matters such as the planning gain supplement is such an important underpinning. Again, that is a challenge for Opposition parties.

I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Clive Efford) that we are hostile to the role of local councils. I have said before that I believe they play an important role in the planning system. I also believe that their role in housing is hugely important. I am not talking simply about the work that they can do through section 106 agreements and partnerships with registered social landlords. Clearly, there are wide differences between the levels of social housing that some local councils are able to achieve through section 106 agreements and those that others can achieve. However, let me say to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) that most of central Government's funding for new homes goes through housing associations, because they can lever in additional independent investment so that we get up to 40 per cent. more homes for the same money. That is worth doing at a time when we need to increase supply.

We could use local authorities far more to create more supply and we are considering a series of ways to do that, such as local authorities using their own land to support new homes—both social housing and shared equity housing, interestingly. We are working with some of the local authorities in London that were previously under Labour control. We hope that, although they have changed hands, they will continue to be interested in this issue, but we do not yet know whether they will be.

We are also examining the use of housing benefit. Hon. Members asked about housing benefit and the fact that, particularly where people are in temporary accommodation in high-cost areas, a lot of money is paid through housing benefit. What more can we do to bring those costs down and use the savings to invest in increasing social housing? We are providing support for an interesting pilot programme in Newham, which involves, in effect, buying back properties to increase social housing over time to help people out of temporary accommodation.

Several hon. Members referred to overcrowding, which we take very seriously. With my hon. Friend the Member for Regent's Park and Kensington, North, I have visited families in very serious circumstances. We must do the consultation on the overcrowding standards, but that will not solve the problem. We must consider a much wider overcrowding strategy. Overcrowding is particularly a London issue, as we can see when we compare the figures for London with those for areas outside London. Overcrowding makes a big difference in London, which is why we are working with the Greater London authority to try to integrate approaches to overcrowding into homelessness intervention strategy.

Mrs. Janet Dean (in the Chair): Order. We must now move on to the next debate.

Migrant Domestic Workers

11 am

Chris McCafferty (Calder Valley) (Lab): May I say at the outset what a great pleasure it is to be speaking in this Adjournment debate with you in the Chair, Mrs. Dean?

Mrs. Janet Dean (in the Chair): Order. Will Members who are leaving do so quietly, please?

Chris McCafferty: I requested this debate because I am concerned that the Government's new proposals, part of the "controlling our borders: making migration work for Britain" programme, will have a devastating effect on migrant domestic workers, who make up one of the most vulnerable groups of workers in the UK.

Unfortunately, I believe that the proposals will establish legal channels allowing migrant domestic workers to be brought into the UK for the purpose of exploitation. By removing even the most basic employment rights and leaving them powerless before abusive employers, they will effectively legalise trafficking, which I am certain the Government do not intend.

In fact, the proposals are a complete reversal of the Government's previous policy, which was specifically intended to protect vulnerable workers. Migrant domestic workers are an exceptional category under immigration law. Since 1998, an employer has been able to apply for a migrant domestic worker to obtain a special visa. The rules of the visa allow the worker to change employer—a right that many other visa categories do not have. In order to qualify for the visa, migrant domestic workers must have been working with their employer for a minimum of one year outside the UK. When the employer applies for a tourist or a settlement visa, they can also apply for a migrant domestic worker visa for their employee. At present, 80 per cent. of migrant domestic workers accompany tourists, and 20 per cent. accompany those with settlement visas. The law was introduced to encourage wealthy foreign nationals to come to the UK and help boost the UK economy.

About 10,000 migrant domestic worker visas were issued in 2003-04. If, as proposed, the visa were curtailed and became a six-month, non-renewable, non-transferable visa, the impact would be devastating. Migrant domestic workers who enter the UK accompanying their employer can leave that employer if they are abused or exploited. That gives them vital protection against violence, mistreatment and exploitation. They receive basic protection under UK employment law, and they are entitled to the national minimum wage, statutory holiday pay and a notice period. As a worker, their visa is renewed annually, and renewal is dependent on the migrant domestic worker being in full-time employment as a domestic worker in a private household. There is also a right to apply for settlement and for family reunification.

Those rights were won after 10 long years of organising and campaigning by migrant domestic workers themselves, with the support of the labour movement, trade unions and the British public. When the Labour Government came to power, they did not forget the commitment that they made in opposition, bringing migrant domestic workers out of the shadows of illegality and into the light.

Unfortunately, although the regulations provide some protection, they do not mean that employers stop abusing their domestic workers. Kalayaan, an organisation that helps migrant domestic workers and campaigns on their behalf, has documented the abuse that occurs within the relationship between migrant domestic workers and their employers. Among 114 workers registered at Kalayaan, during the two sample months of August 2004 and August 2005, 75 per cent. reported psychological abuse; 34 per cent. reported physical abuse; over 57 per cent. did not have their own room and reported sleeping in public spaces, such as the living room, kitchen or hallway or shared rooms with children, ensuring that they were always "on call"; and 40 per cent. reported having to sleep on the floor. Kalayaan registers approximately 400 migrant domestic workers per year who have left their employers because of abuse. That is obviously just the tip of the iceberg. Many are unaware of the organisation, or their rights, and are too scared to seek help.

Under the current system, those workers have been able to escape abuse by leaving their original employer, provided they find employment of a similar nature and are able to maintain their immigration status as a domestic worker. The Home Office paper on the points-based migration system, as it was presented to Parliament in March, does not include migrant domestic workers. However, the draft proposals presented to Kalayaan by the immigration and nationality directorate show that it will restrict domestic workers accompanying their employer to a maximum of six months, with no right to change employer and no route to settlement.

The proposals raise the most serious concerns. First, they will effectively legalise trafficking. If these proposals come into force, migrant domestic workers will be outside the managed migration system. Instead, they will come to the UK as business visitors, tied to their employer for a maximum of six months. They will have no option to change employer during this time, or to renew their visa, which will make it virtually impossible to challenge any maltreatment or abuse. Indeed, it may encourage it. That is in direct contravention of the Home Office's stated policy to protect victims of trafficking, and to stop trafficking "at source".

Secondly, the proposals will lead to an increase in abuse and illegality. Taking away the provision to renew their visa or to change employers, as well as making the employer responsible—which it would—for ensuring that migrant domestic workers leave the UK at the end of their stay, will dramatically increase the power that the employer has over the worker. That will inevitably lead to increased levels of abuse and more migrant domestic workers will be forced underground where they will be further exploited by employers taking advantage of their irregular status.

Finally, the proposals will remove full access to employment law. Despite the immigration and nationality directorate stating that migrant domestic workers will be recognised as workers under the new scheme, it cannot be possible in practice to access UK employment law within the six months allowed, without the right to find alternative employment. As soon as migrant domestic workers leave an employer, they will be homeless and destitute with no right to support themselves in work. As I understand it, there is a belief in the Home Office that employers settling in the UK will probably keep their migrant domestic worker for six months until they find a new one in the UK. They will then send the migrant domestic worker back home. Whether they are sent back to the employer's country or their own is not yet clear.

Many employers hold their workers' passports illegally. Last year, I introduced a Bill that would have made the retention of another person's passport illegal. It is not yet illegal here, and employers often hold their workers' passports. There is a danger that migrant domestic workers will not be sent home but will be held here, completely illegally, for much longer.

Six months is not an effective time to mount a challenge under employment law if an employer is abusing staff. I am aware that the Home Office is seeking to identify abusive employers at the port of entry, which is excellent. However, migrant domestic workers have revealed in confidence to workers at Kalayaan that they are trained to answer such questions at United Kingdom embassies.

Changes to the migrant domestic worker visa mean that employees would be completely tied to the employer. Many employers already believe that they have ownership of their staff, and withhold their passports or keep them locked away in their houses. Many migrant domestic workers are terrified when they seek help from Kalayaan or other organisations.

Employers often tell such workers that they will be illegal if they leave their employer, that they will be deported, and that immigration will seek them out. Unfortunately, if the migrant domestic worker visa is not continued, that may well become true, and trafficking in such workers will effectively have been legitimised, leaving employers in complete control.

In my experience, migrant domestic workers are among the most conservative groups of people one could ever meet. They want to do things correctly, to pay their taxes and to live within the rules. They are not scroungers. This ill-conceived policy will have a devastating impact if it is enacted as it stands.

I fully accept that managed migration is in the interests of the UK and I support the Government's policy of delivering a system that they describe as firm but fair, simpler, more transparent and more rigorous—a system that will benefit our economy and protect our borders. However, over the generations migrant workers have enriched the UK both economically and culturally. We need to ensure that the UK economy can safely continue to benefit from the input of migrant workers, and that they can live here safely.

The fact is that the abuse or exploitation of migrant workers, who have every right to live and work here, continues apace at the hands of unscrupulous employers. A major challenge for the Government is to ensure that those vulnerable workers receive the full protection of our employment law. I therefore request that the Government review their own evidence—evidence that resulted in changes to the existing immigration law in 1998—in order to afford protection to migrant domestic workers. As a minimum, the existing provisions that protect the human rights of that marginalised and vulnerable category of workers must be maintained.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Joan Ryan): It is a pleasure to respond to this Adjournment debate, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Calder Valley (Chris McCafferty) on securing it. The debate will probably stay in my memory for a long time to come, as it is the first time that I have spoken for the Government as an Under-Secretary of State.

Chris McCafferty: I congratulate my hon. Friend on her promotion, which is well deserved.

Joan Ryan: I thank my hon. Friend.

I welcome the opportunity to reply for the Government on this important subject. I take seriously my hon. Friend's concern, which she has expressed on a number of occasions. She raised some important points, which I wish to address.

Before I respond to the debate, however, I shall begin with an overview of the Government's approach to managing migration to the United Kingdom and thus put in context the position of those who are the subject of the debate and who are provided for under current immigration rules.

The Government are—and have been—very clear that migration makes a substantial contribution to economic growth. It helps to fill gaps in the labour market, including key public services, such as health and education. Migration also increases investment, innovation and entrepreneurship in the UK. Culturally, we are enriched by people with diverse backgrounds from other countries. With an expanded EU, an accessible and mobile work force are already contributing to our growing economy, closing many gaps experienced by employers. Our starting point is that employers should look first to recruit from the UK and the expanded EU before recruiting migrants from outside the EU.

Migration needs to be properly managed. It is understandable that people migrate to seek a better life for themselves and their families, but that can leave settled populations, including many in the UK, concerned about the impact on jobs, public services and their way of life. The system should therefore be focused primarily on bringing in migrants who are highly skilled, or bringing in migrants to do key jobs that cannot be filled from the domestic labour force or from the EU. The system should also be robust against abuse. Only those of benefit to the UK should be admitted, and once here they must comply with the conditions of their leave.

That, then, is the underlying strategy. On that basis, we outlined our proposals for a five-tier managed migration system in the Command Paper "A Points-Based System: Making Migration Work for Britain", which was presented to this House on 7 March. The new points-based system forms part of our five-year strategy for asylum and immigration, which was published in February 2004. A thorough consultation on the points-based system was undertaken following the publication of a consultation document, "Selective Admission: Making Migration Work for Britain", and those proposals were generally well received by stakeholders and the media.

The aim of the new system is to develop a more efficient and transparent migration system, which sets out clearly who is permitted to come to the UK and why. We want to design a system that is better able to identify and attract those migrants who have most to contribute to the UK—one that offers a more efficient, transparent and objective process and which improves compliance while reducing scope for abuse. As part of that work we have reviewed existing routes for employment, training and study with a view to identifying which are of most benefit to the UK. Underpinning the new migration system will be a five-tier framework replacing more than 80 work and study routes. That will help people to understand how the system works and will direct applicants to the category that is most appropriate for them.

Tier 1 will cover those highly skilled individuals who can contribute to growth and productivity. Tier 2 will be for skilled workers with a job offer, who can fill gaps in the UK labour force. Tier 3 will provide for limited numbers of low-skilled workers needed to fill temporary labour shortages. Tier 4 will accommodate overseas students and tier 5 will cover what we describe as youth mobility and temporary workers: people who are allowed to work in the UK for a limited period, primarily to satisfy non-economic objectives. Examples might be a teacher on an exchange scheme or a sportsperson coming here to take part in a charity event.

We also intend to set up an independent body to identify employment shortages across all sectors of the economy, known as the skills advisory body. It will build on existing structures and expertise—in particular the skills for business network, which is funded in part by the Department for Education and Skills. Shortages identified by the skills advisory body will inform Government decisions on the use of migrant labour within tiers 2 and 3 of the points-based system.

I shall turn now to the position of overseas domestic workers within this framework. Overseas domestic workers accompanying their employer to the UK are generally low-skilled. As I have explained, our policy under the points-based system is to phase out low-skilled migration in response to the number of workers available from the newly enlarged EU. We expect that in most cases EU countries should be able to provide us with adequate labour in this respect. However, as I said earlier, tier 3 of the points-based system may provide for limited numbers of low-skilled workers to fill specific temporary labour shortages where those are identified by the independent skills advisory body. We have also proposed that in the Command Paper.

We do not currently have any evidence of a shortage of domestic workers. Were the skills advisory body to identify one, and were we to decide that immigration was the appropriate response, we could set up a quota-based, operator-led, time-limited route under tier 3 for overseas domestic workers with countries with which the UK has effective returns agreements. However, admission on that basis would be temporary. If employers want to employ low-skilled domestic staff on a long-term basis, they can look to the resident and EU labour market. There is evidence that that is what they are doing. More than 14,000 nationals of the new member states registered under the worker registration scheme as cleaners and domestic staff between May 2004 and 31 December 2005. We will not therefore be providing a route for overseas domestic workers under the points-based system. Those who are skilled and can meet the relevant requirements may be able to come to the UK under tier 2. We will also be making very limited provision for those currently referred to as domestic workers to accompany another visitor to the UK in certain defined circumstances, under the arrangements for business visitors. An example of that might be where a family on holiday in the UK want to bring their nanny with them.

We of course recognise that there are real concerns about abuse and exploitation of overseas domestic workers, and we will continue to make every effort to protect migrant workers in general from abuse while they are in the UK. Were domestic workers to be provided for under tier 3, we would of course need to ensure that they were not being exploited, and we would work with trade unions and others to achieve that.

My hon. Friend raised some specific points about abuse. It is important to state again that we recognise the concerns about abuse and exploitation of domestic workers in private households. However, immigration is not the way to deal with that. We are dealing with it in a number of ways. To understand how we are addressing matters such as abuse and trafficking, which my hon. Friend mentioned, it is important that what we are discussing today is seen in conjunction with other Government legislation. We have introduced legislation comprehensively to criminalise trafficking in human beings. The Sexual Offences Act 2003 introduced wide-ranging offences covering trafficking into, within and out of the UK for any sexual exploitation. A new offence of trafficking people for exploitation covering forced labour, removal of organs and the trafficking of vulnerable people including children is included in the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004. The maximum punishment for all these offences is 14 years' imprisonment. That shows the seriousness with which the Government view these types of offences to do with abuse and exploitation.

We also have the Reflex joint taskforce, and with the establishment of the Serious Organised Crime Agency, the UK will continue to focus on targeting the organised crime groups that cause the most harm. We recently launched a public consultation on our strategy to combat trafficking and are committed to developing a national action plan to provide a comprehensive, end-to-end approach covering different elements, from prevention, including demand reduction, through investigating and prosecuting traffickers, to protecting and supporting victims.

My hon. Friend mentioned interviews at port of entry. We are not in a position at present to insist that the national minimum wage is paid to certain categories of workers, within which overseas domestic workers would fall, but we do attempt through interview to establish terms and conditions that meet the requirements that we would expect for all domestic workers in the UK, not just overseas domestic workers.

We are reviewing future requirements for admitting domestic workers to the UK and have already offered to liaise with Kalayaan, which has worked very hard on the issue. Options might include retaining the existing requirement for employment to have existed for 12 months prior to coming to the UK, and insisting that the domestic worker is paid at least the national minimum wage. Those useful discussions would deal with points that my hon. Friend raised.

On access to employment law, we are working with the Department of Trade and Industry on the protections that are available in respect of business visitors under UK employment law, but we must bear in mind that they will be covered by other aspects of UK legislation such as the Human Rights Act 1998.

In conclusion, I hope that I have clearly set out the position for the House and addressed some of the concerns that my hon. Friend raised eloquently and with feeling. After a lengthy process of review and consultation, we have set out plans for winding up the quota-based schemes for admitting low-skilled workers for specific sectors, in light of the availability of labour from an expanded EU. Alongside that, we will not in the future provide a specific route for overseas domestic workers, who are generally low-skilled, under the points-based system.

I hope that I have given some assurance to my hon. Friend about the Government's commitment to protect all workers from abuse and about our awareness of the issues that she raised. Furthermore, although we shall not pursue a policy of offering overseas domestic workers from outside the EU a route for settlement, we remain strongly committed to dealing with any abuse to which such workers could be subjected.

Cancer Services (Essex)

2.30 pm

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of cancer services in south Essex, which is a subject that I have been working on over the past few months with my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), for Castle Point (Bob Spink) and for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), co-ordinating some of the activity in south Essex on our collective behalf.

I am acutely aware that cancer is an emotive subject, with one in three people directly affected by it and virtually all of us indirectly affected. It was with some trepidation that I began to engage with the subject matter locally, but the bottom line is that, without being sensationalist, I genuinely believe that there will be a materially worse service in south Essex as a result of the changes that are taking place.

Those changes are the merger of the South Essex cancer network with the Mid Anglia network. I shall give a bit of the history of what has been happening. As far back as the mid-1980s, there was a threat of merger, which disappeared following a local campaign. The Calman Hine report in 1995 rightly suggested introducing cancer networks, and a year later the South Essex cancer network was created. In 2001-02, the network came under threat and mergers were proposed across the whole of Essex. There was a lot of local debate, and a large campaign was run by the Southend Echo and a number of colleagues who were in the House at the time to keep hands off the cancer network and to leave it as it was.

This morning, I was reading the papers from back then and Mike Richards, the cancer tsar, said that he could barely come to the House of Commons without someone mentioning Southend to him. He kindly agreed to come down to Southend and decided that it was right for south Essex and for cancer patients that the merger did not go ahead at that point. More recently, in December 2005, the strategic health authority started a consultation, which although it was extensive was fundamentally flawed and a bit of a sham. I will explain the distinction later and go into the consultation process in more detail.

In terms of parliamentary activity, we have been doing an awful lot. We spoke in the Opposition-day debate on cancer, have met the strategic health authority a number of times and a petition has gained about 5,000 signatures. Collectively and individually, we have made formal consultation submissions to the SHA and, of course, as one would expect, we have been corresponding with the main players and have visited the cancer centre a number of times. Unfortunately, on 29 March the SHA decided to press ahead with the change. Since then I have tabled a number of written questions and written to the Secretary of State. The Minister was kind enough to reply to those, and I shall go into those matters on which I was disappointed by the lack of detail in the reply and those on which I was looking to tease out whether the merger would be good for patients. The case has certainly not been proved and, on balance, would be adverse at the moment.

[James Duddridge]

In summary, the South Essex cancer network was created 10 years ago. I hope that the Minister will consider not effectively abolishing it through merger. The network covers a population of approximately 730,000 and the main hospitals of Southend and Basildon. In many ways, the merger has been brought about because of activities outside south Essex, specifically the decision by Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire to pull Ipswich out of the Mid Anglia network to the north. Crucially, the South Essex network had no involvement in that decision but was fundamentally affected by the knock-on effect.

The South Essex and Mid Anglia networks are two of the three smallest cancer networks in the United Kingdom. I wrote to the Minister asking for details of the population size, but I could not get definitive figures, so perhaps she can correct me and give some figures on the smaller cancer networks.

I want to prove, first, that there was no need for change, secondly, that one size does not fit all, in terms of cancer network sizes, and, thirdly, that the consultation was fundamentally flawed and that the decision had been taken well before the start of the consultation. I also have a number of questions that I hope that the Minister will answer either today or in writing, as she considers appropriate.

There are things that I shall not touch on. Essex cancer services is a broad subject, and I shall focus primarily on the network and the merger. I shall not talk in detail about changes to upper gastrointestinal, urological and head and neck cancer services, although other Members may want to contribute on those subjects in more detail, as they are not uncontroversial. However, very few people are affected by those cancers, and the big issue for me is the network overall, rather than the merger of services for those specific cancers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh, when introducing me to the subject, summarised the whole issue by saying, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." That is probably a fair reflection of the overall feeling in south Essex. The cancer network is doing a fantastic job. In fact, it is one of the leading cancer networks in the United Kingdom, and I would like to pay particular tribute to the lead clinician, Dr. Colin Trask, and the lead manager, Kevin McKenny, who I am sure will read the report of the debate with great interest. The service has a fantastic reputation not only locally, but among its peers. I could quote a whole series of barometer statistics about cancer care, but suffice it to say that statistically it does an excellent job.

At the moment, most of the cancer care network, and most transport communications, in Essex go east-west, not north-south, because when people are treated in Essex and are looking for specialist services, they look to London. There are no significant patient flows north-south or south-north, so the merger is inappropriate, given the movement of people.

Early on, our campaign talked about saving the cancer centre. A few people have called us sensationalist. It is true that the cancer centre will not close tomorrow, next week, next month or even next year, but I feel that this is a case of death by a thousand cuts. A salami-slice approach is being taken to reducing things—a little bit is taken off here, and a little bit is taken off there. There will be a reduction until a critical mass is reached, which will mean that Southend cancer centre will not be able to attract the excellent clinicians that it does at the moment and maintain its excellent reputation.

Also, we are told that the change is purely administrative. If it is purely an administrative matter, then given that there is so much public opinion against the change in south Essex, and given that we are talking about only 20 or 30 people in terms of gastrointestinal cases, why press ahead with it? I have a sinister suspicion that the change is not purely administrative, but a stepping stone to other changes, and I seek the Minister's reassurance that that is not the case.

I need to be careful when talking about the Mid Anglia cancer network, because clearly we south Essex MPs are proud of our services, but perhaps I could quote what other people have said, rather than making a judgment on the network myself. Some people have told me that the Mid Anglia network is unstable at the moment, and others say that there are lots of problems with Ipswich having left. I recognise that there may be benefits for Mid Anglia in the merger, but there are certainly no benefits for my residents in Rochford and Southend, East, or for constituents generally across south Essex. Perhaps the strategic health authority is formulating an equation for the greater good of the residents of Essex, but the equation does not work for me. South Essex loses a little and Mid Anglia gains a lot. That may work overall, but it does not work for my constituents.

There is a feeling that bigger is better, but I am not sure that that is right when it comes to cancer networks. It seems from speaking to some patient groups and GPs that the opposite might be true and that some cancer centres may be too large. One of the greatest challenges is to identify cancer early at GP level and to refer patients to the correct person for a proper diagnosis. A closer relationship between the cancer networks and individual GP practices would be more easily facilitated if the networks were slightly smaller. I am suggesting not a radical change, but a change in direction, and it may be better to keep them as they are or to reduce them slightly.

The cancer centre made the point that it is already working across boundaries in some cases and sharing best practice. I shall go into more detail about how one size does not fit all. I mentioned the 1995 Calman Hine report. It is 10 years old but is still relevant and still resonates. I want to draw attention to some quotes from the report. The first is about the size of the population and states:

> "The size of a population served by a Cancer Unit cannot be inflexibly defined but will be determined by the number of cases of each cancer type being seen there".

It is critical that a network is based on the number of cancer incidents rather than the population. South Essex has pockets of deprivation with, sadly, a higher incidence of cancer and demographically it has a much older population. Those were the two reasons given by the Government's cancer tzar for not going ahead with the decision to merge the network in 2002. Those reasons remain true today.

Secondly, the report states:

"Decisions will have to be taken forward in the light of local circumstances and take account of the views of patients"— patients do not want this—

"and their carers as well as the professionals involved in providing care."

It continues:

"The Group recognise that the development of the ideal pattern of service should build upon existing patterns of referral and care and should take account of geographical constraints."

That is the opposite of what is happening. There are no existing patterns of referral north and south and there are transport constraints. It is normally quite difficult to travel around south Essex and people who need cancer care do not want to be stuck in traffic for hours before receiving important treatment.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I apologise for interrupting my hon. Friend because he is making a good speech.

To amplify what my hon. Friend said about the quota being under 1 million, when the network was established it was specifically given a derogation from the 1 million level because the NHS accepted that there was a higher than average number of elderly people and that actuarially, unfortunately, cancer would be slightly more prevalent in that population group. There was enough business to make a cancer network of 750,000 viable. The point that I want to stress is that that was built in from the day when the network was established. It was looked at from day one and accepted, so it should not be overturned.

James Duddridge: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that. He has been involved in the matter for a considerable period, more so than I have. I completely agree that the 1 million figure is largely arbitrary and inappropriate for the South Essex cancer network. It does not take account of the local situation.

I explained why I found one of the replies to a written question unhelpful. I was trying to probe whether there was a statistical correlation between the size of the cancer network, the number of treatments and the success rate. I also asked the Secretary of State for the population catchment size for each cancer network in England and the Minister replied:

"The Department does not hold the population catchment size for each cancer network. However, a typical cancer network services a population of around one to two million."—[Official Report, 18 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 385W.]

That statistic perhaps went into the first column of some form of analysis. The second column would have been the actual cancers identified each year. Around 3,500 cancers are identified in the South Essex cancer network. The following column would be an indicator of the success of those units—for example, long-term survival rates. I appreciate that that is a much harder figure to obtain, but nevertheless it is important. I seek the Minister's guidance on the exact measure that she could take within the Department.

The final column would be the statistical correlation between those first three numbers. Nowhere in my discussions, the circulated paperwork or the responses to my questions have I seen that statistical analysis for the cancer network. Following a meeting, the medical director of the strategic health authority kindly provided details for three specific cancers, and although I cannot engage in the detail of the medical situation, there seemed to be a case that bigger might be better. However, no one has tried to prove, in anything that has been provided to us, that bigger is better for cancer networks, and many of us have been extensively involved in this subject for the past few months, and some of us for much longer.

I am concerned that this is déjà vu in respect of 2001-02. I feel embarrassed that back then, before I was an MP, colleagues were successful and that I do not seem to be getting a very good deal for my constituents. I worry about that, and I ask the Minister to give me a ray of hope, or at least an explanation. I do not want the cancer network 10-year birthday to be celebrated with effective abolition by merger.

To call the consultation a sham would perhaps be unprofessional, and such language might be unparliamentary. I use those words in anger, because I was very upset by the way I was treated, not individually but as an MP—as a statutory consultee—and, more importantly, by the way all the patient groups were treated. There was overwhelming opposition, which I think is best summarised by the people at the front line who are running the network.

The South Essex cancer network did not support the SHA's proposals to merge. It gave a number of reasons why: there "is no demonstrable patient benefit";

there is a great risk of losing the clinical cohesiveness and ownership that exists in south Essex; patient flows should determine network configurations, and there are virtually no patient flows from south to north or vice versa; current network arrangements meet national peer review measures already; the restructuring of cancer networks is not required to meet national cancer site-specific guidance, with south Essex plans already either approved or well advanced; the south Essex network currently has arrangements that are working perfectly well; and the merger will produce only marginal cost savings. Finally, the cancer network pinpoints a distinct lack of clarity about the future of the Mid Anglia cancer network based on current arrangements. Therefore, there is strong opposition from the people who actually run the network.

Other key authorities also opposed the merger. The two primary care trusts within my constituency—Castle Point and Rochford PCT and Southend PCT—did so. The two local authorities in my area wrote to ask me to raise the matter. They did not just send in a consultation; they passed council motions saying that they did not want it, because it was bad for constituents. That view came from both Southend and Rochford. Patients' groups have also come to me both formally and informally and said that they oppose the merger.

As I am an inexperienced MP, the petition that we put together was my first one. I sent it to a number of doctors' surgeries—about 20—as well as to a number of pharmacies in my area, because I thought that that would be a way of demonstrating the size of support to the Government. I am not sure what level of support I thought would be successful, but I was thinking in terms of a couple of hundred names, and that if there were more than 1,000 I would be celebrating. However, 5,000 people responded. There is a massive amount of local support and concern.

I wrote to the Secretary of State. The Minister was kind enough to reply, saying that the merger was a local matter, that the Secretary of State would not intervene, and that I should raise any concerns with Essex SHA. In many ways I agree; it is a local matter, but I do not consider the SHA to be local. To me, local is Southend, Rochford and the wider cancer network. I find the strategic health authority somewhat out of touch in that regard, and in regard to other matters as well. I hesitate to go into more detail, but I do not think that it has a role as things progress. It certainly does not add value for my constituents. I want more people on the front line. However, I apologise, Mr. Atkinson, for going slightly off on a tangent, and I shall return to the subject of cancer.

The Minister has a role. When the Government's cancer tsar last came to Southend and examined the problem it paid dividends. I do not demand, or even ask, that the Minister should come to Southend, although it would be very welcome. I am more concerned that she should review the matter. [Interruption.] My hon. Friends are asking whether she will come; she would be more than welcome.

What I said about the consultation being a sham involves a key point. When Ipswich left the Mid Anglia cancer network, the writing was on the wall. It was always going to be difficult to justify maintaining two smaller networks, if, indeed, it was Government policy and advice that 1 million-plus should be the population number. That has produced upwards leverage.

Following the Minister's letter, I telephoned the strategic health authority to check that it had not been missed in the post in early May, prior to the debate, and it kindly faxed its response to me this morning. In fairness, its representatives are disappointed that I consider the consultation to have been a sham, but not nearly as disappointed as I feel about the whole consultation process.

I am not criticising a lack of activity in the consultation; there was lots of activity and lots of money was spent on it. However, I believe that the decision was taken well before the consultation. Several more seasoned—perhaps one could say more cynical—colleagues told me not to bother to get involved. They said, "We see this time and again; consultations take place but the decision has already been taken." Furthermore, in the health sector locally there is some consultation overload. I was considering five or six NHS consultations in south Essex in January, so things are quite difficult. Also, in each case the questions being considered were mergers, and getting bigger. I cannot help thinking that there is an underlying philosophy that bigger is better, but I do not think that that is right. Both on the specific cancer issue and on other things, bigger may be considerably worse. We should reduce the size of some of our operating units.

I said that I would try to include some questions to make it clear what I want to achieve in raising the debate. The best thing would be for the Minister to say, "Ah, yes, there has been a terrible mistake and we shall sort it out." I do not imagine in my wildest imagination that that will happen, but a ray of hope for my constituents would be most appreciated. I should like to find out more about why change is needed. I think that I have demonstrated that the cost benefits will be marginal, that there are no demonstrable patient benefits and there will be much administrative disruption, and that there is much opposition.

I should be interested to know more about the 1 million figure and why there is no flexibility, when the cancer tsar showed flexibility in 2001-02. Has there been a policy change since then, or has more information, of which I am not aware, become available? As to the tabular information, I do not ask the Minister to provide anything in that exact format. However, something a little more solid statistically, which correlates population numbers, cancer incidence and survival rates would be helpful to enable us to go forward. If the Minister is right that bigger is better, why should the figure be 2 million? Perhaps it should be 4 million? We need a strong evidence base to enable us to proceed.

I hesitated before putting my questions, because the issue that they raise is, "What if the merger does go ahead?" I should like the Minister to confirm that what is happening is 100 per cent. about administration. The South Essex cancer network and the doctors in Southend would like a promise that there will be no patient movements south to north or north to south, other than in the three specialist cancer centres, without consultation.

I should also like more information about the consultation. I talked about the cancer centre suffering death by a thousand cuts, and one concern is that smaller changes will happen below the radar, and without the involvement of local community leaders and community groups, once we are part of a bigger cancer network.

Macmillan Cancer Relief raised the problem of the travel costs that would be involved should patient flows be significant. Bus routes are poor, and there are virtually no rail routes north and south—certainly not from my part of south Essex. The charity is concerned about the extra costs, and that is a valid concern, although time is also a great worry.

I said that I would not talk in detail about upper GI, but I have had several letters from people in Basildon asking why there is no options appraisal for upper GI in Basildon. I simply throw that issue out to the Minister, and she might want to comment on it. That might be helpful for members of the public in that part of the world.

In summary, the merger of the South Essex and Mid Anglia cancer networks is opposed locally and represents a threat to the longer-term future of the Southend cancer centre. The case for the merger is weak at best and fundamentally flawed at worst.

2.56 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) on the way in which he introduced this debate and on his temperate language.

The Minister is genuine in her intention to do the best that she can for the health service, but how could she possibly know the details of the services that we enjoy in Essex, when she depends on advice? I gently ask her, therefore, to put out of her mind for a moment the thought that she will hear mainly from Conservative Members this afternoon. Instead, I ask her to consider carefully the advice that she is being given, because it was wrong four years ago, and nothing whatever has changed the argument today. I also hope that she will accept my hon. Friend's invitation to visit Southend, and I would be delighted to buy her a Rossi's ice cream, which I can thoroughly recommend, on our newly refurbished pier. She will, however, be very proud of the services that we enjoy.

The Minister should know that there is great pride in cancer services in our part of Essex, and that is particularly clear from the support for local hospices. Last week, I was proud to accompany Vera and Ivan Heath, both of whom are 90. They have no children and little family, so they have decided to benefit others by giving their money to the local community now, rather than waiting until they die. I was honoured to be with Ivan at Little Haven hospice, which he presented with a cheque for £250,000. I was also honoured to accompany him to St. Luke's hospice, which was opened by the late Princess Diana of Wales and the Duchess of Norfolk when I was the Member of Parliament for Basildon. Ivan gave St. Luke's £50,000, which is a wonderful gesture.

On Fridays, I sometimes go round my colleagues' constituencies. Last Friday, I was at Stock Brook Manor in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron). I enjoyed a charity golf day, which was organised by the Donovan family, and a whole number of celebrities attended. The event raised in excess of £60,000 for Little Haven hospice. I just want the Minister to appreciate, if she does not already, that there is an enormous amount of good will towards cancer services in Essex generally. In particular, we are very proud of the services at Southend hospital, which really is a true centre of excellence.

In the debate in February 2002, to which a different Minister replied, I applauded the cancer plan, and I do so now. It is right that cancer, an illness that affects one in three people in the UK, should be given the priority status that it already enjoys in the national health service. However, as I said in that debate,

> "As we have a first-class service and that is what the Government want, why change it?"—[Official Report, 6 February 2002; Vol. 379, c. 1002.]

That is the issue, and it must not be clouded by anything else. We have a first-class service and it should not be changed, whatever briefing the Minister has been given.

Professor Richards decided that, given the high number of cases treated by the centre and the high proportion of elderly residents in the area, the benchmark figure of 1 million inhabitants ought not to apply to the South Essex cancer network. I represent the constituency with the most people between the ages of 100 and 112 in the UK. For the reasons that I mentioned, Professor Richards decided to support the arguments advanced by my colleagues and me.

The factors have not changed, so why, four years later, is the size of the network a reason for merging it with Mid Anglia? It seems absolutely implausible—how can the argument have changed in four years? So far, Essex strategic health authority has been totally unable to provide me and my colleagues with any evidence to show that small centres are less effective in treating certain sorts of cancer than larger ones.

A press release issued by Essex strategic health authority on Tuesday, 21 February 2006—still within the period of the public consultation—made the case for large specialist surgical centres. It stated:

> "National guidance recommends that the surgical part of treatment of gynaecological, upper GI, urological and head and neck cancers should be provided in centres serving at least one million people. The national guidance is known as Improving Outcomes."

The recommendation to replace what the release calls "fragmented" services with other clinical set-ups is made without statistical evidence to back up the assertion that bigger is better.

The Essex strategic health authority consultation on the reconfiguration of cancer services was conducted from 12 December 2005 to 13 March 2006, after which it was decided that the changes proposed in the document—that is, the merger of the cancer networks and the relocation of specialist cancer operations—should go ahead. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East asked, what was the point of the consultation? Members of Parliament and our constituents have been treated like complete idiots and I, for one, will put up with it no longer.

If the strategic health authority had already made up its mind, what on earth was the point of going through the consultation? It was more of a gesture towards openness than real dialogue; it did not take into account the views of the south Essex hospitals, the South Essex cancer network, the 5,000 members of the public—who, as my hon. Friend mentioned, signed the petition—or the Members of Parliament and councillors who represent those people and all opposed the strategic health authority's proposal.

The Minister values the work of the Health Committee, on which I am privileged to serve. She knows that it recently conducted an inquiry on the reorganisation of primary care trusts. Our report found that consultation was woefully inadequate, mainly because of the top-down nature of the process, which imposed change, even when it overrode the needs of local communities, to make financial savings.

I say to my hon. Friends that that is what the issue is all about. It has nothing to do with best practice. The argument, accepted four years ago, is even stronger today.

I end by saying that I had the pleasure of visiting, with a number of my hon. Friends, the Southend cancer centre at Southend hospital on 31 March. We were absolutely in awe of the quality of the services; the centre is meeting not only its targets for breast and cervical screening, but the national cancer waiting times: 100 per cent. of its patients receive their first appointment within two weeks and their first treatment 31 days after the decision to treat. I know that the Minister, when she replies to the debate, will congratulate the hard-working staff on their achievements.

Waiting times and clinical targets are, however, only half the story of cancer treatment. Macmillan Cancer

[Mr. David Amess]

Relief has been making the case for a more comprehensive cancer plan than the one that the Government launched in 2000. The plan would provide for vital supportive and palliative aspects of cancer care as well as diagnosis and treatment. The additional investment in specialist palliative care at Southend cancer centre is already making a difference in that area, along with an agreed framework for implementing the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence guidance on supportive and palliative care and for establishing a network user partnership group and a network patient information project.

I could go on, but I hope that my hon. Friends will catch your eye, Mr. Atkinson. I ask the Minister again to consider very carefully the arguments that she is hearing this afternoon and to reflect again on the advice that she appears to be receiving at the moment.

3.6 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) on making a very measured, well thought out contribution and on leading the drive to save the cancer centre in south Essex. He has done a wonderful job and shown that he has a lot of energy. Whether or not he is successful is no measure of his abilities and potential in this place.

I declare an interest: my son is a neurosurgeon who practises in London, and often in south Essex, treating cancers and such like, and he will do so in the future.

South Essex cancer service is an excellent clinical network. I am a Conservative because I believe in cherishing what is good. That is why I am speaking in the debate and supporting my hon. Friend. At the start of the process, the question should have been, will merging South Essex cancer network with Mid Anglia cancer network help or hinder the continued improvement that we have seen in the South Essex service? For me as an MP, the question was, what will it mean for the people of Castle Point, whom I have a duty to represent, and for my area of south Essex? This is not mindless nimbyism. I have a duty to look after the interests of my constituents, and if I do not no one else will. That is why they send me to this place. I therefore hope that the Minister will forgive me if I speak from the viewpoint of south Essex, rather than the overall viewpoint. It is her duty to look after that, and I know she does so carefully.

What is wrong with our cancer service that requires it to be merged with Mid Anglia and what benefits will we get in return for the merger? What benefits will we get to match the costs and risks of that change? Let me set out some facts about what we are achieving in south Essex. Merging with the relatively not-so-high-achieving Mid Anglia will, some claim, weaken the South Essex cancer network and the service that it is able to provide for our constituents. Merging will certainly disrupt its excellent progress, although I accept that Mid Anglia has many good points and I am sure that excellent staff work in that service, too. I would not in any way bad-mouth them. It must be said, however, that South Essex is reputed to be one of the best services in the country, notwithstanding its smaller size. In fact, its success might be a result of its size; we certainly have no evidence to convince us otherwise.

There are excellent staff at all levels at South Essex, and I pay tribute to them. They are hard working, dedicated, professional and very caring people, as I am sure the staff are at Mid Anglia cancer network.

South Essex is meeting national targets for screening, particularly for breast cancer and cervical cancer, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), whose speech I am delighted to follow, pointed out. However, we need dramatically to improve our screening in those areas and to continue to make advances. We are cutting waiting times from diagnosis to treatment, which is one of the most important factors in achieving successful outcomes. We need to make dramatic improvements, and we are doing that in south Essex, but those improvements might be jeopardised by the change and disruption of the merger.

Our patient outcomes are improving and are now much better than those in many cancer centres in the UK; they are said to be better than those in the mid-Anglia area. We have extremely good financial controls, management and peer reviews, and, added to all that, the convenience of access to a local service. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East pointed out, at length, the natural flow of movement in the health economy, which is east to west—certainly not north to south. There are good reasons for that, not least the infrastructure and the difficulty that people have travelling north to south.

Those who were consulted in my area said that the merger plan was against the best interests of patients in south Essex and the excellent staff who work in that area. It certainly lacks clarity of purpose and any detail about defined, discernible, demonstrable benefits, or even a set of properly laid-out costs. It also lacks any schedule as to how those changes are to be achieved, and detail on what the timing and costs will be. I shall return to that point in a moment.

If we put all those considerations together, we see why the objection to the merger was both hostile and comprehensive, certainly in south Essex, if not the north of the county. The objectors included most of the relevant bodies of opinion, including the south Essex MPs—we have ample evidence of their interest this afternoon. Many excellent councillors and good councils supported our stand on this, as did the hospitals, patient groups, South Essex cancer network and, probably most importantly, the public. Their support is demonstrated in the petitions. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East, that was not my first petition. The media certainly support our side of the argument on behalf of the public.

The anecdotal evidence confirms that the public are very much on our side. I spoke to around 1,000 people—some of whom I questioned and some of whom questioned me on this matter—in the run-up to the recent local elections, and they opposed the merger almost to a person. We have massive evidence that the groups that should have been and were consulted strongly oppose the merger. I hope that if we are to push forward with the change—if it is going to happen anyway—we are all proved wrong, but I do not have any evidence to support that.

I see that the Minister is listening carefully. In a nutshell, it seems that the merger will bring disadvantages, disruption and little demonstrable benefit. It brings unquantified risk without proper weighing of the costs and could set back the steady improvements that we have been achieving in the South Essex cancer network. I accept that it could accelerate improvements in the north, but that is not what I am here to talk about. I am here to represent my constituents, and the Minister is perfectly aware of that.

If the merger is not handled well, it could impede the plans of South Essex and progress on treatments and outcomes, cutting cancer waiting times, delivery on top targets, improving patient information and care, and improving services to the community. It might also affect links with primary care networks, our excellent local GPs and the wonderful Macmillan nurse network in south Essex, to which we all pay tribute.

The Government and the SHA have failed to make any coherent or decisive case for the merger, certainly to the public. That is largely due to the consultation period of three months—I believe that it ended on 13 March—which was said by some to be a sham. I am a moderate man in my language, so one would not expect me to make that claim. The public were angry about the consultation. They felt that they had been steamrollered by the strategic health authority towards a decision that had already been taken, and that there was an element of deceit and pretence in the consultation. In some ways, I feel sorry for the SHA, because it tried to proceed professionally and comprehensively. I do not bad-mouth the SHA, but I heavily deprecate the Government. The SHA was unfortunate, because its consultation was judged against the backdrop of the recent consultation on the police mergers, which was a sham. I say that even though I am careful with my language.

There was evidence that views were not properly considered but simply cast aside. It is easy for us in the south, who were against the merger, to say that and to ignore those in the north, whose views are obviously valid as well. The Minister has to make a balanced decision on that, and will do. In any event, the consultation document was claimed to be a shambles. A powerful letter from the patient and public involvement in health forum for Basildon and Thurrock hospitals, addressed to the Secretary of State and dated 3 April, states:

> "We made it very clear to the SHA that we had concerns that the documentation was not fair, honest, and was biased towards Bloomfield Hospital Chelmsford".

The words

> "not fair, honest, and ...biased"

were underlined.

The results of the consultation—although not clear, at least as far as the south was concerned—were taken by the SHA, which steamed ahead in the opposite direction. It made few arguments, to me anyway, for the benefits of change to the south and gave me little in the way of estimates of costs. Those are not just the financial costs, but the human costs, the operational costs and the costs in terms of patient outcomes. The problem for the SHA is that the Government have stopped listening to the people and the people perceive that. The SHA is judged against that backdrop and in the shadow the mistrust that the public hold for public bodies. However, that is not the fault of the SHA; I lay the blame for that at the Government's door.

The merger proposal looks very much like part of the Government's now not-so-secret regionalisation agenda, which is hitting local democracy and removing local accountability. Their agenda covers things as diverse as police, planning, health, economic development and so much else. It is a Big Brother agenda, the people have rumbled it and action will be taken at the polls to reverse it.

Experience shows that such mergers typically cost much more than was anticipated at the outset. They typically fail to deliver the anticipated benefits or results—not that I see net benefits for my constituents from the merger in any event. Such mergers disrupt and set back progress towards important delivery improvement targets. The plan must be carefully controlled if it goes ahead and we should ensure that we achieve the targets that we set out to achieve.

The Government seem to be obsessed with reorganisation for its own sake. Yet again, we see them shuffling the deckchairs on the NHS deck. They should focus on tackling improvements, such as removing postcode prescribing and making better treatments and drugs available—for example, temozolomide and Gliadel implants for brain cancers and Herceptin for certain stages of breast cancer—as well as spreading the good practice that we see in other countries.

I ask the Minister to rethink the proposal, even at this late stage. It is never too late to accept that the case for merger has not been made, as it certainly has not in this example.

3.19 pm

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) on securing this debate and on introducing it so ably and comprehensively. I also congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point (Bob Spink) and for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) on their contributions. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) may yet be hoping to catch your eye, Mr. Atkinson, so that he can have a few minutes before the winding-up speeches.

It is a pleasure to see on the Conservative Front Bench my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron), who will reply for our party. This is very much an Essex production, from our perspective.

Some of us have been around this loop before. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East said in his introductory remarks, there was a campaign several years ago when the Government unfortunately came up with proposals to transfer some cancer operations away from Southend to as far afield as Ipswich. They caused tremendous disquiet in south-east Essex and local Members of Parliament chipped in and lobbied the cancer tsar and Ministers. As we heard, the cancer tsar came to Southend and considered the issue in detail. Importantly, as an expert, as the Government's adviser on cancer, he decided to leave well alone. He was not a politician but an expert on cancer. As a result of his review, there was transfer of some local operations—just a few—between Southend and Basildon hospitals, but in essence the operations remained in south Essex and the South Essex cancer network remained intact.

The Government's adviser on cancer came to Southend, looked at things on the ground, as they say in modern parlance, and having done that, decided that it was best to leave well alone. I suggest to the Minister in all seriousness—this is not a partisan point—that that is a very powerful consideration in this context.

There is no debate about the quality of care for cancer patients at Southend. There are various problems in the national health service. The Minister has had many letters from me about problems with dentistry and, most recently, clinical dental technicians—I take the opportunity briefly to remind her of them—but no one is saying that there is a problem with clinical outcomes at Southend. It is not as if the service there is deficient.

Several of us had a meeting with the medical director of the Essex strategic health authority some weeks ago, and we pressed him repeatedly on this point. We asked him to provide clinical evidence that there was something wrong with the outcomes at Southend. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East said, we have still had no conclusive evidence from the Essex SHA or from anyone else that there are poor outcomes at Southend that would necessitate a merger. We do not believe that there is a compelling clinical rationale to undertake the move. If there is, we genuinely are not aware of it.

Moreover, it is important to note that the cancer tsar accepted the case for derogation below the 1 million figure. As I said in an intervention, that derogation was there from the start of the network. The matter was considered when the network was set up, and it was considered again by the cancer tsar a few years ago. Both times, the answer was that it was all right at 750,000 for all the reasons that have already been given. Now, suddenly, that is being overturned, and I do not believe that that is wise.

I too am a moderate man, but I shall say it: the consultation was a complete sham. In fact, because of the shape of my constituency, I have responded to seven NHS consultations in the past few months. Briefly, they were on proposals to merge the Essex SHA in a regional SHA, to abolish the Essex ambulance trust and make it a regional ambulance trust, to reduce the number of primary care trusts in Essex, to turn the two mental health trusts in Essex into foundation trusts—that I actually support—to relocate the non-cancer head and neck services to Broomfield, and lastly, this one to abolish the South Essex cancer network. For each of those seven consultations, the recommended option was adopted—every time. It is difficult indeed not to become cynical about such exercises when it seems, particularly in the NHS, that proposals are put out to consultation but the decisions have long been taken. The Government go through a consultation exercise only because it is a statutory requirement.

That is even more galling because the policy of the Department of Health is to encourage local decision making, to push such decisions down to local level. I am sure that we will hear that in the Minister's summing-up speech. If the Government are going to do that, they should be consistent. If they are putting decision making at the local level so that when things get difficult Ministers can say, "It wasn't my fault, guv"; the flip side is that they should listen to what local people say.

If there is local consultation and 5,000 people sign the petition and the local councils and many of the local medical professionals say, "We don't want this," that should be acknowledged. It is pointless to go through sham consultations if local people are ignored. I am afraid that that is exactly what has happened in this instance. If I sound angry about it, it is because I am.

We are worried about the thin end of the wedge argument, and we are worried that whatever may be said today, the issue will be revisited and reconsidered in a few years' time, a few more operations will be moved away, it will be reconsidered again, and eventually the centre at Southend will be under threat. We are not making it up, because the centre was under threat some years ago. We are genuinely concerned about that, and it is partly why we are taking part in this debate.

I reiterate to the Minister that the network was given a specific derogation below the 1 million quota when it was set up. That derogation was reaffirmed by the Government's own cancer tsar—not someone from Conservative central office, Labour party headquarters or the Liberal Democrats. The Government's own cancer tsar considered it and reaffirmed the 1 million derogation, which it is now proposed to overturn. There is no compelling clinical evidence to back up that decision; it is done simply for administrative convenience to fit in with the figure of 1 million and make it neat. Local people were consulted, they said that they did not want it, and they were systematically ignored.

I believe that the Minister is a reasonable person. I have dealt with her before on other issues, and I mean this genuinely: she is a reasonable Minister and she is fair-minded. Not all her colleagues are, but she is. I make a genuine plea to her to reconsider the matter. If she wanted me to sum up the whole case, I would do it like this: Minister, it really ain't broke down in Southend. Please, please don't fix it.

3.27 pm

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) on securing the debate. It covers cancer services in Essex, as well as the proposed change. During the Opposition-day debate on cancer services, the Health Secretary said that the decision on the future of cancer networks in Essex would be made locally. The emphasis on "locally" is what interests me. Do not my hon. Friends agree that the reason for the proposed change is the imposition of national requirements? One of the biggest challenges faced by my primary care trust in Braintree is the interference of central Government, often in the provision of services that really matter to my constituents.

Witham, Braintree and Halstead primary care trust has received a five-star rating for vital cancer services such as cervical screening. However, it received that rating for the local services that it provides, not because of national impositions. It is not only acute and specialised services that are important in effective treatment of cancer; the early detection and easy access to primary services are essential, too. That is why I emphasise that localism and local services are important.

Although the consultation said that the amalgamation would affect only a small number of complex surgical cases, what guarantees do we have that routine services will not be compromised by the proposed changes? Now that the Minister is in front of me, I should like to make a quick aside. People in my constituency are battling to secure the future of a new community hospital in Braintree, yet the Government still make strategic changes a priority over the improvement of basic local services. My constituents want a community hospital, they have been promised one by the Government, and they are still waiting for the Government to support that.

My genuine concern is about meeting local needs. In a press release, I read with interest that the strategic health authority on 29 March said:

"The board of Essex strategic health authority today agreed a recommendation to create a new cancer network"— about which we heard earlier—

"covering south-east, south-west, mid and north-east Essex. It was one of four key decisions about cancer services made by board members".

The press release continues:

"Speaking after the meeting, Dr. Paul Watson—the strategic health authority medical director—said: 'The main aim in making these decisions is to ensure that Essex cancer patients have access to high quality services that meet national requirements'", not local requirements. Local people want local services to meet local requirements. They do not want a national diktat.

I share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron), who has said that cancer survival rates in this country are worse than those in Albania. That is a shocking statistic. While we must acknowledge that more people are being diagnosed with cancer, waiting times for surgery and radiotherapy have been getting longer. That is of tremendous concern to me. How will the merger improve survival rates, diagnosis and early detection? Any restructuring should ideally be about such things.

I have always been supportive of the Schumpeter principle that small is beautiful. On the proposed merger of the cancer networks that co-ordinate treatment in south Essex and mid-Anglia, my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East has said:

"It is important that south Essex keeps its cancer network as it is."

I agree with that.

Our shadow Health Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien), said that my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East made a cogent case on behalf of south Essex MPs about the cancer network and the appropriate size of the South Essex cancer care centre, considering local conditions. He added that he hoped that people at both national and local decision-making levels have taken due account of that strong and well made case. In that context, I find it difficult to understand why the Government are pursuing a merger that is unpopular, unnecessary and likely to be ineffective in meeting local patients' needs.

3.32 pm

John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) on securing the debate and on having introduced it in a reasoned and sensible fashion.

I labour under the disadvantage of not being familiar with Essex's facilities, geography or history. Therefore, I shall confine myself to making some general remarks about cancer provision and the difficulties of locating it. In my youth, cancer was considered to be a certain death sentence and was discussed in hushed tones of horror. Now it is seen as treatable, curable and liveable with. There is no secret to that: there have been advances in knowledge, both scientific and among the public, and there has been early screening and detection, more sophisticated treatment and skilled intervention. For that reason, people will travel far to exercise their right to the best clinical outcome. The "best" often means the most specialised, because such units, by and large, have the best outcomes.

I shall draw a parallel with my constituency, although it does not resemble Essex in any way. There is sincere and justified outrage in it about accident and emergency facilities not being available for children, but my constituents travel, not with joy but with a degree of equanimity, to places such as Clatterbridge hospital. They go through Liverpool, cross the Mersey and through the Wirral because they know that Clatterbridge hospital has specialised, effective and very skilled treatment.

The National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence argues that centres of excellence should have catchment areas that contain about 1 million people, though I note in passing the remarks made about the derogation; I assume that the Minister is in a position to respond to that. When people come up against that fact they immediately come up against two problems in any area. Where will the centres of excellence be? What can be done to minimise travel for all concerned?

On the "where", everybody would ideally want the specialised unit—in fact, every such unit—to be in their town. We know that that is not possible, so a decision must be made. There have been many complaints from the Members who represent Essex constituencies about how the decision was made and the calibre of that decision making. Such a decision should be made openly, in an unbiased fashion and on agreed criteria. Although I accept what hon. Members said about the strategic health authority's decision-making process, I note from its website that it publishes seemingly objective criteria, and one can consider the outcome.

I share the feeling about consultation in the NHS. It is normally dire, formal and pretty unproductive, and it normally results in what the authorities had already thought of. Perhaps someone can clarify the matter, but I see that one or two earlier options were dropped during the consultation process. The website states that option this or option that were considered during the informal process but were abandoned. It may have led to the inevitable result, but it was not simply a rubber-stamping process—unless, of course, that was the initial intention.

We know that the results of such a process will not be universally liked. However, there should be a degree of professional and public support. I am concerned that, as Essex Members have pointed out, the merger does not seem to have professional support, any more than it has the support of the public.

In areas other than Essex, such decisions are not so contentious, largely because they have centres of clinical excellence with form and an established reputation, and there are often clear candidates for specialisms. Even then, conflicts can sometimes be caused by regional loyalties. For instance, large centres of population or even centres of excellence might be on the periphery of a region, which can create additional travelling difficulties. In fact, change always creates difficulties. People do not normally welcome change in their local health facilities, and the matter is complicated if a degree of political rivalry is added.

The second problem that dogs the idea of centres of excellence is that of travel. It is recognised that although some treatments need to be undertaken in centres of excellence, many do not. Out-patient appointments, diagnostic processes, check-ups and even chemotherapy can take place elsewhere in the clinical network, and somewhere nearer home. That is justified; it is a serious attempt to minimise patient travel and the cost to patients and relatives. Patients like their relatives to be with them, because cancer is intrinsically an extremely stressful process, and they need the support of the family and the wider community.

Networks need to be designed properly, and consultation is part of the process. It should be genuine to get the fit absolutely right. Things can be blown apart if factors other than clinical matters are taken into consideration, such as administration or finance. I wonder how the Government's drive for all NHS facilities to have a degree of financial independence and autonomy will fit with the drive for effective and decent clinical networks for cancer or for anything else.

The Government's strategy is not wrong in principle, and the Minister will, I am sure, say that we should be alert to the commendable results in cancer treatment. I am not certain that they have the template right for Essex. I can pass no judgment on that. I have listened to what other hon. Members have said, but I am not in a position to judge. However, it is possible to get it right with adequate consultation and the adequate sharing of appropriate evidence. My fear is that administrative, financial and other considerations may prevent a good template from emerging for Essex.

3.38 pm

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) on introducing the debate, on the comprehensive, thorough and incisive way in which he introduced it, and on his campaign to prevent the merger of the South Essex and Mid Anglia cancer networks. I also commend him for his excellent and heartfelt contribution. I hope that the Minister takes the time—I shall ensure that she has the time—to answer the points that have been raised.

We know that cancer networks have played an important role in developing cancer services since their inception 10 years ago, following the Calman Hine report commissioned by the last Conservative Administration. The proposed merger is important, as it would create a new organisation covering a population of approximately 1.4 million. I am sure that the Minister is aware of that. Although such a change relates primarily to the management and administrative arrangements for planning cancer services, I hope that from the heartfelt contributions to this debate she appreciates the real concern that the needs of south Essex will be overlooked by a larger and more remote network. She should not take that concern lightly.

In Essex as a whole we have had a spate of reorganisations of services, including those relating to PCTs, SHAs, the ambulance service and cancer networks. The common theme seems to have been a desire to create ever-larger, more regional organisations. The concern for many people, as expressed in the debate, is that those structures will become more remote and less responsive to the needs of local residents. I do not believe that that concern is fully appreciated by those making such decisions.

In my constituency, for example, people were particularly vexed about the proposal to scrap Essex police and our local PCTs, and we campaigned accordingly. Given the importance of Southend hospital to the structure of the South Essex cancer network, my hon. Friends are rightly continuing to raise their concerns about the cancer reorganisation. They have made the case against the merger in detail, but I want to highlight one or two points in the hope that they will be addressed by the Minister when she winds up.

Will the Minister explain why a merger of cancer networks is so vital in the east of England at this time? As she heard from almost every contribution, South Essex cancer network has a good reputation—an excellent reputation, in fact—for planning and commissioning cancer services. Naturally, there is confusion about why arrangements are now being thrown up in the air. If the argument is about population size and the need for networks to correspond to areas of between about 1 million and 2 million people, what does the Minister make of the point—made on several occasions—that was conceded by the cancer tsar Mike Richards four years ago when he said that due to its age profile and areas of relative deprivation, the cancer case load in south Essex at least makes up for the shortfall in population?

During the past four years, the population in south Essex has probably grown faster than most other areas, which raises the question of why we have to tinker with the current arrangement at all when it works so well. If the Minister has formed a different opinion, perhaps she could explain to us on what evidence she has done so because it is not clear to my hon. Friends why that should be the case. They have made a powerful argument to keep things as they are.

What is more, the small population of the Mid Anglia cancer network seems to have been brought about by the withdrawal of Ipswich, a decision taken by Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire SHA. It seems somewhat unfair, to put it mildly, that south Essex should effectively lose its cancer network on account of a decision taken by a different health authority, a point made by several of my hon. Friends.

Another concern is that current patient flows do not argue in favour of an enlarged network. Consultants in south Essex are not in the habit of referring patients to centres further afield, and I have seen no evidence of any sudden, recent, increased desire to do so. It simply does not exist. In those cases where patients will have to travel further for treatment as a result of the merger, what financial assistance is the Government going to provide for their travel costs, given that cancer treatment often involves a number of visits to hospitals or other centres? The point has been raised before, but the Minister would do well to dwell on it because, in some cases, we are talking about quite increased distances of travel. That should receive urgent consideration.

There is naturally a degree of confusion about the motivation for the change. It appears that the SHA is putting a desire for administrative neatness, and reorganisation for reorganisation's sake, over and above the concerns of local people. I would reiterate one point to the Minister. The consultation on the merger appears to have been inadequate, lasting only a few months and ignoring strong opposition from my hon. Friends, councillors, hospitals and many residents, including the 5,000 who signed the petition. To many, it appears to have been a sham, designed to give a veneer of credibility to a decision that had already been made, without reference to people's concerns. That comes on top of many other consultations, such as those on primary care trusts, strategic health authorities and police reorganisations, which have led to a growing view that people's concerns are not addressed.

Mr. Francois: Just ignored.

Mr. Baron: As my hon. Friend says, the feeling is that residents' concerns are ignored.

As I mentioned, in my part of the county people were particularly vexed at the thought of losing their local PCTs. However, despite the concerns expressed by those PCTs, the local MPs—both Labour and Tory—and many residents, our views were ignored and the original proposal, chosen prior to the consultation, was taken up. Such fig-leaf consultations have sorely tested the patience of people in south Essex. The consultation that we are concerned with in this debate seems to be yet another example of that.

The SHA does not even have the support of the South Essex cancer network for the proposal. The network has argued that a merger runs the risk of compromising the clinical cohesiveness and ownership in the region. Much progress has been made recently on implementing the national cancer plan and improving services in the community. The network is understandably wary of accommodating the challenges and difficulties of the Mid Anglia cancer network because the people who will suffer if it goes wrong will be the patients.

I would welcome the Minister's explanation of why the merger is going ahead. She will notice that I have given her additional time to respond, in the hope that she will be generous, both in dealing with the concerns raised by my hon. Friends, and in taking their interventions.

3.46 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I add my congratulations to those that have been offered to the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) on securing the debate. As hon. Members said, he put his case eloquently on behalf of his constituents. There were some extremely relevant contributions, including the remarks of the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) about the excellent work of the hospice movement.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) talked about the success of staff in his area in meeting targets. I, too, want to thank and congratulate the dedicated and committed staff in the area, who have achieved massive changes to mortality rates, among other things, thanks to extra investment, which has led to increased staffing. Of course, increased investment is nothing without strong input from the staff and a willingness to embrace some of the changes.

I want to respond to several issues that were raised by, for example, the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), particularly with respect to the comments made by Mike Richards, and the evidence on some of the changes that have been made. The hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) asked how the changes would fit with other services. I hope to touch on that too. The hon. Member for Southport (John Pugh) acknowledged that specialist treatment is an important consideration in the wider debate, and talked about how to deal with the fact that not every service can be available in every hospital. Those are some of the issues that we must grasp. The hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) spoke from the Front Bench about travel costs—I shall refer to that—and about the point that was made by Mike Richards.

As I said, we approach the subject against a background of improvements in the treatment of cancer. That is clear when we consider the situation in Essex, where there is an increased number of cancer consultants, diagnostic radiography staff and therapeutic radiography staff. That has made real changes to the way in which cancer care is delivered. However, it is also important to recognise that many of the improvements took place because of the establishment of cancer networks, which started a number of years ago.

We have to be absolutely clear what we are talking about when we consider cancer networks. They are about professionals, patient representatives and other organisations, perhaps from the voluntary sector—

[Ms Rosie Winterton]

hon. Members referred to the work of Macmillan nurses in their areas—getting together and considering how services can best be delivered over a whole area. It is important that we take note of how that local delivery is considered to be best shaped. In my area, there are often intense arguments about whether a service should be moved from one trust to another, and local people often deeply resent services being changed, but we also have to recognise—this is a crucial part of the debate, and a number of hon. Members raised the point—the evidence on whether the population coverage for specialist treatments and centres makes a difference.

I challenge many of the assertions made by Opposition Members about there being no evidence. There is evidence from the improved outcomes guidance and other national guidance which shows that when it comes to treating some specialist cancers, it is important to have a larger population. We are talking not about just providing a convenient service, but about saving lives. The evidence is very clear: it is obvious that if people, particularly consultants, do not see a certain number of patients every year with those specialist cancers, they cannot be expected to have as great an expertise in them. There is very clear evidence, and we should accept that.

Hon. Members talked about south Essex and their constituents, but it is important that we think wider than that, because Members of Parliament have a responsibility for all members of the public, who are all possible patients, and who may be affected by decisions that we make.

James Duddridge: I agree that there is a case for saying that bigger is better for some very specialist cancers. There is some evidence for that, in terms of evaluating specifically upper GI, gynaecological, urological and head and neck cancers. I know that there is a debate about those. However, we are saying that absolutely no evidence has been put before us to show a statistical correlation between larger cancer networks and better clinical outcomes. We are talking about network sizes, not specific cancers. Those specific cancers relate to only 20 or 30 people; we are talking about 3,500 people who are affected in south Essex.

Ms Winterton: But we are talking about the ability of a network to plan for a specific population base, and that is where the statistics and the evidence come into it. I absolutely understand what the hon. Gentleman says about Southend cancer centre, and this is no slur at all on its ability—I will come to that—but we are talking about the ability of a wider cancer network to make plans.

I will not go into great detail on the reason for the consultation, because that has already been stated—it is the withdrawal of east Suffolk from the Mid Anglia cancer network. However, I want to address some of the points that were made. It is worth noting that all other clinical networks in Essex—cardiac, neonatal, critical care, pathology and neurosciences—are configured on an Essex-wide basis. That is important in terms not only of achieving outcomes, but of providing a stable foundation for those who enter the medical profession. For example, it is important that networks can provide a proper population base and a high level of expertise to ensure that consultants who want to specialise in a chosen field develop professionally.

I also want to give some reassurance. Essex SHA is not planning to close the cancer centre in Southend. Indeed, the position is quite the opposite, and the SHA is committed to supporting a thriving cancer centre in Southend. That includes the provision of out-patient care, diagnostic tests, chemotherapy, radiotherapy, palliative care and some specialist surgery. The only services to be moved from Southend to Chelmsford will be those for people with head and neck cancers. That move has the overwhelming support of senior clinical staff and will affect approximately 20 to 30 people a year in Southend. It will mean that patients who must have surgery for those less common cancers will have access under one roof to consultants and surgeons who are experts in oral and maxillofacial surgery, ear, nose and throat, and plastic surgery. Ultimately, it makes sense for those services to be together, because those cancers might require other treatments, such as plastic surgery. There is also the question of whether people will have to travel and whether their expenses would be covered. That is addressed by the hospital costs travel scheme, and people below a certain income level would qualify for that. Those are the only changes that will be made.

It is important to stress that there are no plans to downgrade services at Southend hospital. Indeed, as many hon. Members said, services have increased, and the hospital is now a cancer centre for south Essex, providing neurological and gynaecological cancer surgery services. Yesterday, I met Dr. Paul Watson, the medical director of Essex SHA, who assured me that there are no plans to reduce any other services currently offered at Southend hospital, and I understand that he has said that publicly.

Finally, the issue of Mike Richards's last visit to the area was raised. There was no derogation that he would have given in those circumstances, although he obviously gave some advice. I shall not ask him to overturn a decision that has been made on very reasonable grounds, and I stress again that we are talking about saving lives in many instances. However, I shall ask him to look at the operational framework, which is due to be introduced in October, so that we can reassure hon. Members that the changes have fitted in exactly with what I have said.

I hope that that gives hon. Members some comfort. As I said, I am not asking Mike Richards to overturn the decision, but I would like him to look at the operational plans to ensure that the decision will improve services in the local area, and I would like them to be reassured of that.

Identity Card Scheme

4 pm

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I am glad to have secured this debate on an important matter, especially as the Identity Cards Bill received Royal Assent on 30 March.

ID cards are a controversial topic. The Government were defeated five times in the other place before the legislation finally passed after the Government's concession to delay the scheme until 2009. Public support for ID cards is falling sharply, from about 80 per cent. in 2003 to just under 50 per cent. today.

The public are concerned about the introduction of identity cards for many reasons. There are real fears about the erosion of civil liberties and much confusion about what problem ID cards are supposed to solve. The suggestion that they will somehow prevent terrorism stands up to no scrutiny when the 9/11 and Madrid bombers held valid ID and the Home Office admitted that ID cards would have done nothing to prevent the7 July bombings last year in London.

Today I would like to focus on another cause of concern, which is the cost of the ID card scheme. The debate is set against the backdrop of a six-month countdown that started when the Bill received Royal Assent, and as each day passes until 30 September we come closer to the date on which the Government will have to reveal to Parliament the estimated likely cost of the identity card scheme over the next 10 years. How that will work in practice with 30 September falling on a Saturday during recess, I am yet to discover, but I am sure that many of my party colleagues are looking forward to receiving the report. It will hopefully contain more information about the cost of the scheme and with any luck we might get some information from the Minister today.

Back in 2002 initial Government proposals suggested that an entitlement card scheme would cost £1.3 billion over a period of 13 years, which would include the three years that it would take to set up the necessary systems and the 10 years in which the first cards would be valid. In November 2003, the then Home Secretary made a statement in the House in which he stated that the cost of an ID card would be £35. That changed again and by April 2005 the Government estimated that the cost of an ID card would be £15 with a fee of £85 for a joint passport and ID card application. However, that figure changed once again after the Identity Cards Bill was introduced after the general election a year ago.

The previous Minister, now Minister of State in the Department of Health, the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), stated in the Identity Cards Bill debate on 13 February that the cost of a stand-alone ID card would be £30 and the cost of a biometric passport £63, so the combined cost would be £93. It could be argued that the number is only valid for the first year of the scheme, which will not be up and running until 2009.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD) rose—

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. The etiquette in these short debates is that there are to be no interventions. If there are to be interventions, that has to be done with the permission of the Member and of the Minister.

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): I have no problems.

Mark Williams: Does my hon. Friend agree that the problem is compounded in rural areas? In Wales, four facilities to renew passports have been announced. From October, the renewal of those passports will involve the collection of personal data. There are four new passport offices in an incredibly rural area and the cost to individual householders will be far greater than the cost of the application.

Jo Swinson: Absolutely. My hon. Friend is right to mention the additional travel costs that individuals will face when they go to have their details processed. For many people, those costs might end up well in excess of £93. In addition, how can we be certain that the cost will remain at £93, given that it has already escalated on several occasions?

My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) questioned the Home Office on how much money had been spent on the Government's ID card scheme from April 2003 to December 2005. He was informed that £32 million had already been spent by the Government on the scheme before the legislation was passed by Parliament.

The former Home Secretary made the House aware that a small contribution from public funds would be required towards the running costs of the scheme. However, we have never had much clarity on the interpretation of "a small contribution". That is a rather ambiguous phrase, and it leaves a great deal to changes in circumstances and the patterns of take-up of the card. Now that ID cards are on the way, I ask the Minister whether the Home Office has any firm figures so that we can be aware of how much this small contribution from public funds might be.

The Government have consistently refused to publish their estimate of the set-up costs of the database design of the national identity register. They argue that that might jeopardise the procurement of the contracts for the database. The London School of Economics has tried its best to make up for the Government's lack of clarity with several extensively researched reports published in the past 12 months, most recently a report on the Home Office accounting of the ID cards scheme in March. The previous Home Office Minister, the hon. Member for Leigh, in his best defence of the Government, suggested that the LSE figures for the ID card scheme were designed to confuse and frighten people. A lack of any financial preparation for the national identity register is far more confusing and frightening for the taxpayer when no estimates are being put forward by the Government.

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that given the Government's lamentable record to date in delivering IT infrastructure projects on budget and on time, they would have been better advised to spend the millions and millions of pounds that the ID card scheme will now cost us on improving police presence on our streets?

Jo Swinson: I thank my hon. Friend for those comments. I will return later in my speech to the issue of the Government's handling of IT systems and their ability to deliver. I accept that there are many projects that taxpayers' money could be better spent on—regardless of whether the amount is £3 billion or £5 billion, or £10 billion or £19 billion.

For clarity, let me remind Members of the supposed aims of the ID card scheme according to the Home Office regulatory impact assessment which it published in November 2004: to reduce illegal migration and illegal working; to enhance the UK's capability to counter terrorism and serious and organised crime; to reduce identity fraud; and to implement a more efficient and effective delivery of public services. On all these points the Government are weak in both clarity and their hoped-for delivery. After last July, the terrorist attacks blew out of the water the suggestion that the counter-terrorism side of the card's purpose would be effective. The country is all too aware that a piece of plastic will not act as a deterrent or as a tool against terrorism. There is strong evidence that terrorists do not hide their identity. The release of the foreign national prisoners which unseated the former Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), also suggests that an ID card scheme would not have helped. The problem was not the identity of most of the foreign prisoners; the immigration and nationality directorate and the Prison Service knew the identity of most of them. The problems arose because the two parts of the Home Office were not communicating with each other. That poses a lot of questions, and does not bode well for the national identity register.

The Home Office's current estimate of the cost of introducing and implementing the biometric passport and ID card scheme is £584 million each year for the next 10 years; the total cost of that is £5.8 billion. However, that figure does not provide a true picture of the total cost of the ID card scheme. There is a variety of hidden costs in respect of ID cards.

The Government have consistently refused to say how much the plans will cost other Departments, despite several parliamentary questions on this matter. I hope the Minister will enlighten us; if he is unable to do so, perhaps he will undertake to consult his ministerial colleagues in other Departments so that they can present to the House a realistic estimate of the overall cost to the Government of implementing the scheme, rather than simply the cost to the Home Office. If we do not have the full, total figures, it is impossible for the people and the taxpayers to make a realistic assessment of whether this is good value for money.

Some of the hidden costs, other than the costs to other Departments, include the cost of designing the database, which, as I have said, the Government will not reveal. One would expect that it will be a complex and technologically sophisticated database, and security measures will need to be incredibly robust given the nature and the quantities of data that will be stored on the database. Therefore, this is unlikely to be a piece of software that comes cheaply. There is also the cost of the scanners and the readers. Many problems have been reported in trials with the accuracy of some of the reading equipment. That varies in terms of the different types of biometrics used. People with disabilities have reported problems with using some of the biometric readers; for such cases, more than one type of scanning equipment may be required at sites where the ID cards will be used.

An individual card reader is estimated to cost about £275, and a card and fingerprint reader about £500. However, many people, such as manual labourers, cannot use the fingerprint reader with great accuracy because their fingers are often worn down. Facial scanners would cost £750 and iris scanners, which are the most accurate, are very costly at £3,500.

The aims of the project were about delivering better public services, but if the costs I have mentioned are multiplied across the various Government Departments, hospitals and police stations up and down the country, they soon start to escalate, and the costs to other Departments should be borne in mind.

I am also concerned that some of the costs of the scheme are being concealed in other budgets. A large part of the money being used for the scheme is said to be going only towards the upgrade of the UK Passport Service, as if all the biometric data were absolutely necessary for that. We must scotch that myth. Under international regulations, all the different forms of biometric data do not need to be stored on the cards. Yes, we have to have facial recognition, but fingerprinting and iris scanning are optional, not mandatory. No other country has as many biometric details stored in their ID cards or passport systems; this project is far more ambitious than the others, and the Government would do well to rethink it.

We also have to consider the cost of replacing the cards. Currently, it is estimated that once every 10 years will be sufficient. However, biometric data diminish over time; people's appearance changes and as time passes, the scans—particularly those for facial recognition—become less accurate. The operator of the national fingerprint information system, Northrop Grumman, argues that cards may need to be replaced as often as every three years; even if it were necessary only every five years, that would significantly increase the cost of the scheme and increase the figure of £584 million a year.

Taking into account various of those factors, the London School of Economics report estimates the true cost to be anywhere between £10.6 billion and £19.2 billion. Even at the optimistic end of that range, the costs would be almost double those projected by the Home Office.

In assessing the costs of such a scheme, it is also important to compare them with any expected benefits. Given the Government's track record on IT projects, already mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter), such benefits may be dubious.

Hong Kong has a widely praised ID card scheme. In the Sunday Herald of 28 November 2004, the consultant responsible for implementing it said of the UK scheme:

> "'Saying you're going to introduce a nationwide identity card is easy. Making it happen is a different matter...This would be the most ambitious IT project in UK history, an enormously complex system involving untried technologies, and success seems unlikely when you consider the public sector's abysmal track record in this area.'"

For example, EDS was the company responsible for developing the tax credits database. I am sure that in the past few years, most Members have had contact with constituents who have been on the receiving end of that flawed system because of overpayments, underpayments or administrative failures. EDS has negotiated a £71.25 million settlement with Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs to compensate for the IT failures that have plagued the system since its inception. Yet that very company has been awarded another Government contract—to revamp Ministry of Defence systems. Unlike other contracts, which have been worth tens of millions of pounds, that contract is worth £4 billion. I hope that the Minister will be able to assure me and the taxpayer, first, that the national identity register contract will not necessarily cost that much—an estimate of how much he thinks it will cost would be very much appreciated—and secondly, that careful consideration will take place before an IT contractor is chosen, particularly if a company such as EDS is placing a bid.

The Home Office's own report shows that for other Government Departments to take up and benefit from the ID card scheme, there will need to be high levels of take-up. For example, the Department for Work and Pensions and Revenue and Customs are unlikely to get large benefits until 80 per cent. of the population are using the scheme. When does the Minister expect us to reach a level of 80 per cent. take-up with a voluntary scheme?

In their manifesto, the Government said that they would introduce a voluntary scheme. We have had many debates on whether requiring people who have passports to have ID cards complies with the assertion that it is a voluntary scheme. I would argue that that represents a great degree of compulsion. I still believe that 80 per cent. is a fairly optimistic level to achieve in a short space of time. Although 80 per cent. of people have passports—

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I hope that the hon. Lady will forgive me for intervening. I have listened carefully to her detailed and cogently argued speech, but I would like her to clarify something before she sits down. This matter is of great concern to my constituents. I receive a lot of correspondence on this matter supporting both sides of the case. It is unclear to me whether her opposition to ID cards, such as I take it, is on a matter of principle or practice. We have to accept that the relevant costs are variable and will inevitably be imprecise at this stage, but is there a cost at which the implementation of ID cards would be acceptable to her?

Jo Swinson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. As a Liberal, I have a principled objection to ID cards. We do not need the system, and no evidence has been presented to the House to suggest that it is necessary. However, as the debate is about the cost of the scheme, I have focused on those particular arguments.

The hon. Gentleman's point is well made. I am opposed to ID cards in principle, as are many people. I am sure that some of his constituents have written to him voicing that view. Hon. Members might know that there is a strong campaign at renewforfreedom.org, which is encouraging people to renew their passports before the ID cards database comes into effect. I wonder whether the Minister thinks that that will have an impact on the likely take-up of the scheme and, therefore, when the anticipated benefits might be achieved by Government Departments.

However, I am keen to press on. The cost of the project has spiralled, and it has been characterised by a complete lack of clarity about what it is intended to achieve. The stated aim of the project has changed from anti-terrorism to tackling benefit fraud, to making things easier for Government Departments, to making it easier to prove one's identity without having to take one's passport out with one, but we have not heard a strong argument for introducing ID cards. The likely cost is incredibly worrying, and we can expect it to increase further because not all aspects of the scheme have been included in the projections. The scheme offers poor value for money.

I understand that the Treasury has asked for an annual review of the scheme's cost. I hope that the Minister will tell us when that review will be undertaken. Will it be published in front of the House? If the costs escalate, on the annual review basis, at what point would the Government reconsider the merits of the scheme and review its implementation? Are they committed to implementing ID cards no matter how high the costs and how small the benefits?

4.18 pm

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): I hesitate to say this because the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) has been in the House for only a year and her reputation is strong and growing, but, with the best will in the world, I have never listened to such cliché-ridden tosh since the last time I heard a Liberal speak on ID cards. That is a shame because there are serious and substantive matters of practicality rather than principle that we now need to consider. This is such an important debate, regardless of where one started from in terms of the Bill, which means so much to the country, that it demands slightly better than a cliché-ridden rehash of the arguments of the past two or three years. I say that with real regret.

The hon. Lady is wrong in so many instances that I am not sure that I could go through them all in 10 or 15 minutes, but let me start at the beginning. She is wrong to suggest—I do not want anyone to be misled in this regard—that somehow by 30 September, as a result of amendments to the Bill accepted by the Government, there will be a full and detailed cost breakdown of every single aspect of the project. There will not. That was not the substance of the Lords amendment that we quite rightly accepted, which was that we should report to the House progress on the project, including costs, on a six-monthly basis. It is entirely right and proper that the House should know such things.

I suspect that the paucity of intellect in many of the hon. Lady's arguments comes from a complete lack of understanding—God knows, I do not understand it entirely—of how government works. The Liberals seem to think that we have thought of a number and doubled it, and that is the apparent cost of the ID cards. Whatever the Government, internal governmental processes and accountability simply would not allow that. She is quite right to quote the figure of £584 million; she is quite wrong to ascribe that in full or in part to ID cards, with a little bolt-on for the new biometric passport scheme. It was the other way around. We have said throughout that about 70 per cent.-plus of those costs are for the biometric passport.

I had a look, and never have I found in this House—admittedly before the hon. Lady became a Member of the House—any peep, any whisper from the Liberal Democrats countering the introduction of biometric passports. Nothing. By the bye, I did not find anything from the official Opposition either. That is right and proper. The consensus was that we must have a far more secure international travel document than we have had hitherto.

The hon. Lady is right—in a fourth-form sort of way—to suggest that what we are seeking goes far beyond international requirements in international agreements. They require facial recognition and fingerprints, but not the all-singing, all-dancing 13 biometrics that we suggest. That is not a critique of where we are going with the project, because I guarantee her and the House that everybody else internationally will get to where the UK is starting from. It is not sufficient to suggest that somehow there is a flaw in the entire project because we are going for an absolutely copper-bottomed gold standard biometric system for passports and ID cards. As far as I am aware, apart from the rumbling around the edges, there is continuing support for a biometric passport.

I accept in full the point made by the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) about our network of offices and application by interview. I appreciate that it will cause difficulties in rural areas. It was discussed at length during the last Committee sitting of the Bill and previously, but the interview is a necessary part of obtaining a biometric passport, and those matters must be overcome. By the bye, it was probably the most far-flung Liberal Democrat, the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), who made that point, and given his constituency, he can make it in far stronger terms than anyone else. It is an issue, there are 70 offices, and we may need to consider mobile facilities and others in more detail, and we have said that we will; but there is no other way to capture people's biometrics, even for the first phase for the new passport, other than through application by interview. It is a fair point, and one that we are addressing.

On the hon. Lady's points—again, clichéd, I am afraid—about the trials thus far, there has not been in substance a mock-up of every aspect of capturing people's biometrics. She knows that; she has read the reports. They are, for the individual, about physicality, ergonomics and all the other elements of having one's biometrics captured; no more than that. The trials did not use the tip-top, state-of-the-art biometric capture technology that exists for passports and will exist when ID cards come in. One cannot say from a series of tests about the ergonomics and physicality of the process of having one's fingerprints, irises and everything else captured, that the incumbent and subsequent flaws in many aspects of it are due to flaws in the technology. One simply cannot say that, and the hon. Lady knows it.

But let us return to cost, which is what the debate is principally about. I cannot remember who said it, but I agree, in response to the hon. Lady's question, that saying we will introduce ID cards is easy, but making it happen is a different matter. I agree with that in spades, given the complexity of the project. However, it is not the case that we should simply think of a number and double it. Nor is it the case—there is a fundamental flaw in the argument—that all that money could be spent on so many other things. Much of the set-up costs will already need to be in place for the biometric passport system, with which everyone broadly agrees. Beyond that, the only moneys available are, as the hon. Lady correctly says, the £30 fee for a stand-alone ID card or the £93 fee for the combination ID card and passport. There is no other money.

As I said earlier, unless the hon. Lady is suggesting that we scrap the Bill and scrap any notion of going forward with the ID card project, but keep in place the £30 per head and the £93 per head—she is clearly not saying that—then there is no additional pot of money for all those mythical policemen, security services and others. It is a complete and utter fallacy to suggest that there is, but that is what has been said on countless leaflets—during the general election, before the Bill came to the House and subsequently. The net result in Harrow was one Liberal Democrat councillor, which is one too many. None the less, that flaw demeans the nature of public policy debate in the House. There is no additional money, unless the hon. Lady is suggesting that we should keep that little tax of £30 or £93—which is about £30 more than is now charged for passports—and she clearly is not suggesting that.

It is equally facile to suggest—as the official Opposition and the Liberal Democrats did at length—that if we cannot come clean about the set-up costs, we must be trying to hide something. That shows a fundamental lack of understanding about basic public procurement, whether under a Labour or Tory Government or anyone else.

The hon. Lady wants a degree of financial transparency and prudence, and a cost base that works—entirely praiseworthy ambitions—but one cannot do that by giving a blank cheque to all potential IT procurers without exposing every aspect of the architecture of the database and the commercial structure. It is easy to say that because the Government are hiding behind commercial confidentiality, they must have something to cover up. It is an interesting point, but a fourth-form one.

The Government stand by the regulatory impact assessment for the Bill and the costs therein. In January 2006, the Office of Government Commerce carried out a gateway zero review of the overall programme and we were advised that we can proceed to the next stage. That internal process continues. There must be rigour and probity. It is not in the Government's interests for costs to spiral as the hon. Lady suggests. The review team has full access to our business case for the setting up and the issuing of cards, including on the anticipated use of the scheme in the public and private sectors.

What the hon. Lady said about the durability of biometrics was entirely wrong. What she said about Northrop Grumman happened in 2002. I freely admit that the development of the technology improves by leaps and bounds year after year. It is wrong to compare smartcards with highly developed biometric cards.

It is a canard to say so—I have said it myself of other projects—but as and when there is time, the Government and the public sector are getting rather good at large IT projects. Invariably, past failures have been the result of a big-bang instant roll-out—rather like the passports. That will not be the case for ID cards. We think that the cost structure is robust. We are absolutely certain that the country needs ID cards. I do not know when the next cost review will be published, given that 30 September is the six-month deadline. Whether we go for July or slip into October, once we are ready I will be more than happy to discuss the review in detail with the hon. Lady.

Buried in a cliché-ridden rehash of old canards, some serious points were made, and I shall reflect on them.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (in the Chair): Order. We must move on.

Community Recycling

4.30 pm

Jessica Morden (Newport, East) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to have this debate, and I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for being here to respond. I make no excuses for being parochial and talking about a hugely successful recycling scheme, which is a model of best practice, based in my constituency. I ask my hon. Friend to look at that scheme, which we can all learn from, and to listen to points raised by community recycling groups.

In the race to avoid being buried under a mountain of landfill, and facing hefty penalties, local authorities are in danger of grasping at easy waste options, often ignoring community enterprises such as Wastesavers in my constituency, which offers cheaper, cleaner systems and added benefits for the local area. It is relevant that we are discussing this matter today. The waste strategy consultation closed just yesterday, and this major national debate is one that normally enjoys significant cross-party agreement.

We all understand the need to reduce landfill, and to recycle and reuse our precious resources. We all produce waste—that is a fact. We create 100 million tonnes of industrial, commercial and household waste annually, and it is growing at a rate of 3 per cent. each year. The Government have rightly introduced stringent targets backed up by a punitive landfill tax that will increase by £3 per tonne in 2005-06 and by at least £3 per tonne in subsequent years to a rate of £35 per tonne by 2010.

Newport city council, which partly covers my constituency, has developed a highly innovative partnership with a provider of waste services in the area—a community enterprise called Wastesavers, which handles dry recycling and furniture. It is difficult to ignore the recent achievements of Newport Wastesavers. It provides the most cost-effective recycling scheme in Wales, and arguably in the UK. With the support of the council, it has scooped prizes at the resource awards and the national recycling awards, and collected the prestigious Marks and Spencer award for a community recycling project in 2005.

Eighty per cent. of households in Newport participate in recycling. The partnership between the council and Wastesavers has resulted in Newport doing far better than the Welsh average. It recycled or composted 27 per cent. of total municipal waste last year.

With a sustained partnership with the council and a determined and dedicated group of people, Wastesavers has moved from humble foundations and now occupies a purpose-built clean-stream resource recovery centre in my constituency. It employs more than 50 people who provide kerbside collection services for recyclable material and a furniture reuse project that helps disadvantaged families in Newport. Operating since 1985, it takes pride in being a true recycler—it does not do waste but aims to make everything reuseable or recyclable in any way possible. Over the years, it has innovated and expanded its range of services in Newport, and in the process has demonstrated that the community sector is capable of delivering economic efficiencies as well as environmental benefits.

I visited Wastesavers in Newport. What comes across is its enthusiasm and professionalism, and most of all the simplicity of an operation that achieves the lowest costs and highest participation rates that I have come across. So what makes it successful?

First, Wastesavers works in partnership with the council and the community. The council took the radical and difficult decision to reduce collection of traditional black-bag waste to a fortnightly service while Wastesavers collected the recycling weekly. Therefore, recycling became the default waste action. In areas where that system operates, the rate of households participating has risen to a staggering 90 per cent. The model has been so successful that it is being rolled out into more areas of Newport, and it has generated much enthusiasm for recycling among the public, including those residents who were sceptical when the fortnightly refuse collections started.

Secondly, Wastesavers is efficient and therefore cheaper. Newport pays only £41 a tonne for recycling, which is only a few pounds higher than its cost of landfill. I understand that charges in other authorities are at least several times that cost, and anecdotally I have heard of authorities being charged up to £400 a tonne. The £41 rate is not subsidised by grants but is a reflection of the true cost.

Thirdly, Wastesavers separates at source so that it can command higher returns. Residents separate, wash and sort the materials themselves and put them out in kerbside boxes. The result is clean, contaminant-free materials for collection. Those valuable products command the highest prices from customers who are prepared to pay for the highest-quality materials. I used to live in an area where all recyclables were collected in green bags and I often wondered how all that was recycled; did it not just get all squashed together and mixed up? The answer seems to be that it is squashed together and mixed up and much of it does not end up being recycled. The high level of contamination of materials collected in that way means that they have to be incinerated or sometimes they even find their way into landfill.

Wastesavers keeps things simple, investing in people, not machines. Clean, sorted material comes in, because people sort it themselves, so the Wastesavers depot has no need of big, expensive sorting machines. It invests in training and developing its people and it provides opportunities for the whole community, with employment possibilities for people on probation and people with learning difficulties. Fifty per cent. of people who come on placements become permanent employees, and 80 per cent. of the employees were previously unemployed. That is a testament to true social enterprise.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Lady on securing this important debate. Does she agree that the organisation to which she is referring and ones such as the Bradford Area play association and the Windhill community furniture store in my constituency bring not only waste management and recycling benefits—that is important enough—but community benefits, which she is also mentioning? That is the crucial part of why such organisations should be supported.

Jessica Morden: I agree and I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I congratulate him on the successful scheme in his constituency—may it go from strength to strength. I agree that it is the community benefits that we get from such schemes that add value. They are not just commercial operations; they are adding something to the community.

Wastesavers looks to the future and educates the next generation of recyclers. A not-for-profit organisation, it runs fantastic educational programmes on recycling, and the results are everywhere. Yesterday, pupils of Llanmartin primary school visited me in the House of Commons and spoke enthusiastically about their school recycling programme, which was inspired by Wastesavers. Wastesavers provides a model of good practice that is efficient, effective and economic.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate. She is a powerful advocate for both her constituency and the scheme. What advice would she give people such as me, in my constituency? Swindon borough council has made recycling a relatively low priority. We have only 0.24 recycling points per 1,000 of population, compared with the national average of 0.41 per cent. I am struck by the contrast between Swindon borough council and Newport borough council, which seems to have played a very entrepreneurial and constructive role. How would my hon. Friend advise people such as me? I want Swindon to do better on recycling and to follow the good practice that she is outlining.

Jessica Morden: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. One success of the Wastesavers scheme is the strong partnership that it has had with a committed local authority. I am sorry to hear that he does not have a successful recycling scheme in his area. I suggest that he speak to Community Recycling Network UK, which I am sure can suggest a way forward for him and his local council.

As I said, just yesterday pupils of Llanmartin primary school visited me and talked enthusiastically about their programme. The educational benefits and the will of Wastesavers to do such work with the community are great. Is it really simple to be so economic, effective and efficient? It is, but what annoys Wastesavers and similar organisations represented by Community Recycling Network UK is that the potential for community enterprises to do even more seems to be slightly ignored in planning for the future.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): I share the optimism in the hon. Lady's speech; I share also the frustration of some community organisations. Does she agree that sometimes we have had difficulties with the Environment Agency's interpretation of licensing exemptions, particularly for small recycling schemes? In my rural area, small community schemes find, for instance, a £6,000 charge for a licence prohibitive of future recycling work.

Jessica Morden: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. I think that Wastesavers is entitled to an exemption because the materials are sorted at source—residents sort the materials themselves—so perhaps one answer for the residents of Ceredigion would be to consider that type of operation. I am sure that the Minister will respond to the point and I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention.

Many councils take a mechanical approach to recycling and, threatened by rising targets and penalties, are willing to sign up to long-term contracts for treating waste, sometimes for up to 30 years. Such contracts are likely to involve thermal treatment, incineration or anything that keeps waste out of landfill. Machine-based systems to sort or treat waste are costly to install and can produce low-grade recyclable materials or even destroy a valuable resource. Crucially, we end up paying more for materials to be destroyed than we do to have them recycled, with all the economic benefits that that brings to the community and the environment. Something simple is being made complicated and more expensive.

Committing to a 30-year contract for incineration of up to 60 per cent. of waste might solve a landfill problem for a local authority in the short term but will prevent the expansion of the community recycling model, which would add the social benefits and the ability to deal with the long-term problem, as I have outlined.

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware of the work of the furniture re-use network, which has its national headquarters in my constituency? It promotes the reuse of 1.5 million items of furniture a year and does some incredibly good work throughout the country. There are also local organisations in Bristol, such as the SOFA project and Emmaus, which reuse more than 10,000 items a year, most of which go to low-income households. Does my hon. Friend agree that the issue is not just about environmental concerns but, as the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) said, about tackling social exclusion? Such organisations have an important role to play in that.

Jessica Morden: I agree with my hon. Friend. Wastesavers also has a furniture recycling project that adds much to the community in Newport, so I commend the projects that she has mentioned. We are fundamentally ignoring the principles and the success demonstrated by community recycling schemes such as Wastesavers, which have been run throughout the country. Such schemes are rapidly increasing the tonnage that they recycle and therefore reducing waste to landfill at the same rate.

Anecdotally, some Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs officials have indicated to the community recyclers that they believe that it would only ever be possible to divert 40 per cent. of household waste to recycling. However, Wastesavers and its colleagues in the community recycling networks think that that is not an ambitious enough target. They think that they can do a lot better and believe in striving towards a state of zero waste. However, that takes time and will require us to look at the issue from the other side, creating a service designed around recycling, rather than modifying the existing waste services.

In the short term, it is vital that we do not hamper progress towards the goal of reducing and recycling all waste by committing to very long-term contracts that prevent the growth of other models. I look forward to seeing the evidence and the outcomes of the waste strategy review, which closed yesterday. In the meantime, I ask the Minister to take note of the excellent alternative systems on offer—perhaps by visiting Wastesavers with me and meeting representatives of the networks that support them, such as Community Recycling Network UK and its Welsh counterpart Cylch. I also suggest that a comparative study be commissioned to evaluate the wide variety of systems on offer, the range of costs and the various social and environmental outcomes that can be achieved. Without that information, we could find ourselves in an expensive recycling trap.

4.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Jessica Morden) on securing this debate and on her excellent speech. It is encouraging to see such a high level of interest from all three major parties—that is not always the case in shorter Adjournment debates—and all hon. Members who have intervened have made important points.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, we have just finished a major public consultation on the review of our waste strategy. In the renewed strategy, which we will publish later this year, the Government are determined to see an enhanced role for the community and voluntary sector. We have made considerable progress in recent years, which all hon. Members recognised, although it has been rather patchy, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) pointed out. We have trebled the amount of municipal waste that we recycle or compost and we are on course to hit our targets. It is not every Department that can say that about all its targets.

That is partly the result of the excellent work of local authorities, working in collaboration with the private sector and the community and voluntary sector. It is also the result of the work of our public, who are increasingly aware of the importance of sustainable waste management; that subject is rising up in the public consciousness. If people are asked in opinion polls, for example, whether they think it is important to recycle, about 90 per cent. say yes; but only about 45 to 50 per cent. recycle regularly. We must close that gap. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East pointed out, one of the best ways to do that is by providing a high-quality kerbside recycling service for the public.

Those services have increased hugely in recent years and my hon. Friend has rightly—not just in this Adjournment debate but several times in DEFRA questions—drawn attention to the Wastesavers project in her constituency of Newport, which, as she says, is a beacon for the rest of the country. In partnership with the excellent local council and her constituents, it has achieved a tremendous increase in the percentage of recycling.

[Mr. Ben Bradshaw]

It is interesting that my hon. Friend used a slightly different figure from the one that I have heard cited previously for the cost per tonne achieved by Wastesavers in Newport. Getting the cost down so low is an incredible achievement. She will, I am sure, appreciate that part of the explanation is that the organisation is community-based and that some of those involved are volunteers. They work efficiently and well, but she is right to point out that there are wide variations in the costs not only of recycling and kerbside collection but of waste management by local authorities as a whole.

My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that the Government are considering that issue, not just as part of the review of our waste strategy but as a result of the Gershon report in 2004, which identified potential for considerable savings in our waste management and collection systems. We should be interested in studying the experience of Wastesavers, which one of my officials has already visited. I should be delighted to take my hon. Friend up on her invitation; she can show me around. I am keen, in the months ahead, following the closing of the consultation yesterday, and before the publication of our renewed waste strategy, to examine best practice and ensure that we get the strategy right.

We need to do that—my hon. Friend has, again, made the point well—because although we have made dramatic improvements in this country in recent years we have an awful long way to go. We still use landfill far too much. Landfill, as everyone recognises, is the least environmentally friendly way of managing our waste. We need to get our recycling and recovery levels up to those of continental Europe and our landfill levels down.

Kerry McCarthy: Is the Minister aware that one of the problems of current landfill policy—according to Bristol city council, which, again, does not have a good record on recyling—is that it is more economically viable to recycle heavier objects? When I have tried to encourage the council to recycle plastics, it has replied that that is not cost-effective, because plastic does not weigh as much.

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend is right. It is depressing, when some local authorities are as good as Newport and are doing so well on recycling, that others, such as Bristol and Swindon, do so badly. There is no excuse for it, and my hon. Friends may want to take a stark warning back to their constituents and local authorities. Their constituents will pay the price for poor performance on recycling.

As the landfill tax escalator hits in as one of the major financial incentives, council tax payers in Bristol and Swindon will pay the price for the poor performance of their local authorities. In recent years, the ratcheting up of the system has been made even more effective by the introduction of the landfill allowance trading scheme, which is rather like the emissions trading scheme, one of the mechanisms used to deal with climate change. Local authorities that perform badly can buy extra landfill allowance from other local authorities, but, again, that will involve a cost to council tax payers. It is not merely good for the environment to recycle, reuse and compost; it is, in the long run, also cheaper for council tax payers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Kerry McCarthy) is right about the importance of community recycling network schemes. I know of the headquarters in her constituency, and in fact I met the chief executive, or whatever he calls himself, fairly recently. He has had some very constructive meetings with my officials to make sure that those schemes are not forgotten in our consideration of our new waste strategy.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right to point to the perverse incentives in our waste policy under the weight-based system. That system sometimes incentivises local authorities to collect heavy waste for recycling, because that boosts their recycling rates, and waste that is easy to collect. I shall give her a good example: hon. Members may have noticed that recently many local authorities have rapidly expanded their so-called green waste collections of garden waste. That has been a very easy way for local authorities to increase their recycling rates, but of course it is much easier for local authorities in leafy suburbs and rural areas to do that than it is for local authorities in some inner-city areas. There is a real problem with the incentives in the current weight-based system, and we are actively considering that as part of the waste review.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East may also be interested to know that my officials are working with Wastesavers in her constituency to look into how it achieves what it does, and to get it to be an exemplar for other social and community-based recycling and waste management organisations across the country. That is because we want a lot more successful, social and community-based, voluntary-based organisations involved in how we manage our waste, for the very reason touched on by a number of hon. Members: we are not just talking about a sensible, efficient and environmentally friendly way of managing waste; the issue is also about getting community action and community spiritedness on the whole issue of managing waste.

If people based in, and coming from, the community are running such organisations and providing the sort of opportunities to which my hon. Friend referred—opportunities for disadvantaged people, people coming out of prison who want to rehabilitate themselves, people with learning disabilities and so forth—that is a fantastic contribution that they can make. Also, people benefit enormously from the sort of work that that involves, and as my hon. Friend rightly says, it is often a stepping-stone by which they can re-enter the full-time employment market, so it is a virtuous circle.

We would like enterprises such as Wastesavers in Newport to expand. There are examples of other bodies that have expanded and gone to other places, but my understanding is that Wastesavers is quite happy staying the size it is, and as a result it has agreed to share its business plan with anyone who is interested. My hon. Friend has already established herself in the House as a great ambassador for sustainable waste management and for Wastesavers in her constituency. May she go far afield, singing its praises and suggesting that people in other parts of the country talk to Wastesavers—a process that we will certainly encourage—to see whether they can replicate elsewhere its wonderful practices in Newport.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) is absolutely right to say that in the past there have been issues to do with prohibitive licence costs for composting and recycling organisations. Community composting organisations raised that with me very soon after I took on the waste brief, just under a year ago. They were worried that they would be put out of business by some of the new charges coming in. We shelved those charges, and over the past 12 months we have undertaken a review of them. I am confident that in the next few weeks we will come forward with a revised system that will benefit the sorts of recycling and composting organisations to which the hon. Gentleman referred, and that should be cheaper for the Environment Agency. I am absolutely determined not to put barriers in the way of those sorts of very sensible and effective community organisations.

I should have said at the beginning of my speech that everything that I have said about visiting and so on is with the slight caveat that I remain the Minister responsible for such matters. Hon. Members will understand that DEFRA has become an almost completely new Department and the portfolios may be switched around.

I hope that I retain that responsibility because I very much enjoyed seeing the waste review through. There is huge and growing interest in the matter, as the debate has illustrated, and it will be a huge environmental challenge for the country. If we fail to get it right in the next few years, not only will the environmental consequences be extremely serious, because we will continue to produce methane through landfill—hon. Members know that it is one of the most damaging greenhouse gases—but the country and individual local authorities will become liable to swingeing fines from the European Commission for failing to meet our landfill targets.

Question put and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Claire Ward.]

2.30 pm

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I call the distinguished Chairman of the Select Committee, Mr. Malcolm Bruce.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Thank you for that encouraging introduction, Sir Nicholas. It is genuinely a pleasure and a privilege to present the International Development Committee's first report of this Session, which, appropriately, we published on world AIDS day.

The Committee was extremely appreciative of the international community's commitment to eradicate AIDS. When we published the report, however, it was clear that the international community's first target—getting 3 million people on treatment by 2005 as part of the "3 by 5" campaign—would be missed. I have no intention of delaying hon. Members by quoting from the report, which they can all read, but I shall pick up a couple of points to which I hope the Minister can respond.

The Committee had quite a debate about how to achieve the 2010 target progressively, and the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) will have something to say about interim targets if he catches your eye, Sir Nicholas. We recommended that the Department consider including a target on access to treatment when formulating the public service agreement for the next comprehensive spending review, which is currently under discussion, and I would be interested to hear what progress the Minister can report.

We identified a particular problem with the treatment of children. There is not enough investment in paediatric antiretroviral drugs—the issue was raised at International Development questions yesterday—and the pharmaceutical companies have no real commercial interest in the issue, although the international community, the children and their families do have an interest in it. However, the relevant drugs, where they exist, are up to six times more expensive than equivalent adult treatments and are not designed for children. Antibiotics are also not always appropriately targeted at children with HIV/AIDS. Again, we would be anxious to hear what progress has been made on that.

The witnesses who came before the Committee raised several issues, and the Government addressed them in their reply. Although I accept without demur the Government's real commitment to putting resources into tackling the problem and their determination to meet the end target, there was concern about a possible mismatch between the Department's global ambition and individual out-turns in different countries. The Government rightly respond that it is up to each country to set its targets, but they are the major provider of support in many countries, and we are looking for a partnership. We expect the Department to be able to define its targets progressively so that we can monitor how well we are doing. We do not want to reach the end of the process, only to find that we have missed targets, when we could have identified the problem earlier and taken appropriate action.

My last point relates to the role of the International Monetary Fund. I raise it because the Government agreed with us, and particularly because their policy is to use budget support as a major way of funding recipient countries. Some glib things are said about the IMF, but the fund and the World Bank are major institutions, which operate in a much more complex fashion than some of the more simplistic arguments might suggest. Nevertheless, there is concern that the IMF, in its overall policy of trying to ensure that countries operate within a sound financial framework, may inhibit the diversion of resources to deal with the AIDS problem in a particular country. The Government agreed that that was a cause for concern and hoped that the IMF would not do that.

A comment from the Minister would be helpful on how our role in providing budget support can come alongside the IMF or act as a buffer between the two. If we provide a country with money specifically to achieve its own HIV/AIDS target, presumably there is no reason why the IMF should try in any way to interfere with that.

The international community has set itself ambitious targets. Our Government are committed to being one of the leading contributors in tackling the problem and I am sure that the House is looking for leadership from the Department for International Development, as I am sure is the international community in many ways, although there are one or two contentious aspects of that to which I shall come later.

The Committee published the report at the end of last year and there have obviously been continuing developments. The statistics are still serious and the Committee had a chance to make visits, particularly to Africa where we saw some of the issues at first hand. Interestingly, we visited Botswana and the Botswana programme was mentioned in the House yesterday. What we saw was impressive in one sense. It is one of the richest, least corrupt, most competent and most well-run countries in Africa. However, it has one of the highest incidences of AIDS, and if it does not deal with that it will cease to be one of the most successful and dynamic countries in Africa. We saw an impressive hospital, which provides impressive treatment, encourages people to come in and reaches out to provide treatment throughout the country. However, two or three issues arose which I think are worth recording.

The first, which is obvious, is that when a huge amount of resources go into dealing with one major problem such as HIV/AIDS, which requires the combined commitment of health resources, clearly other health problems fall down the pecking order. One point of concern is that it is diverting a huge health resource from other problems in the country, which are receiving attention but not the same attention as would otherwise be the case. Botswana is a rich country and the problems are multiplied in poorer countries.

The second issue is that in subsequent meetings with representatives of the Government and Government agencies we asked some probing questions about what was being done to reach some of the prime victims and problem areas, particularly homosexual men and those engaged in sex traffic and the sex trade. The answers were a little disturbing to say the least. In a nutshell, we were told that such activities are illegal, and the clear implication was that there is no programme to reach those people, despite the fact that they are a prime source of the problem.

Someone in the diplomatic community—I shall not identify them—said that in the process of employing a domestic member of staff they asked about her health, to which she said: "I understand what you are talking about and my health is fine. I have been tested and I am negative. However, my husband works in the mines in South Africa so he is away for weeks on end and I have no idea what he gets up to, but when he comes home he expects me to behave as any wife would so how long I will stay in that condition is indeterminate." That raises another issue: the sharply rising incidence of AIDS among women and girls and the fact that they have much less control over circumstances than they should. They need to be empowered to enable them to take more positive control over the situation.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I agree, as so often, with everything that the hon. Gentleman has so far said. May I support and reinforce his observation about targets? Its importance seems to be underlined by what he has just said about the attitude of particular states to personal behaviour. Does he not agree that the Government need to take care not to overdo localism and decentralisation? If we are providing money, we are entitled to stipulate in some measure of detail what we expect by way of its effective use. In respect of disaggregation, does he not agree that it should not be necessary continually to press the World Health Organisation for disaggregation of data? What is the rocket science? It ought to be done.

Malcolm Bruce: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, and more will be said about that.

It would be fair to say that there was not entire agreement on the Committee—although there was no fundamental division—about the exact role of targets. However, we agreed that we needed to quantify what we were doing and pull it back together. One cannot leave these things to every country and hope that that combination will deliver what we have set. We agree about the objective, even if we have not focused on how best to achieve it. That is about attitudes.

There are some issues surrounding a survey that was conducted in South Africa about people's knowledge and behaviour in relation to AIDS. It produced two or three disturbing statistics. Many answers represented what one would expect, and people's knowledge was clear. However, one statement was:

"You can reduce the risk of HIV by having fewer sexual partners."

Although 67.3 per cent. of both sexes agreed with that, 24.4 per cent. did not agree, which is an alarmingly high figure.

Within the survey, we also received an indication that the percentage of young women and men who have had sex before age 15 is high—on average about 25 per cent. It seems to be true of many affected countries. The other statement that was highlighted was that the percentage of young women and men aged 15 to 24 reporting the use of a condom the last time that they had sex with a non-marital and non-co-habiting sexual partner was 69 per cent.

In the context of Botswana, that statistic raises a contentious issue. Although DFID is supporting Botswana through the Southern African Development Community, we do not have a heavy engagement programme, because it is a middle-income country. As a consequence, the Americans are heavily involved in Botswana. The Gates Foundation is fine, but the President's Fund is not quite so fine, because the American contribution through the President's Fund places a heavy emphasis on abstinence and moralising. The statistics demonstrate that a significant number of people will not be reached by that approach. I know that the British Government do not share that approach, but if we are not there, for example, there are problems because we leave the field clear. When we are there together with the Americans, there is tension.

Although none of us has a problem with the basic idea that people should be encouraged to be monogamous, an over-moralising attitude will not reach many people. As the Secretary of State precisely and starkly said yesterday, we do not agree with the American position; and, as he put it, people should not die because they have sex—even in circumstances in which people disapprove of the fact that they have had it. If we are trying to deal with the problem on that scale, we must be realistic and we must engage robustly with those who tell us otherwise.

That approach did not work with drugs. The "Just say no" campaign has not stopped the advance of drug abuse, and it will not stop the advance of HIV/AIDS. Prevention is as important as cure, although our report is concerned to ensure that we get treatment to those people who need it.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): I want to share with the hon. Gentleman some information that I received yesterday. It is relevant to how we tackle the issue. In Zambia, where DIFD is involved in a great partnership on primary education, the removal of school fees has enabled girls to go to school, and there has been a shift: among girls receiving primary education, there has been a reduction in HIV infections, whereas for those who have not received primary education, infections continue at similar levels. Primary education—for girls, in particular—can have an impact, and is relevant to the issues that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Malcolm Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that intervention, because it reinforces the fact that the AIDS problem can be tackled successfully. There is some evidence of that across east Africa, and not just in Zambia. I received similar information on the situation in Uganda, where it is not only education about HIV/AIDS that makes the difference; it is the fact that the girls are in school, and therefore less vulnerable to being preyed on than when they are out in the communities. So there was a double benefit from their being in schools. That is an immeasurable result, in terms of bringing the epidemic under control and reversing it.

I have one final comment on attitude. The acquittal of Jacob Zuma in a contentious trial in South Africa highlighted the cultural and social problems involved. I picked up a press report that says that, after his trial, he apologised for not having used a condom. That was an acknowledgement that he had been a bad role model, and a sign that he wanted to do something right. Indeed, the report says that "he became visibly upset when a journalist challenged him on his admission made in court and widely reported in the media, that he had showered after sex to reduce the risk of HIV infection. 'If you've been in the kitchen, my dear, peeling onions, you wash your hands afterwards,' he said."

That is not a very sensitive and sensible comment, but at least he has had the grace to acknowledge that, apologise, and state what he should have done; that is a step in the right direction.

I now come to the completely different issue of TRIPS—trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights—and patent rights. Again, that is a concern for the Minister. There is a Financial Times report about a march on the Indian Parliament yesterday against the application for a patent on an antiretroviral drug from Gilead Sciences. Such a patent would be completely contrary to the spirit of what we are trying to negotiate, which is the right for generic drugs to be manufactured to deal with the problem in individual countries. The final point in the report is:

"Indian drug companies, such as Cipla, have developed a low-cost generic version of tenofovir, priced in India at a seventh of international levels and would be likely to have to cease production or pay steep royalties if a patent was granted."

Clearly, we have not completely won that battle, and I hope that the Government will use whatever influence they have to stop that sort of litigation. That litigation could lead to the deaths of tens of thousands of people by denying them affordable access to drugs, or could divert resources in the Indian budget away from where they are needed.

I am conscious that a number of hon. Members wish to take part in the debate, so I shall not take the matter further. I conclude by saying that the international community has made an ambitious commitment to tackling the problem. The United Nations is demonstrating a determination to keep on top of that, and at the turn of the month it will monitor where we are on the issue and will make further progress. From that, I hope that we will get an idea of what we have succeeded in doing and where we have failed, and that a recommended course of action is pointed out to help us to achieve our end.

We—and certainly our Committee—will have to take on board the fact that for many of the countries involved, the problem is social, humanitarian and economic. The economic problem has social dimensions. There is a suggestion that, by 2010, some 50 per cent. of all children in Zambia will be orphans. There is a huge issue of responsibility, in terms of who will look after those children, and how they will be brought up and maintained. That is assuming that they are not infected themselves or, if they are, that they can get treatment. A country such as Botswana could see its entire economic success wiped out if it does not get on top of the problem. I hope that the countries concerned have the capacity to do that.

With the greatest respect, although there is no difference of view between us and the Department, the Committee is so concerned about the need to demonstrate commitment that we shall put the Department under continuous review by publishing an annual report on our judgment of what progress has been made, in the hope that that will apply additional pressure. The Department might feel that that is unnecessary, but we think it desirable to ensure that there is an annual parliamentary report saying how well we are doing in achieving the overall objectives.

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that GDP growth figures often underestimate the economic impact of AIDS? They cannot encapsulate, for example, the effect of a reduction in life expectancy or the fact that a huge proportion of a country's health service has to be devoted to tackling the scourge of HIV/AIDS rather than to other things. In that sense, even though the reductions in growth figures for African countries that are affected by HIV/AIDS might be relatively small, the impact is much greater.

Malcolm Bruce: The hon. Gentleman is right; indeed, the problem is even worse than that, because in many cases there is substantial under-reporting.

The negative effect of too much moralising—I do not deny that moral education has a value, but there can be too much of it—can add to the stigma and discourage people from coming forward. I see that ex-president Clinton—I think that President Clinton is still his title in the United States—has called for mandatory screening in all countries and has demonstrated that that gets rid of the stigma, because it happens to everybody. People who need treatment are identified and they receive it. I do not know whether that is the answer, but it is an interesting contribution to the debate. We need to identify the problem, quantify it and solve it. That will require every sinew of every major country in the world, in partnership with the countries most affected, to deliver those end products.

The Committee is proud of what the Government are doing. We appreciate the commitment and the lead role that we are playing. We hope that they will use that lead role to help shape the outcome in ways in which we have more confidence than the largest donor to the programme does, the United States. We have to work with the United States, but we have to make it clear that we have a reason for our different approach and that our approach must reach the people that otherwise will not be reached.

2.53 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce). I pay tribute to his chairmanship and to the Committee for its report, the first of the Session and on an important subject.

I do not intend to speak for too long but, on average, for every minute that I do, nine people in the world will become infected with HIV and six will die from AIDS. At least one of the newly infected people will be a child and so will one of those who dies. I sometimes wonder whether the shock-horror statistics—40 million people living with HIV, five million new infections, three million deaths a year—might be too much or difficult to comprehend. There is a danger that people might become overwhelmed by the scale of the crisis and conclude that the battle is lost.

It is important to remember that progress is possible and in some areas has been made. The global response to AIDS has improved significantly since the world's leaders agreed the 2001 UN General Assembly special session's "Declaration of Commitment on HIV/AIDS". The special session's declaration followed the millennium declaration and set targets for prevention, treatment, care and support. The "Declaration of Commitment on HIV/AIDS" will be reviewed at the UN high-level meeting in New York at the end of this month.

Total funds available for HIV work in the developing world have more than quadrupled since 2001 and are in the target range set by the special session. Progress on the ground can be seen in some areas. Prevention work has reduced the spread of HIV in some countries, including Uganda, Senegal, Thailand and Brazil. With respect to treatment, the "3 by 5" campaign was launched by UNAIDS and the World Health Organisation, with the target of giving 3 million people access to drugs by the end of 2005. That target was missed. The number of people getting HIV drugs in the developing world nearly doubled last year to 1.3 million. It is clear that far more needs to be done. For every five people in the developing world who need HIV drugs, only one gets them. Last year the G8, led by the UK, made a commitment to getting as close as possible to universal access to HIV treatment by 2010. I join the Select Committee in commending the work of the Department for International Development in securing that commitment, which was adopted by world leaders at the UN.

Nobody in this Chamber needs to be reminded that if we are to meet the 2010 commitment, catching up with the epidemic will require a huge increase in the scale of the effort. For every one person in the developing world who received antiretrovirals last year, eight people were newly infected.

There has been an increase in funding, but the resources available at present to address HIV/AIDS still do not match the scale of the crisis. As cited by DFID in its written evidence to the Select Committee, it is estimated that $15 billion is required this year to meet prevention, treatment and care objectives, yet only $9 billion is available. The UN Secretary-General has warned that the rate of increase in HIV funding appears to be slowing, yet $22 billion will be needed for 2008.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will remind us that the UK has increased the money that it makes available: at least £1.5 billion will be spent in the current three-year spending round, including £100 million each year for the global fund to fight AIDS, tuberculosis and malaria.

I had the privilege of initiating a debate on the global health fund a year or so ago. At that time, the drive was to get round 5 launched. I was pleased that last month's board meeting agreed to launch round 6, and that the UK was given much of the credit for the decision. However, I understand that no money is yet available for round 6, as all existing finances are required to cover the costs of previous rounds. Of course, that means that new pledges are needed from donors. I would be grateful for an indication from my hon. Friend the Minister as to how he sees that developing and how we can get an adequate response from donors. I welcome the acknowledgement of the Chairman of the Select Committee about the contribution that the Government have made in this area. Indeed, this country is a world leader.

Access to drugs was the centre-piece of the Select Committee's excellent report. One strand in the effort to get drugs to those who need them has dealt with prices. There have been moves to reduce the cost of antiretrovirals in poorer countries through differential pricing and the availability of generic drugs. Such steps have had a noticeable effect on the prices of first-line drugs. However, as resistance becomes more prevalent, there will be more need for second and third-line treatments, whose prices remain high. In his report to next month's high-level meeting, the UN Secretary-General has called on donors to work with their pharmaceutical industries to reduce the prices of second and third-line drugs, and I would be grateful if the Minister could outline where discussions on the matter are in the UK.

Bearing in mind that pharmaceutical companies need an income to finance research, I would be grateful for an insight from my hon. Friend the Minister into how well we are doing at ensuring that lower-priced drugs remain in the developing countries for which they are intended. DFID noted in its framework for good practice in the pharmaceutical industry how important it is to "avoid leakage and diversion". I believe that there is broad consensus in this Parliament that we must enable drug companies to make profits if they are to develop new drugs.

The hon. Member for Gordon referred to trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights. As we know from the Government's response, they do not share the Select Committee's view that they should lobby for a review of TRIPS at this time. However, I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Minister could indicate whether he is of the widely held view that the TRIPS safeguards are too onerous and too complicated for developing countries seeking to get access to vital drugs.

On the affordability of treatment, the Select Committee considered the effect of user fees and concluded that it had heard no evidence that such fees improve adherence to drug regimes. I would be interested to hear the Minister's assessment of the reliability of the data on that point, and his response to the call by the Select Committee to work with the WHO and UNAIDS to issue a statement supporting the removal of user fees.

I note that the UNAIDS paper "Towards Universal Access", published at the end of March, set a target date of June next year for countries to reduce or eliminate user fees for AIDS-related services including treatment. I wonder whether we can anticipate progress in the direction hoped for by the Select Committee. Again, what is the Government's view?

Meeting the 2010 target—the target for universal access—will require action from many agencies at international, regional and national level. The global steering committee, which is co-chaired by the UK, has called for an integrated approach through implementation partnerships involving not only the Government but other key leaders in society, including private sector employers.

I shall say a few words about the need for the private sector to meet its obligations. The World Economic Forum warns that businesses are doing too little, too late, in the battle against HIV/AIDS. The organisation conducted a survey of businesses worldwide and found that some firms have responded to the needs of their work force. Globally, 17 per cent. of responding firms provide antiretroviral drugs. That rises to 38 per cent. in the countries that are hit hardest by HIV. The private sector delivers antiretrovirals to 60,000 people in South Africa. However, the response is still inadequate. Kofi Annan described the level of provision as lamentable. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister would outline what is being done to secure a strengthening of the private sector's response.

Getting antiretrovirals to everyone who needs them is not merely a matter of securing adequate quantities of affordable drugs. For a start, health workers can treat only those people who have tested positive for HIV. Access to testing and counselling services more than quadrupled between 2001 and 2005 in more than 70 countries surveyed, but UNAIDS reports that only a fraction of the 40.3 million people who are currently living with HIV are aware of their infection. Yet the health infrastructure in many countries has been weakened. Many health workers have been lost to AIDS. In some countries pay for health care and other key infrastructure staff is below subsistence levels. Added to that is the pull of richer countries that rely on health care workers from the developing world.

The broader health infrastructure of many countries that have been hit by the epidemic will need to be strengthened if the world is to meet the 2010 commitment.

Joan Ruddock: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there may be real scope for the international community to give much more support to health workers in relation to financial assistance, social payments or some means to enable them to remain in their own countries to provide the services that are required? In Africa we saw that it is, as my right hon. Friend says, not just the availability of drugs that matters, but systematic testing and monitoring of the people receiving the drugs. That requires an enormous input from health workers. If there are not sufficient health workers—as is true of all the countries in question—we need a way to assist them in acquiring greater numbers, perhaps by training but certainly by support.

Dr. Strang: My hon. Friend raises an important and topical point, because as hon. Members are probably aware, a change in the regulations on medical staff means that people training in the medical field from outwith the European Union will find it difficult to get employment; everything is now swinging in favour of doctors trained in eastern Europe. On Sunday, I spoke to the Bangladeshi postgraduate association in Edinburgh, and although we were not, in particular, pursuing the present subject, we discussed the question of how to provide the correct incentives. What should our attitude be to the doctors and nurses who come to work in our health service?

The answer is that we live in a global world, and that they must have the opportunity, if they want it, to work in this country. However, as my hon. Friend says, we should surely try to provide incentives and encouragement to them to go back, even if only for five years, to make a contribution, having been trained to a high standard in this country. I think, also, that we must be prepared to employ them. We cannot just train them and tell them to go home immediately.

John Bercow: Of course, substantial subvention by the Department for International Development of key cadres of health service staff is taking place to the great advantage of Malawi—a fact that we discovered on a recent visit. Further, however, in response to the intervention of the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock), does the right hon. Gentleman agree that on the assumption that we cannot finance staff or anything else for ever, it is incredibly important that we accept the need not only to finance staff now but to train the future trainers of staff?

Dr. Strang: Again, I am grateful for the intervention; it is a complex area and perhaps the Minister will throw some light on it. Certainly we are all aware of the objectives. We want, as the hon. Member for Gordon said, to reverse the process that is going on to an extent in some countries of an implosion of the health infrastructure, for which there are several reasons, not least of which is HIV itself.

I congratulate the Select Committee on addressing prevention in its report on the treatment target. As I have said, last year an extra 630,000 people in the developing world received HIV drugs, but there were also almost 5 million new infections in that year. Without improving prevention work, we do not have a hope of reaching the 2010 commitment.

Many of the people most at risk are not being reached by the HIV prevention programmes. Throughout the world, less than one person in five has access to basic HIV prevention services. Less than a third of young people in the developing world can correctly identify ways of preventing HIV transmission, as against the 90 per cent. target set by the special session. The United Nations population fund estimates the gap between the supply and the demand of condoms to be 50 per cent. It is also important to reduce maternal transmission of HIV. Only 9 per cent. of HIV-positive pregnant women receive antiretroviral drugs; that is still very low. The failure to provide treatment to pregnant women is one of the factors leading to 1,800 infants becoming infected with HIV every day. The Department for International Development's written evidence to the Select Committee cites estimates that a comprehensive HIV prevention package costing $4.2 billion annually by 2007 could avert 29 million of the 45 million new infections expected by 2010. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to do all in his power to secure additional funding for the world's prevention efforts.

All Members present are aware that reaching a consensus on prevention work presents challenges, most notably in respect of the use of condoms. I was interested to read the evidence given to the Committee in support of the ABC approach—abstinence, be faithful and use condoms. However, I share the Committee's concern about an over-emphasis on abstinence; the Chairman, the hon. Member for Gordon, referred to that. If ABC is to work, the three strands must work together. We must not allow the moral attractions of A or B to lead us to exclude from HIV prevention work the very people who need to be reached.

In that context, Members will have seen reports that the Catholic Church may be prepared to consider whether the use of a condom is a lesser evil than the transmission of AIDS. According to the media coverage, the specific circumstances currently being considered involve the use of condoms by a married couple when one of them is HIV-positive. I am sure that we all look forward to seeing these deliberations proceed.

At the end of this month, a high-level meeting will review achievements against the targets set five years ago in the declaration of commitment on HIV/AIDS. As I suggested at the beginning of my remarks, despondency is as much our enemy as complacency. Behind the missed targets and depressingly high infection rates lie grounds for hope for the 2010 commitment to universal access. To miss the "3 by 5" target was desperately disappointing, but the progress made in response to the initiative showed that antiretrovirals can be administered in deprived areas, that adherence is good, and that the necessary public health policies can be put in place.

I shall conclude by quoting directly from Kofi Annan's report to the forthcoming high-level meeting:

"Although the epidemic and its toll continue to outstrip the worst predictions, the foundation for an extraordinarily stronger and sustained response is largely in place. For the first time ever, the will and means needed to make real headway have been secured."

We can be proud of the British Government's contribution, and I am glad that my hon. Friend the Minister will be in place in the next few crucial years. I am sure that he has the experience to continue to contribute to ensuring that we progress.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I remind Members that we have to conclude the debate by half-past 5. Quite a large number of Members wish to speak, including some who have not given notice to the Speaker's Office, and I would like to allow as many Members as possible to contribute to this important debate—if not all of them who wish to do so.

3.9 pm

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang). He followed me in a disability debate last week in the main Chamber and said that my tone was very much in line with the new leadership of the Conservative party. I have been trying to work out whether he considered that to be a compliment. In any case, it is a pleasure to follow him again.

It is also a pleasure to follow the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce), who made an excellent contribution. Under his chairmanship, the Committee has not fallen into the trap of thinking that we have solved the HIV/AIDS problem with the Gleneagles declaration. It has remained a high priority on the Committee's agenda, which I welcome and thank him for.

I also commend the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) on the work that he does as chair of the all-party group on AIDS. I worked closely with him on the successful early-day motion on interim targets which was signed by 250 Members. As a new Member, I reflected on whether the secret to success was to form an alliance between old left and new right, although I suspect that such an approach would not find favour in either of our parties.

Last month, in Nairobi, I attended the funeral of Christobel Wanju, an HIV-positive orphan. She was 13 years old, and I met her a couple of years ago on a visit to Kenya. She was a delightful girl, and was apparently healthy, although she was HIV-positive. She had an undetectable viral load; her CD4 count was perfectly adequate. Five weeks ago, she had severe headaches and was rushed to hospital. Tragically, on 4 April, she died. The reality is, unfortunately, that antiretroviral drugs alone are not the answer. From time to time, even children such as Christobel, who was in the controlled environment of an orphanage and was getting all the care and medicine that she needed, are cruelly snatched away just because the virus makes them weak. That is particularly the case for orphaned children, who do not receive the care that they need in their early years, although they might receive it later.

The slow-burn effect of HIV/AIDS means that it is not like a famine or tsunami, so it usually does not hit the headlines in the same way. When these children keep dying, we must remember the figure put out by UNAIDS: one child dies every minute. Last year, 570,000 children died from HIV/AIDS. Let us compare that with the tsunami which occurred at the turn of that year. We are talking about two tsunamis' worth of deaths from HIV/AIDS of children alone. Let us add the relevant figure for adult deaths, and we are talking about eight tsunamis' worth of deaths from HIV/AIDS, not as a one-off event, but every year.

The tragedy of the epidemic is that it is getting worse. For every child who dies from HIV/AIDS, 1.3 children are being born with it. We have almost managed to eliminate mother-to-child transmission in the developed world, but in many African countries the relevant figure for it is still more than 35 per cent.

Some people understandably ask, "Why AIDS? What about all the other killer diseases, such as tuberculosis, malaria and smallpox?" The best answer to that was given by Professor Alan Whiteside of the university of Natal. He described HIV/AIDS as an "involutionary" event. For him, involution is the opposite to evolution. He describes how most viruses extinguish themselves because they end up killing the host that is carrying them. The evil genius of HIV/AIDS is that the host—the person who is infected—remains apparently healthy for long enough to be able to transmit the infection to many other people before they themselves become ill.

As HIV/AIDS is a sexually transmitted disease, the effect on young people is particularly devastating. A prevalence rate of 25 per cent. in a country means that the likelihood of a teenager getting the virus in their lifetime is 50 per cent. If the prevalence rate increases to 35 per cent., their likelihood of getting it increases to between 80 and 90 per cent. South Africa is heading in that direction. At current rates, by 2010 it is predicted that three quarters of its teenagers will not be able to expect to live until their 60th birthday.

In that context, the Government should be extremely proud of what they achieved at Gleneagles last year. The 2010 universal access commitment was championed by the UK and was not easy to achieve. I congratulate the Minister and the Secretary of State on their personal commitment to that. I am grateful that interim targets have become UK Government policy, and am pleased to see that they are one of the proposals that we hope will be adopted from the submissions that are going before the UN for the high-level meeting on 2 June. What is the Minister's candid assessment of the chances of interim targets and milestones being adopted at that meeting?

If we are to achieve universal access, it will not be a question only of declarations and high-level commitments from the world community; a number of practical challenges will also need to be addressed, and I should like to touch briefly on some of them. The first challenge is money. This week, the Minister stated to me in a parliamentary answer that there will be a funding shortfall of $18 billion in anti-AIDS programmes during the next two years—only half the period between now and 2010. The international community is still not putting its money where its mouth is. What will the Minister do to try to persuade G8 countries other than the US and the UK, which have taken a leading role in the battle against AIDS—the Italys, Frances, Germanys and Japans—to play their role and contribute what they should to the battle against HIV/AIDS?

I do not want to pre-empt the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble), who is a great expert on paediatric drugs, but the second big challenge is the supply of paediatric drugs for HIV-positive children. The HIV virus is unusually and particularly aggressive in children, whose immune systems are undeveloped, yet fewer than one in 20 of the children who need antiretrovirals can expect to get them. When they do get them, by and large the portions, which have been chopped up, are not sized for them, but for adults. The regimen for antiretroviral drugs has to be administered extremely carefully, and that is a bad way of ensuring that children get the correct dosages. They very often have to rely on syrups and solutions, which, again, are not ideal because the dosage can be wrong and they have to be refrigerated.

As the shadow Secretary of State for International Development pointed out yesterday in the House, there is no market for such drugs in the west so drugs companies have been very slow in developing them. The point of his question was this, and I ask the Minister to respond to it: if the Secretary of State asked to see the heads of the drugs companies, that would provide a major impetus for getting them to raise paediatric AIDS drugs up their list of priorities. Although I strongly welcome the discussions between the Department for International Development and the drugs companies, if such meetings were attended by the Secretary of State, the bosses of those companies would attend too and we would be far more likely to get progress.

The final challenge has not been talked about a great deal. How will fragile states in the poorest African countries, particularly conflict and post-conflict zones, reach the 2010 universal access target? Hank McKinnell, the chairman of Pfizer, one of the companies that manufactures a lot of antiretroviral drugs, said that if the cure for HIV/AIDS were simply a glass of clean water, we would not be able to get it to half the people who need it.

The development of health infrastructure is appallingly bad in such countries as Burundi, where there are only 300 doctors, a great majority of whom are in the capital. The Clinton Foundation recently estimated that if it were to get antiretroviral drugs to 57,000 people in Rwanda, it would need to double the number of doctors there. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo, where I went recently, outside Kinshasa there is only one doctor for every 30,000 people. That compares with one doctor for every 600 people in the UK.

There are two particular problems in conflict zones. First, there are food shortages. Some 17 million of the 53 million people in the DRC face such shortages, and antiretroviral drugs do not work properly if people do not receive proper nutrition. The second problem in conflict and post-conflict zones is the explosion of sexual violence. Indeed, while I was in the DRC, I went to one of the world's only rape hospitals. The problem is a real challenge, and it, too, must be addressed.

It is easy to be overwhelmed by the problems, but I want to conclude on a slightly more positive note because I believe that AIDS can be defeated in our lifetime. Although we are unlikely to find a cure—unfortunately, HIV/AIDS changes the DNA of cells and is incredibly difficult to unravel—we can have much better prevention programmes. Hopefully, those will involve microbicides, which offer great hope.

We can also have a much bigger roll-out of testing programmes. We need to look at what is happening in Lesotho, which has an opt-out testing programme. The programme is not mandatory, but every child is automatically tested at the age of 12 unless they opt out. That happens to everyone, so the stigma of testing is removed, which is a positive step.

We need to bring down the price of antiretroviral drugs much further. In particular, we need partnerships between pharmaceutical companies and generic drug manufacturers. Just imagine what would happen to the price of antiretroviral drugs if China started manufacturing them. That would have a huge impact, and it is potentially round the corner.

[Mr. Jeremy Hunt]

Finally, we might find a vaccine for HIV/AIDS. Michael Gottlieb, who discovered the virus in 1981, said that we could be trialling a vaccine by 2010 and that it could be widely available by 2021. My question, therefore, is simply this: given that we have the drugs to prevent AIDS deaths now, how many people will have died needlessly by then?

3.22 pm

Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate. I congratulate the Select Committee on producing its report. I am an officer of the all-party group on AIDS, so I take a particular interest in the subject, and I am pleased that the Committee gave it high priority.

Other hon. Members mentioned Botswana, and I want to speak a little about that country. I have visited Botswana three times since I entered Parliament. I went once in 1999, on a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association visit, and again in 2004. At the end of March this year, the Government of Botswana invited me to visit, and I spent four days looking at their HIV/AIDS programme. Over those three visits, I have been struck by how a country can change its reaction to HIV/AIDS.

In 1999, I spoke to the Minister of Health in Botswana, and there was a sense that HIV/AIDS was not a problem. However, I also spoke to the manager of a diamond mine who had just completed the anonymous testing of the work force and discovered infection rates of 25 to 30 per cent. Clearly, there was a problem, and the Government of Botswana quickly changed their approach. A few years ago, they reached an agreement with the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation and Merck to put in place a full programme of antiretroviral treatment for the population. That involved a $50 million contribution from Merck, the foundation and the Government. The Merck Company Foundation also provides the programme's two basic drugs—Crixivan and Stocrin.

When I went to Botswana two years ago, the country was beginning to build the delivery mechanism. I visited the Princess Marina hospital in Gaborone, which was the main clinic at the time, and it was treating about 24,000 patients. When I went there a few weeks ago, it had rolled the programme out across the country. Drugs are being distributed at more than 30 centres, and there are more than 50,000 people on the treatment programme, which is provided free. In addition, just under 10,000 people are probably being provided with drugs by their employers—mainly the diamond mine corporations in Botswana.

It is interesting that 300,000 people out of a population of 1.7 million are estimated to be HIV-positive. The Government feel that if they can reach 110,000 through the drugs programme, that will meet the needs of those people who require the drugs. They aim to reach that target in the next couple of years, but because of the spread of the disease and the fact that some of those who do not need the treatment at the moment will need it in the future, they will eventually need to deliver the programme to 150,000 throughout Botswana.

Botswana, as has been said, is a middle-income country with stable government and good infrastructure, and its health service is probably better than those of many other countries in Africa. Even with the deal that has been done, the money that has come in, the ability to deliver a drugs programme and a series of new testing centres, it is beginning to run into capacity problems in trying to use a western medical model to deliver the testing programme and the treatment programme throughout the country. I sense that even in Botswana they will struggle to have the capacity to do so.

Malcolm Bruce: The hon. Gentleman quotes a good case, and the Select Committee was in the same hospital just a few weeks ago. We were concerned to be told that 52.4 per cent. of Botswana's development aid programme is going on the HIV/AIDS programme. As he says, the Government are struggling in one of the most privileged countries. That shows the scale of the problem and why it is such a challenge. He is right: Botswana is a success story in comparison with most other places.

Mr. Borrow: One of the things that I picked up and sensed from the visit was that if there is bound to be a struggle even in Botswana, we need to encourage new systems and new models of delivery of care.

We need to engage with the medical professions to see whether we can deliver pharmaceutical products, do the testing and so on without relying on everything being done by pharmacists and doctors, and to see whether there is a way of working with people with lower skills and qualifications to deliver what is needed. If we cannot succeed in Botswana, the chances of being able to succeed in the rest of Africa, however much money is given for drug treatment, are not very large. It is not simply a matter of getting drugs for free, or for very little, and providing millions of dollars in aid. In the end, each country has to use its human capacity to put in place the medical system to deliver the drug treatment programme.

We need to begin to see whether it is possible to develop a different type of delivery mechanism to the one that we would expect to see in western Europe and north America. That problem has to be tackled in Botswana. It will apply across the whole of the developing world, because I do not understand how we can reach our aim to allow everybody who needs treatment to get the drugs unless we find a different mechanism for delivery. That is one of the lessons that I have picked up.

The Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce), raised my next point, which is the approach to prevention and how we challenge people's assumptions—ABC is the shorthand. A few years ago I was involved with UNAIDS and the Inter-Parliamentary Union in developing a handbook for parliamentarians on the subject. In all those discussions, what came across was the need to take a human rights approach to HIV/AIDS and to ask what in our legislation and prejudices gets in the way of tackling the disease. What do we as parliamentarians here, in Botswana, in India or wherever, need to do to enable AIDS to be defeated?

On a visit a few years ago to look into HIV/AIDS, I remember speaking to people in New Zealand, an affluent, western country. They faced a challenge in the late 1980s which meant they had to make decisions about drug users and men who had sex with men. It was necessary to change the law and change what was done to enable the problem to be tackled. I remember when the question of men who have sex with men was raised in Botswana, and the attitude was similar: "That is not something we really talk about." It is difficult to challenge that in many African countries.

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend makes a thoughtful speech, but does he agree that cultural attitudes about the role of women—I have noticed this particularly in sub-Saharan Africa—are a major contributor to the problem? Many women are kept deliberately ignorant of how to protect their sexual health, and they are certainly not encouraged to seek the information. We need to build up a civil society movement for women in those areas if we are effectively to deliver treatment of the sort he describes, and introduce the mechanisms that will enable our goals to be achieved.

Mr. Borrow: I agree. I am always struck when I visit sub-Saharan Africa by the strong imbalance between the sexes, and the frequency of sexual relationships between older men and younger women. Economic imbalance feeds the spread of the disease. Older men have many sexual partners, who are often very young women, and that creates problems because of the women's inability, as a result of the sexual imbalance in society, to insist on condoms or to say no. It is a challenge for us to ask countries in which the development has been different from ours to examine many of their belief systems when they get in the way of tackling HIV/AIDS.

John Bercow: The continued and extensive incidence of sexual violence, not least rape, is a related and legitimate cause for concern. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that donor countries must help recipient countries to address that problem, not least in the light of the fact that it is not merely the male rulers of those countries who regard that state of affairs as unexceptionable; it is a depressing reality that a large proportion of female citizens apparently still think that it is something up with which they have to put?

Mr. Borrow: I agree. A few years ago I visited a hospital in Addis Ababa in Ethiopia and spoke to women there. A culture clearly existed in which if a man wanted sexual relations with a woman or wanted to go out with a woman and she said no, it was legitimate for him to rape her, because she would then be no use to anyone and would have no choice but to become his sexual partner. That attitude was common, as was the attitude that a wife should expect to have nine children. That problem is particularly acute in the Ethiopian context, in which boys are fed much better than girls and women tend to be very small. As a result, many problems associated with the physical size of the woman occur in childbirth. I am well aware of that difficulty.

On a different matter, I am patron of a charity, the Naz Foundation International, which does work in south Asia to do with men who have sex with men. The Department for International Development contributes to projects there, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister, who is, I know, hoping to visit India in the near future, gets the opportunity to see some of those projects. In the south Asian context, it is interesting that infection rates are significantly higher among men than among women. That is a reversal of the situation in sub-Saharan Africa. It reflects a different pattern of sexual transmission. Although there is not what would be seen by western society as a gay community, it is not uncommon for men who are married and who have children to have sex with other men. That may be one of the links that creates the different pattern.

The legal situation in most of south Asia is not conducive to tackling the problem, which brings us back to the human rights issue and the fact that parliamentarians can put in place a proper legislative framework to help tackle such problems. I urge my hon. Friend to raise the matter if he visits India, because with that scale of population we need to do everything that we can to prevent an explosion of HIV/AIDS in south Asia. The risk is that such an explosion would be much larger than the explosion in Africa.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): Order. Again, I want to help hon. Members. If they discipline themselves when speaking, I hope that everyone will have the chance to speak. It is important that all who hope to speak can do so, given that they have been patient and have prepared for the debate.

3.36 pm

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): This is an important debate. We have heard a number of thoughtful contributions from all parts of the House. As the Select Committee report says, the HIV/AIDS pandemic is a full-blown global health emergency. When we consider the figures, it is impossible to disagree. The sheer scale of the problem is sobering. Since 1981, more than 25 million people have died of AIDS, and by the end of 2005 more than 40 million globally were living with HIV/AIDS. Of that number, 60 per cent. were living in sub-Saharan Africa, where the situation is most severe, and of the 5 million new infections recorded globally in 2005, 3.2 million were in sub-Saharan Africa.

Figures like those are difficult to appreciate fully, but they help to underline the scale of the problem. However, although Africa is bearing the brunt of the disease, no part of the world is immune to the pandemic. HIV/AIDS is not restricted to a particular country, age group or section of society. It is a global problem, and it requires and deserves a global reaction. It is in that context that I welcome today's debate on the report "Delivering the Goods" and the Government's response.

It is worth remembering that since 1999 there has been a steep rise in the number of HIV diagnoses in the United Kingdom. Reports show that at least 6,700 people in the UK were diagnosed with HIV during 2005, and that number is expected to rise. The welcome and rapid scaling up of antiretroviral treatment programmes in Africa, driven by international advocacy and supported by unprecedented global funding, offers hope to millions of HIV-infected Africans. It is important to realise how far the issue has moved up the priority list in the international community, which I welcome wholeheartedly.

I join those who have already spoken in commending the work of the Department for International Development, in particular its success in securing the G8 commitment to ensuring universal antiretroviral treatment by 2010. However, although Her Majesty's Government are a worthy contributor to the battle against HIV/AIDS, one of DFID's key roles must be to influence the approach of other nations, to ensure that the funds mobilised are used in the most effective manner.

I shall be brief, and I shall try to avoid repeating what has already been said. I wish to focus on the importance of prevention and the need to steer international efforts towards a greater appreciation of a more balanced approach to treating HIV/AIDS. First, I add my voice to those who have argued that prevention and treatment are two sides of the same coin. As "Delivering the Goods" makes clear, expanding access to HIV treatment should not be seen as a simple technical fix to the pandemic. A major scaling up of HIV prevention must form an integral part of all programmes to expand treatment. It could be argued that the overall international investment does not fully reflect that. In that regard, the Department's approach is difficult to fault.

I was delighted to see the important role played by DFID in securing international agreement on UNAIDS new prevention policy and to see the Government throw their weight behind emphasising the importance of a properly balanced approach in that regard and the recognition that prevention must remain the cornerstone of a comprehensive response to AIDS. DFID has a crucial role to play, not simply to fill the gaps left by the US, as some have put it, but to lead and inform the US policy and approach. As the Committee repeatedly heard in evidence, continued research is needed on the complex range of factors that affect HIV transmission and determine the eventual success or failure of HIV prevention strategies. The crucial point is that any such strategies must be firmly based on evidence; there should be no political agenda to them.

As many hon. Members will know, the US Government's PEPFAR fund—the President's emergency plan for AIDS relief—has a strong emphasis on the provision of treatment and care for people with AIDS, with only one fifth of the money used for HIV prevention work. Many groups and workers on the ground have rightly been dismayed by the requirement that one third of those prevention resources be ring-fenced for spending on programmes promoting sexual abstinence before marriage. That is a good idea for those to whom it is applicable, but it does not work for all.

The emphasis on that idea has been the subject of considerable discussion, particularly with regard to the effectiveness of such an approach at the apparent expense of other initiatives, such as the distribution of condoms. PEPFAR's five-year strategy document mentions condom provision and promotion only for those who practise high-risk behaviour; condoms are not mentioned as a strategy to help young people in general. Clearly, that approach differs significantly from previous US policy and the policies of other donors, including the UK. The European Union and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria have a similar view to that of the UK. Often, the ABC approach—abstinence, being faithful and condoms—is advocated by the US, but sometimes it is over-weighted in favour of the A and the B. Hon. Members will know that there have been reports of organisations refusing US funding because they believe that condoms should be promoted beyond high-risk groups. There is a fear that the approach will lead to the restigmatisation of condoms and promote the notion that they do not work as a form of HIV prevention. Such stigmatisation is a side effect that we can ill afford.

The medical journal The Lancet has published an editorial calling PEPFAR's approach to preventing sexual HIV transmission "ill-informed and ideologically driven", and calling for a complete reversal of the policy. The editorial concludes:

> "Many more lives will be saved if condom use is heavily promoted alongside messages to abstain and be faithful".

I could not agree more. The essential problem is that PEPFAR sets other funding restrictions that are not necessarily based on evidence of what is most effective in combating HIV and AIDS. Thankfully, DFID's approach has been quite the reverse. It is crucial that we use what leverage we have to steer US policy towards what works and away from what will satisfy the conscience of the American Christian lobby.

One further issue that warrants serious discussion—it has been mentioned—is the potential use of HIV testing as a medical routine for any patient whose symptoms may be due to HIV and as routine for all individuals with tuberculosis. There is a growing feeling that that could be justified, not only in the interests of the patient but in the broader interest of HIV prevention. As hon. Members will know, HIV has a long incubation period; many years can pass with no symptoms apparent. As a result, individuals can unwittingly pass on the disease to many people. Clearly, one major challenge is identifying those individuals at an early stage.

Sir John Crofton, a distinguished Edinburgh scientist and the pioneer of the DOTS—directly observed treatment short course—programme for TB, is one of the growing number of cheerleaders for routine testing. Sir John recently pointed out to me that many years ago, when syphilis was a major health problem, it was routine to test for syphilis all patients complaining of almost anything, as syphilis has such a wide variety of symptoms. Similarly, if we are to treat HIV as a public health emergency, which it undoubtedly is, routine testing could make a major difference in preventing the spread of the disease and improving early diagnosis and treatment. Having to ask every patient for permission to test for HIV can give rise to much unnecessary anxiety, as many patients will undoubtedly be negative. There is also the danger that the practice only reinforces the stigmatisation of HIV that has been such an obstacle to progress.

The contrast between the treatment of tuberculosis and the treatment of HIV is also worthy of some consideration. TB prevention and control programmes have epitomised the public health approach, where controlling transmission of the disease has been a paramount aim, with less focus on patient-centred goals. In contrast, HIV programmes have tended to focus on an individual approach to HIV testing that is private, confidential and voluntary, but which has placed little emphasis on interrupting chains of transmission.

We have to ask ourselves whether that approach is sustainable. In a region where such a large proportion of the population is living with HIV, public health must be the priority. Fewer than 10 per cent. of African patients with TB are tested for HIV. I would be interested to hear the Minister's thoughts on the introduction of universal HIV testing for patients with confirmed or suspected tuberculosis. TB and HIV go hand in hand so often that it would make sense for treatment and prevention to do likewise.

We should also be sensitive to the relationships among TB, malaria and HIV. In the countries with the highest HIV prevalence, more than 75 per cent. of TB cases are HIV-associated. Those three diseases are interconnected and it is important that responses are tailored to reflect that. I am pleased that a truly co-ordinated approach towards TB and HIV is now recognised at the highest levels. Many members of the Committee and other hon. Members have met too many people who have suffered from HIV and AIDS. One is one too many, but fortunately the provision of antiretrovirals provides a light at the end of the tunnel. We must ensure that, through the report and this debate, we continue to tackle the problem and keep it at the top of our agenda.

3.47 pm

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I shall keep my remarks brief, because I appreciate that other hon. Members want to participate. I should also like to say what a pleasure it is to follow the excellent speech made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett).

I shall focus on two points. The first is the report's recommendations on children and the second is delivery on the ground. In commending the report, which above all is focused and concise—that strengthens its recommendations—I am pleased to see its recommendations on the need for more attention to be paid to children with HIV and AIDS, particularly in connection with the research on new paediatric formulae and diagnostics. I shall not repeat the remarks that the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) made in his excellent speech, but I should say that he set out clearly the problems faced as a result of the lack of paediatric formulae; indeed, I understand that only one combination of drugs is prepared specifically for children.

The issue of diagnostics is desperately important. Anyone who goes to homes and street shelters in sub-Saharan Africa will find children who have been abandoned at the steps for other people to bring up. The carers have no idea of the status of the children or sometimes of the background of the parents. There is no way in which the carers can establish such status because of the lack of research on effective diagnostics for children. I have seen children who were clearly ill, but whose illness it was impossible for the carers exactly to determine.

UNICEF gave evidence to the Committee—it made an excellent submission—and at one stage it was proposing to establish a special fund to look at the development of paediatric formulae and of diagnostics. I would be interested to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister whether UNICEF is still pressing for that fund and if so, whether the Government will contribute to it, as it would seem an important way to plug one of the gaps in HIV/AIDS provision.

I also want to deal with the effectiveness of aid and access to antiretrovirals, because there are two sides to treatment: the roll-out of antiretrovirals, and ensuring that people can access drugs and take advantage of them. We must focus on both aspects. I commend the work of Save the Children in this regard. In an excellent report on blockages in the international aid system, it identified such blockages and, in particular, identified money that goes into national Governments and does not come out again. It was a real credit to Save the Children that it also found that money goes into large NGOs and stays there without reaching the community organisations.

I should also like to draw attention to the work emerging from the technical consultation in London organised by the consortiums working group on orphans and vulnerable children. My hon. Friend the Minister knows about that work, which specifically considered such issues, and about the research that World Vision has just set up to analyse in practical terms in the field the way in which funding gets through. I hope that DFID will take on board all that work to ensure that aid is more effective.

I have recently returned from Nairobi in Kenya, where I spent two days at a conference that the Department for Education and Skills sponsored to consider children's issues and, in particular, young carers in relation to AIDS. It was an excellent and well-organised conference. I encourage DFID to liaise with DFES and to pick up the recommendations from the conference and find some way to carry them forward. They focus largely on the details of child care using a child-centred approach, and they do so from the perspective of child policy, which sits within DFES but has profound implications for international development policy.

I also took the chance to visit Kibera and speak to the Kenyan Network of Women with AIDS, with which I work, as my hon. Friend knows. The network still has financial problems. It is grateful to DFID for the funds that have been provided, which amount to about £10,000, but it needs a budget of $300,000 to run a total of eight centres, so there is still a substantial shortfall.

Having spoken to the network in some detail, I understand that the World Bank and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria are not funding the Kenyan Government, because of the problems in that Government. One can say that we should not put funds through a government with traceability and accountability problems, but in practice it means that in Kenya, which has one of the highest prevalence of HIV/AIDS, either 300 or 3,000—I cannot remember how many noughts were on the figure—community-based organisations are without money. Some have shut down, while others such as KENWA have been able to beg, borrow and cadge to get enough funds to keep on going. However, they have had to retrench people, reduce payments and refuse to take on new cases, and in the Kenyan context, that is desperate.

Cynics might ask what the funding of community-based organisations has to do with the roll-out of antiretrovirals. The answer is simple: those organisations work in the slums where the high incidence rates are. Kibera has an infection rate of about 40 to 50 per cent., according to Médecins Sans Frontières. The organisations have credibility in the community, and they can deal with the problems of stigma and provide an holistic approach for people. They will provide people with food and ensure that their rent is paid and that they are strong enough to withstand the rigours of antiretroviral treatment, which, as the hon. Member for South-West Surrey said, is a major issue.

Funds and treatment need to be provided, and everyone recognises that there has been enormous progress in that area, thanks in particular to the UK Government, who have played an influential role. At the same time, however, the pull of demand is required at the other end. We need people to come forward and access counselling and treatment in the most disadvantaged areas where infection rates are highest. I understand that at the UNGASS meeting next month, the community-based organisations are going to bring up the fact that funding at community level is not there.

Mr. Hunt: Does the hon. Lady agree that one problem for community organisations is the fact that DFID is reluctant to fund small organisations in countries such as Kenya, because it prefers to fund big programmes? Often, some of those important community organisations, which can be very effective on the ground, find that they cannot get the support that they need.

Ms Keeble: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. This is a complex issue. It is understandable that a large, bilateral programme is not well placed to fund an individual, small-scale community-based organisation. There is a need to have local ownership. UNICEF also provides funding: it provides some of the £150 million earmarked for orphans and vulnerable children. There is an issue regarding how the consultation methods are set up; it is about people knowing how to get access to those funds when they are provided through other organisations.

There is a major issue with situations in which there is a corrupt or problematic Government through whom funding is supposed to be going, and we should probably consider whether there is some arms-length way of dealing with that problem. I completely understand that the global fund and the World Bank do not want to put enormous amounts of our constituents' money through corrupt Governments, but it is unacceptable for our constituents to think that money has been earmarked and then find out that there are 300 or 3,000 organisations at grass-roots level that are desperate to help some of the poorest and most vulnerable people, but simply cannot get access to the money. It is not surprising when such organisations say, "Excuse us for being just a tiny bit cynical; we hear about the money being spent but we simply don't know how to get hold of it. In the meantime, we are laying people off, the kids are going hungry, we can't get people on to treatment and people are dying." That is a serious issue.

Dr. Strang: I think that hon. Members are impressed by my hon. Friend's involvement in the situation and her knowledge. She is clearly making a distinction between bilateral support from the UK Government and the global fund. I am sure that she will agree that it is important to maintain the credibility of the global fund. Does she agree that there is a danger that if projects are not properly tested and people are not confident that the Government are delivering, the global fund will begin to lose credibility?

Ms Keeble: I take that point. The funding issue is too complex to go into within the confines of this debate. My hon. Friend the Minister has been helpful by listening to me moaning at him about this matter for quite some time. I appreciate his patience in that, and the detail of his responses. I assume that he is going to the meeting that I mentioned, and I ask him to take time to meet the organisations, listen to what they say, take it seriously, and find a way to deal with the red tape that prevents people from getting the money that everyone wants them to have to produce the results that everyone agrees are a desirable goal. If he can do that, there will be real progress on the ground and, given that the UK Government have been so good about giving out all the money, the roll-out of the antiretrovirals will be effective and will reach some of the most vulnerable people, whom we see when we visit those communities, and ensure that they and their children have the benefit of these miracle drugs—longer life and better health.

I apologise, Sir Nicholas, that because some constituents have been waiting to see me for rather a long time to talk about health issues, I shall have to duck out of the debate for a while. I apologise also to whichever hon. Member speaks after me, but I shall return.

4 pm

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to take part in the debate and to be reacquainted with friends on a Committee that I still miss very much. The work of Her Majesty's Opposition has taken me in a different direction for the past couple of years.

It is also a pleasure to listen to a series of speeches that would, if they were more widely available, do much to combat the rather smart cynicism about modern politics and our commitment to people. The compassion and knowledge shown by members of the Committee and hon. Members who speak about the topic never ceases to amaze me, not least the contribution of my new colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt). Every now and again, contributions come along that make one appreciate politics in general and the fact that one's own party is in good hands for the future, and do much to contribute to such a belief.

What personal and slight knowledge I have of the topic tends to come from my work with World Vision, a visit to Mozambique last year and the challenging and interesting contributions from my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow). World Vision took us to see children orphaned by AIDS and I want to base my brief contribution on the part of the report that covered that.

I am sure that we have all experienced the same feeling on such visits: a mixture of a distressing and an uplifting experience. What one sees is distressing, as is one's feeling of inadequacy at walking away from almost unbearable life situations which the throw of the dice has given to others. Yet, it can be uplifting because of the extraordinary commitment of those who work with such families and the spirit of those who are infected but find a way to live which would challenge the presumptions of most of us.

I, too, found the difficulties relating to diet that my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey mentioned distressing. In the small district that we visited, 80 people had been diagnosed with HIV/AIDS, none of whom was receiving treatment because the available diet would not have sustained the treatment that could have been had at some of the local clinics.

Children who are orphaned by AIDS present a series of problems. Food and care must be found for the family and the children must do that, so their education suffers. The number of children in families with HIV/AIDS who are dropping out of the education that is available on a greater scale than ever before is a worry for us all.

World Vision has long had a focus on children orphaned by AIDS and I pay tribute to the work of that Christian-based organisation. Some of the issues surrounding HIV/AIDS are tricky, but I want the compassionate voice of Christians who work in the area to be heard. There are some difficult mindsets to be thought through, not particularly in Africa but certainly in the United States. Plenty of Christian believers can cut through those and work with compassion. If we want to see Jesus in our world today, we should expect to find him not in the harsh words and angry controversies of men dancing about on pinheads of doctrine, but rather in the sweet voices and kind hands of those who touch the broken and the hurt.

To give an example of that and to reflect on something said by the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) in his opening comments, I draw hon. Members' attention to the "Hope" initiative that World Vision has been running for some years. It is deliberately targeted at some of the most vulnerable people and those whose behaviour is on the margins to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The "Hope" initiative in Mozambique concentrates particularly on drivers who take goods from the centre of the country to the ports. They follow particular routes and are away from home for great lengths of time. Their vulnerability to HIV/AIDS and the danger that they pose to others through their conduct can, of course, lead to them being at the very edge of society. They are perhaps not on everybody's first list of those who need care and support, but World Vision is providing that care, and it thinks it very important to work with sex workers, truck drivers, miners and those in particularly high-risk situations. It works through prevention, through offering care and, increasingly, through advocacy. World Vision sees that as not only a social and health issue, but a human rights issue, too, as the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) mentioned.

I wish to make two brief points on our concerns about children, an issue highlighted yesterday in the House, and today in this debate. I welcome the attention that the Committee paid to the needs of children, and to making sure that children are not missed out from efforts made to increase provision of, and access to, treatment for HIV/AIDS. In particular, I draw the Minister's attention to targets; I hope that we will firmly press for country plans to include targets. If money has been ring-fenced to deal with children with AIDS and those orphaned by it, it is essential that it actually gets through. Plenty of countries have made commitments in the past, but things have not always worked out, because it is easy for those without voices—children orphaned by AIDS are often precisely those with the smallest voice—to be missed in a rough-and-tumble situation where there is much demand for scarce resources. I would appreciate it if we looked hard at the issue of appropriate, measurable, transparent and achievable targets, and if that could be covered in the reporting-back process that the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) mentioned.

Secondly, when considering affordable medicines, one should please take note of the need for affordable diagnostics, too. The most commonly available, easy-to-use diagnostic test is inaccurate for children under 18 months. Infants must be diagnosed through a more complicated test that measures the HIV virus instead of antibodies. Unfortunately, current tests require technical expertise as well as costly equipment. As it stands, many multinational diagnostic companies have shown little interest in developing accurate, simple, fast and affordable tests for diagnosing children. There are similar arguments on the production of necessary vaccines, tablets and other medicines. In much the same way, colleagues refer, in the report, to the very amateurish attempts to break down adult doses into something apparently more compatible with children.

Again, proper diagnostic testing needs to be done—not in an ad hoc way, but in a proper, scientific manner. We should get those who can provide such tests to engage in the subject, and to realise the importance of their products to the most vulnerable. It would be most welcome to have a commitment to ensuring that when treatment is considered, diagnostics will be considered, too.

In general, that is a further area where the work of the Government and the Department for International Development has been excellent over the past few years. There is a general welcome for many of the things that the Department does. It has raised the bar for everyone and has produced a degree of consensus on the work done that is entirely appropriate when dealing with some of the world's problems. There will continue to be challenging questions for those doing that work, but in general there is much to be proud of. I just mention to the Chairman of the International Development Committee that it has played a significant role over the years, and it is excellent that that work is continuing. On behalf of the children most affected by this appalling plague, I hope that their voice also will be heard in the next stage of the work done to alleviate this dreadful suffering experienced by so many.

4.9 pm

Chris McCafferty (Calder Valley) (Lab): I, too, congratulate the Select Committee and its relatively new chair, the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce), on the great deal of hard work done on this important report, and the Government on their response.

HIV/AIDS threatens to destroy a generation of leaders, workers, parents and young people and has created a generation of orphans in the worst affected countries. In many countries, the infection is creeping through the population and is preparing to strike full force. I think that prevention is about striking first. Sexual and reproductive health information, education services and supplies enable people to avoid HIV infection and to protect themselves, their partners and their unborn children from this deadly virus. We know that prevention works and we have a consensus among nations about the need for action. I, too, commend the Department for International Development on the important role that it played in securing international agreement on UNAIDS new prevention policy, "Intensifying HIV prevention", and the EU-adopted statement "HIV Prevention for an AIDS Free Generation".

However, let us face it: it is widely recognised that without a massive scale-up of HIV prevention, the upward trend in the number of people infected will simply continue. That will pose a major threat to the affected countries' ability to sustain progress in tackling the epidemic, to prevent an explosion of the disease, and to provide AIDS treatment. The EU statement underscores the fact that prevention of new infections must remain the cornerstone of a comprehensive AIDS response.

I agree with the Select Committee report: the relatively new focus on treatment should not be allowed to displace the important work that has already been done on HIV prevention. We must talk about HIV/AIDS openly, honestly and directly and act to guarantee prevention, care and treatment for all those who need it. However, the reality on the ground is very different. There is limited funding available for HIV, prevention, treatment and care. I urge DFID not only to continue to balance work on HIV treatment with sustained attention to HIV prevention, but to continue to make prevention its top priority in a comprehensive AIDS response, with linkages between existing sexual reproductive health and rights, HIV/AIDS and health care services and systems.

As the Government's response states, critical components of a comprehensive evidence-based response are: universal access to sexual and reproductive health information and services for women, men and young people; provision of accessible and integrated health promotion and harm-reduction services for drug users; reliable access to essential sexual and reproductive health commodities, including male and female condoms; universal access to education and the provision of life skills and sexuality education; the integration of HIV prevention interventions, including voluntary counselling and testing for HIV, into other health services; action to confront and address gender-based violence and to provide protection and support to victims of violence; and supporting investment in modern methods, such as microbicides and vaccines.

The ABC approach—abstain, be faithful, use a condom—adopted by the Bush Administration to assist prevention is not evidence-based. Research from Africa and Asia shows that marriage is not a protective factor. In fact, in some areas, married women are more likely to become infected with HIV than their unmarried counterparts. In marriage, abstinence is not always an option and women are unable, as we heard earlier, to ensure their partner's faithfulness, or condom use. The ABC approach is further eroded by the Bush Administration's promotion of abstinence-only programming. Many NGOs receive substantial funding for HIV prevention, but with restrictions against comprehensive programming, particularly condom use, ABC fails to recognise the complex realities of comprehensive promotion. Therefore, prevention may need to be reinvented to place a greater emphasis on how each new HIV infection takes place within its own political and socio-economic dimension.

That brings me to vulnerable groups and access to treatment. Children, intravenous drug users and men who have sex with men are all mentioned in the report, but women are omitted. I draw hon. Members' attention to the Global Coalition on Women and Aids, which makes the point that at least 57 per cent. of adults with HIV are women, and young women aged 15 to 24 are three times more likely to be infected than young men. Despite that alarming trend, which was mentioned earlier, women know less than men about how HIV/AIDS is transmitted, and they know less about how to prevent infections. What little they do know is often rendered useless by the discrimination and violence that they face within and outside the home.

High numbers of pregnant women visiting antenatal clinics are HIV positive. In many southern African countries, more than one in five pregnant women are infected with HIV. The overwhelming majority of children with HIV contract the infection from their mothers during pregnancy or delivery, or through breast feeding. The 700,000 new infections among children in 2003 represent an unacceptable and almost entirely preventable component of the epidemic.

In the UK, mother-to-child transmission has been reduced to less than 2 per cent. due to voluntary counselling and testing, antiretrovirals, elective Caesarean sections and alternatives to breast feeding. In too many places, VCT is still completely absent, and a mere 1 per cent. of pregnant women in heavily infected countries have access to services aimed at preventing mother-to-child transmission.

I commend DFID for the important role that it played in securing the G8 commitment to universal antiretroviral treatment provision by 2010. I hope that in the meantime antiretrovirals will reach poor women and their unborn children, as well as young children and wealthy men, and that prevention remains the cornerstone of all activities included in the comprehensive approach that is essential to tackling HIV.

4.18 pm

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): Last week, the nation was shocked by the revelation that 10 new cases of HIV had been discovered in the space of a single month in St. Ives, Cornwall. Headlines grew more hysterical as the story unfolded of a single perpetrator who had, perhaps knowingly, spread the infection through the small town. An expert team of medics was sent directly, a helpline was set up, two new testing clinics were established and my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) issued a call for calm. My thoughts are with those 10 people and their families, whose anxiety must be unbearable.

However, it is not to belittle their suffering to say that that is the reality every single day for many families throughout the world. In the UK, about 19 people are infected with HIV every day. As my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) said, that is still far too many, and it is worrying indeed if the trend of recent years has been an increasing infection rate. Perhaps the safe sex messages that were so strongly accepted in the 1980s and early 1990s are losing some of their resonance.

We are, of course, concerned about cases in the UK, but compare 19 a day with the figure for Africa, which is 8,800. Even taking into account the huge difference in population size, there is a clear disparity. Per capita, if the UK's infection rate was the same as Africa's, every day in our country almost 600 people would be contracting HIV. That would be a major public health emergency. We would be dealing with it at the highest levels of Government. However, in Africa and in many other places in the world there is a much greater problem.

Botswana has one of the highest HIV rates; 37 per cent. of the adult population is HIV-positive. For those people there will be no crack team of medics, no special clinic, no helpline, and their contraction of HIV is by no means headline news. The sad fact is that for many communities in Botswana and across the world HIV is part of the daily reality. Having contracted the infection, the 10 people in St. Ives can expect an average of £15,000 a year to be spent on their care. In Africa, the average per person is £7.

The Government's commitment to funding antiretroviral drugs must be commended, and the Minister and the Secretary of State are to be congratulated on their work in pushing this issue up the agenda. The UK is the world's second biggest bilateral donor on HIV and AIDS. In 2004, DFID said that over the next three years the UK would spend at least £1.5 billion on AIDS-related work. However, it is already clear that that is not enough. In June 2005, UNAIDS and the World Health Organisation estimated that 6.5 million people in developing countries needed immediate antiretroviral treatment, and of those only 15 per cent. were receiving it. While the Government's commitment to aid is substantial, it is still out of balance with their spending on war; the £1.5 billion pledged to aid is dwarfed in comparison with the £3 billion already spent on the war in Iraq, and that figure is likely to rise to £5 billion by the end of the year. Our country must redress the balance of our spending on war and aid. Thirty years late, we are yet to meet the UN target of increasing international aid to 0.7 per cent. of gross national product, although I welcome the Government's commitment to meeting that in the coming years.

Furthermore, in the developing world war and health are inextricably linked. Aid to alleviate poverty and to improve health is an essential safeguard against the escalation of violence. Nowhere is this link between violence and the deterioration of health resources more glaring than in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, where easily preventable diseases are rampant because the war has destroyed hospitals and other areas of health infrastructure. The most recent report of the International Rescue Committee aid agency found that 1,000 people are dying every day from conditions such as malaria and malnutrition—basic, easily preventable diseases. When one adds HIV and AIDS to the situation, it is easy to see why the health services get stretched to the point where they cannot cope. In the DRC, there are 1.1 million HIV-positive people, which is about 4.5 per cent. of the population.

The report says that the international humanitarian aid to the DRC has been "abysmal" compared with the response to other disasters. In 2003, for example, Iraq received aid worth the equivalent of £75 per person and the DRC received the equivalent of £1.70 per person. There are some excellent aid projects under way to support the testing and treatment of HIV in the DRC, especially the work of the United States Department of Health and Human Sciences, with its Centres for Disease Control and Prevention global AIDS programme, but these projects need more attention from the UK Government. Several Members have spoken about the availability of antiretrovirals in the fight against AIDS. That is partly to do with health and the infrastructure in developing countries, but it is also partly to do with simply access to drugs and being able to afford them.

Unfortunately, the financial barriers faced by developing countries are not always simple. The issue that I believe currently needs most attention is TRIPs—the trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights—which is dealt with in paragraph 12 of the Select Committee's report. Protection must be in place to exempt areas that impact on the millennium development goals and global disease control. The current provisions have proved inadequate; we all remember the furore in 2001, when 39 major pharmaceutical companies tried to prosecute the South African Government for passing a law that allowed easy production and importation of generic HIV drugs. There was a good ending to that incident. Following immense pressure from the South African Government, the European Parliament and, not least, 300,000 people from more than 130 countries who signed a petition, the pharmaceutical companies were forced to back down.

[Jo Swinson]

I strongly support the Committee's recommendation that the WTO must be persuaded to undertake a review of the implementation of TRIPS, and that DFID should continue to work to build the capacity of developing countries to use TRIPS safeguards, like compulsory licences and Government-use provisions, to facilitate the production and export of affordable medicines, particularly second-line ARVs, which are increasingly important, especially as the disease becomes more resistant and the first-line ARVs become increasingly ineffective. It is perhaps a sign of the difficulty that developing countries have working within the TRIPS provisions that no compulsory licences have been issued.

I am deeply concerned about the future of the agreement that keeps sub-Saharan African countries immune from TRIPS-plus agreements with the United States. Those laws go beyond the requirements of TRIPS to protect intellectual property and are often drawn up as part of bilateral trade agreements with the US, usually involving the US promising better trade and investment to a particular country in exchange for it introducing legislation to protect US intellectual property rights. That may mean restrictions on compulsory licences or parallel importing, and it could mean the extension of patents beyond the standard 20 years suggested by TRIPS.

An Executive order signed by President Bill Clinton in 2000 barred the US Government from asking southern African nations to sign such agreements. President Bush endorsed that when he came to office in 2001, but there is a danger that his Administration, faced with the fact that many generic plants now operate in Africa, will not keep their promise. If the UK Government wish to stand by the promises made at Gleneagles, I urge them to make it clear that such a possibility is intolerable.

We are all aware of the extent of the HIV/AIDS problem. I welcome the Select Committee's excellent report and the spotlight that it is putting on the issue. The Government have made good progress, which is to be commended. I hope that Ministers will take on board the strength of interest that Members of this House and the wider public have in the issue. It is incredibly important that it is given a high priority within Government.

4.26 pm

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I did not intend to speak, but as we have some time available, I thought I might add a few comments.

The debate has been useful and interesting. The International Development Committee's report was also useful. I welcome the comments by its Chairman, the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce), about the intention to return to the subject repeatedly, because doing so would be useful. We have discussed whether the Department for International Development should be setting targets internationally. From the point of view of Parliament in scrutinising what is happening, if the Committee returns regularly to the subject, it would be of great value.

I am pleased that attention is being given to the impact of HIV/AIDS by those who are interested in international development. Eight, nine or 10 years ago, when I was getting involved in the subject in the House, people recognised that AIDS was a huge problem in Africa, but the international development connection was not made. It is made now, and everyone who is involved in such work accepts the central importance of dealing with HIV. That represents real progress.

I shall try not to repeat or to dwell on many of the things that have been said. Points have been made about drugs for children and the malignant effect of current US policy, which is starting to do damage in some African countries.

The commitment to universal access by 2010 is an amazing one when we consider what it involves, particularly if we compare the aim with the current situation. My suspicion is that we probably will not reach the target. We did not reach the three by five target, but that does not mean that it was not worth while. Setting the target changed some attitudes about what we should be doing and trying to do. The three by five target also changed people's views about the ability to deliver antiretrovirals in relatively resource-poor settings. I recall debates on the subject only two, three or four years ago, in which people said, "It is impossible. You can't deliver antiretrovirals in poor countries. It just won't work. People won't adhere to the drugs regimen. They won't understand what it means." All the evidence from the work on three by five is that that is rubbish. It is possible to deliver. People with the opportunity to take the drugs will adhere to the regimen. Rates of adherence compare pretty well with, and in many cases are much better than, rates in the UK, western Europe or the United States. That disproves some of what was said.

The target for four years' time is a challenge. Even if we do not get there—I have doubts about whether we will—the existence of the target, particularly if interim targets are adopted, will lead to progress and change in some of the countries that most need that. We do not even really know the numbers—how many people we aim to treat by 2010—although we know that it is not the same as the number of infections. In many countries with high infection rates, there is not yet sufficiently detailed knowledge about numbers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) made important points about what has been happening in Kenya. The problem there is also a problem in other countries, and it will, in time, be a problem in more. If Governments are corrupt or incompetent, we cannot react by saying that we will do nothing for the people in those countries. We will have to find ways around those problems, and that will probably involve NGOs. We will have to find ways to get money and resources to people on the ground, even if Governments are incompetent.

Mr. Borrow: Does my hon. Friend agree that once treatment programmes have been started they must continue, irrespective of what happens to the Governments of the countries in question, or of the instability that might arise later, and that once people have been given the promise of continued life through a drug treatment programme, the developed world cannot take that away? It is a commitment not for five or 10 years, but decades.

Mr. Gerrard: That is absolutely right. We cannot take the commitment away because of a problem with the Government in a country. However—this is another point about universal access by 2010, and the money that it is said is required to fill the gap—billions of pounds will be required not just between now and 2010, but year after year subsequently. It would be unthinkable and immoral to get treatment programmes running and then withdraw the money that allowed them to continue. That demonstrates the importance of prevention. If our answer is simply to pour in drugs and treatment, and if we do nothing about prevention and stopping the rise in the number of infections, the drugs bill will inevitably go up every year, for years ahead. It will not be possible to cope with that if we allow it to happen. It will not be a question of £15 billion or £18 billion a year, but double and treble that figure, if we let infection rates continue to rise.

Another issue that arose with respect to Kenya—again, this is a matter of continuity—was the establishment in one or two places of successful pilot schemes funded bilaterally or by the Global Fund to Fight Aids, Tuberculosis andMalaria. At the end of the pilot period, the question arises of where the money for their continuation is to come from. In some cases the money has not appeared. That problem has led to people being given treatment and support—given hope—that is suddenly taken away. That is a difficult one. It is not easy. Sometimes when a pilot ends, it is decided that it has not worked and it is cut off. We cannot guarantee that a pilot project will continue for ever. However, if a pilot runs and is successful, there are questions about why it should not continue and how it should be made to continue.

The hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) referred to TRIPS, which I agree are important. The TRIPS agreement was drawn up before antiretrovirals existed, although it was expected to cover lots of other drugs. At Doha, a waiver was agreed so that in some circumstances public health could override intellectual property rights.

However, that waiver is not an answer to the long-term problems in respect of TRIPS. The newer, more effective drugs will not come out of patent for a long time. Even the very earliest HIV drugs such as azidothymidine are not yet out of patent, although they may be getting pretty close to it. There is a long way to go before some of the newer drugs get to that stage.

I agree with the Committee about the need to assess where we are going. To some degree, the drugs companies have learned lessons from South Africa and the appalling, dreadful publicity it gave them. They will not readily go down that road again. However, that has not solved the problems, and I suspect that if there are no changes to TRIPS, we will be in the situation mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), in which the generics and cheaper drugs will not be available and second line drugs will be required.

I come back to testing and prevention. As I said, we cannot solve the problem by just throwing in drugs and money, because it will go on and on. A false dichotomy used to be presented—that testing and prevention were one thing and drugs were the alternative. However, the approach has to be of a piece; there has to be treatment, testing and prevention. It is pretty obvious why. We cannot persuade people that there is much benefit to being tested if there is nothing to offer them if they test positive. We will have much more success in persuading people to test if there is something to offer them as a result.

Development of testing on a bigger scale is a key to prevention as well. When so many people may suspect but do not know that they are HIV-positive, why should they be too worried about taking precautions against passing on the disease? When we talk about prevention, we focus all our attention on sending messages to uninfected people about how to avoid becoming infected. For some time, I have thought that that is true of this and other countries. We do not do enough to talk to infected people, yet they are the key to prevention, as they can pass on the infection. We do not give that enough attention.

It is not easy. People have to be careful not to blame or stigmatise somebody because he or she is infected. However, there is no question of not paying more attention to effective prevention work with people who are already infected.

Malcolm Bruce: Picking up on something mentioned earlier, does the hon. Gentleman agree that we as parliamentarians, with our contact with parliamentarians in other countries, ought to support those who demand rights and respects When the Committee was in Malawi, the chairman of the social affairs committee there said that it wished to debate violence against women and the rights of women to discuss their sexual rights, but the men on the procedures committee said that that was not important and should not be given parliamentary time.

Mr. Gerrard: That is right. The debate on HIV/AIDS has moved on a long way from regarding it as a medical problem. It is far wider than that: it is a human rights issue and a women's rights issue. We need to face up to that fact.

At the 2001 United Nations General Asembly Special Session, I was with the previous Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), at a meeting where there was a Minister from another country, which shall remain nameless. When we tried to discuss groups such as gay men, who were at high risk, he said, "Well, we don't have a problem. We don't have any gay men in our country: it's illegal. It's not possible." My right hon. Friend's response, which I thought was a good one, was to offer him a bet on that, which absolutely crushed him, rather than try to have an abusive argument.

I hope that when the Select Committee comes back to address the subject it will look broadly across what is happening in the world. We rightly focus a huge amount of attention on Africa, because of the devastation there. However, we should be looking more closely at what is happening in Eurasia. We are now getting general infection levels of 1 per cent. in Russia, elsewhere in the Commonwealth of Independent States and in some of the Baltic states, and an epidemic is growing in India and China, where the capacity for an enormous number of people to be infected is obvious.

[Mr. Gerrard]

We are still at a stage at which, if we get things right, we can avoid an epidemic developing in India, China and Eurasia which will reach African proportions. However, we have a pretty narrow window of opportunity. While looking at what happens across the world in future and returning to the subject in subsequent years, I hope that the Select Committee will take account of that.

4.43 pm

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): I join those who have congratulated and endorsed the Committee on its work and its conclusions.

The quality, depth and knowledge in the speeches have meant that, as someone who is trying to come up to speed on this and a range of other development issues, I have had a brilliant afternoon, sitting listening to hon. Members speaking with such a level of expertise. I appreciate it. Every voice seems to echo the others; this is an area where we are very much united, which means that we must be able to be more effective.

A number of people have laid out the size of the problem that we face. I shall not stand here and start to repeat strings of numbers. I thank the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) for setting out the framework and context that we need to understand.

I want to pick up on a point about numbers made by the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard), who spoke about the importance of not looking only at sub-Saharan Africa. Although the numbers are devastating and we recognise that 64 per cent. of new infections occurred last year in sub-Saharan Africa, we should bear in mind that the increase in eastern Europe and central Asia was 25 per cent. We are looking at a burgeoning epidemic, as that 25 per cent. increase brought the numbers up to 1.6 million infected. It is right that we have that broader scope.

As others have said, the world community is starting to respond to the HIV/AIDS tragedy. It is happening among global leaders and political leaders of countries that have had severe problems, and crucially in civil society. It is right to congratulate DFID on raising awareness at all levels, pushing the issue forward, leading the campaigns and especially securing the G8 commitment to universal antiretroviral treatment provision by 2010. As has been said, however, we must pay attention to global funding.

Only a few weeks ago, the global health fund board approved a sixth round of funding—the United Kingdom seconded that motion—but when I last looked at the papers, no other country had committed funds. The replenishment conference for the global fund will take place in Durban in July, and I ask the Minister to tell us a little about the efforts that he intends to make with other donor countries to ensure such replenishment. If it does not happen, we will be looking at an extremely significant and serious problem.

I want to comment on a couple of the report's recommendations. Monitoring and evaluation have been mentioned in various forms this afternoon. I was rather surprised by DFID's comments in the Government's response. I reread the paragraph in question two or three times, but I could not work out quite what was meant. Nevertheless, I sensed a real resistance to those two factors.

We all know the value of scrutiny. It is critical. If we are going to spend the sort of money that we are discussing on HIV/AIDS, we and our parliamentary bodies must be confident that the programmes are delivering what is intended. At the global level, we must be confident that they are delivering what is expected. I wonder whether the Minister can give us some understanding of why the Department is resisting a much more detailed and, I assume, more precise approach to monitoring and evaluation.

I do not understand DFID's resistance to talking with the European Commission about developing a way to lobby the WTO for a review of the TRIPS programme. We heard of two major relevant examples today. The hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) spoke about his recent experience in India, where it seems that the TRIPS structure would in a sense permit the undermining of the generic drug that is so vital in dealing with AIDS in India. The right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East and several other Members underscored the significance of developing second-line—soon it will be third-line and fourth-line—retroviral drugs in generic form at affordable prices. If we do not do that, our past work will rapidly be undermined. I do not see why a review of WTO's approach, to discover whether it is working or whether it needs to be adjusted, should be resisted.

A number of hon. Members spoke about the architecture and the way in which the International Monetary Fund and others impact on the world of HIV/AIDS support. In a sense, people are worried about the health infrastructure. The Minister will be aware of rising concern about the way in which HIV/AIDS money is delivered and the functions of the global fund are potentially obscuring the need to build core health delivery systems. How will that balance be addressed?

We have fundamental concerns, as everyone has said, about the lack of care workers. They go out into rural communities, where health structures are almost non-existent and the needs are extreme. Many of the programmes of developing countries are focused on urban centres and capital cities, and vast areas have become an abandoned hinterland.

Ms Keeble: Does the hon. Lady accept that in addition to the acute centres, we need a network of community-based care, which can sometimes be provided by faith-based organisations? The real issue is providing drugs, supplies and food through those networks, and ensuring that they are properly utilised and delivered to people in the community.

Susan Kramer: The hon. Lady made that point eloquently when she described her experiences in Kenya. The development of civil society and the ability to deliver at community level over a much wider range of issues than just HIV/AIDS are crucial, as others have said.

There is much mention in the report of joined-up thinking across Whitehall and integration with other Departments. I heard on the news earlier this week that the Department of Health is to cut the number of places for nursing training in the UK, on the grounds that there is not a need to keep nursing training in the UK at the levels that it has reached in the past year or so, having been built up from a low base. Two thoughts immediately come to mind. Is the assumption that we have enough nurses going through training and can therefore cut training on the basis of continuing importation of nurses from developing countries? If not, what is the potential to use those spare places to train people who might go back to the developing world at some point? Again, it would be exceedingly helpful if the Minister could say something about joined-up thinking among the various Departments.

A number of hon. Members have referred to the US programme PEPFAR. I hear almost universal concern about its distortion of the delivery of a response to the AIDS crisis in many vulnerable countries and, in particular, about its bias towards treatment over prevention and about a definition of prevention that works with the A and the B, but restricts as much as possible the delivery of the C, the condom, which most people think is the most effective element.

The Government Accountability Office of the US Congress, which is a very influential body, has just issued a serious rebuke to the US President and PEPFAR. I wonder whether DFID could say whether the potential exists to work within Congress to see whether a rebalancing of that programme could be achieved. If the GAO is willing to stand out and make such comments, there must be an underlying potential within Congress itself.

I should also like to ask DFID how it has responded to that reshaping of the delivery of aid by the United States—in effect, that was the question that my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) asked yesterday. Has DFID picked up some programmes that would otherwise have been abandoned? Has it changed the way in which it delivers aid in certain circumstances, in order to become the C, where the United States is playing the role of the A and the B?

Much of the discussion this afternoon has been about vulnerable groups and gaps in treatment. We have heard probably one of the most brilliant speeches that many of us have heard, from the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt), on paediatric ARVs and the lack of diagnostic tools. Other hon. Members brought that subject up too. I am sure that we all feel quite stunned that it takes only a single dose of a retroviral at the onset of labour, followed by a second dose when a child is just a few days old, to reduce the transmission of AIDS and HIV by 50 per cent.

I am going to become a grandmother twice this year, and the moment I hear of a child who is ill or suffering from HIV, it is obvious to me that we should put effort and emphasis on the problem and call on the Government to set targets and begin to take it on. However, when I looked at transmission from mother to baby, I was shocked to discover that in almost all cases where intervention takes place during labour and again three days later, so that the child has a good chance of being born HIV-free, there is no treatment for the mother. Women have been saying, "Of course I want to take the drug to benefit my child, but tell me what the value is, if in two years' time I'll be dead myself." We have to start focusing on mothers.

Ms Keeble: Does the hon. Lady agree that it is also important to make sure that organisations can supply infant formula feed to mothers, so that they can substitute for breastfeeding? Does she agree that it is outrageous that at present they get only ordinary skimmed powdered milk, and not infant formula?

Susan Kramer: I can only agree with the hon. Lady. Obviously, the issue of formula raises the issue of clean water and, as we have said, issues of community support and civic society. I very much take her point.

In 2005, some 17.5 million women were living with HIV and, of those, 13.5 million live in sub-Saharan Africa. Women are disproportionately represented in the rising numbers of those exposed to AIDS and, as others have said, for many women in some countries, AIDS is in effect a death sentence. When we face that situation, we get some sense of the scope of the work that we have to do on the hidden shame of AIDS. I have heard anecdotally from a couple of colleagues who recently travelled to a number of countries in Africa that because of that shame, it may well be the women who go to the clinic, have themselves tested and are identified as having AIDS. They receive retroviral drugs, which they are to administer themselves, and bring them home, but it is their husband who uses them or else the drug is shared between family members. In effect, that undermines everything that the programme is intended to deliver.

I know from talks with various groups that are active on women's behalf that the problem cannot be tackled unless we challenge the whole issue of the status of women—their education and human rights, and their position and status in local society—and tackle head-on the issue of violence against women. I hope that DFID can give us some assurances on the share of AIDS money that goes to women, because if that issue can be managed, surely it will begin to play a large role in dealing with that imbalance.

Somebody mentioned Zambia—I apologise, but I did not note who it was—when dealing with the subject of women. A recent survey said that in Zambia, fewer than 25 per cent. of women surveyed believed that a wife could refuse sex to her husband, even if he had had multiple partners, and only 11 per cent. thought that they could ask their husband to wear a condom.

I know that I need to bring my remarks to a close, but I briefly want to mention one last issue that I raised in International Development questions yesterday—sexual exploitation. All of us probably took great note of Save the Children's report on Liberia and what it said about aid workers and the military exploiting their positions of power by having sex with young girls who see that as the only way to continue to survive and receive aid that they should receive for free. I asked whether safeguards were in place for money that DFID passes on, either bilaterally or through multilateral agencies, in order to ensure that that does not happen. Sexual exploitation is part of a much wider and bigger picture within many cultures, but I do not have time to explore that. However, I would very much appreciate the Minister's response on that issue.

4.58 pm

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): I join hon. Members in congratulating the Select Committee on putting together an excellent and thankfully brief report, which is pithy and to the point. I also congratulate hon. Members on this extremely high-quality, well informed and knowledgeable debate. I have been impressed by how well travelled they are, and also by their first-hand experience of the problems that we are discussing.

It needs to be said that the Chairman of the Committee, the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce), who has been in that position for just under a year, has a growing and excellent reputation. He has done a fantastic job in coalescing the views of the diverse and disparate Members on the Committee. That is a great skill, as is making sure that the Committee comes out with a unified position on this and many other important matters.

The hon. Gentleman's opening remarks were an excellent summary, and I want to draw on four key points. He was right to highlight the discussion on mid-term targets and the differences of opinion between Committee members. He was also right to highlight the complexities of that issue. We all accept that targets do not necessarily always achieve, or contribute to, the ends that they are supposed to achieve. In addition, he rightly highlighted the problem with treating children and orphans.

The hon. Gentleman was correct to assess the complications that exist with budgetary support and targets, and in the relationship between the International Monetary Fund and individual country performance. DFID and the Minister would probably acknowledge that much more work needs to be done on those.

The hon. Gentleman rightly analysed the abstinence argument, and I draw hon. Members' attention to what happened in Uganda. A little while ago, the main thrust of its programme to control HIV/AIDS was the use of condoms. Relatively recently, it changed to more of an abstinence argument, and the impact has been a growing prevalence of HIV/AIDS. I understand the moral arguments of that approach, but there is growing evidence that it does not work in practice. On that basis, my party agrees with the strategy supported by DFID, the Secretary of State and the Minister.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) made a superb speech. It was not only intelligent and informative, but moving in parts. He was absolutely right when he said that antiretroviral drugs are not enough, and he went on to explain why. He was also correct to highlight mother-to-child transmission, something discussed by the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer), and to highlight the problems in conflict areas, giving the DRC as an example. Darfur and northern Uganda should also be mentioned, because rape and sexual violence are used there as weapons of war. DFID and other international donors must co-operate with the United Nations and military forces on the ground to try to eradicate that appalling behaviour.

My hon. Friend led an extraordinarily successful campaign for interim targets to meet the 2010 target. I am delighted that, despite the complexities of the issue, the British Government have taken up his suggestion, which was supported by the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) and 248 others in this House. It will be put to the United Nations at the meeting at the end of May and beginning of June. If my hon. Friend is successful, he will have achieved something extraordinary for somebody who has been in the House for just over a year. He may change global policy through his personal efforts, and he should be congratulated on that.

The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) has been a consistent advocate of improving the lot of HIV/AIDS sufferers, particularly children. She spoke with great knowledge. She was right to discuss paediatric formulae and the necessity of improving diagnostics, especially on the ground, and she made a good point about access to antiretrovirals.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) was right to highlight the importance of diet, and he gave some good examples. I want to thank him for the excellent work that he does with World Vision, which tries to improve the lot of people suffering from HIV/AIDS, but I am sure that he would be the first to acknowledge that it is not the only worthwhile organisation involved in this sector.

Opposition Members recognise DFID's contribution. We recognise that the UK is the second largest bilateral donor on AIDS and that it donates one of the highest proportions of gross national income to AIDS projects. We welcome the £1.5 billion that has been committed by the Government to tackle the disease over the next three years, and the recent additional £20 million pledged by the Prime Minister for the international AIDS vaccine initiative.

The Opposition are interested in and welcome the global steering committee on scaling up access to antiretroviral drugs, primarily because it is independent and transparent, and its monitoring systems are vital to ensuring that aid is effective. I agree with the hon. Member for Richmond Park that if it is possible to do such work and to have the regionalisation strategy that DFID has put in place in Latin America, why is it not possible to do that elsewhere in the DFID budget, which is growing, as it rightly should?

I have some questions for the Minister about how the global steering committee will work. Will there be standardisation of reporting structures so that there is a means of comparison between countries, to ensure that those that do not meet the requirements and targets are assisted by being able to identify the problems?

We acknowledge the three ones principle to create one AIDS action framework, one national AIDS authority and one monitoring and evaluation system in each country. It will be helpful if the Minister could inform us of the number of countries that have implemented that principle to date, the number that are working towards doing so and the time scale involved in those countries implementing the three ones principle. It will be interesting to know whether DFID has given any thought to how the three ones initiative will fit in with the monitoring and evaluation reference group, and how they will co-ordinate with each other to ensure the maximum impact on the ground.

The hon. Member for Walthamstow rightly mentioned the three by five initiative. While it was worth while in setting out the structure and architecture of the programme, sadly it did not have the impact that we all hoped it would have. Only 550,000 people were receiving antiretroviral drugs at the end of last year against a target of 3 million. I hope that DFID has learned serious lessons so that that failure will not be repeated and the 2010 target will be met, or that we get as close as possible to meeting it.

In the report, the Committee rightly stated that there were problems with the three by five initiative, particularly its highly vertical nature. I would be interested to hear the Minister elucidate—perhaps not today, but at another time—how he will ensure that that mistake will not be made again and how country strategies will fit in with donor responsibilities for ensuring that British taxpayers' money and taxpayers' money in other countries is spent where it is supposed to be spent, so that we get the maximum impact on the ground.

There was an interesting exchange between the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow), who made a thoughtful contribution, and the hon. Member for Walthamstow. They discussed the necessity of continuing the funding of antiretrovirals and other resources to combat HIV/AIDS as we go forward. We cannot have a situation in which countries, particularly in Africa, are dependent in perpetuity on developed countries giving them money. We must facilitate their economic growth to enable them to trade and build their own infrastructure so that they can pay for their health care systems. That will particularly help those countries that have significant and large rural populations, which are difficult to access in the normal course of events. We support the Government in their current difficult discussions to try to resolve the Doha round of trade talks, which could play a major role in facilitating at least the start of that process.

The Committee was right to highlight the position of, and the difficulties with, vulnerable groups, and much has been said about that. I want to make one or two points about children and orphans. There is no doubt that very few companies so far have shown an interest in developing accurate, simple and affordable tests for diagnosing HIV/AIDS in children. Much greater interest and attention needs to be given to paediatric treatment.

Packaging antiretrovirals in doses suitable for children is another point that my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey made. We must focus on reducing the cost of paediatric antiretrovirals, which are currently six times more expensive than standard antiretrovirals for adults. DFID needs to work with the international community to ensure that children are included in the international and national treatment targets. As children grow, their development necessitates a change in their treatment. What is DFID's strategy for HIV prevention and treatment specifically for children, especially as malnutrition hinders effective antiretroviral treatment?

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) made a good point—we have debated it before, so I shall not repeat it—about the coterminosity between HIV and TB, and the necessity of ensuring that those with HIV are tested for TB and vice versa. We must ensure that those whose tests are positive receive all the drugs they require, and not just those for one of the diseases that they have.

The Committee made an interesting point about coherence. I would like to know how the Minister is implementing "Taking Action", which is an attempt to tackle the problems of coherence, and what steps DFID is taking to ensure co-ordination and coherence between the different programmes through the non-governmental, multilateral and bilateral organisations that it funds.

All hon. Members, not just members of the Select Committee, want to ensure that the maximum amount of antiretroviral drugs reaches the maximum number of people as fast as possible, and DFID needs to address three things quickly. The first is resistance to drugs, about which the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) was absolutely right. It is important, because of the cost, that there is a swift and effective transition from the provision of first-line to second-line and, subsequently, to third-line and fourth-line antiretroviral drugs.

The second point involves delivery on the ground. As well as provision of the drugs, there must be strategies to ensure that there are effective methods of transportation, refrigeration, delivery on the ground and monitoring of treatments. The third point concerns generic drugs and the TRIPS agreement. Like the hon. Member for Richmond Park, I was slightly surprised by the Government response to the report. TRIPS is important and has been relatively successful at creating a new programme, but there needs to be flexibility, increased capacity, assistance on the ground and capacity-building in Governments to purchase generic drugs.

Fairly recently, the former director of the World Health Organisation's HIV/AIDS programme suggested the designation of a "humanitarian corridor" within which leading drugs manufacturers would allow rivals to produce drugs at low prices for modest royalties, with the purpose of allowing people in developing countries to benefit as fast as practically possible. That is a good idea.

To meet millennium development goal 6, which is to have halted and begun to reverse the spread of HIV by 2015, strong strategies are needed for prevention as well as treatment. If the Government go down that route, Opposition Members will be very supportive.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (in the Chair): I call the Minister to wind up what has been an excellent debate.

5.12 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): I agree with your characterisation of the debate as excellent, Sir Nicholas. That is largely due to the quality of the work done by the Select Committee. I pay tribute to the contributions of members of the Committee and particularly to the leadership of the Committee by the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce). I am not sure that I would go as far as the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mark Simmonds) in hoping that the Committee continues to be so powerfully led all the time. Nevertheless, I welcome the interest and the commitment of the Committee and particularly of the hon. Member for Gordon to reviewing annually our work on HIV and AIDS.

[Mr. Gareth Thomas]

The debate demonstrates powerfully the commitment of hon. Members on both sides of the House to addressing this issue. It also reflects the passion among many of our constituents, who want to see progress. In that respect, I pay tribute to the advocacy work and the direct services that many organisations based in the UK provide in sub-Saharan Africa in particular and in the developing world more generally. The hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) mentioned World Vision. Others mentioned Save the Children, UNICEF and many other NGOs with which we are familiar.

The report that we are debating was published in late November 2005 for world AIDS day and much has changed in the time since then. The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness rightly drew attention to the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on world AIDS day of a further £20 million to help to accelerate progress towards vaccines, which the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) mentioned.

What was also important about world AIDS day was the review of the state of the AIDS epidemic. Many of the contributions in this debate rightly focused on the severity of the epidemic in sub-Saharan Africa, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) made clear, we cannot afford to take our eye off the growing epidemics in eastern Europe and central and east Asia. The UNAIDS report referred to that point, and highlighted the increasing epidemics in China, Papua New Guinea and Vietnam.

My hon. Friend also mentioned India. We are seeing signs that serious epidemics might be about to start in Pakistan and Indonesia. As my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) said, there is a significant difference between the way in which the epidemic is being driven in Asia and in sub-Saharan Africa. In Asia, it is driven particularly by marginalised groups, whereas the driving factor in sub-Saharan Africa tends to be heterosexual sex. We must recognise those differences, and nuance our responses accordingly.

Another change to the landscape since the Committee published its report is the launch of round 6 of the global fund. My right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) and the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) drew attention to the serious lack of funding in the global fund's finances for round 6—it has just $46 million, I believe. We know that Spain has just made a commitment and that a further sum is due from the European Commission now that its budget headline figures have been resolved. Obviously, we will use our leverage to try to secure as large a sum as possible for the global fund from the European Commission.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has already written to G8 Heads of State to draw their attention to the need to commit more resources to the global fund for round 6, and similarly, he hopes to speak to the business community soon to encourage it to make contributions. We are also lobbying oil-rich states that have not yet made significant contributions into the global fund. I hope that, in that way, further resources can be made available.

The hon. Member for South-West Surrey rightly drew attention to the broader estimates of funding gaps for spend on HIV/AIDS—broader than the issues of global fund financing. If we are to address those long-term gaps, we have to make sure that G8 and other nations follow through on their pledges of assistance that were delivered at Gleneagles and confirmed at the millennium review summit. We must also recognise that even those resources will not be enough on their own. That is why it is so important to get innovative sources of financing up and running; why we are working with the French on their idea for a ticket levy; and why we continue to pursue the international finance facility. The excellent progress made by the international finance facility for immunisation is a powerful demonstration of the IFF concept. We continue to make the case that people should support the major IFF.

The G8 presidencies of our Russian friends and our German friends next year will provide further opportunities to focus on financing for AIDS. In that respect, I welcome the fact that President Putin has prioritised infectious diseases as one of the development issues on which he wants to focus.

The points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) about the need to ensure that both future and current financing get to community organisations is extremely well made. Other hon. Members asked about coherence across government. The Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), and I went to Malawi and Zambia last year, and looked at issues such as health workers—an issue to which I shall return—and blockages to resources from the global fund, World Bank and other bilateral donors. As a result of pressure from her and the experience in Malawi and Zambia, that issue was discussed at the global partners forum in February. The experience gained there will help us to continue to unblock access to those funding streams.

Obviously, in countries whose Governments are committed to reducing poverty and addressing HIV/AIDS epidemics, we will be able to make faster progress in getting more resources to the grass-roots level. Indeed, in Malawi, there were encouraging signs that funding was getting through to many community organisations, although more still needed to be done. In countries such as Zimbabwe and Burma, where we have to set up systems completely outside and outwith the Government because of corruption and other problems, it can take longer to ensure that community organisations get access to financing. We take the issue extremely seriously and we are busy working on it.

As the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness made clear, through our joint chairmanship with UNAIDS of the global steering committee, we have been following through on the commitments made at the G8 and the millennium review summit on universal access to try to come up with a plan that can be adopted by the international community at the UN General Assembly special session in June. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will lead the delegation, again demonstrating the coherent approach across Government to the issue. The Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), who has responsibility for public health, will also be part of that delegation.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness alluded to the fact that interim targets have been incorporated in the country plans that we have encouraged countries to adopt. I take issue with the point raised by the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) that we should set targets ourselves as a donor. I understand the initial attraction of such a concept as a way to track how our funding is being used, but if we want to make faster progress in a developing country, we need targets to be owned and accepted by that country's Government. Indeed, all donors, not just the British Government, need to get behind such targets. That is why the lengthy consultation process undertaken by the global steering committee—UNAIDS deserves praise for the way in which it has gone about its work in drawing up plans—offers substantial encouragement that we will get as close as we can to universal access by 2010.

I do not accept the doom and gloom about the three by five initiative, although I recognise that only about 1.3 million out of the 6 million people in developing countries who need access to antiretrovirals are gaining access to those drugs. I do not accept it precisely for the reason given by my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow: the initiative has galvanised attention on what must be done to address the issues.

That is where the point about broader health systems comes in. We need to recognise that it is not possible to solve the problem of HIV/AIDS in a vacuum. It is necessary to develop much stronger health systems, and not only to provide drugs at affordable prices, but to continue training health workers so that they can support people not just in towns and cities, where it is often easier to get access to a health worker, but in rural areas. I and the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central, saw a programme in Malawi, which the Department is funding, that will increase the number of nurses and doctors over the next six years. Part of that programme involves ensuring through VSO that trainers are training future trainers in Malawi so that the process is sustainable in the longer term, as the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness and others have made clear.

Ms Keeble: Does my hon. Friend accept that networks of health visitors are in place, run by community-based and faith-based organisations, but there is no funding going downstream, so they are not getting access to things? They exist, they are trained and they know what to do, but they do not have any resources.

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend draws attention to two problems: the broader problem of funding, on which I have recognised that more money must be made available, and the issue of co-ordination. We need to ensure that all those contributing to the fight against AIDS in a developing country, whether they are small NGOs or major donors, are working through the three ones process to one national plan, with one national monitoring and evaluation framework, under the leadership of one national AIDS commission. Where those three processes are effective, the types of problem to which my hon. Friend alluded can be more effectively addressed. The last thing we need is donors having different plans about how they will operate in a country. In such situations, plans often overlap and donors do not think through how each is working in different ways.

Several hon. Members have mentioned the relationship that we have with our friends across the Atlantic. I pay tribute to the work of Randall Tobias, the US global AIDS co-ordinator, who has worked extremely closely with us within the mandate given to him by Congress. We work closely in several sub-Saharan African countries. Along with other donors, we examine what each of us is doing, where there are gaps in the response that is necessary and which of us can deal with them.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear at questions yesterday, and as both of us have made clear before, we take a different view from the Americans on abstinence and on issues such as our support to drug-users who inject. We continue to have debates on such matters with them. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) alluded to the fact that we had such debates last year on the prevention policy of UNAIDS. We are having them in the run-up to the UN General Assembly special session, and it is important that we continue to have them. We have a strong view. I welcome the fact that our view and approach are endorsed by the vast majority of Members of the House; I wish there was 100 per cent. endorsement, but there is not. We will continue to advance our position.

Several hon. Members raised the issue of the relationship with the IMF and the concerns that a number of NGOs have expressed about its adverse influence on public health investment. I am sure that hon. Members will be pleased to know that in his note for the high-level meeting, the Secretary-General made it clear that he expects the IMF and the World Bank to initiate a much more transparent process to ensure the necessary fiscal space for AIDS spending. Members who have followed the issue will be aware of problems that arose in Zambia, and they will be pleased to know that the issues appear to have been resolved.

My hon. Friends the Members for Calder Valley (Chris McCafferty) and for Walthamstow rightly pointed out the need to focus not only on antiretrovirals, but on the much broader response to the epidemic that is needed, with the broader focus on sexual and reproductive health rights that must be part of the prevention response.

I hope that all hon. Members have had the chance to see the European Union's statement on world AIDS day, which sought to refocus attention on the importance of prevention. We were responsible for its drafting, and I commend it to hon. Members as an example of the type of comprehensive response that is necessary. We hope that the UN General Assembly special session that starts at the end of this month will endorse a full and comprehensive response. In particular, we hope that it will endorse ambitious country-led plans and support the belief that no effective, properly audited, ambitious country-led plan should remain unfinanced. That is why raising further funds is so important.

The chairmen of the all-party group on population, development and reproductive health and the all-party group on AIDS and, my hon. Friends the Members for Calder Valley and for Walthamstow, will join my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, the Minister of State, Department of Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley, who has responsibility for public health, and representatives from four UK NGOs, including several people who are living with HIV, in that delegation.

I shall bring to the Secretary of State's attention the specific point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North about groups that have focused on the problems about resources getting down to community level.

I am conscious that I have not answered hon. Members' questions about antiretroviral drugs and the relationship with pharmaceutical companies. I will write to hon. Members who have participated in this debate to let them know our approach to engaging more with those companies. Both my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I meet such companies on a regular basis and encourage them to do more in terms of differential pricing. It is not quite as bleak a picture as many have suggested. I shall write on other points too.

Incapacity Benefit (Nottingham)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Heppell.]

9.30 am

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): Being officially "incapable" corrodes the confidence and aspirations of the toughest. In Nottingham, 30,000 individuals feel like that every day. We can now do something about it.

Some 18 weeks ago, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions wrote to me, as he did to many, to let me know that I was one of 100 MPs who have among the highest number of incapacity benefit claimants in their constituencies and what the Government proposed in their Green Paper. I am sure that he wrote also to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell). My hon. Friend is here today, but his Whip's duties prevent him from speaking. However, I know that he feels strongly about getting people off incapacity benefit, as does my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson).

As the chair of One Nottingham, our revived local strategic partnership, I know that it is keen to seize the opportunities to be offered by the Green Paper. Individual partners in my city have already done some tremendous work. The city council, Jobcentre Plus, the greater Nottingham partnership, the learning and skills council, the voluntary sector and many others have introduced innovative and important projects.

Those partners and others need to build on that work, taking their efforts to the level necessary to meet the magnitude of the challenge to be set by the Government, doing so not from a bureaucratic perspective but from the perspective of the incapacity benefit claimant. We are doing so in close co-operation with the skills board, one of the five theme partnerships that work closely with One Nottingham. With the lowest rate in the United Kingdom of level 2 achievement, and the UK's worst reading levels at age 11, they know the problems that Nottingham faces. They also know that long-term preventive measures in education and skills are needed to complement the remedial measures necessary to deal with incapacity benefit.

It is One Nottingham's intention to respond promptly when the Government ask for expressions of interest in creating a city strategy on incapacity benefit. Local partnerships deliver. They have done so in Manchester, where £1.75 million of neighbourhood renewal funds have been used on the highly successful stepping stones project, and in Edinburgh, where the equivalent of the local strategic partnership has led innovation on incapacity benefit.

One Nottingham will allow unique access to all the partners in our city, including organisations dealing with crime, health, education and liveability as well as skills. We also intend working closely with our conurbation and county partners. To take matters forward, a consortium will be created that will include key local and national players. It will pool money, create new flexibilities, and push back the boundaries of devolution. Beyond that, it will work out the most effective structures for execution and delivery, which can be monitored and held to account. A lot of planning has already taken place. During the past three months, our local area agreement, our floor target action plan and our community strategy have converged to present an aligned and coherent set of targets, which can be the foundation of our city strategy.

The local area agreement sets a target for the reduction in the number of incapacity benefit clients over three years. The target will move from the current 65 per cent. of people in our city in employment to 80 per cent. The target reductions for invalidity benefit claimants in our city have been set at 1,129 this year, 2,258 next year and 3,387 the year after that. That may sound ambitious, but for Nottingham to reach its share of the Government's target of a 1 million reduction will require 6,425 people to leave our incapacity benefit register. That is another indication of the efforts that will be needed to take us to a different dimension—more even than what has already been done.

Our local area agreement stretch targets already link to specific evidence-based programmes on training, child care and health. That valuable pre-planning will obviously sharpen as our expression of interest is prepared, and if it is successful in June, we shall want our consortium to be up and delivering before the end of the year.

We are delighted that, within days of the launch of the Green Paper, the Secretary of State accepted my invitation to come to Nottingham and give the keynote address at our One Nottingham conference on building a city strategy for incapacity benefit. Ironically—or appropriately—that conference was held in the Aspley ward in my constituency, where one in eight people is on incapacity benefit and 56 per cent. of people have no qualifications whatever. It is the ward with the lowest entry rates into higher education among the 18-20 age group in the whole of the UK. It was appropriate and welcome that the Secretary of State took the message to a heartland area that is so obviously in need of the strategy.

That was followed up on 31 March by a broad-based series of workshops involving officials from the Department for Work and Pensions and many local partners, which began thinking through what shape our strategy should take. That work continued and last Tuesday—9 May—a delegation of partners from One Nottingham was able to play a full part in the DWP's stakeholder event on incapacity benefit in London. We were pleased to welcome the new Minister; it was probably his first official engagement after the reshuffle. He made a telling contribution at that event, and I am sure that he will do so today, too. The Secretary of State said:

> "I very much welcome One Nottingham's support for this initiative and look forward in due course to seeing your proposals as to how you would use a City consortium to build on your existing work and that of your constituent partners."

[Mr. Graham Allen]

One Nottingham, with its partners, is ready to submit that expression of interest. It is a big task, but we have proved that such big tasks can be done; an example is unemployment. In Nottingham, unemployment has fallen by 2,700 to 11,300—that is according to the International Labour Organisation measure—since 1997. That is not just a statistic; it means that 2,700 individuals and their families now have self-respect and a better quality of life, and are now contributing to society, rather than feeling that they are being a drain or burden on it.

However, we must do more, especially to address that forgotten group of those trapped on incapacity benefit. There are 17,600 IB claimants in Nottingham, more than half—53 per cent.—of whom have been on IB for more than five years. The excellent district manager of Jobcentre Plus told me that a person who has been on incapacity benefit for two years or more is more likely to die or retire than find work. That is a damning conclusion from a local expert professional. We will do something about that. Some 7,700 of that number have mental problems, and I will address those difficulties later. In addition, there are 6,820 lone parents and 10,200 older workers on related benefits. Reaching and helping those groups will be the mission of our city strategy.

On top of the human price that we pay there is also financial waste. Around £5.6 million is paid in incapacity benefit in Nottingham alone each month. Add to that housing and council tax benefit and forgone income tax revenue from people who are not working, and the bill mounts up massively. We are interested to explore the incentives for recycling any savings made into more incapacity benefit programmes. I am pleased that the Government floated that as a possibility; we need to explore that carefully.

The savings in incapacity benefit spending need to be retained locally—not nationally or even regionally—so that local partners can see something for their effort and investment of energy. The money needs to be reinvested locally to expand the city strategy even further, so that we can get the next tranche of people nearer to work. It needs to be retained locally because it needs to flex and we need to be sensitive to the local context and initiatives, rather than imposing a top-down model.

The average IB beneficiary receives the king's ransom of £83.86 a week. For those who say that the higher levels of benefit paid to long-term IB recipients have encouraged people to stay on IB, let me point out that in Nottingham 42 per cent. of all IB claimants are not getting the higher rates. They did not have sufficient national insurance and so have to depend on income support. That group has been increasing while the number of IB recipients has been decreasing. More people in Nottingham—7,300—have to claim income support because they did not have sufficient national insurance than are receiving the long-term IB rate. There are 7,200 such people.

In households in which no one goes to work, both money and self-esteem can be in short supply. A lack of positive role models can result in generation after generation getting stuck in the benefits trap. Getting people on to IB and its predecessors—invalidity benefit and sickness benefit—was sometimes seen as a way to mask soaring unemployment levels. People in Nottingham—in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East, in my own and in Nottingham, South—have paid a heavy price for that policy failure over many years. We are delighted that that is now being seriously addressed by the Government.

One Nottingham, which was created to help in deprived areas, sees the clear link between benefit dependence and hardship. It was shown in the figures that I received from the Department for Work and Pensions all those months ago that half of the most severe pockets of deprivation in Britain are in the 100 constituencies with the largest number of IB claimants. If we tackle incapacity benefit, we tackle poverty. People in my city do not accept a system that perpetuates hardship and denies people the opportunity to better their lives by accessing the world of work, and we want to do something about it. The vast majority of people who start receiving IB want to go back into work. That has been proven in survey after survey as well as by anecdotal experience, which I am sure hon. Members on both sides of the House share. Our city strategy will provide those people with tailor-made, local help to go back into work.

The Government have made great progress since 1997, reducing the number of new claimants by one third and turning round the massive rise that took place when numbers trebled between 1979 and 1997. The Government have also put the pathways to work programme into every core city in the country, and those programmes have piloted a new approach that offers increased support to IB claimants in return for an increased responsibility to do what they can to return to work. By 2008, IB claimants in Nottingham will, for the first time, be able to benefit from the pathways to work programme, which is being rolled out nationally. It was pioneered successfully in our nearest city, Derby.

One Nottingham obviously has an interest in the impact that IB claimants can have on regeneration—for example, in mentoring youngsters, teaching literacy or helping to reduce antisocial behaviour. If just one in 10 IB claimants gets back to some form of activity in our city, there will be 3,000 extra brains and pairs of hands helping to regenerate our city. We want to build on the work of the voluntary and community sector, Enable and the local learning and skills council to create volunteering experience as a route to work. Volunteering is a safe place in which to build up confidence, self-esteem, experience, skills, the work habit and discipline. It is, in effect, work experience, which looks good on a CV, and the volunteers realise that if they can work for free, they can work for money. Most areas in the country have a volunteer centre accredited by the national body, Volunteering England, which operates like an old-style job centre and which the consortium would look to develop in our city.

Although the new deal for disabled people has shown increased success, with job starts for incapacity benefit claimants in Nottingham increasing from 120 in 2002 to 390 in 2005, and 52 per cent. of all those registering for the new deal for disabled people in Nottingham starting work in 2005—a very good record indeed—the scale of the activity is not large enough to do more than scratch the surface. Our consortium will need to examine how we can use outside providers, such as the Shaw Trust, Working Links, Work Directions and many others, to work alongside local providers to liberate the talent and potential in the disabled people of Nottingham. One Nottingham and our partners will never advocate forcing people with physical and mental difficulties back into work. That is not appropriate. However, we will not shrink from using our city strategy to challenge the fatalistic culture of storing people on incapacity benefit without offering them ways forward.

When we receive documentation relating to an expression of interest we will need to think seriously about governance and how to take the consortium forward. How the consortium works and how it is structured will be key. None of the local partners will have dealt with central government on a task of such size and scope. Passive representation will not do. Each consortium member must bring revenues to the pool and take responsibility for specific targeted and measurable activity. A small full-time core team is likely to be needed, under its own chief executive, to measure achievement and provide a forum for day-to-day learning and interaction of the many providers that we will need if we are to make an impact on the problem.

One of the key early decisions of the consortium will be how to franchise and commission our 6,000 share of the 1 million national target. That represents more than 700 incapacity benefit claimants whom we wish to get off the register in each of Nottingham's nine area committees, should our consortium choose to break the task down at that level, so that it lies alongside the new developments taking place on neighbourhood management. Even that work will need to be further sub-divided into target groups, such as single parents, older workers and those with mental health issues. All the low-hanging fruit has been picked, so long-term relationships in each locality have to be built between providers and commissioners around workable and realistic delivery plans.

I hope that I will not disappoint the Minister in saying that I do not want a big blast of figures next year that make him feel good about how well the programme has been implemented early. I want a steady growth in those figures, rather than a quick fix that peters out, and I am sure that he feels the same.

We have been incredibly excited by the idea of taking control of the incapacity benefit challenge locally. We must now enter the uncomfortable phase of reality checking, being honest about local capacity and allocating responsibilities and accountabilities that will stay the course. Our consortium will tackle a number of key issues, the first of which is the incapacity benefit routine.

It is difficult to leave the security of incapacity benefit payments for regular work payments. A bad back, depression or stress can often recur. Members of a Jobcentre Plus focus group recently mentioned their suspicion that Jobcentre Plus wants only to talk to them to take away their benefit. They fear the transition to work and the impact on, for example, tax credits, housing benefit and final incapacity benefit payments. If the employment does not work out, they have the reverse situation. One suggestion that came out of the consultation in Nottingham is that we should look to retain stability by, for example, keeping housing benefit and free prescriptions for a transitional period. We need to reward people financially for working by making the incentive great enough to overcome their fear of moving from incapacity benefit and reassuring them that we will take every possible step to ensure that the transition is easy and smooth and not something to fear.

The second issue is flexibility. When we first went to see the Prime Minister and the then Secretary of State at No. 10, it was encouraging to hear over and over again that the Department and the Government wanted to be as flexible and open as possible on ideas about extending and changing some of the rules that inhibit those on incapacity benefit in getting back into work. Some excellent flexibilities already exist, and incapacity benefit claimants can earn up to £81 per week for one year, although many do not know that or do not know how to take advantage of the arrangements. A locally based city strategy will, I hope, be much better placed to get that information to claimants and be sensitive to their needs.

Giving us real authority to act locally will mean that our consortium is able to judge how resources can best be applied by sector and by area. The problems in the white working-class estates of outer-city Nottingham that I represent will, of course, differ from those in the inner-city, multi-ethnic areas of mixed housing tenure that are more typical of the constituency represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East. We will need to be sensitive to such problems, and by creating city-based strategies with a lot of flexibility, the Government will allow us to tackle them all at the same time.

I must flag up for the Minister the fact that the move by Jobcentre Plus towards regional contracting has taken away local district managers' ability to invest in and purchase what they know is needed. The Department for Work and Pensions could demonstrate flexibility by looking again at whether it can let the local Jobcentre Plus manager have more control over his or her budget. I do not expect the Minister to answer that question today, but if he has any thoughts about it and cares to write to me, that will be most welcome.

We need to work out how those with short-term or treatable incapacity spend the period of their rehabilitation on incapacity benefit and then come off it once they are fit again. We need to offer a menu to help reintegrate these people back into work and we need to plan flexibility and discretion in relation to incapacity benefit exit. The individual's variability of performance over time is also a critical issue, particularly where their mental health is involved and they suffer, for example, from bipolar illness. We need to use reasonable adjustments. We need to make use of volunteering and permitted work, but there should also be also scope for social firms and charities to pioneer alternatives. The Government have offered flexibilities, and the Minister knows that we will test that offer.

The third issue is re-skilling. In the case of longer-term injury, it is easy for claimants to find their skills out of date. A year out of the information technology industry, for example, can be a long time. Even outside fast-moving technology industries, the pace of change is increasing year on year. Skills upgrades need to be created by all our partners. We need to break down the artificial barriers and silos from top to bottom, including in central and local institutions.

If we have our own city strategy, there will be nobody to blame. If we cannot get deals done locally, we will not be able to point the finger at a convenient Minister and say, "If only they did this" or, "If only they did that". If the responsibility is ours, we will need to face up to things locally and strike deals. Where deals cannot be made, we will come to the Minister and ask for the barriers to be removed, but the onus will be very much on us.

The rules must be made crystal clear and ensure, for example, that when an IB claimant follows an agreed training and further education programme they do not lose their benefit. Further education institutions that reach out to claimants who are long out of education should be rewarded and not penalised, for example, by Ofsted, since success rates might be low. I have mentioned that to the Minister in private. Where FE institutions fulfil their educational mission to reach out to those without qualifications, that should be understood in Ofsted's marking and weighting system. Ofsted should not say that such people should attain at the same level as those who are cherry-picked by the establishments, often against those establishments' judgment and drive. However, when people are marked down, colleges have to take those unenviable decisions.

Fourthly, there is a need to build bridges to work. I have alluded a little to that. It is difficult for those who have never been on benefits to appreciate how it feels. I have had a brief spell of unemployment, and even though I knew I had a job coming up at some point in the future it was completely debilitating. It knocks a person's confidence sideways in a way that nothing else can. It destroys self-esteem, it is demoralising and it can often evolve into depression and even clinical depression. It is easy for someone to believe that because they are claiming incapacity benefit, they are generally incapable of any work or any contribution, or of being any use to society or their immediate family. That can happen not just if someone has an ailment or injury but if they have wider mental problems.

Morale and motivation needs to be revived. Effective person-to-person contact has to be ensured and, above all, our Nottingham approach will recognise that IB claimants should have an important say in their road map to a better future. We will also ensure that our programmes meet their needs rather than just fuelling local or national bureaucracies.

It will be our ambition to ensure that every IB claimant has a personalised road map that shows the training or work experience that they need. Over time, we will develop ways of putting real choice in their hands about where they can access the help that their map signposts for them. One way might be to trial a pilot in learning or guidance accounts. Those should not just be the preserve of undergraduates or people at advanced level. As the revival of the learning account concept takes place, I hope that incapacity benefit claimants will find their rightful place in that pantheon. We have to live the rhetoric that many people on incapacity benefit want to get back to work. We must trust them to take the right decisions, with the right help, for themselves.

Our Nottingham programme will have an IB claimants customer group, which will let us know whether we are meeting the needs of claimants. We are also considering using Jobcentre Pluses and geographical information systems—GIS—to door-knock. There is nothing like good, old-fashioned canvassing: eyeballing people and asking what they need and when they need it, with trained advisers taking the work of the estate-based local learning champions, a concept that we have pioneered in Nottingham, to a higher level.

Why not reward those on incapacity benefit who mentor a youngster at school, help the elderly or take on work as a park keeper as a bridge towards more appropriate and fulfilling work? That would reward those who want to keep working but cannot necessarily work conventionally. It would augment their income and raise their aspirations, confidence and experience. Nottingham is lucky enough to have strong community and voluntary sectors, and it is our aim that they will play a key role in our city strategy on IB issues.

Finally, we have already identified the work on mental health that we need to do with our health partners. Many people just need personal encouragement. Employment and the full reacquisition of social skills are as important as treating medical symptoms. There are massive service delivery implications for GPs and cognitive behaviour therapists, who will be needed to work not with the odd customer but with thousands of people. That needs to be carefully worked through, with colleagues in the health service and primary care trusts—particularly in the new era of practice-based commissioning.

There is also a need for employers to be given awareness training and education; they need to be able to achieve compliance with the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and provide appropriate mental health support to employees as well as occupational health support for those returning from time on incapacity benefit. There is a leading role for private and public sector organisations in piloting the arrangements and setting an example.

Most of the surveys and studies do not bear out the view that employers do not want to take people who have been on incapacity benefit, or that there is discrimination against people with a mental incapacity or mental ill health. None the less, an example should be set, not least by the big public and private sector employers. We need the whole team at the table, in the local context, in Nottingham, just as is happening at ministerial level in the national context.

As the Secretary of State said last week, we are beginning

> "a process of policy renewal that will help us to better address the endemic problem of worklessness facing many of our major towns and cities. Looking to the future. Being prepared to adapt and change. Always being prepared to develop new and better tools through which we can support local re-generation and economic development."

In the brief conversations that I have had with colleagues from other parties—the Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties—I have gained the impression that they, too, are anxious to exploit to the full the possible advantages of the new way of ensuring that people on incapacity benefit can lead more fulfilling lives. We certainly want to replicate that at local level. The issue is not a partisan one; it affects people—indeed, it affects claimants—of all political views or none, and does not discriminate on those grounds. We should not either.

Our consortium would be keen to add some of the seedcorn funding, which I understand will amount nationally to some £90 million from the deprived areas fund, but we see that only as an addition to the pooled resources that we have locally. A key point will be to enable all the individual organisations and agencies to come together. Of course we will welcome the additional resources, but the project lies in our own hands. The real prize in the next few months—this is something else that is evident from our consultations—will be to build a relationship, with trust, with central Government, so that the proposed freedoms and flexibilities can be negotiated with our national partner at the Department for Work and Pensions, to bring about real benefits for the people of Nottingham.

In Nottingham we know that the number of incapacity benefit claimants needs to be reduced. We are working towards a clear strategy on how to do that. Working closely with all our partners we intend to submit an expression of interest to the Department for Work and Pensions, as soon as the Minister requests it. I wish him well in his new appointment and hope that he will retain his position long enough to see the initiative through. It will be a long-running effort and will take a lot of setting up. I am not trying to keep the Minister from his ultimate rightful post in Cabinet, but I hope that he will be allowed a sufficient period to get involved in the issue and see it through—not just for Nottingham's sake but for the sake of all the other pathfinders who get city strategies in the first wave. I could not wish for anyone more capable to do the Minister's job, and we do not want to lose him, now that he has started out on the path.

I hope that by raising this debate, I have reinforced the Minister's view that the agencies and organisations in Nottingham collectively look forward to meeting the challenge of making a serious impact, not only on the problems of incapacity benefit but on more fully realising the potential of the individuals who claim it but would welcome a return to appropriate work. Nottingham is a great city; our revival is continuing and our ambition is not to let the talents and potential of a single person in our city go to waste.

10.5 am

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): I start by congratulating the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on securing this debate on a very important subject for Nottingham and the whole United Kingdom. I congratulate him also on the detailed and eloquent case that he set out on the proposals coming forward within Nottingham, and on the leading role that he clearly plays in his community in trying to develop some of the ideas and thoughts about benefit reform and in helping back to work people who have long been excluded from the labour market. He clearly plays a leading role in making such things happen in his community, and that is a model that many hon. Members could follow. I congratulate him for all those reasons.

The hon. Gentleman set out the scale of the problem faced by people in Nottingham; his constituency and those of the other Labour Members who represent the city are among the 100 constituencies with the most incapacity benefit recipients. As he said, 17,600 people are on incapacity-related benefits in Nottingham. It is also interesting to note the high overall level of economic inactivity in the city: 36 per cent. of its population are classified as economically inactive for reasons of incapacity or for the many other reasons that he set out.

The hon. Gentleman drew particular attention to an important point that needs to come out more in the wider debate about benefit reform and helping people on incapacity benefit back into work: for many in the groups that we are discussing, low educational achievement is another barrier to returning to work.

Drawing attention to Nottingham's problems helps shed light on the broader issues facing many cities—and indeed rural areas—in the UK. After all, 2.7 million people are on incapacity-related benefits across the UK, and the December 2005 figures, although they may have been updated since, show that over the whole of the UK, 7.94 million people are classified as economically inactive. The Government are finally taking on the challenge to raise the level of economic activity and help people on incapacity benefit back into work, and I welcome that; it is important and timely, and it has come not a moment too soon.

Mr. Allen: As we have a little time, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will indulge me. I should like to reinforce his point about educational attainment being one of the key factors that we need to bring to bear in our partnership work on this issue. The powers and extra assistance from the Government on IB claimants are extremely welcome, but locally we need—we are attempting it at One Nottingham—to seek a city strategy. That is one of our priorities; the second—there are three—is to teach social behaviour in all our primary schools so that youngsters can get the social toolkit to learn, so that they qualify better than youngsters have in the past, and go on to further education, training and employment, so there will be less of a pool from which those on incapacity benefit can be drawn. We need to tackle the issue on lots of different levels, and the hon. Gentleman was right to emphasise that.

Danny Alexander: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He makes a good point.

Also, I should have welcomed the Minister to his place at the beginning of my remarks. I am delighted to see him here and to congratulate him on his appointment. I look forward to working with him as the welfare reform process continues. I am sure that he will want to give due emphasis to that process in the coming weeks.

The partnership approach taken by One Nottingham is one that the Government should encourage not only in Nottingham but throughout the country. It is important to bring together people and organisations from the public, private and voluntary sectors to deliver in a coherent, co-ordinated and locally driven way—that is an important consideration—policies and proposals to help back into the labour market people who have been out of or excluded from it for a long time, perhaps for reasons of incapacity. A lot of hard work is being done in Nottingham to bring people together, and that can be furthered. The hon. Gentleman set out clear targets, and made it clear that Nottingham will soon be ready to submit its application. That has been successfully advertised and highlighted today, and I congratulate him on that.

The hon. Gentleman rightly drew attention to the social and human waste that incapacity benefit creates. A number of people have been on incapacity benefit for a substantial time. He drew attention to the often-quoted statistic that people who have been on incapacity benefit for more than two years are more likely to die or reach retirement age than they are to find work. That is a damning indictment of the current system. Many different barriers prevent people in that situation from getting back into work, such as having a lack of educational skills or confidence, or having an illness or disability. There are also more physical and practical barriers to prevent people from returning to the labour market.

The hon. Gentleman has made important points about the local situation in Nottingham and contributed to the broader UK debate about the welfare reform that we hope is about to get going. The concept of the city strategies, in which available funds—often a multiplicity of funds; I know that in Glasgow there are many dozens of strands of funding devoted to helping people back to work—are brought together and other funds may be brought in, is a welcome approach. However, there are several issues that relate to that approach that I want to draw to the Minister's attention, and I will be grateful if he can respond to them.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North talked about scaling up in Nottingham. One consequence of the greater focus on welfare to work is that current projects and programmes need to be scaled up dramatically to enable them to meet delivery targets, but such scaling up raises issues of local accountability and responsibility.

It is important that the Government's approach to welfare reform should not be to deliver it in a top-down way, but to allow local communities and organisations to develop their own strategies, programmes and ideas about how best to tackle the problems that they face in their own communities. The hon. Gentleman talked about the deprived areas fund that the Government are looking to set up. It is worth noting that that fund will be partly resourced through ending the action team for jobs model, which works in Nottingham, in Inverness in my constituency, and across the country. Can the Minister provide some reassurance that the areas that will be targeted by the deprived areas fund will, by and large, be those that currently benefit from the action team approach? In many parts of the country, including Nottingham, there could well be some concern that the important community engagement work of the action teams will be lost.

Mr. Allen: This is a rather paradoxical point. I am keen to have as much local discretion as possible and, going beyond this debate, I believe in constitutional independent local government, in getting off our backs. However, having been in this position of almost supplication for decades, it is not always easy to release people locally to get on and do the job. People are still unsure of where to go and how to take on those responsibilities. It is important that the Department is still there to offer advice.

We have had tremendous advice from officials in the Department for Work and Pensions and from people such as David Simmonds at the Centre for Economic and Social Inclusion that has been invaluable in pointing us in the right direction so that we do not miss this fantastic opportunity because of inexperience in running our own affairs at that level. I hope that the Department will continue to do that with a light touch and to guide us in the right direction.

Danny Alexander: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention.

I want to speak about the national role of the DWP in bringing to fruition some of the local ideas that we have heard about today. The Department's first role is to introduce legislation following the Green Paper, and any indication that the Minister can give us today about the likely timing of that will be gratefully received. Given the range and detail of the issues that have been rehearsed today relating to the strategy in the city of Nottingham and the rest of the country, it is important that sufficient time be allowed to scrutinise the matter in detail. I would be grateful for anything that the Minister can say about that.

Two other issues relating to the approach so far about which there are real concerns are, first, funding, and secondly, the arrangements for contracting with voluntary sector organisations such as those that the hon. Gentleman told us were involved in the consortium in Nottingham.

The overall package in the welfare reform Green Paper for funding the pathways to work scheme was £360 million. The hon. Gentleman drew attention to the importance of rolling out the scheme properly in Nottingham. I have looked at the pilots elsewhere, and it is clear—this is the view of many of the organisations that have commented on the matter—that £360 million is not enough to ensure that a roll-out on the scale that the hon. Gentleman wants in Nottingham and elsewhere can be taken forward. Even a calculation based on a written answer that I received suggests that the cost of the scheme is £400 per claimant, in which case over two years the total funding needed would be £440 million. However, that estimate does not include the cost of the back to work credit or the condition management programme.

I was surprised, to say the least, having tabled a parliamentary question to ascertain what proportion of that £360 million is for back to work credit and what proportion is for the condition management programme, to be told simply that the information was not available. That raises concern in my mind about how the Department calculates the figures and whether we will see pathways lite, which is not what people in the One Nottingham consortium or anywhere else really want or need. A further point is that the £360 million will supposedly come from existing DWP budgets. I am keen to hear from the Minister where the axe will fall to release even that inadequate sum for rolling out the pathways to work project.

I mentioned the condition management programme, as did the hon. Gentleman, in relation to necessary medical assistance. A successful condition management programme rolled out nationwide is dependent on a supply of properly qualified professionals such as cognitive behaviour therapists, but there is a shortage of such therapists and they take up to five years to train. It is important that the Minister in his response addresses how to ensure a supply of properly trained condition management professionals and properly qualified employment advisers. I also want to know how the importance of having people in those areas comes up against the current cuts in DWP staff in a number of areas—and, as I know from my own experience, how that has an impact on morale.

The hon. Gentleman drew attention to the important issue of engaging the voluntary sector and the private sector in delivering many of the back to work schemes that are starting. The separation that that entails and the engagement of such organisations are very important. The Government have talked about that, which I welcome, because a separation between the benefit decision-making process and the back to work help can be an important tool in engaging people in back to work activity without their fearing that they will be challenged on or lose their benefits. That might lead to Jobcentre Plus and the DWP moving into much more of a commissioning role: rather than delivering back to work services themselves, they will commission voluntary and private sector organisations of the sort that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

However, it is important to know how these contracts are to be set up. I think that that will be specified in legislation at national level; perhaps the Minister will spell that out. The Green Paper addresses the engagement of the voluntary and private sectors on a target-driven basis. In terms of the setting out of the contracts, it is important that there be sufficient flexibility to allow the kind of local initiative that the hon. Gentleman described. It is also important that sufficient time be available within a contract for a local organisation to develop and work through the best methods for engaging people in its area. Too often we hear about voluntary organisations coming up with programmes that, as the hon. Gentleman described, spend too much time working on next year's funding application rather than delivering the services that they are setting out to deliver.

It is also important, as the hon. Gentleman said, that welfare to work—welfare reform—provides real support for employers. I was privileged during the Easter recess to visit the Working Links project in the Parkhead ward in Glasgow; some such projects have been picked up on in the plans being developed in Nottingham. One of the most striking things about that Parkhead project is how it engages with employers to help individuals once they have been placed in work not to lose that job. It can often be found that for people who might never have been in work or who have not engaged with the workplace for a long period, the basics of being in employment—such as turning up on time and dealing with their employer on a day-to-day basis—are an entirely new experience, and having support to deal with that is very important. I hope that providing real support to employers, and beefing up the access to work scheme, which is very important for helping people with disabilities back into work, can all be part of what the Government introduce.

The hon. Gentleman rightly drew attention to the importance of mental health, and he will know that depression and anxiety-related conditions are now the largest cause of new on-flows to incapacity benefit, and that people once on incapacity benefit for other reasons often become depressed as an associated condition, so tackling those mental health-related conditions is very important. He said that the One Nottingham consortium was planning to do that.

That requires reform of the personal capacity assessment in particular. In the Green Paper, the Government talked about setting up a taskforce to look into reforming the Pca for people with mental health conditions. I understand that that taskforce has still not been set up. Will the Minister address that? Dealing with this issue is of great importance in terms of the wider point that the hon. Member for Nottingham, North made on the need to provide support that is as locally driven and flexible as possible, to help people in Nottingham who need it to get back into work.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): Welcome to you on this fine morning, Mr. Olner, and welcome also the Minister, for whom I have a great regard. I want to say on the record for all those who will read this debate that I see it as part of my job as shadow welfare reform Minister to work co-operatively with him.

Welfare to work is a key part of social justice, which is an objective that I believe all politicians of good will sign up to. We may differ on the means but not the objective, and I am sure that everyone reading this debate will want my party to work co-operatively with the Government and the Liberal Democrats to take politics out of the issue as much as is humanly possible during debates on the Bill and beyond. I congratulate the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on another typically insightful parliamentary contribution.

The debate is timely, as the introduction of a Bill to implement parts of the Green Paper and the city strategy is a key part of the Secretary of State's agenda. We do not know much about the city strategy models. Co-operative inter-agency work has been done in Edinburgh, Glasgow and Manchester, but the strategies are very much in their infancy. The Opposition believe in more localism and, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned, decentralisation, but we must ensure that councils and the public sector take the role of enabling authorities and do not seek to micro-manage.

The right noises are being made on page 10 of the Green Paper about how co-operation should work. It states that employers should be involved and that budgets should be pooled to simplify funding streams so that they are more accessible and comprehensible to claimants. We welcome the idea of fewer and simplified targets. Let us hope that the learning accounts are not individual learning accounts, as that model sounded good in theory but did not work too well in practice. Much detail needs to be chewed over, and I urge the Minister—as if he does not already know this—to understand that the devil lies in the detail, as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North said.

There is a discussion on page 18 of the Green Paper about vacancy rates in the cities with some of the highest proportions of incapacity benefit claimants. There is a reference to the 100 MPs to whom the Secretary of State wrote in January. The Green Paper states:

"However, many residents of cities do not take up these jobs even though they live within easy travelling distance of thousands of vacancies."

It would be extremely useful to have more detail when we debate this matter in the coming weeks and months. Can the Minister publish evidence to support that proposition, that there are literally thousands of vacancies in those cities? Those inner cities are some of the most depressing, sad and demoralising blackspots for people who feel that they are trapped on incapacity benefit. We need to help them, but we can do that only if we have more analysis, and in particular supporting evidence for that proposition in the Green Paper.

Mr. Allen: The hon. Gentleman has highlighted a phenomenon that I experience often in Nottingham, which is that people do not wish to move off their estate, whether for education or employment. One way to tackle that is to make provision on the estate for further education or other aspects of learning. Once those people are turned on to education and realise that they can get a job, they cannot be stopped from applying for further education or the vacancies that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. We must provide a trigger point in the locality for those people and then let them make the best of it themselves. I hope that that will become evident as we develop our city strategy.

Mr. Ruffley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman and hope that he is right. However, we need more evidence for the proposition that there are thousands of accessible vacancies in those cities. Perhaps the means that he outlined—I trust that he is right—is the way for people to access such vacancies, but discovering the distribution of vacancies among cities would be a starting point, and it is necessary before we can discover whether that is a true proposition.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): Speaking as a Glasgow Member, it is undoubtedly the case that thousands of vacancies are available in Glasgow, and thousands of people are on invalidity benefits. One of the reasons why there has been such a take-up of jobs by the influx of eastern Europeans is that most of those unemployed or on benefits are essentially unemployable and no reasonable employer would take them on in their existing situation. Given a choice between a highly skilled and motivated eastern European and someone trying to return to the labour market who may have addiction problems and has been unemployed for 10 years or so, the latter would be found to be simply not job-ready. They cannot compete in such circumstances, and background help and assistance is necessary. A simple juxtaposition of vacancies and individuals is insufficient.

Mr. Ruffley: That is an important point, which is why I call for the Minister to publish some statistics. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, the question is not quite as easy as it looks. If it were, many more people would be getting on buses and going from one side of Glasgow, Edinburgh or Manchester to the other, and we would not face this problem. I take his point.

In some quarters, such as the third and private sectors, the Green Paper's proposals have been judged to be rather sketchy. We look forward to seeing detail in the Bill and I urge the Minister to tell us the likely date of its publication, not just for my benefit but for that of the stakeholders outside this place. I shall make it easy for him: can he narrow it down to summer or autumn? A specific month is not necessary.

I want to raise some points that bear on the likely success of the city strategy model, which are applicable to all other means of welfare to work delivery, outside cities. The first is the key role of the voluntary and private sectors. In the Green Paper, we are told of the city strategy model and that "Each consortium would also be expected to make use of private and voluntary sector providers to deliver additional employment support."

I shall not rehearse the arguments brilliantly set out in a document from the Oxford Economic Forecasting company prepared for the Employment Related Services Association. In essence, it argues for what the National Audit Office has urged: a complete top-to-bottom change in the letting of welfare to work contracts on the part of Jobcentre Plus.

There is not a level playing field. Private and voluntary sector providers already understand that some of the contracts let to them are of very short duration, which means that they cannot plan and invest for the future by hiring people and buying premises. There are low-value contracts for which it is not worth tendering. Short tendering times and last-minute tendering by Jobcentre Plus make it very difficult for the third and private sectors to make proper bids. Quite amazingly, there is sometimes a change in the specifications that a private or voluntary sector provider has to meet after their bid has been accepted.

Those issues must be flagged up because of the ambition that we regularly hear about from Ministers, which I share, to get more private and voluntary sector provision, provided it is as effective as or more effective than the public sector alternative. We are talking not about cost considerations but about what is effective in getting more people back to work more swiftly in more sustainable jobs. The private and voluntary sectors are not getting a fair crack of the whip. The city strategy will work only if we reconsider procurement.

My second concern relates to the target of getting 1 million off benefit within 10 years, and there is obviously a disaggregation of that figure: there will be a target for each city. Of course, that will mean not getting 1 million people into work but getting them off benefit. There is a huge issue here for those of us who grind through the statistics with a great deal of joy in our heart—it is a genuinely fascinating subject. The destination of some of those who come off incapacity benefit will be to return to income support or jobseeker's allowance, or just to disappear altogether. We should place proper emphasis on getting as many of that 1 million as possible back into work, not just off benefit; they are two radically different things.

I shall not delve into the view of Her Majesty's Opposition and my views about whether getting 1 million off incapacity benefit by 2016 is too ambitious. The Secretary of State calls it a stretching target, but I wonder about it. I say that for one simple reason. I pray in aid only what the Work and Pensions Committee said in the past couple of weeks, that the "Department has not met its commitment to produce incapacity benefits caseload forecasts to 2016" and that it should do so immediately. It also stated that clarification of the baseline by which the aim will be measured is urgently required.

That must be right, because unless we know what the predicted off-flow is, particularly in respect of those over 50 who will reach retirement age between 2006 and 2016, we cannot get a sensible idea of how well the Government are doing in terms of hitting their target.

That brings me to my third concern, which the hon. Member for Nottingham, North will share: how far will the city strategy or any other strategy tackle the problem of existing claimants? That issue needs a good and thorough airing for the following reason. Having been an old Treasury hand pre-1997, I know how to qualify spending commitments and I noted that page 48 of the Green Paper states something about how the needs of the existing stock in pathways to work areas will be catered for:

"As resources allow, we will, over time, consider extending work-focused interviews to existing claimants".

Three qualifiers in one sentence—"as resources allow", "over time" and "consider"—is not bad. That bears on what so many of us have pointed out: the £360 million from existing budgets to roll out pathways to work nationally seems a serious underestimate.

Why do we say that? We know that incapacity benefit personal advisers will need upskilling, that there will need to be better training and that there is a shortage of therapists. Professor Layard is probably arguing on the high end of the spectrum when he says that 10,000 cognitive behaviour therapists might be needed to deliver pathways as a high-quality intervention in the condition management programme. Listening to this debate, I wondered whether the consortium in Nottingham will have the ability to tackle what seem to be serious supply-side constraints, be they in physiotherapy or cognitive behaviour therapy.

Employers are important in the area of welfare to work. The Work and Pensions Committee said that employers seem to have been "largely overlooked in the Green Paper".

All of us who speak to the stakeholders—the voluntary, private and public sectors— agree with that. No matter how much help and support an incapacity benefit claimant or disabled person may receive, if employers do not change their culture there will be difficulties. They must also change it in respect of statutory sick pay and the 28 weeks for which someone who may still be under contract to a company can take time off work because of illness, be that a mental health condition or otherwise. Employers are not doing enough to intervene and give such people support, because they might have been off sick for six months before they do one day go on incapacity benefit. As we all agree, unless incapacity benefit claimants are helped and supported early in their claim, the chances of their returning to work reduce almost exponentially.

The Minister can help the city strategy model by telling us a bit more about his plans for changing statutory sick pay. What will he do to improve employers' attitudes when they work in consortiums of the kind that the hon. Member for Nottingham, North outlined? What plans does the Minister have to reform medical certification, which is first encountered by a claimant when they are on statutory sick pay and are going to their local GP? We need to hear more about what the Government intend to do with the new personal capability assessment, which is meant to be about what IB claimants—and those on statutory sick pay who are potential claimants—can do, rather than just focusing on the illness. To do that, we have to understand what the role of employment advisers in doctors' surgeries will be, not just for individuals on incapacity benefit, but—I stress this—for those on statutory sick pay who are not yet in the benefit system.

The Minister will want to consider all those points. I had a discussion with him before this debate; we decided—well, I did, anyway—that we are men of good will, and that what we were talking about, essentially, is an exercise in improving legislation in a crucial area of public policy and social justice as much as we can. If some questions raised cannot be answered today, I hope that they will be answered in Committee. I once again thank the hon. Member for Nottingham, North, who has, typically, raised an important issue, and has done so in his own special way.

10.41 am

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Mr. Jim Murphy): I am delighted to respond to this debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), who is not only a Nottingham Member of Parliament but chairman of One Nottingham. In the short time that I have been in this job, he is the Member I have seen the most of, but I am not complaining about that; there are others I might complain about. However, over the past week and a bit, I have on occasion felt as though I were being stalked by him.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this Adjournment debate. It is an important time in the development of the city strategy. Given what he says, I would be surprised if One Nottingham were not first in submitting its expression of interest to the Department. I am not saying that it has to be, but given the interest shown by him and his colleagues in the partnership, that would not surprise anyone in the Department.

Mr. Davidson: Of course, the case for Nottingham is strong, but the case for Glasgow is similarly strong.

[Mr. Davidson]

Given that the Scottish elections are coming up next year, I should point out to the Minister that it is important that any launch does not get confused with that process. That requires bringing forward the announcement about Glasgow. The Minister was born and grew up in my constituency, but then left it to go to the other side of the world. He ought to put something back as soon as possible by recognising that Glasgow should be one of the cities chosen.

Mr. Murphy: I do not know whether I have to declare an interest based on what my hon. Friend says, but before I respond to that point, I should say that I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell), who, as my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North, said, was not able to participate in today's debate simply because of the rules of this place, which we all understand; nevertheless, I am sure that he wished to contribute in the same passionate way that my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North, did. I also welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Ian Stewart). He, too, has taken a silent role, but I know that he is interested in the issues that we are discussing.

Mr. Olner (in the Chair): It is a role that he plays very well.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Olner, I have to say that that is the first time that I have been intervened on by the Chairman.

Last, but of course not least, I should mention my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West (Mr. Davidson), who rightly pointed out that I—and almost all my family—grew up in his constituency, in whatever configurations it has found itself in the past few years.

In the short time available to me, I shall not be able to answer all the questions raised during the debate. My officials have written an excellent speech, for which I thank them, but I shall not use much of it. I would rather respond to as many points as I can and save that text for another occasion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West was right to say that I grew up in his constituency. It is the most significant reason for my having energy and determination for my job, especially in respect of the city strategies, the opportunity for people to find work—it was not always there for my immediate family—and the challenges of child poverty. All of us have had different upbringings, and different experiences of income, and of the difference between wealth and poverty. Some have managed to escape poverty, but those who do so must not forget those experiences. Despite the remarkable improvements of recent years, we should remember that too many children continue to grow up in shameful poverty. We need continually to challenge it.

I need no encouragement or additional commitment to get the work done; it gives me the opportunity to restart social mobility. I have spoken about it in the past, but I was limited in my ability to make the changes essential to driving it. Working at the Department for Work and Pensions gives me an enormous opportunity to help change that cycle of social mobility, but that change has stalled. We could debate why, but it is a generational problem.

The changes in social mobility have come about over the generations, but there are three big drivers of social mobility. The first is the family and the mechanisms that the family employs to support the children; that is partly to do with the culture of work and partly to do with the culture of aspiration. The second is education. Education is a phenomenally important driver of social mobility, particularly early-years education—and even early-months education—pre-school education and support during the first few years of primary education. The third is poverty, especially child poverty. As we know, a child born in poverty is four times as likely to live in poverty in adulthood.

We need to break that cycle of generational poverty, that inherited lack of aspiration. The Department and others are helping to overcome that problem. Although I say that it is a generational problem, we none of us have the luxury to say that the solution is generational. The problem has built up over the generations, but it cannot and must not be solved over the generations. Instead, we have the target dates of 2010 and 2020 for alleviating child poverty and gaining the aspects of full employment of which we have spoken before.

The reason why we have a city strategy—I will respond soon to the specific points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North—is that we have a target of 80 per cent. employment for the United Kingdom. We are currently hovering at just under 75 per cent. The employment rate in our great cities of Glasgow, London, Manchester and Liverpool is at or just below 70 per cent. Despite that, the greatest progress in the past nine years has been in the cities with the highest levels of unemployment and the highest levels of economic inactivity.

However, there are still real problems. There are problems not only in Nottingham, as we heard earlier, but in the five cities that we talk of most often—London, Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool and Glasgow. For those five cities even to reach the current national average—not the 80 per cent. target but the national average of 75 per cent.—a further 400,000 people will have to find work .

Mr. Davidson: Is the Minister aware that since 1997 unemployment in my constituency has fallen by more than 50 per cent., that youth unemployment has come down by more than 80 per cent. and that long-term unemployment has been reduced by more than 90 per cent.? He would have known that if he had delivered my election leaflets. However, there is much more to be done.

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend is right. There has been remarkable progress. The areas where the problem has been greatest have seen the most remarkable improvements and turn-around. There has been genuine progress in the transformation of individual families' material well-being and employment has changed the culture within families. However, even within those families who have an adult in work, there are still too many—I think it is about 40 per cent.—in which the child experiences material poverty.

Listening to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander), I think that the good people of Parkhead will be over-visited, as I, along with the local Member of Parliament, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, East (Mr. Marshall), will be visiting the area this Friday to talk about the specifics in the east end of the city.

London is the richest city in Europe, yet almost half the children in inner-city London still experience real poverty. That cannot be right. We all agree that it cannot be right. The city strategy, pathways into work, the new deal, the national minimum wage and investment in primary education are all about driving those children out of poverty and into opportunity, so that they can help break what is an all too common cycle in generations of families.

I shall respond to some points that hon. Members have made during our thoughtful debate. I hope that it sets the tone for our dialogue throughout the entire welfare reform agenda. I thank hon. Members for welcoming me to this new post.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North made some points about local flexibility for Jobcentre Plus managers, and I shall take him up on his invitation to reflect on whether we have the flexibility right at local level. Our approach to local flexibility must be consistent. If we say that in city strategies, local people who know the local specifics should design a mechanism that helps to drive up employment and alleviate child poverty, it is right that we should provide opportunities for people to tell us what barriers exist in national and regional policies, structures or mechanisms as they roll out those strategies and make their expressions of interest. We will do what we can to remove as many of the barriers and working operations that those who submit well-founded expressions of interest say get in the way of their ambition to deliver a locally designed, effective way of finding people employment.

Several hon. Members made the point about qualifications. I have said this before, but the generation currently in education is the first for whom the global economy is the norm. People are no longer competing with the person in the same street, country or on even the same continent. It is a global competition. To equip those children and teenagers in the global economy, skills and qualifications are crucial. One sobering statistic is that 40 per cent. of lone parents who are out of work have no qualifications whatever. That is one genuinely worrying statistic.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West alluded to how we provide an opportunity for those folk who have no formal qualifications, are not in employment but have the phenomenal responsibility of bringing up children. We must strike the right balance to ensure that they learn and acquire skills and qualifications, whether academic or others, to make them more employable in the global economy. He gave his own sense of that in terms of the challenge from eastern Europe.

A question was asked about the city strategy timetable. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North will receive over the next few days detailed guidance about the expression of interest. Some very good work is being done in Nottingham, but I know that he accepts that if we are going to deliver on our collective ambition, we have to take that good work delivered by good people to a different scale and reach. That is the case for all cities that submit an expression of interest. We expect a delivery plan over the following three to four months. Our current thinking is to have 10 to 15 pathfinders in the first tranche of the roll-out. There is flexibility in that, too, because if there are more than 15 high-quality expressions of interest, we may go further.

I thank my hon. Friend for his compliments on the support that he received from officials at the Department for Work and Pensions. They will welcome his words, because they put enormous energy into the initiative, as did my predecessor, the right hon. Member for Barking (Margaret Hodge), who has now gone to the Department of Trade and Industry. She had a personal interest in the initiative. The appropriate level of support and guidance—but not interference—will remain available for local consortiums that want additional support and to share best practice.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey raised points about capacity in the health service and the attitude of employers. We are in constant dialogue with officials and Ministers in the Department of Health and elsewhere on the matter. We all share an ambition—it is shared across Government, so that there is no lack of will and determination to achieve it—and we are engaged in detailed conversations about capacity.

As the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) pointed out, if we are to reduce the number of incapacity benefit recipients by 1 million, supporting people in getting work is not all that is needed. We must prevent people from going on to incapacity benefit in the first place. That is a matter of working with GPs, primary care trusts, and, crucially, employers.

The initiative is not just a matter of employment opportunities and the changing of employers' attitudes towards people on incapacity benefit and people with mental health problems; it is about working with employers to prevent people from slipping out of economic activity into the depression and lack of confidence that we heard described by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North, which leads them to leave the workplace and claim incapacity benefit. This is not just about getting people off incapacity benefit; it is about a sensitive approach to preventing them from going on to it—something that I am sure we can profitably discuss in the next few months. I have already engaged in conversations about that with the national employment panel.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds raised points that also arose in other hon. Members' speeches this morning. We expect that the national roll-out of pathways will largely be achieved in partnership with the voluntary and private sectors, with the proviso that he suggested that it should provide value for money and be effective. We think that working in partnership with local agencies will provide the dynamism, flexibility and spark that will help us with the national roll-out.

I have two things to say about the voluntary sector. First, now that we have greater ambitions for the voluntary sector and are asking it to do more, we cannot ask it to do so on a cycle of annual budgets and annual contracts. It is not feasible, fair, effective or cost-effective, and it will not deliver on our collective ambitions. As we all know from our conversations with representatives of the voluntary sector, when organisations are asked what they want to do first, they often say, "My first priority in my one-year contract is to get a renewal for next year. My main role in week one is to scope next year's funding plan." It is not reasonable to request the voluntary sector to work in that way, particularly if we are asking it to do more. I hope that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds is reassured by the fact that the pathways contracts, for example, will build a three-year cycle, which will give a greater sense of stability.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West gave his own interpretation of the point about vacancies in cities, but it is my understanding that the Department for Work and Pensions has published a detailed analysis. I shall look at it, and if there is a gap in the analysis I shall of course do as my hon. Friend suggested. As to contracting, external consultants are currently reviewing how we contract, and whether we do so in the most cost-effective and productive way. Once we conclude that work, I shall of course share it with hon. Members.

We have come to the conclusion of a helpful discussion. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North again, and not only on securing the debate. He and my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West have taken a keen interest in how we support those who are economically inactive, how we drive up employment opportunities and how we end the cycle of low aspiration in families. Cities are key parts of that. They are engines of economic regeneration and development and I thank my hon. Friend for securing the debate.

London Olympics

11 am

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): It is a pleasure to introduce this debate. I suspect that we will have quite a few debates on the financing of the Olympics in the next six years. It is appropriate to visit the subject now, because we are getting past the stage of general concept and into the practical, gritty reality. The Olympic Delivery Authority has been established and the chief executive of the London Organising Committee for the Olympic Games is now in place. There is also the public inquiry into the site, and people are beginning to talk seriously about funding.

In the past few weeks, David Higgins, in almost the first words that he has uttered in his capacity of chief executive of the ODA, has suggested that the infrastructure costs would be not £1 billion, as originally thought, but £3 billion. It was not clear exactly what those costs referred to, but the implication was that the man running the show has a much more realistic—and pessimistic—picture of costings than has hitherto been portrayed.

Also, the Mayor has indicated in the past few days that he might have to acquire land, at considerable cost—pessimists have argued that an equivalent of possibly double the London council tax contribution will be needed, which is not something that was considered previously. I do not know what the truth is on those items—we shall come to questions about that later—but costings are now crucial and the issue of a properly financially disciplined games needs to be firmly set out.

I share the all-party consensus that hosting the games is potentially good for Britain and good for London. We should support the games and ensure that they are a success. Success is not just about sport but about funding and the wider economics. My other motives for approaching the issue are several, the first of which is that I represent a constituency in south-west London.

I was surprised and a bit taken aback by the strength of feeling that I encountered on the doorstep in the past few weeks from people who had realised for the first time the extent of the council tax increases that they face—because of the nature of property valuations in London, many are nearer £40 than £20 a year. It is not so much the cost, which I guess most people can afford—at least at the upper end of the income scale—as the feeling that things are open-ended and there is much more to come.

In trying to justify the games and explain things to my constituents, I appreciate that their response is not just a grumpy reaction to paying for the games. Twickenham is already a sporting Mecca and we are proud of that. There are the usual frictions associated with stadium communities, but we are proud of our association with rugby union. However, the key thing about the sport is that its big events—from the World cup down to internationals—are self-financing. It does not depend on largesse from London or the Government. Indeed, one of the gripes of rugby union is that corporation tax has to be paid on its profits, just as if it were a company, and the surpluses go to the Treasury, not back into grass-roots sport as they should—a point that I have made to the Minister and the Chancellor.

We now have another big spectator sport in Twickenham. As a fellow Yorkshireman who grew up with rugby league, I know that the Minister will be pleased that Twickenham now boasts a rugby league side that sits above the mighty Wigan in the premier league. Like rugby union, however, rugby league is a self-financing sport and does not depend on subsidy.

We have also had bad experiences locally of national funding of sport, which has jaundiced an awful lot of people's thinking. I suspect that the biggest participant sport locally is swimming. We have one public swimming pool, which is open and heated. For my first five years as an MP, I battled with Ministers and Sport England to get some support from the lottery for the pool. Initially that was ruled out on grounds of pure dogma—in no circumstances would the lottery support open pools—but, with the help of the then Sports Minister, we got the fatwa lifted. However, we were then told that although the pool was an admirable project, which would serve many thousands of people and was no longer barred on principle, Sport England did not have enough money, so we had to go for a cheaper patch-and-mend solution. Unfortunately, a few months after the announcement we were told that there were hundreds of billions of pounds available from the sports lottery for the Olympics. I think the Minister will understand that a lot of my constituents—the tens of thousands who use this community facility—are a little jaundiced when they hear about the way in which the Olympics are being funded.

My final local point is that, like all communities, we have local athletes of whom we are very proud. Unfortunately, in the case of Twickenham, the most celebrated name recently has been that of the gymnast Ben Brown, who publicly announced that he was no longer able to continue training for the Olympics because there was no support for him. I know that the Chancellor has subsequently come forward with a handsome sum of money, but I think it was too late in his case.

I paint this picture because I want to try to convey to the Minister the fact that in my area, as in many parts of London, let alone other parts of the country, there are mixed feelings about the way in which the Olympics are being funded. There is a general sense of pride and optimism, but also grumbling. I am anxious that the grumbling should not become anger, and to that end we must ensure that things are properly managed financially.

A second personal reason for wanting to introduce the debate is the work that I did before I became an MP. I was involved in the oil and gas industry, with projects that were often as big as the Olympic games. In the private sector, no less than in the public, there can be massive errors and cost overruns. I have recently been reading about the travails of my former company in its projects off Sakhalin island in Russia, where costs are several hundred per cent. more than budgeted. In the private sector, there are disciplines to deal with that, which we used to call scenario planning. Managers are forced to set out what could happen rather than what they would like to happen and think will happen. In the funding of the Olympic games, I do not sense a hard scenario planning discipline. Are people looking at worst case scenarios, budgeting for them and preparing for the worst possible outcome, not in order to knock the games or undermine them but to be hard-headed and ruthlessly realistic about the prospects? That is my background and why I have come to the debate.

We are all concerned with trying to make a success of the games. Success is about money as well as sport. As the Minister knows, recent Olympic games have a mixed history. Some have been unambiguously successful: Seoul, Los Angeles and probably Barcelona—although there has been an argument about the legacy of the buildings there—are normally included in that category. Some have been commercially successful, although perhaps not successful in sport: Atlanta is the obvious case. Some were disasters, some for purely political reasons: Moscow and Munich. We have had commercial disasters, of which Montreal is the obvious example. Sydney massively overran and, most recently, in Athens costs escalated from £2 billion to £8 billion in broad global terms, and there is continuing anxiety about how Greece will cover that. We clearly want London to be at the top end of the range, rather than the bottom.

In order to try to analyse the problems, I have been trying to get a handle on the costs of the games. One of the difficulties is that quite apart from the big document that the costs are contained in, they are being presented in many different ways. Revenue and capital are also mixed up, there are differences between cash flow and balance sheet accounting and all kinds of conventions are being used, so it is difficult to get a handle on the costs that we are talking about and how they are being set off against revenue streams. In simple terms, so we can talk from a common base, my understanding is that the cost of the Olympics can be roughly put into three main categories.

First are the operating costs of £1.5 billion, which are predominantly commercial and are covered by TV rights, tickets and sponsorship, although there is an explicit Treasury guarantee on that component. Secondly, there is £2.4 billion in funding from the lottery, London council tax payers and the London Development Agency for the village's essential infrastructure, the transport, the stadiums and the security costs. The third, slightly ambiguous bit includes elements that were to be funded anyway, such as the Lea valley development and the village, which was originally seen as a purely commercial project, but which might not be now, given the Mayor's comments. It also includes the £7 billion envisaged for transport, which may or may not be necessary, but which would be desirable. We therefore have a rough range from about £4.5 billion to £12 billion, depending on what we do or do not include.

The big challenge for the organisers—the Government are, of course, centrally involved—is how to ensure that the costs do not explode as they have in other public and private sector projects. I am sure that the Minister is fed up to his eyeballs with all the pessimistic stories about previous public sector projects, but what amuses me is that people always choose the Wembley stadium project as a bad example, when in fact it has been pretty successful compared with many other projects, because the cost overrun is only 20 per cent, the project is overdue by only a year and almost all the extra costs have been borne by the commercial partner, Multiplex. That is rather a good outcome compared with many other projects, such as the Jubilee line, let alone real horror stories such as the Scottish Assembly or the British Library, which is probably the ultimate disaster case, having cost 10 times the original estimate and been 10 years overdue. Clearly, we are not heading down that road, but a lot of discipline will have to be exercised if we are to get close even to the outcome of the Wembley project, although of course the Government and the organisers cannot allow such an outcome, because the Olympics must be delivered on time.

The central problem is that the organisers must ensure that the project is delivered not only on cost, but on time. Some pretty sophisticated thinking is going into understanding how we can improve on previous public sector experience with big projects by drawing on best practice, as happened in the case of the T5 terminal, which is the model that is now being used. The central problem, however, is that although the Government, the Mayor and the people who will be operationally responsible are thinking about best practice, the people in the construction industry are also learning from experience. People do not get to be the chief executives of big construction companies by being Mother Teresa—they are hard-headed people and they have learned the lessons. Companies do not want to be the next Multiplex, so they will put in very high bids for contracts that involve rewards for coming in under cost and penalties for going over cost—nobody will take the risk of overshooting. When the bids come in, I suspect that we will be shocked by how big they are, and Mr. Higgins has perhaps been preparing us for that.

I want to set out a long series of questions. I hope that the Minister can answer them and that they will trigger discussions among colleagues in the Room. I think that they will form the basis for a process of questioning and public accountability in the months and years ahead. First, can the Minister explain what Mr. Higgins meant? Which infrastructure costs was he talking about? Was he talking out of turn or was his estimate of the cost escalation sensible and prudent?

Secondly, and related to that, when will the KPMG study on the cost of the Olympics be published? What is the Government's estimate of construction cost inflation? We do not need to get such information from an expensive commercial consultant, because it is presumably available to the Bank of England and the Treasury. According to unofficial estimates, cost escalation is about 7 per cent. a year, rather than 3 per cent. a year, but is that correct?

Leading on from that, once the KPMG study has been finalised, who in the Government or the ODA will be responsible for monitoring and modelling the construction industry over the next five to six years? I ask that because an awful lot of work will be going on. I think that the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) spoke about this in a recent debate. Although the transport projects, the London Gateway project and the bridge are complementary to the games, they are also competing with the games for construction raw materials and labour. Who will monitor supply and demand in the construction industry? Has anyone got a grip on that? Presumably it is not the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. Is it the Department of Trade and Industry or the former Office of the Deputy Prime Minister? Is anyone in Government or involved with the project considering the overall flow of supply and demand in the construction industry and how that will affect costs as the project rolls forward?

There is a question about new items of cost. There is the possibility, raised by the Mayor, of the compulsory acquisition of land—of London buying land that was hitherto assumed to be part of a voluntary, purely commercial exercise. Will that happen? I do not know what the risks are, the current state of play or the Government's assessment of it.

There is a series of questions about how the ODA and the various partners to the Olympics will deal with the pressures that I have described. One question is about how they will deal with issues of design. There is clearly a big difference of strategic focus between the Mayor and Lord Coe. I am not a great fan of the Mayor of London, but I believe that he said the appropriate thing for an elected politician when he said that London

"was not in the position of spending additional monies on iconic buildings", but he was promptly contradicted by Lord Coe, who rather tartly observed:

"We wouldn't want a tin-shed Games on the edge of a city."

Reading those quotations, one sees that there are very different perspectives on how the games and the facilities should be designed and costed. It is appropriate to ask the Minister where the Government sit in that controversy. What end of the spectrum are they at? Do they broadly agree with the Mayor or with Lord Coe? Where will they throw their weight in the argument?

Another question about how the Government in particular could help with the management of potential costs relates to the subcontracting of much of the construction work. One of the more worrying documents that appeared in the past few weeks was the report by PricewaterhouseCoopers, which I am sure the Minister has seen. It says that whereas London's GDP will benefit by some £6 billion, non-London will lose £2.8 billion. In other words, the rest of Britain will be worse off than if another country had staged the event. I present that not as a negative debating point but to make the point that the provinces of Britain could benefit from large-scale outsourcing and prefabrication in respect of a great deal of the work. They will have lower construction inflation, too. Clearly, the process needs to be managed, and I ask the Minister who is managing it.

There is a series of questions about sponsorship. The £1.5 billion needs to be met through aggressive and successful sponsorship. We all wish the sponsors well. It is a worthy cause and I hope that they are able to raise the money, but it is a big ask, because we are talking about more being raised in sponsorship than the whole marketing budget for British sport in any one year. What happens if the sponsorship falls short and the £1.5 billion operating budget cannot be met? Who is first in line to take up any slack if the sponsorship does not come in as we hope it will?

My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) has been pursuing a series of issues relating to the link between sponsorship and the integrity, the copyright, embedded in the Olympic symbols. Quite rightly, the Government have been tough in insisting that those symbols should be protected. There is real intellectual property there, and protection is essential to encourage sponsors to come forward. There is an issue of detail, because we are all beginning to hear from small businesses that are irritated or frustrated that they cannot muscle in on the Olympics. The question for the Government is about when they will produce the guidelines that explain exactly how the integrity and intellectual property elements of the Olympic symbols are to be protected. What guidelines will govern people who try to encroach on that terrain?

There are also questions about security; we know from the Athens experience that that can blow the financing of the games wide open. Clearly, the Government have to give security priority. If the security budget goes way beyond what was in the bid document, where will the slack be? To what item of the budget will the Government look to offset any escalation in security costs, as could well arise for very good reasons?

There is also an issue about the legacy and its costing. Who will benefit from the legacy? In the past few months, a change in the concept of the Olympic village has emerged; the village could become a more valuable, high-density development than was originally envisaged. Presumably, that means that after the games it will be worth a good deal more. That is positive, but who will have first access to that money? Will it be London, the Government or the International Olympic Committee? Under what formula will any upside be apportioned between the various partners? Similarly, who will take the first hit if it all goes badly? I am not clear that there is a clear protocol that defines which of the various supporters and guarantors will be first in line to take both the benefits and the losses that might arise.

How far have we gone in clarifying what will happen to some of the legacy buildings? I am aware that the IOC has praised the London Olympic bid for the thinking that has gone into legacy work. That is a very positive sign. As one who represents the rugby Mecca, I was somewhat struck by the proposal, current until recently, that the main likely future for the big stadium was to downsize its capacity from 80,000 to 25,000, and that it would probably then be used for a London rugby club. Harlequins, my local rugby club in Twickenham, is good and well supported, but even with the recent expansion of capacity, it operates at about 10,000. It is not at all clear how any London rugby union or rugby league club operating in the east end close to West Ham will be able to pull in anything remotely like 25,000 spectators. The concept I have talked about may have disappeared, but it would be useful to have clarity on whether the issue has been resolved, and if so, in what form.

We acknowledge that it was necessary to enter various guarantees, involving notably the Treasury, but also London as a result of the memorandum of understanding with the DCMS. The lottery is also a potential support. However, from what I have read and discussed, what is missing from the picture is the exact relationship that would exist between those three potential guarantors and support bodies in the event of things going wrong. Who will take the first hit when, and under what conditions? We need more clarity on that.

Among my constituents there is a mixture of pride and hope on the one hand, and worry, anxiety and even a degree of cynicism about the funding of the games on the other. The feeling is that the present generation of politicians of all parties is only too happy to scoop up the credit for having brought the Olympics to London, but in six, seven or eight years' time somebody else will have to pay the bill. If we are to prevent that anxiety from degenerating into outright cynicism, it is important that we should be absolutely up front and clear about the costs, risks and potential dangers, and that we should face them now.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Initially, I came only to listen to the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable). However, having understood and appreciated what he has said, I should like to make a few comments.

Financial commitment is an important aspect of the games, because we have, dare I say it, been here before. Contingency planning has come before the House for many years. I remember when we discussed and managed the preparation for and development of the millennium dome, when I sat on the Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport. Over a period of two years or more, we had the then Minister, Mr. Mandelson, in front of the Committee—I hope that the Minister will spend some time looking back at some of the evidence given then—and our biggest issues and complaints were about contingency planning.

Of course, things happen, as part of a development process, that one does not anticipate at the beginning. The hon. Gentleman's earlier questions on this issue are particularly timely, because we now have an opportunity to overcome some of the problems from which we have suffered on issues such as the millennium dome.

The hon. Gentleman pointed out that sponsorships have to come in. One of the problems with the millennium dome was that sponsorships did not come in on time, and the Ministers and other people involved with the commissioning of the dome had to back-pedal on many occasions. We all know that the costs spiralled enormously. Having said that, the dome opened on time, but then there was a big question about its legacy. Unfortunately for the Government and all those who supported the dome, the press had a field day and the dome became a great white elephant. The issues of the dome and its legacy still have not been resolved, and I do not want to see what could be a fantastic event for this country, with a fantastic legacy, being handled in a way that does not close off all the financial issues that were not closed off for the millennium dome.

The Culture, Media and Sport Committee also studied the preparation and build-up of the Olympic games in Sydney. Our Chairman decided that it would be appropriate to go out to Homebush, and we spent some time there. I was extremely impressed by the work done by the Australians in preparation for and in the build-up to those games. I may have this wrong, but I remember being told that they had sold off the competitors' village in advance to raise funds. We all thought that was fantastic, but at the end of the games—like many others, as was well described by the hon. Gentleman—even though their contingency planning was, in my opinion, well scrutinised in advance, they came across some extremely large financial costs which had to be supported by the Australian nation.

We cannot take anything for granted. We want the games to be a success. I want that not only for my constituents but for the nation. Importantly, we must accept that although not everyone can participate and compete in the games, everyone can be a part of the process. I would like the Minister to accept this morning, in terms of the planning commitments and finances that go with them, that we should have a nationwide project through our schools, sports clubs, regions and local authorities to encourage people to participate in a successful launch and games. That could do many things: it could mean that everyone says, "I didn't compete, but I participated," it could help to raise funds, and it could make people buy into the concept, so that when the games happen, everyone owns part of them. The nation's ownership of the games is a fundamental part of everybody understanding the financial commitment that goes with them.

I have a specific point to put to the Minister about the games and their legacy, and about contingency planning in order to get the "best of British" flag flown from the beginning. Does he agree that an environmentally sustainable Olympic park that demonstrates the best in UK green landscaping and planting would be a valuable contribution to the games? I speak with a vested interest: I am vice-chairman of the all-party group on gardening and horticulture, and in my constituency there are many companies that can and will produce first-class plants, trees and all sorts of landscaping products for use at the games.

My point—and it has been amply demonstrated that this was not well handled at the Athens Olympics—is that such activity is always considered last and not first. If we want to give a commitment to make the park an environmentally sustainable place where the whole nation can participate and it becomes a British park—not a world park, because we are flying our flag and nobody else's—I have to ask this question of the Minister: as part of the financial commitment, will he join me in calling on the Olympic Delivery Authority, by ring-fencing funding early in the development process, to allow this to happen, because I assure hon. Members that it would pay dividends in the end?

May I draw to the Minister's attention my early-day motion asking for this commitment? It currently has all-party support, but not enough people recognise the need for us to fly the flag for Britain. We need to make a financial commitment now, and we must ensure that that financial commitment, and the contingencies that go with it, are fulfilled before, during and after the games.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing the debate. It is traditional to say that, but I also congratulate him on the content of his contribution. He made it very clear that the Liberal Democrats are fully supportive of all the work being done to ensure that London in 2012 has the best ever Olympics and Paralympics. However, he also made it crystal clear that our support comes with a clear understanding that we will be critical friends of the project, and that we will not be prohibited in any way from seeking answers to some of the crucial questions—questions that were raised not only by my hon. Friend's constituents in Twickenham but by people across the country. I am delighted that he had an opportunity to put a series of questions to the Minister, and I am sure that we all look forward to the responses.

There have been many debates in this Chamber and elsewhere about the Olympics and Paralympics. During them, it has been traditional for the relative merits of the cities of Loughborough, Bath and Sheffield to be aired, and for the virtues that they have to offer in respect of the Olympic movement to be extolled. I am prepared today to agree to a self-denying ordinance to make mention no more of my wonderful city and the contribution it can make, if we get a similar assurance from the Minister in relation to Sheffield.

The crucial thing so far has been the cross-party support for the Olympics. In a recent letter from the IOC to the Secretary of State, the IOC praised that cross-party support and made it clear how important it had been in securing the Olympics and Paralympics for London in 2012. I must place on the record therefore my considerable disquiet at the winning of the Olympic games having been used in a Labour party election broadcast in the run-up to the recent local elections. I know that that concern is shared by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson). We have raised it with the Secretary of State, and we have been given a clear assurance that such events will not be repeated, which I welcome. We have also been assured that there will continue to be the opportunity for members of Opposition parties to work closely with the Government on the various issues that will no doubt come before us over the next few years, because this is a crucial project. It has not been said so far in this debate, but it has been said elsewhere, that seeking just to build the Olympic park and to make the associated transport arrangements is the equivalent of seeking to secure within just six years two terminal 5s. This is a huge project. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham is absolutely right to say that it is critical that we examine and question issues relating to the cost of this mammoth undertaking at all stages and to what happens if things go wrong, as they are likely to in one way or another. He rightly asks questions about who will pick up the tab and who will get the huge benefits that may come.

It is crucial that we do not see the winning of the games a year ago as the end of the matter. One of the diligent researchers in my office came across a quotation from Polybius, made over two and half millennia ago:

"Those who know how to win are much more numerous than those who know how to make proper use of their victories."

In a sense, that is what our debate is about: ensuring that we make proper use of our success in Singapore a year ago. Scrutiny mechanisms must be in place to ensure that we do not have the sort of fiasco we had with the millennium dome or the many other public sector projects to which my hon. Friend referred.

We must ensure, as the hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser) rightly said, a sustainable legacy. That includes an environmentally sustainable park and many other aspects. We will be critical friends of the project, but from the outset enormous praise must be given because of the huge progress already made. That progress was recognised by members of the visiting IOC delegation recently. They rightly said that we were years ahead of some other cities that had previously won the great honour of hosting the Olympic games in their countries.

The London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games Act 2006 was passed in record time, and it will set up the various bodies that run the games. The Olympic Delivery Authority and London Organising Committee of the Olympic Games are both now well under way, and soon we shall see the official launch of the ODA, even though it already has some excellent people on board—people in whom I have a great deal of confidence. The organising committee has begun to search for the first tier of sponsors, which is an example of good, early progress.

London 2012 now controls 90 per cent. of the land at Stratford and has done deals with the majority of landowners. As my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham says, we still have the compulsory purchase order inquiry to come, but good progress has been made. Work has already begun on the Olympic site with the burying of what were previously overhead power cables. Recently, Stratford International station has been completed, which will open next year once the final stage of the channel tunnel rail link is completed.

During the past 48 hours, we have seen the success of the national lottery, not just in meeting the £14 million target for this year's Olympic lottery games but in exceeding it by more than £2 million. We know that work is under way to consider all aspects of cost. My hon. Friend rightly referred to the KPMG study, and we look forward to that report. I hope that it will touch on the issue that he raised of inflation costs. A figure of roughly 3 per cent. has been assumed, but many people are saying that inflation costs in the construction industry are running somewhere in the order of 7 per cent.

Understandably, there will be concerns. My hon. Friend said that we should be "ruthlessly realistic" about the cost of the games, and that notion should apply at all stages. The fullest information must be made available, so that as many people as possible can be engaged in the necessary scrutiny. We do not wish to be left in the same situation as Athens—some are saying that it will still have to find about €9 billion or €10 billion.

We know that there are huge challenges ahead, and my hon. Friend mentioned many of them. I do not wish to repeat things, but I shall discuss additional concerns. A huge challenge is being given to the national lottery in respect of the money that it is to secure both from its traditional funding sources, where money will be taken away, and from the money raised through the specific Olympic promotions. Despite the recent successes—overall lottery ticket sales have increased for three years on the trot, which is welcome because of the money that is going to good causes—there are some clouds on the horizon.

One such cloud relates to lottery-style games, which are increasingly being run by gambling operators and have no mandate to raise money for good causes, yet offer lottery-style arrangements. They confuse consumers, are at odds with the duty of the Gambling Commission to ensure that gambling is conducted in a fair and open manner, and are increasingly diverting money away from the national lottery and the good causes that it supports, including the Olympics.

I also have a concern about possible impacts on the national lottery of the newly-established online lottery, monday. Recently, on the Floor of the House, I asked the Minister whether it had been set up as a result of a loophole being found in the existing legislation. I was told that that was certainly not the case and that it was all perfectly above board. It seems odd that monday is claiming that it is offering a prize of £1 million, yet the operators are set up as a so-called society lottery, for which the legislation requires that the maximum prize be £200,000. The only way in which it can offer £1 million is by linking five individual lotteries, but I understand that such linking is also not permitted.

We have concerns about how that particular online lottery is operating. It is setting itself up very deliberately—its advertisements are clear—in competition with the national lottery. I recall the Minister assuring me during debate on the Gambling Bill that everything possible would be done to protect the national lottery. I am in favour of society lotteries. I moved amendments to propose that such lotteries that provide funding for hospices, for example, would be protected. The monday operators have found a loophole in the legislation, which I hope will be examined quickly.

My hon. Friend and I share the growing concerns of some Londoners about the contribution that they will have to make. My party has argued, and the Conservative party has supported us, that there should be a cap on the total contribution that London council tax payers should make to the running of the games. Londoners will benefit more than those in other parts of the country, but there is a limit to what they should realistically be expected to pay. They should not be put into a situation where they have no certainty about how long they will have to make the contribution for. I must point out something that is rarely said in a debate about London council tax contributions. The total contribution is estimated at £625 million, but the Mayor of London has always made it clear that that represents £550 million going towards the Olympics and Paralympics, and the further £75 million has been included for potential cost overruns.

I am also concerned that Londoners may not get the full benefit that they seek. One concern is whether we are doing sufficient to ensure that people in London have the necessary skills to acquire the jobs that will be created. A recent Local Government Association report expressed concern that not enough was being done about that.

Another area of concern relates to tourism, for which the Minister also has responsibility.

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): No longer.

Mr. Foster: I apologise to the Minister. He has been stripped of that responsibility, but he had it until recently, and I know that he is an expert in these matters, so he will have no difficulty in responding to my point. I say to him in the gentlest possible way that I for one am confused by the Government's policy on tourism. Before we had won the games, the Secretary of State proudly boasted that she would get behind tourism and that, consequently, by 2010 we would achieve income of £100 billion from tourism. That was her tourism target. The Minister looks puzzled. It was published on 19 July 2004.

We won the Olympic games, there was a pause and then the Prime Minister decided to get in on the act. He produced the Prime Minister's Olympic tourism charter. When we asked for a copy of it, nobody could give us one. Eventually we got one—it was printed on one side of an A4 paper—but nobody has heard any further details. The interesting thing was that it set a target of £100 billion for income from tourism by 2012. Having won the Olympics, the Government appear to have downgraded their aspirations for income from tourism.

Finally, on the nations and regions, I have spoken to the Minister about the commitments that we all made to our electorates that all parts of the country would benefit from the Olympics and Paralympics coming to London. It is critical to ensure that that is the case and that at the earliest possible opportunity people in every part of the country who were so supportive of the bid for the games are given information on how they will benefit not just from one-off contracts, although those are important, but from lasting legacies in each nation and region.

I note with some concern that the chief executive of the British Olympic Association is urging the Minister, as did my hon. Friend in his excellent contribution, to publish at an early stage a set of guidelines on how plans for—rightly—protecting the Olympic symbols and names will be put in place in a way that enables firms, businesses, organisations, charities and so on in each of the nations and regions to feel that they are able to contribute.

My hon. Friend asked a series of excellent and important questions. We look forward to the Minister's answers, but I end where I began, by saying that, notwithstanding the fact that we are critical friends of the Olympics and Paralympics, we believe that significant progress has been made. The games are a huge opportunity for each part of this country as well as for London, but a great deal of work must be done to ensure that we grasp that opportunity in such a way that our preparations are not only on time but on budget.

11.48 am

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing this debate on the financing of the Olympics. It is of course only six weeks since the London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games Act 2006 passed through the House, but three key things have changed since then. The first is that the Olympic Delivery Authority has been formed as a result of the Act. It is focusing its attention on land acquisition, site assembly and, particularly, the businesses. Secondly, the Olympic precept has hit the doorsteps—people are now paying for the games.

Thirdly, the local elections have taken place. We had the same feedback in west London that the hon. Gentleman described. There is a clear feeling that people in the west of the capital are not benefiting from the process at all, and that came back time and again during the local election campaign. We have already spoken to the Minister and voiced our dissatisfaction about the party political broadcast. I suspect that in some subconscious way people's feelings were stirred up. There are many people in the west of London who believe that the games are very east London-centric and that they are not benefiting them. The first of five questions that I want to ask the Minister is about the plans of the Government and the Mayor to ensure that west London benefits from the Olympics in the same way that east London evidently will. I want to concentrate firmly on the financing of the Olympics.

As the hon. Member for Twickenham said, the issue is a jungle, but it is best explained by breaking the Olympics down into four departments. The first is the area for which central Government are responsible. They have responsibility for the overall strategic direction, the legislation and the funding through the Exchequer and lottery. As the hon. Gentleman said, tied up in that are generic infrastructure improvements—exact cost unknown. The second department—these divisions correspond exactly to the four seats on the Olympic board—is the responsibility of the Mayor and the ODA. They are responsible for infrastructure; the estimate for that is £2.375 billion.

The third department is that managed by LOCOG, which is effectively the event manager. It raises its income through sponsorship and merchandising. When we considered the Bill, we were told that LOCOG had to raise £1.5 billion, as the hon. Gentleman said. In a written answer to me this week, the Minister for Sport suggested that that sum was too big. Finally, there is the BOA, which is responsible for training the athletes.

The best analogy for that structure that I have heard is that of a theatre: the Government decide that having a theatre would be a good thing; the ODA and the Mayor build the theatre; LOCOG is the events manager who lays on the show; and the BOA ensures that the actors turn up ready to go, having learned their lines. That is the rough division.

Let us consider those four areas one by one, starting with the Government. We debated the Government's part extensively during proceedings on the London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games Act, and there are two points worth emphasising. First, there is still a crucial lack of protection for Londoners from any cost overruns that may occur. We suggested to the Minister—we proposed an amendment, supported by the Liberal Democrats, to this effect—that there be a cap on Londoners' contributions. In the absence of that cap, the feelings that the hon. Member for Twickenham mentioned will continue. There is a real worry—particularly in west London, where the hon. Gentleman's constituency is—that costs will overrun and that Londoners will be left to pick up the tab. Until the Government address that, those concerns will continue.

The second point to emphasise is that the Minister could have been spared the battle with the Treasury over funding that characterised the autumn and the spring and that caused so much unpleasantness if the Government had adopted either or both of the policies that we advocated at the time. They were: to return the tax on the Olympic lottery game as a one-off—that would have provided £320 million, which would have comfortably paid for all the elite athlete provision—and to put back the four original pillars of the lottery. The other day, I was interested to note figures from the Library showing that since the lottery was reformed in 1998, £3.2 billion has gone away from those four original pillars, although some of it has come back. That is quite a headline figure. If sport had received a quarter of that—£800 million—it would be in a dramatically different place.

The second of the four areas is the part played by the Mayor and the ODA. That is at the heart of this debate. London council tax payers are expected to contribute £625 million. A KPMG review is in progress, and that will look into where costs have increased and where value can be added to the site, and so where the bill can be adjusted. However, there are five key things that give us worries about cost overruns. The first is the evidence. I am afraid that the evidence is simply that every single Olympic games up to now have substantially overrun their budget. Local taxpayers in Montreal are just now paying off the debts incurred in 1976. Sydney's budget was £1 billion, but the games eventually came in at £2.8 billion; the hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser) alluded to that. The Athens budget of £1 billion went up to £5 billion. So the evidence is not at all encouraging; indeed, the one thing of which we can be sure—apart from death and taxation, of course—is that there will be an overrun on the Olympics.

The second worry is that security costs are likely to soar. The budget was decided on before 7 July last year. No Member of this House can believe that the international security situation will improve dramatically in the near future. I think that we would agree that, if anything, it is likely to get worse. It was the rising cost of security that caused Athens to run over budget so dramatically. I believe that the security budget is £220 million. The question is whether the Minister still holds to that figure.

Mr. Don Foster: I urge caution on the hon. Gentleman. Was not a new Tetra security system established as a result of the increased cost of security in Athens, which has provided a lasting legacy? That could have been borne outside the Olympic costs. We have to be careful about where the different costs lie.

Hugh Robertson: I entirely take the point. However, the central point is that the original budget of £220 million is unlikely to sustain the post 7 July environment.

Thirdly, I have always felt that there is a contradiction at the heart of the process. The Mayor has always been commendably honest about his reasons for supporting the Olympics: he wants to regenerate the east end of London; it is his lifetime's passion. However, that is not the Government's key priority; they want to deliver the 2012 Olympics on time and on budget, as the best games ever. The temptation for the Mayor to try to get a little more for his key lifetime's project of regenerating the east end will be irresistible. That will necessarily add to the pressures on the budget.

Fourthly, the cost of acquiring land in the lower Lea valley—and therefore of site assembly—is bound to have risen dramatically since we secured the Olympics. That is an inevitable product of the market.

Finally, to pick up on the point made so clearly by the hon. Member for Twickenham, I looked up the inflation rate of building costs, and the current estimate is that it stands at 7 per cent. However, the bid document shows it to be 3 per cent. My second question for the Minister is therefore this: is the funding package of £2.375 billion still accurate, and in particular how have the estimates for security at £220 million and for construction sector inflation at 3 per cent. altered since we debated the Bill?

The third area of concern is to do with LOCOG. It has rightly received wide praise for the progress it has made since the bid was won—particularly, as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said, during the IOC visit. When the Bill was going through Parliament, we were told that LOCOG would have an operating budget of £1.46 billion. That was made up of £550 million from the IOC; £310 million from ticket sales in its role as an event manager; £100 million from revenue, licensing, merchandising and the like; and £500 million from sponsorship. However, in answer a week ago to a written question that I tabled, the Minister told me that LOCOG's budget is now £2 billion. My third question to the Minister is why has the budget risen from £1.46 billion to £2 billion, and when was that increase announced? In connection with that, does the Minister still stand by LOCOG's original expectation that it would produce a profit in excess of £100 million? Clearly having to raise so much more must throw that profit forecast into doubt.

My fourth area of concern is the BOA—the fourth pillar of the Olympic board. It is in the market looking for sponsorship. We have raised the issue with the Minister before. Private sponsorship is now an extraordinarily congested field—a point made by the hon. Member for Twickenham. As far as I could see in my brief survey, LOCOG is in for either £1.5 billion or £2 billion; UK Sport is looking for £100 million, as announced by the Chancellor in the Budget; the Youth Sport Trust, albeit a charitable organisation that has already secured sponsorship for the UK school games, is also in the market looking for money; and the National Sports Foundation, which the Minister launched in April, is looking for private sponsors. That strikes me as an incredibly congested field. A number of sports bodies are likely to be competing with each other and possibly against each other, so my fourth question for the Minister is how does the DCMS, which is the only body that can regulate or act as umpire, plan to regulate the market, and what are its priorities?

London 2012 has two central sporting objectives. The first is to put more British athletes on the rostrum, and the second is to increase the number of people who take up sport. The first has been dealt with as a result of the Chancellor's announcement in the Budget, but the second very firmly has not. Many people are making encouraging noises about how we want to get more people, particularly young people, involved in and taking up sport for all its health and educational benefits. So far, however, no pot of money will pay for those improvements, and they will not happen by magic. The Greeks tell me that fewer of them participate in sports now, after the Olympics, than before. The Australians, whom I visited last month, told me that there was no discernable take-up in sport as a result of the 2000 Olympic games. The fifth question is how can the improvement in mass participation be financed? Connected to that, does the Minister believe that through Sport England, the structure is capable of delivering the improvement?

In conclusion, I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham on securing this timely and useful debate. I thank all those who have contributed, including my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk, and of course the hon. Member for Bath. I would like the Minister in his winding-up speech to address five key questions. First, what plans does DCMS have to ensure that the whole and not merely the east of London benefits from the games? Secondly, is the funding package of £2.375 billion still accurate, and what are the estimates for security and construction sector inflation? Thirdly, why has LOCOG's budget risen from £1.5 billion to £2 billion, when was it announced, and does it still hold to its target of producing more than £100 million in profit? Fourthly, how do the Government plan to ensure that the sponsorship market is properly regulated? Finally, how are the improvements in the mass participation agenda to be structured and delivered?

12.2 pm

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): I shall try to answer the many questions that have been asked, but first I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing the debate. It is always good to update the House, and this is an opportune time to do so. I shall try to answer the questions as I go through my response to the hon. Gentleman.

As has been reflected again this morning, 6 July 2005 was a momentous day. There was great rejoicing and a great feeling of pride when Jacques Rogge said London. Several of us present today were at the announcement, and we also saw the fantastic celebrations in London and the length and breadth of the United Kingdom. We must now manage those expectations into reality, and the hon. Gentleman brought us down to earth to start analysing how we are doing so. I hope that what I shall say will provide some assurances that we are well on the way with the management of the project. It will be managed probably as no other major project in which Government have been involved has been.

We are determined that the London Olympic and Paralympic games will be a memorable and inspirational event that leaves a lasting sporting, social and economic legacy, and that not only London but the nations and regions throughout the United Kingdom benefit and gain from it. It has rightly been said that the challenge facing us is formidable. As the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said, the biggest construction project in Europe is terminal 5, which is running at £5 billion, but we are embarking on a project twice the size in half the time. By any standards, it is a challenge, but the prize is a legacy that will last for generations.

The regeneration of the Lea valley—one of the most deprived parts of the UK— will make it into a stage fit for the greatest sporting and cultural show on earth. Although we rightly focus on the Olympic games, we must put the event in context. It is the gateway to the Gateway: the gateway to the Thames Gateway, which is a 20-year project and, again, probably one of the largest investments in transport, social and housing infrastructure anywhere in Europe. What we are discussing will bring about between £13 billion to £15 billion of investment, with a lasting legacy of not just a stadium or other sports facilities but housing, as we have heard, improved transport infrastructure, schools and health care. That is an integrated regeneration package, of which the Olympics are part.

The games will also bequeath a powerful sporting legacy to the whole UK, as I have said. Those 60 days in 2012 will give many young people throughout the UK the unique opportunity to see elite sportsmen and women competing at close hand. I have talked to people who saw the 1948 Olympics, and the experience is vivid in the mind of many of them. I hope that tens of thousands of young people will for years to come be affected in that way.

We have heard many times about the inspiration of competing in one's own country. We are determined to capitalise on that, creating a new generation of elite sportsmen and women in the UK. London will inherit major new sports facilities, including an aquatics centre, a velo park, a hockey arena, an indoor sports arena and the main stadium, but the UK will also benefit from top-class sports facilities. That is how what we are doing differs from Australia's approach and that of many other countries that have won the right to stage the Olympics in the past. Through the nations and regions group we shall invest—and are already investing—in sport and recreation facilities. An impetus is added in the Olympic context.

The work will also bring considerable lasting benefit to business and the economy throughout the UK. The games are expected to create 7,000 jobs in the construction industry alone. In addition, a further 12,000 jobs could be created as a result of the legacy development of the Olympic park area. A cultural Olympiad is planned to coincide with the games and a wide range of cultural events will be staged throughout London and the UK. Jobs are likely to be created in the cultural sector as a result, and stage managers, lighting technicians, producers and artists will co-ordinate a massive programme of events.

The games will also offer a considerable boost to the tourism industry in the UK, by putting this country in the biggest shop window in the world. The games are seen by billions of people, and visitors will naturally want to see what else the UK has to offer. It is essential to consider tourism—a matter that the hon. Member for Twickenham raised. It has always been difficult to get visitors to one of the most famous capitals in the world, if not the most famous, to go to other parts of the United Kingdom. The games give us an opportunity to do that. Only yesterday I was discussing with representatives of visitBritain how we could capitalise on the Olympics and other sports events and use London as the gateway to the rest of the UK. We are now receiving a level of co-operation from Visit London that we have not had before.

I am fairly confident that we shall be able to do what was done in Sydney where there were an extra 1.6 million visitors between 1997 and 2001, with a spending power of 6 billion Australian dollars between them. We should expect to do equally well or, I should hope, better, in 2012. Tourism industry leaders forecast that hosting the 2012 games should be worth at least £2 billion to our visitor economy. Those benefits will fall particularly on London. However, we are committed to ensuring that the 2012 Olympics will maximise the potential for job creation, training and business growth throughout the UK.

Early progress has been made, as both Government and Opposition Members have I think acknowledged, as, recognising the need for fast progress, we either passed or at least framed much of the relevant legislation ahead of 6 July, to get a flying start if London proved successful. By 31 March this year, more than £40 million had been spent on essential preparatory works. To date the Chancellor has announced an additional investment of £200 million in our most talented athletes between now and 2012. The London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games Act 2006 has received Royal Assent, and I want to acknowledge the support that we received from all parties in the House, and indeed in the other place.

The Olympic Delivery Authority has been established and its board appointed. Its board is one of the most significant to have been created while I have been the Minister, and I was very pleased at the number of people who came forward.

Let me digress slightly, however, on the issue of the Olympic board. The IOC delegation came here to look at the progress that is being made, and everybody will acknowledge that its report was very good, but I get very concerned when I see articles that are as ill-informed as the one in yesterday's Evening Standard. It was headed "Get a grip now on the Olympics, Ms Jowell" and was written by Rowan Moore, who I understand—I have never met the guy—is the paper's architectural critic. The IOC delegation made it clear that it gets all the cuttings from the British press, and its members are incredibly well informed—they know what goes on in Select Committee and in the press.

Let me quote just one bit of Rowan Moore's article to show how ill informed he is. He writes:

"For much of the time since the bid was won, it has been hard to know who is in charge. It took months to announce the chief executive of the Olympic Delivery Authority, when it could usefully have been done a day after the victory."

A 10-year-old student of politics would know a lot more about how this place works than Rowan Moore does, and the headline ought to be "Rowan Moore, get a grip on the facts", but the fact remains that the article will now appear in the IOC's files. Rowan Moore is doing a disservice to the Olympics and to this nation. As Opposition Members have said, no one could have been more open than the Department, and I invite Rowan Moore to check his facts.

What concerns me more, however, is that when the Secretary of State asked the editor of the Evening Standard whether we could have the right to reply to the article just to put the record straight—after all, we are talking about a national programme—she was denied that right. I say this more in sorrow than in anger, but that article, with its ill-informed commentary, will now be in the IOC's file, and we do not even have the right to reply to put the record straight. Broadly speaking, in the run-up to London winning the bid, editors and the press were very supportive—

Mr. Fraser: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Caborn: In a minute.

The press were very supportive, and we welcomed that. All I am saying to them is, if they want the information, they can come and get it, but will they please not put such ill-informed articles in newspapers and then try to argue, on the back of that, that the thing is likely to go wrong? As the hon. Member for Bath said, there will be constructive criticism, and that is absolutely right—we can accept that.

Mr. Fraser rose—

Mr. Caborn: Wait a minute. Don't get excited.

Mr. Fraser: I am not excited. I am trying to get on with the debate.

Mr. Caborn: We will scrutinise this issue—that is what these debates are about. If the press want the information, they should please come and ask for it, and we will give it to them. I hope that the Evening Standard will give us the right of reply and that Mr. Moore will make sure that he gets his facts right in future.

Mr. Fraser: May I draw the Minister back to the debate? As I sat on the Back Bench, I noted that he was asked more than 37 questions, but he has spent the past three and a half minutes on what I would suggest is a rant about an issue that he should take up outside the Room. He should perhaps spend the next 13 to 15 minutes answering our questions, which are totally relevant and which would give him the opportunity to put on the record his support for our comments and to let us know that the financial probity of the games is secure, rather than spending time on a rant against a newspaper.

Mr. Caborn: I totally reject that. I would not have had to come here to say what I did had the Evening Standard been reasonable about a national project and given us the right of reply. This is the only place where I can say that that was fundamentally wrong and that it will do a lot of damage to the British case—it is power without responsibility. If people write such things and know that they are fundamentally wrong, but then deny us the right of reply, the issue needs raising. However, I will leave it at that.

Mr. Fraser: Thirty-seven questions, 15 minutes.

Mr. Caborn: If the hon. Gentleman wants another Adjournment debate, he can have one. I am more than willing to spend hours in front of hon. Members.

The EDAW consortium has been appointed to design the Olympic park and infrastructure. The relocation of high-voltage overhead power lines into tunnels underground is under way to deliver an essential improvement to the environment of the Olympic park. A charitable trust to support cultural and sporting initiatives associated with the games has been announced. That initiative is worth £35 million and will see the end of the Millennium Commission with the funding going to the trust. On 24 January, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport hosted a business summit, which was attended by more than 300 business representatives and was massively oversubscribed. The summit set out the key challenges and opportunities facing business, including up-to-date information about procurement. That was followed up with a further business summit in the west midlands on 9 May, which was organised by the regional development agency, Advantage West Midlands, which is very proactive. On 30 January, the Olympic Delivery Authority announced updated plans for the Olympic park site. Camelot's income target for raising lottery income for 2005-06 was met, and indeed exceeded by some £2 million.

The first "Go for Gold" scratchcard was launched on 28 July and sold faster than any other £1 scratchcard launched by Camelot since November 2002. A second edition was issued in September 2005. On 1 February 2006, a new £1 winter sports scratchcard, "Win Gold", was also launched. During its recent visit, the International Olympic Committee expressed itself well pleased with the progress that is being made.

In 2003 the Government agreed a public sector funding package of £2.375 billion to deliver the Olympic venues and infrastructure and to secure the development of athletes. The package will be funded from the Olympic lottery, the sports lottery, other lotteries, the Greater London Authority and the London Development Agency. The bulk of the package—£1.5 billion—will be met from the lottery. The Olympic lottery has already raised some £16 million. It is expected to raise a total of £96 million in 2006-07 and to deliver a total of £750 million by 2012. The sports lottery will deliver £340 million for elite athletes and associated sports infrastructure. The £200 million of Exchequer money that the Chancellor announced in the Budget is on top of that.

Hugh Robertson: That is at the heart of the debate. Is the Minister saying that the £2.375 billion is robust?

Mr. Caborn: I will come to that.

Other lottery funding of up to £410 million will come on stream from January 2009-10. The London Development Agency will deliver up to £250 million from 2008-09. The GLA has agreed to contribute up to £625 million from the London council tax precept. The funding that comes on stream this year accounts for around a quarter of the public sector funding package. I recognise—this was clearly spelled out during the London local elections—that hon. Members are concerned about the impact of the precept on London council tax payers, particularly in west London. However, to put the financial impact in context, it is expected that average London home owners in band D properties will pay 38p a week, or a total of £20 a year. As hon. Members know, that formula has been used in many United Kingdom cities, including Manchester for the Commonwealth games and Sheffield for the World Student games. That is reasonable because those cities received considerable investment in their infrastructure. The formula has been tested, and given the massive benefits that the games will bring to the UK and particularly to London as a whole, we feel that it is justifiable to put that financial burden on London.

I recognise that hon. Members are concerned about the risk of increased gambling addiction—the hon. Member for Bath raised the matter—resulting from the Olympic lottery. The Gambling Commission will be looking at the monday lottery, and if there is a move away from what Parliament intended, we will revisit the matter. We believe that the risk of problem gambling will be very low. The national lottery is not generally associated with problem gambling. Indeed, around 70 per cent. of the adult population play the National Lottery, but spend relatively small amounts of money. The average weekly spend on the lottery was just over £2.84 in 2004-05. In 2004, only 3 per cent. of calls to GamCare—the organisation that looks into problem gambling issues—concerned national lottery products. Olympic lottery games need to be approved by the National Lottery Commission, and the NLC's statutory duties include preventing excessive play. It would not license a game that it considered encouraged that.

The hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) raised the issue of how cost increases would be addressed. We went round the world and looked at cities that had staged the games: Munich, Barcelona, Sydney and Moscow. We also looked at what Athens and Beijing were doing. The cities that we looked at, Sydney especially, were generous in giving us advice. As I have said before, two or three major themes emerged from that. One is that the first two years are crucial if people are to keep costs on track. What is needed is a company with the powers of compulsory purchase, which we have, and planning, and a robust budget.

It is also important to ensure that there will be a sustainable legacy. If there was any failure in Sydney, it related to the legacy. Sydney is spending £10 million a year servicing not debt but a main stadium that does not have a tenant. Another problem is that there are now two arenas in Sydney, although it wishes that there was only one. The tennis went down to Melbourne, which now has a massively underused tennis park. The legacy is important in terms of both sports infrastructure and the cost of that. We have considered the issue carefully as we have gone through the process.

It also became apparent to us that there are three stages to an Olympics. One is winning the right to stage the games, and we put together a formidable team to do just that for 2012. The second stage is producing the infrastructure, which basically involves construction and which we are doing through the ODA. The third stage is to deliver the games, which is the role of LOCOG. That body is chaired by Seb, and Paul Deighton is the chief executive.

The overarching body is the Olympic board. There are three stakeholders: the Government, the Mayor and the British Olympic Association. The Olympic board provides a strategic overview. The Government have learned the lessons of Wembley and the dome. There will be no Government interference in the ODA other than to give clear instructions and to ensure that it carries out its duty within a budget that will be defined and negotiated with the ODA. The ODA board is skilled; indeed, it has expertise like no other board that we have put together. I am very confident that the chief executive, the chairman and indeed the entire board will carry out the project and will do so with transparency.

We are committed to tight control of the funds, but we have never shied away from the possibility that costs will increase. The Government have given assurances that they will act as ultimate financial guarantor should there be a shortfall between Olympic costs and revenues. The 2003 memorandum of understanding between the Government and the Mayor envisages how any cost increase would be managed. We have rehearsed this many times in Committee, but I repeat that the memorandum explains that, should the shortfall between Olympic costs and revenues exceed £2.075 billion, the Government would expect to discharge that responsibility in a sharing arrangement to be agreed as appropriate with the Mayor of London, and through seeking additional national lottery funding in amounts to be agreed at the time.

A number of hon. Members are suggesting that we place a cap on the amount of London council tax that can be drawn on to support the development of venues and infrastructure for the Olympic games. As we have rehearsed, we do not accept that proposal. Capping the share of one contributor would simply increase the amount required from others. That would not be consistent with the pressure that needs to be exerted to keep costs down. Nor does it seem reasonable that council tax payers in west London should not make a contribution to the cost of the games. London as a whole is a major beneficiary of the games, so it is only fair that council tax payers in London as a whole should bear an appropriate share of the costs.

Hon. Members will know that we are undertaking a review of costs, which includes building inflation. In the light of that review, we shall consider how any additional costs should be met within the terms of the arrangements agreed. The cost review work embraces many strands, including security, venues and infrastructure, reducing risk, contingencies and taxation. Maximising private investment is also important in the review. Any revised estimates will be reported only when they have been agreed and when the cost review has been completed.

The staging of the games is the responsibility of LOCOG, whose budget is now £2 billion, which takes into account inflation from 2004 through. The move from £1.4 billion to £2 billion is due to the costs of inflation over the period of the games.

Hugh Robertson: Wait a minute. Inflation over a six-year period cannot be 33 per cent. If the budget has gone up from £1.5 billion to £2 billion, that is a £500 million or 33 per cent. increase. Is the Minister really saying that he expects inflation to equal 33 per cent. over the relevant period? That would be far in excess of the Treasury's estimates.

Mr. Caborn: The advice that I have been given is that the reason for the move from £1.5 billion to £2 billion is the calculation on inflation. If the calculation is less, the figure will be less than £2 billion, but that is the calculation that has been made, and that is why the figure has moved from £1.5 billion to £2 billion. If the hon. Gentleman wants, we can go back to that issue. I shall write to him.

Mr. Foster: For clarity, will the Minister confirm that he is saying that the operating costs of LOCOG to run the games are, on a real-cost basis, exactly the same now as when we first discussed them, and that the only difference is in which year's base we are talking about?

Mr. Caborn: Yes, the advice that I have been given is that the reason for the move from £1.5 billion to the figure that I have given was the calculation on inflation. If that is wrong, up or down, we shall adjust the figure.

Hugh Robertson: One final problem: it seems extraordinary to me that that figure should not have been used in the first place, because presumably that calculation can be made. Will the Minister guarantee that the same problem will not occur with all the other budgets, and that they have been done at 2005 figures? Will the £2.375 billion, for example, need to be compounded by 33 per cent. as well?

Mr. Caborn: As I said, there has been a review on costs. The hon. Gentleman asked me about LOCOG and I gave him the answer on LOCOG. We are reviewing those costs. In 2004, the figures in the 17 chapters of the candidate file were costed at 2004 figures. That is now under review. As the hon. Gentleman knows, before we won the bid on 6 July, we had to keep very firmly to those 17 chapters because we were making a bid. From November 2004 to 6 July 2005, we kept to that very religiously, as any change in cost would have been detrimental to our bid.

Since 6 July 2005, we have gone through the cost review to which I referred. The KPMG study will be built into the ODA's. It is looking at areas such as construction inflation as well—the hon. Gentleman said that that was 7 per cent., although I do not know whether that is true. These are exercises that we would expect to go through after making the bid. I have said clearly that once the cost review has been completed, we shall come back and report.

Hugh Robertson: I am confused. Thirty-three per cent. is a hell of a hit and considerably in advance of the Treasury's estimates. Inflation is running at about 2 per cent.; if one compounds that over six years, there is no way that it comes to 33 per cent. Clearly, we are not going to make much further progress on the issue this afternoon. Will the Minister agree to write to all Members who have attended this debate to explain the situation? There is a disparity between 2 per cent. compounded over six years and 33 per cent.—one does not need to be a banker to work that out. We need to nail the issue down.

Mr. Caborn: I was asked why the figure had moved from £1.5 billion to £2 billion. My answer was based on my officials' advice, which was that the later figure included the inflation from 2004. If the figure is greater or less than £2 billion, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman to inform him. However, that is the reason for the increase.

A substantial proportion of LOCOG's expenditure will be met by sponsorship and the legislation has been drafted specifically to protect LOCOG's right to raise sponsorship. LOCOG has the rights to deal with the sponsorship and any illegal actions, as was clearly explained when the Bill was going through Parliament.

Finally, we have a lot more to do to convince people that the games are going to be beneficial throughout the UK, and not just in London.

Further Education and Adult Learning

12.30 pm

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): I begin by congratulating the Government on the improvements that they have made in further education and on recognising the importance of the sector in their White Paper. The contribution that FE can make to improving our skills base, widening opportunities for 14 to 19-year-olds and addressing my particular concern of giving second chances to those who may not have had the educational advantages that they deserved is vital if we are to improve our educational standards and maintain a vibrant economy. It is fair to say that the Government have recognised that with the investment that they have put in; I believe that it has increased by 48 per cent. in real terms since 1997.

The results can be seen in bricks and mortar in constituencies such as mine. My local college has a £27 million new build, which will replace outdated and unsuitable buildings with something fit for the 21st century. In turn, the investment has produced rising success rates in FE; there has been a rise from 59 per cent. in 2001-02 to 72 per cent. in 2003-04. We know that more 19-year-olds get level 2 qualifications and that more people are completing apprenticeships.

Nothing that I say today is intended to detract from that success, which is real and life-transforming for many people. I do not suggest that we do not need to focus on skills and on ensuring that more people stay on at 16. That has been a blot on our educational record for far too long in this country, but we are making progress in that area. Some 8 per cent. of people in their 20s do not have any qualifications, and although that figure is still far too high, we are making progress.

We have a mountain to climb in respect of the people who left school 20, 30 or 40 years ago. We should focus on one stark fact: 24 out of every 100 adults aged between 40 and 64 have no qualifications. Those adults will need to reskill if they are to participate in the labour market. It is estimated that in the next decade two out of three jobs will be filled by adults rather than by new entrants to the labour market, so we should not neglect their needs. The difficulty that we need to discuss is how we get such people, particularly those with no qualifications, back into education. That is not always done in the way that we might expect. In my experience, many people first come back into education by doing shorter courses at venues that are not threatening. We should not underestimate how difficult it is for people who have failed in the past just to get through the doors of a college.

If we do not succeed, the penalties will be stark. I looked at the latest figures that I could find—those for 2004—and they were clear. Some 49 per cent. of those with no qualifications were in employment, whereas 71 per cent. of those who had a level 1 qualification and 75 per cent. of those who had a level 2 qualification were. I am sure that the figures have risen since then, but the ratio will have remained similar.

The penalties for a lack of learning are low income, periods of unemployment and even an effect on people's health. I looked at the 2001 census, and it struck me starkly that the rate of limiting long-term illness among men who are long-term unemployed or who have never worked is three times that among people who have worked. Of course, some of that is because such people have been ill and cannot work, but some of it represents a consequence. There is an associated set-up of low income, unemployment and ill health, which costs not just the individuals, in wasted talent and blighted lives, but all of us.

I understand why the Government wanted to focus adult learning on those without qualifications and set key targets on skills for life and on first level 2 qualifications. Rightly, there are now no fees for people seeking first level 2 qualifications, and under the train to gain programme employers can obtain free training and development for those working towards a level 2 qualification. I applaud that, because it is the right thing to do, but I want to examine its unintended consequences—I stress that they are unintended.

We are losing many courses that bring people back to education in the first place. Let us be frank. We have not been very good at reaching those with no qualifications in the past. The last time I asked, last year's national adult learning survey was not available, but the trend in previous surveys is clear. Participation in adult learning is highest among people with professional and managerial jobs and lowest among unskilled manual workers.

The National Institute of Adult Continuing Education surveys show the same sort of pattern. We have been much more successful in increasing participation among people in socio-economic group C2, but the participation rate of people in groups D and E has remained almost constant from 1996 to 2005; it is still 26 per cent. My hon. Friend the Minister will know that the one area in which that trend is bucked is adult and community learning. In the winter of 2002, 9 per cent. of people in adult and community learning had no qualifications. By winter 2004, that had gone up to 17 per cent. At the same time, the rate in FE hardly rose. It went from 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. We need to learn the lessons of that and apply them elsewhere.

I fear that our targets might have different effects to those intended. It is easy to meet the targets for people getting a level 2 in colleges by taking on people who are already close to that level. I was surprised to learn, when the Learning and Skills Council came before the Education and Skills Committee, that it did little in the way of considering the social profile of adult learners. The council admitted that it could have the same number of people on courses but an entirely different profile to the target group. In other words, it could be that while targets are being met, some of those who are most in need are being neglected. Although the council considers the socio-demographic characteristics in an area before planning its courses, we need to do much more research into those who are actually engaged in learning. I have not seen the results of the Mosaic pilots, but I hope that we will see them soon, because there needs to be more research in that area.

The Government rightly want to improve qualifications among 16 to 19-year-olds, but while spending on them will increase by 4 per cent. in the coming year—we are spending more on people with disabilities and on learning difficulties—part of the adult learning budget will be squeezed. I asked a parliamentary question about the changes in the budget for adult and community learning in different LSC areas, but have not yet received an answer. The Association of Colleges estimates that there will be a 7 per cent. drop overall. We therefore assume that asking colleges to increase their fee income from certain courses would mean focusing money on those most in need. I accept that that is the Government's intention, but I do not think that it always happens in reality. Some of the reductions being made are in courses such as first aid, food hygiene and health and safety, which are often the first courses that people take which bring them back into education.

Liverpool community college—I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) has secured a debate on Liverpool later today—is looking at a reduction of £1.5 million next year. In North Yorkshire, there was a 16 per cent. cut from 2004-05 to 2005-06 in the adult learning budget. Some of the courses that went were courses for classroom assistants and on British sign language, and some craft courses. There is an argument that some of the people on those courses can afford to pay, but there is also an argument that some people take them precisely because they are not threatening. They are the courses that get people through the door to adult learning in the first place.

To give the Minister an example, the college in my area ran very successful courses in schools and community centres on subjects such as "Help your child to read", first aid, and the one that I always call "Computing for the terrified", although that is not its name. A lot of mothers went on those courses because they were directly relevant to their children, but I can point to people who went on to further education after one of those courses. Some have become classroom assistants, and highly qualified classroom assistants at that, but normally we would never have got them through the doors of the college in the first instance, and that is the key. We need to know what motivates people to take up learning.

Let me give the Minister another example. The union learning fund and the college run a learning centre in a council depot in my constituency. A lot of our bin men take courses there, and when I went to ask what the most popular were, they said computing. Also, a lot of them learn Spanish for their holidays. Are those courses directly relevant to being a bin man? No, although I would like to say that they are very good bin men and they never drop things on the paths and so on. Do courses then spark people's appetite for learning, because through them people achieve things that they never thought they could? Yes.

The problem is that we do not have real research on what sparks people's appetite for learning; we do not really know. However, the history of adult education in this country shows that it has been most successful when it has built on people's interests and led them on from there. We need to learn those lessons. The union learning fund, which is one of the unsung successes of this Government, and the adult and community learning fund are very good at doing that, but adult and community learning is only 6 per cent. of the Learning and Skills Council's adult learning budget, which is itself being squeezed. According to the Department's own estimates, the result will be a loss of about 500,000 adult learning places from one year to the next.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister will quote the neighbourhood learning in deprived communities fund, and that is an excellent initiative, but when I last looked, there were only 30,000 places under it. That does not replace the other adult education places that are being lost.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): My hon. Friend has talked a lot about adult courses being lost, and that is a concern for a college that I represent in Gateshead, but there is a further point that she has not picked up on; I do not know whether it applies only to Gateshead—perhaps the Minister can help on that. It is the loss of dedicated courses for people with learning difficulties. Rightly, the learning opportunities for people such as bin men, who I have had the privilege of representing for many years, are about much more than just what they do at work. However, for people with learning disabilities, the issue is actually about their whole life; not just education but what they do if they are not in education. What do they do with their lives during the day?

Helen Jones: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. Clearly, in some areas there is a difficulty for colleges and social services about what should be provided for people with learning difficulties and where that should be provided. We see that in my area, too.

My plea is for the Minister to look again at the subject. I accept that the Government did not intend there to be such consequences; the law of unintended consequences operates in so many areas. We should get some proper research on the effect of the policy on some of the people whom we most need to bring back into education. I ask him to imagine what the situation would be if he had failed in education in the past, and had had a very bad experience of education. What would bring him back? I suggest that it would be something immediate, fairly short and with an attainable goal; something not directly related to work skills at first, but that could lead on. If there is to be progression, which the Government want—and I accept that that is the right goal—we must first get people through the doors. If we do not do that, they cannot progress.

I hope that the Minister will look at the 1999 report from the policy action team in the social exclusion unit, which said that we needed to take a much broader view of the skills needed. People need a wider range of skills to keep themselves in employment, including confidence, motivation and the ability to present themselves and navigate the labour market. A lot of courses give people confidence and motivation. We could have an entire debate about the structure of adult education and education as a good in itself, which I firmly believe in, but I am concentrating on those who might fall through the net because courses are disappearing.

I urge the Minister to look at our successes in adult and community learning, at how the trade union learning fund has worked and at some proper research on what is happening and who is losing out, and not to see all adult education or adult and community learning as the same thing. I urge him to remember that those adults whom we need to get into learning and on to the skills path will be the mainstay of our economy as the population changes and ages.

The Minister is interested in the issue and has some concerns about it, so let me tell him that the experience of many of us on the ground is that sometimes what happens is not necessarily what those in Whitehall think happens. Let us take a real look at what gets people back on to the learning path. We talk about the learning society, but we always talk about the supply side. Let us also talk about how we create the demand for learning and try to ensure that we do not let people with no qualifications at all lose out.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): I indicated to the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) that I would like to intervene in her speech, but having listened to what she said, I should like to congratulate her on the timeliness of this important debate and to take a minute to make a few points to the Minister.

Self-improvement is important to all members of the community. Does the Minister agree with the women's institute in my constituency, which says that cuts in the adult learning budget are "very short-sighted" and that they will impact on local communities and social groups, as well as on individual learners? I am sure that the Minister agrees that democratic adult learning, as part of a tradition of self-improvement, has changed the lives of people who, for social or economic reasons, have had little or no access to education, and that it should be safeguarded by public funding policies. Does the Minister understand the dismay that women's institutes throughout the country have expressed at older learners being excluded from adult education because of the cut in funding? Older learners are being denied their right to lifelong learning in the way that the hon. Lady so well articulated.

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) on securing a genuinely important debate and on the consistency with which she pursues such issues. It is right and proper that we should be having this discussion.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for rightly giving credit for what has happened in the further education sector generally since 1997. We can collectively be proud of what we have achieved. She referred to the 48 per cent. real-terms increase in funding since 1997, which contrasts favourably with the 14 per cent. real-terms cut that took place in the five years running up to 1997. I agree with her that that transformation can be seen most effectively in capital expenditure. I visit further education colleges up and down the country, so I have seen the practical progress that is being made, including in qualifications. The latest figures show that the success rate has risen from 59 per cent. to 75 per cent. That is a genuine improvement.

My hon. Friend raised a number of issues to which I want to respond, but before doing so I should like to outline the backdrop, to explain the policy direction in which we are moving. Our overall objectives are to meet our future skill needs; to ensure that people maximise their potential through learning both as individuals and as members of families, local communities and a flexible and adaptable work force; and to establish the priorities for public funding of adult learning and a new balance of who pays for what, between the state, employers and individuals, in line with the benefits that they receive. Finally, we aim to reform the further education sector, to make it more responsive to the needs of the economy.

The skills strategy is at the centre of the debate. We live in a world where new markets, new places of production and new skilled work forces are emerging with astonishing speed. World trade is doubling every decade. Last week I visited China with a higher and further education delegation, where, unbelievably, trade is doubling every three years. Chinese wage costs are still just 5 per cent. of those of the European Union. We face a colossal challenge from those pressures, and if we do not respond we will be blown away by the global competition.

A few figures bring home the scale of the challenge and the skills gap that we face in this country: one third of adults are not at full level 2, which is the basic school-leaving qualification; 6 million adults are without functional literacy; and 17 million adults are without functional numeracy. The matter is a social and an economic imperative. The most effective way to tackle poverty and social exclusion is to give people skills so that they can get into the workplace.

Mr. Anderson: I made the point earlier about what happened at Gateshead. There is an economic impact as 30 jobs might go among the teaching staff because of the decisions that have been made, but there is also an economic impact on other public bodies. If disabled people are not in the classroom learning, they will probably have to go to day centres or hospitals, where they do not necessarily need to be. That will be the upshot of a policy that is not at all welcome in our area.

Bill Rammell: I thank my hon. Friend for that contribution. I actually signed a letter to him last night about the situation at Gateshead college. One of the points I made is that the Learning and Skills Council has gone through a very elongated process during the current allocation round in order to allocate funds to colleges. That happens at various stages. I ask my hon. Friend to wait until the end of the allocation round before passing judgment about the end game. I am reasonably confident that once we reach that stage the picture of overall funding for FE colleges will be very different from the one suggested by some. Regarding his second point, which he made earlier, the LSC has made it clear, as have the Government, that people with learning difficulties remain a priority. The figures that I have seen suggest that an overall cut is not taking place, but we undoubtedly need to keep the issue closely under review.

The skills strategy is an imperative, and like my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North, I believe that the impact of qualifications and skills on people's health, overall participation in society and access to income-generating jobs is crucial.

I shall now respond to some of the detailed points raised by my hon. Friend. She talked a lot about the danger of unintended consequences. In driving the policy through during the past year, both the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Phil Hope), and I have been very conscious of the danger of unintended consequences, and we will keep the matter under active review.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North that we do not want to lose good courses that demonstrably lead to progression. We made that clear in the grant letter from the former Secretary of State, when we asked for a good balance of learning opportunities for adults in every area. However, we also know that too much of the current provision, which is called "first steps" or "return to learn", is more of a revolving door than a true pathway to progression. I shall explain what I mean by that.

Our research suggests that the average number of years between attaining a qualification below level 2 and studying for full level 2 is 14 years. Most of us feel that that is far too long, which is why we announced in the recent White Paper the development of a new foundation learning tier. Through that, we intend to turn the current complex range of qualifications below level 2 into a coherent system of units that are easier for learners and employers to understand and which are based fundamentally on employability and life skills. The foundation learning tier will encompass a range of programmes, including clear pathways to progress to level 2. For those not able to achieve a full level 2, the foundation tier will also provide a rich mix of courses. As we made clear in the FE White Paper, over time and as resources allow, we intend to make that an entitlement.

Helen Jones: Will my hon. Friend undertake to look at the effect on women of the disappearance of some community courses? In my experience, a lot of women access learning in that way. Will he keep that matter under review?

Mr. Fraser: The women's institute.

Bill Rammell: I will keep the matter under review, and to answer the hon. Gentleman, I shall meet the women's institute shortly to discuss some of those issues. The figures that I have show that women are well represented in the further education sector. We want to maintain that, and we must keep the issue under review.

My hon. Friend also made important points about the social profile of learners. I take her point that there is concern that the lowest take-up is among the poorest groups. However, we have more information on the social profile of learners than is sometimes suggested. For example, of those doing their first full level 2 qualifications, almost one in four had no qualifications at all, and the remaining 76 per cent. had a qualification below level 2. I cite that example just to suggest that the targeting strategy has an effect and is working. However, I accept her point, and we must keep the matter under review and conduct more research into who benefits. I intend to take that work forward, and I shall keep in contact with her about that issue.

I very much take my hon. Friend's point about family learning and extended schools. She gave as an example local courses where parents have the opportunity to help their children and, at the same time, help themselves through reading. There is no reason why such courses, where they are valued, should be lost. For example, we have specific programmes through the Learning and Skills Council, often run by local authorities and aimed at helping families learn together. The wider family learning programme is worth £12 million a year and helps 50,000 families. The specific programme for family literacy and numeracy is £25 million a year and helps 70,000 families.

In addition, the Government have committed £680 million in start-up funding during 2006 to 2008 to enable schools to provide access to the core offer of extended services. Part of that offer is parenting support, including sessions for parents to read with their children. It is an important initiative, and I am sure it will be welcomed.

My hon. Friend also talked about short courses and the policy that we are pursuing of moving away from short courses towards longer courses. The issue must be seen in perspective: the majority of short courses are short skills for life programmes and other—particularly IT—courses. The short skills for life courses should be part of larger programmes aiming for the achievement of qualifications. Other short courses appear to be of limited benefit to the progression of learners, and we must consider the issue in that context.

My hon. Friend talked about the importance of personal and community development, and as she knows, we have maintained its level of funding. However, we have rightly said that we want LSC partnerships at a local level to determine better the priorities for that expenditure. We do not want it centrally driven to the same extent.

My hon. Friend discussed the union learning fund, and like her I think that it is an unsung success story of this Labour Government. If I may make a political point, it is one of the most effective ways in which the Labour party and the trade unions work together. It has brought real benefits by introducing into the education and training system, through the support of their peers, people who would otherwise not have taken that approach.

My hon. Friend talked about having a mountain to climb in terms of people who left school or college 20, 30, 40 years ago with no qualifications. It is the most significant challenge that we face. On all the evidence they are the people who miss out on social, economic, health and other advantages. We need to focus on reskilling those adults, and we are doing so through the level 2 "Train to Gain" initiative. It is one of the most radical policies that this Government have pursued: for the first time saying to adults in the workplace who do not have a full level 2 qualification that the state will guarantee that level of education and training.

The recent change that we made in the further education White Paper to extend the free entitlement up to level 3 and the age of 25 is a significant step forward, as is the foundation learning tier to which I referred earlier. However, all that comes down to priorities, and we are a Government who have significantly increased investment in the further education sector. In that context, we have rightly said that the priorities must be 16 to 19-year-olds, adult basic skills, and the roll out of "Train to Gain". We want to do more than that, but we cannot say that we have those priorities and then have a set of other priorities. I know that that is not what my hon. Friend is saying, and we need to keep the issues under review to monitor their impact. However, if we are saying that those core priorities are genuinely important, we must commit resources to them—

Hywel Williams (in the Chair): Order. We must move to the next debate.

Tax Credit System (Angus)

1 pm

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): I am pleased to appear for the first time under your distinguished chairmanship, Mr. Williams, and I am sure that this will be the first of many such occasions. I should say at the outset that the debate is not about the effectiveness or desirability of tax credits but about the way in which the system that is used to calculate and deliver them fails many of my constituents. Although I shall be referring to specific cases, they illustrate a general problem with the tax credits system.

In my first term in Parliament, by far and away the most complaints that I received concerned the Child Support Agency, and no one was at all surprised when the Government effectively threw in the towel, conceded that the agency was unworkable and ordered a redesign. Sadly, over the past two years, the number of complaints about tax credits has risen substantially and now rivals the number of complaints about the CSA. Unless the Government take urgent action to tackle the problems, they will simply multiply, and we will end up in the same situation as we did with the ill-fated CSA. Several constituents have told me that they are so dispirited and worn down by the problems that they have encountered that they will no longer claim tax credits, even though they are entitled to them. That is a terrible indictment of a system that is supposed to help those who are most in need.

The problems that I shall describe affect constituents across my constituency and, I assume, across much of the rest of the country. The first case that I want to bring to hon. Members' attention is that of Katie Adamson, from Forfar, who first came to my office in December 2005. She applied for child tax credit first as a single claimant and then jointly with Anthony O'Hare. Her problems began with the annual review in September 2005, when she received a letter asking whether there were any changes in her circumstances. There were not, so she phoned the department, and the person she spoke to told her that she could send the form back blank or not send it back, because confirmation that there had been no changes had, in effect, been recorded as a result of her call. Being a cautious and sensible young woman, however, she sent the form back anyway.

Soon afterwards, Katie received a letter from the tax credits office informing her that it had heard nothing further regarding changes in her circumstances, so her tax credit would be stopped. At that point, she contacted the citizens advice bureau. The tax credits office told the bureau that it acknowledged the error and would recommence the payments. It may come as no great surprise, however, to hear that that did not happen, and that brings us to the crux of many of the problems with the system. As MPs, we contact the tax credit hotline or the tax credits office, and those involved acknowledge that a mistake has been made, but they seem incapable of rectifying it, because of the computer system that they operate. In many cases, we seem to have slipped into the "Little Britain" sketch in which the computer says no, and that is it.

To return to the long-suffering Katie, however, nothing happened for 11 weeks, and the arrears accumulated. The computer system was blamed for the problem, although, to be fair, the department agreed to make a manual payment for four weeks. However, Katie had to make a 40-mile round trip to Dundee, at a not inconsiderable cost, to collect it, and she received nothing further after that. After she contacted my office, we contacted the technical department and were assured that the error had been sorted out and that payments would be made to her bank account as normal. Bizarrely, however, she was then told that she would receive the full arrears for 11 weeks, but that she would have to pay back the four weeks that she had received as a manual payment in the interim. Quite how that was a sensible way to deal with the situation escapes me.

Finally, my office managed to secure arrears payments of £224.94 for Katie. Even then, however, we noticed that she was still due £85.96, so we contacted the department again to point that out. It accepted that there was an error and agreed to forward the arrears, but nothing has been received to date. That was bad enough, but at least Katie had got through the maze and got most of the money that she was due. However, nothing about the tax credit system is quite as simple as that. She and her partner Tony then received three award letters on the same day.

The first letter related to Katie's single claim prior to December 2005 and claimed an overpayment of £1,383.12. The tax credits office has since agreed that that was sent in error. The second notice claimed an overpayment of £224.92. Yet that related to the period for which it had already been agreed that a payment of £85.96 remained due to her. That contradicted what she had previously been told. The last letter referred to the new tax year, 2006-07. However, a portion of the overpayment referred to in the previous letter had been deducted wrongly from the award. We are still chasing the office about that. I do not know whether hon. Members can follow those complications, but I am sure that they can begin to appreciate the "Little Britain" sketch.

Worse still, the tax credits office claimed an overpayment of £1,210.20 for the tax year 2004-05. My office raised that several times, until the tax credits office finally responded that there was no record of any overpayments for that year, but repeated the claim that there was an overpayment of £1,383.12 for 2005-06. That was the sum that it had previously agreed in writing was an error. It was going back and claiming something that it had already said was not due.

This is just one case, but it is a complete mess and it illustrates a problem. Both my constituent and my office have been told one thing, only to receive correspondence totally at odds with the verbal advice and sometimes at odds with previous written advice. The computer gets the blame, but is there no point at which human interventions in the system can stop cases spiralling out of control and creating havoc for people like Katie Adamson?

If the case were an isolated one, I should put it down to bad luck, but it is far too general a problem. I shall briefly note a few points about other cases. Another Forfar constituent—Forfar seems particularly unfortunate in experiencing such cases—faced a claim for more than £10,000. The couple had made an application and received an award. Before it was paid, the husband was paid off, but quickly got another job at a reduced income. They received a letter telling them how much they would be paid, which they queried, saying that they thought it was incorrect; but they were assured that it was correct.

Eventually, when the inevitable happened and money was reclaimed from them, they were told that the problem was that their two children had been input into the computer system twice. They appealed on that basis, only to discover later that the real reason was that the wrong income had been entered on the computer. Part of the problem appears to have been that the couple never received a formal award notice after the change of job setting out how the amount was calculated, but the tax credits office refuses to accept that.

I can do no better than to quote a paragraph from a letter from my constituent:

"I still get the impression, from the person I spoke to, that the only way they will reconsider the matter is for me to prove that I did not receive a proper award notice, which is impossible. She said that the computer showed an award notice was sent and that would be correct—she could not answer when I asked whether their computer showing that I worked forty hours a week for nil pounds while claiming for child care would be correct too."

Again, the computer says no. That seems to be the crux of the problem. The department relies on the computer absolutely, but will not consider that it could be wrong. It reminds me of the constituent who repeatedly questioned the amount that was awarded, and was assured that it was right. When, inevitably, a repayment was claimed, she received a letter saying that although she had been assured that it was correct, it was not reasonable for her to accept that. What definition of "reasonable" does the department use?

Yet another Forfar constituent had been receiving working tax credit since 2003. In October 2005 she was told that she was no longer entitled to it, and a repayment of £1,200 was demanded. That was queried and the office agreed that it was a mistake and that she was still entitled to working tax credit. However, no payments were made in November, which left her very worried. When she contacted my office we contacted the department, which again pleaded computer error and promised manual payments. A manual payment was made in December, but in the same month she received three applications to complete and two demand letters, one for £1,000 and one for £700. She went to the Dundee office and was advised to appeal on both demands. She was then also told that the computer had now ended her claim—the computer seemed to be dealing with things all by itself.

My office contacted the tax credits office and received a letter in response that was totally incomprehensible. I am a lawyer, and I could not understand what it said, so we contacted the tax credits office. Surprise surprise, it could not understand the letter either, even though it had sent it out. Perhaps the computer had moved on to composing the letters as well.

In early March, the department promised to cease sending demand notices and to try to resolve the problem. Thankfully, for once, no more notices have been received but there has been no resolution either. That lady is still not receiving the money to which she is entitled. The case is unacceptable, and it has left this lady in worry. I wrote to one of the Minister's colleagues on 3 April, but I await a response.

It is not just the people who have come to see me in my office who are having problems. After I secured the debate, Arbroath citizen's advice bureau—we have left Forfar, for a change—contacted me and brought to my attention a case that it was dealing with. A young couple had received an overpayment demand for more than £19,000 for the period between 2003 and 2005. On 7 November 2005, the CAB wrote to the Department and said:

"Please treat this case as a matter of urgency as it is having a major impact on the well being of our clients as well as creating a crisis in their ability to manage their finances."

The department asked for a copy of the original application, which had been made online and of which the constituent had no copy, although I appreciate that that system has been changed in the interim. No response was received until April of this year, when the constituent received another demand notice. The CAB wrote again on 10 April, and made a formal complaint. It has now received an acknowledgement and a promise of a full reply, but that came only after a formal complaint was made. It is simply not good enough that it has taken six months from when the original application was made to reach that stage.

Even this morning, I got yet another letter. A constituent had come to my office who had been chased for a repayment. The tax credits officer said that the payments had been made to their employer, but the employer denies that any such payments have been made. The letter states that due to technical difficulties the office is unable to bring my constituent's records up to date. Again, the computer is unable to deal with it.

It seems to me that the problem is that the system is too complex and relies on a computer system that is not up to the task. There appears to be no process that allows human intervention to deal with a problem once it occurs. The demands keep coming, irrespective of what is said to me or to anyone else. Even when it is agreed that manual payments will be made and the person goes to collect them, the situation is not resolved, the computer does not deal with it and there seems to be no way to break into the cycle of the computer program. That is exacerbated further by the forms and letters, which are very difficult to understand. As I say, I am a lawyer and I find them difficult. Many of my constituents, who are far from being lawyers, simply cannot follow the information that is given to them.

The time frame for dealing with cases often means that people are trying to reconstruct information from a number of years with little written information from the applicant, but a mountain of often contradictory information from the department. As I said at the outset, it seems that the complaints about tax credits are now rivalling those about the Child Support Agency. I appeal to the Minister to consider the problem seriously. I am sure that he will tell me that tax credits are a good thing, and are helping a lot of people. I am not here to dispute that or agree with it. I am here to ask about the system, in particular the computer system that seems to have a will of its own in dealing with my constituents. Unless the problem is tackled now, things will continue to deteriorate until, like the CSA, the tax credit system cannot continue. I appeal to the Minister to deal with the matter now, and to tackle that dreadful computer system.

1.15 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Timms): I begin by welcoming this debate, which is the first that I have answered as Chief Secretary. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) for raising the topic and for his interest in and concern about the tax credit system. The debate is focused on Scotland, and the hon. Gentleman gave a number of examples of the unhappy experience of some people in Angus. However, it raises United Kingdom-wide tax credit policy issues. Alongside child benefit, the tax credit system now delivers significant financial support to the vast majority of families with children in the UK.

I shall not even begin to attempt to defend the unhappy sagas described by the hon. Gentleman. He named Katie Adamson, but he did not name the individual concerned in the second case.

Mr. Weir: I specifically asked Katie Adamson whether I could name her, because of the complexities of her case; for obvious reasons, other constituents preferred anonymity. However, I am happy to give full details to the Minister if he wants to look into them.

Mr. Timms: I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman did so, because I shall certainly want to take up those cases with officials.

As the hon. Gentleman anticipated, I want to tell the Chamber that we must not lose sight of what has been achieved through the tax credit system. It has been vital in two important areas. First, it has reduced the extent of child poverty; and, secondly, it has made work pay.

The system provides financial support, which is worth more than £15 billion this year, to nearly 20 million people. In Scotland, it is worth about £1.5 billion; and in the hon. Gentleman's constituency last month, 7,100 families benefited from tax credits, including 10,900 children. The hon. Gentleman is right to highlight the problems faced by some of his constituents, although they form only a small proportion of the 7,100 families who benefit from the system.

The hon. Gentleman has raised 10 cases this year in which people have had a problem with tax credits, and I readily concede that it would have been much better if he had not had to raise any. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General and I will be happy to look at the cases that he has referred to today, but I hope that he will acknowledge how much the tax credit system is delivering to a large number of families in his constituency.

We have set a target—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman supports it—to eliminate child poverty within a generation. Tax credits have helped lift some 700,000 children out of relative poverty since 1997, including 80,000 in Scotland, which is broadly in line with the milestone that we set to reduce the number by a quarter by last year. The UNICEF report "Child Poverty in Rich Countries 2005" states:

> "The proportion of children living in poverty has risen in a majority of the world's developed economies."

However, it says that there are exceptions, and the country achieving the biggest reduction in that proportion has been the UK. It points out:

> "Until the late 1990s, the United Kingdom had one of the highest child poverty rates in the OECD."

It then says that

> "over the last six years, the UK government has pioneered an approach to the monitoring and reduction of child poverty that seems to be working."

The tax credit system has been key to that success.

For a family with two children on half average earnings, the tax credit system provides £4,400 a year. The least well-off can now receive up to £107 a week, compared with just £20 per week in 1997; and the number of people receiving tax credits is seven times higher than the number of those who received family credit.

Mr. Weir: As I said at the outset, I am not here to criticise or agree with tax credits; it is the system that bothers me. Although I appreciate what the Minister says, does he not accept that, if constituents are telling me that they are no longer prepared to go through the hassle of claiming tax credit because of the situation that they find themselves in, something is wrong and that a simplified system is needed to deal with the problem?

Mr. Timms: I am hoping that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge the strengths of the system. He takes a neutral view that perhaps it is a good thing but perhaps it is not.

Mr. Weir: To be fair, that is not what I said.

Mr. Timms: That is what I understood. I would be happy to give way again in a moment, but it is important in the backdrop to this debate to set out why the system was introduced, why it has the characteristics that it has and what a great deal has been achieved through it, including for more than 7,000 families in his constituency.

I accept that the system ought to work smoothly and that the problems to which the hon. Gentleman rightly drew attention must be put right. We have made several changes. Last year, my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General made some announcements which I shall outline in a moment. They started to take effect from last month and will continue progressively to take effect in the coming year. I hope that in the hon. Gentleman's constituency they will tackle effectively the kind of problems that he described.

I do not for a moment want to gloss over the problems that he described or pretend that they do not exist. I know that there are significant problems exactly along the lines that he described. However, I should point out, first, that the system has achieved a great deal and, secondly, that we are on the case. I hope that he will detect over the coming weeks that we are putting right the problems that he drew to our attention.

The tax credit system has had a big impact in reducing child poverty. Take-up has been high from the start—much higher than for predecessor income-related benefits. The system has also had a big impact in helping to make work pay. Together with the national minimum wage, it can guarantee a minimum level of income for people moving into employment, thereby helping to ensure that work pays over welfare. For example, a lone parent with two children moving into full-time work on the national minimum wage will have an income gain from working that is 40 per cent. greater in real terms than would have been the case in 1997. That contributes to stability in the economy and has helped to increase the number of people in work by 2.3 million to the historically high levels of employment that are such a positive feature of the UK economy today.

As I said, it is certainly not my intention to gloss over the serious difficulties that the hon. Gentleman highlighted. The system is complex and has to be because of the complexity of people's lives. Every year, 3 million people change jobs, and 200,000 men and women move into new or better jobs and raise their family income by more than £10,000. We need a system that reflects that and that can support people as they move between jobs and change their circumstances, and that is what we have designed the system to do.

Overpayments, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, are a consequence of a responsive system. Under an annual system, given that a family's final entitlement cannot be known until the end of the year, we have to be able to make end-of-year adjustments. We can avoid that only with an entirely inflexible fixed system that would not offer the flexible support that is such a valuable feature of the present system.

Mr. Weir: I understand what the Minister is saying, and I do not dispute much of it, but does he not accept that if the system is to be responsive, it is vital that notified changes are correctly put in the computer and that the computer is able to deal with them? From the cases that I have come across, it appears that that is not happening. Either the information is wrongly inputted—perhaps it is not inputted—or the computer does not react to it. In some cases, it does not seem to be able to take on board the changes that are given to it. That is a serious drawback to the system.

Mr. Timms: I completely agree with the hon. Gentleman. The system should not fail to work because of that, and we have made some important improvements to tackle the problems. This is the first time that I have had the opportunity to look in detail at it, but the incidence of problems is limited, as far as I can see. There are 10 too many problems in his constituency, but that is 10 out of 7,100. It is not the normal experience of people who send in information about a change of circumstances that the system fails to register it. I agree that no one should have that experience and that too many do at present, but they are a small proportion of the total and I hope that it will get smaller over the coming months.

We have made changes. From last month, the disregard for income increases between one tax year and the next has risen from £2,500 to £25,000. Almost all families with rising incomes will not have their tax credit entitlement reduced in the first year in which the increase occurs. We believe that that will lead to a big fall in the number of overpayments. Other changes will be introduced in the coming months.

The aim is to provide more certainty for tax credit recipients—the hon. Gentleman's constituents—particularly for families who see a rise in income, and to keep the benefits of the system's flexibility to respond to falls in income and changes in circumstances. We estimate that overpayments will be reduced by around one third. Families will have a clear responsibility to report changes promptly and will be helped to keep their records up to date. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs will take a more proactive approach.

There have been significant further improvements in our administration systems. With effect from last month, a new award notice is being issued to give claimants a clearer summary of their award, explaining how it was calculated and what they will be paid. I hope that that will help people in the circumstances described by the hon. Gentleman. The guidance notes that accompany claim forms have been replaced with a clearer, shorter version. The tax credit section of the Revenue and Customs website has been redesigned to make it easier to access information.

Since the beginning of the year, there has been a publicity campaign reminding people to notify us promptly of changes in their circumstances. The helpline, which dealt with 22 million calls in 2004-05, has been improved. Call-back arrangements providing more targeted, fuller support in the most complex cases are now in place, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman's constituents will see improvements as a result. Major software releases were successfully implemented in November last year and again last month and are delivering real improvements in operational performance. Again, I hope that that will directly address the concerns that the hon. Gentleman expressed. New procedures to suspend recovery of a disputed overpayment were also introduced last November and we published a revised and clearer version of HMRC's code of practice on overpayments. I hope that that will also help.

I know that hon. Members on both sides of the House have appreciated the willingness of my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General—who is out of the country on ministerial business today—to meet hon. Members about the problems that we have had, to assist in resolving them and to make changes to put them right.

Today, tax credits are helping millions of families throughout Scotland and the UK. We are determined to improve the system further, to remedy the defects that have affected a minority of tax credit recipients in the way outlined by the hon. Gentleman today. We want to give families more certainty about their tax credit awards, but we want to hang on to the crucial ability that characterises the current system of being able to respond to changing circumstances.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for setting out on behalf of his constituents their wholly proper concerns and for helping us to ensure that the system provides the help that it was designed to provide. I hope that over the next few weeks or months he will notice the significant improvements that are being made to the administration of the system and that the incidence of the problems that he described will become significantly less frequent than in the past few months.

Finally, I note that we received a helpful and interesting brief from the National Council for One Parent Families to coincide with the debate. It made a number of points rightly emphasising that there is more to be done to ensure that the system delivers what we want it to. It started by welcoming the fact that the Government have listened to concerns about the operation of the tax credit system and that we are introducing changes that should improve income stability for claimants and reduce hardship. That is our aim and I hope that we will be successful.

Second Chance Education

1.30 pm

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): I am pleased to have been able to secure this important debate. I am aware that there is a great deal of interest in this topic, and I wish to associate myself with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones).

I want to draw attention to the problems that are being experienced in adult education in Liverpool and in other large urban areas as the unintended consequence of changes to Government funding for further and adult education. In particular, I want to focus on a highly valued course at risk, "Second chance to learn", in the hope that the course's future can be secured.

There are three key players in this matter: the Government, the Greater Merseyside learning and skills council and Liverpool community college. Government provide major funding and set national priorities, the Greater Merseyside LSC allocates funding based on those priorities, and the college itself makes decisions on specific courses, although that is strongly constrained by the priorities already set and the funding allocated.

The Government, through the Department for Education and Skills, have given priority to securing employable skills and expanding participation among 16 to 18-year-olds. They prioritise level 2 and level 3 qualifications to be funded partly by transferring money from level 1 and courses inauspiciously designated "other". That is where the problem lies. The transfer of funds threatens the adult skills for life provision and second chance learning, where Liverpool community college has been judged as "outstanding" by Ofsted's adult learning inspectorate in its 2005 inspection.

Greater Merseyside LSC's initial allocation to Liverpool community college reduced its adult further education budget by £2.7 million—8 per cent. That was in order to transfer money to fund higher priority courses. Following representations, the allocation has been increased by £1.2 million, and I understand that further negotiations are still under way.

The Government's national priority of improving employability is to be commended, and is highly relevant in Liverpool where, despite the city's growing economic success and a 43 per cent. reduction in unemployment since 1997, high unemployment persists. For example, in the Riverside constituency the unemployment rate is 12 per cent. and male unemployment runs at 18.1 per cent. If we look more closely at local areas, we see that those figures increase. For example, in the Granby ward, the unemployment rate is 26 per cent.

It is essential that people are equipped with the skills to take up growing opportunities provided by successful regeneration. The unanticipated consequence of this national policy is, however, to reduce funding for people who either need support to enable them to step on the skills ladder or require education that boosts their confidence as individuals and as active citizens. The courses at risk include those that address that objective.

[Mrs. Louise Ellman]

The courses may well become the gateway to further qualifications, but they are valid in their own right.

The courses are highly relevant to Liverpool, where long-term deprivation persists: 46 per cent. of Liverpool's special output areas are in the highest 5 per cent. in England, and 23 per cent. of Liverpool's SOAs are in the 1 per cent. of most deprived areas in the country. According to the Basic Skills Agency, 27.3 per cent. of Liverpool people between the ages of 16 and 60 have poor literacy skills; the corresponding rate for England is 24 per cent. In addition, 32.3 per cent. of Liverpool people in this age group have poor numeracy skills, compared with a figure of 24 per cent. for England. The constituency of Liverpool, Riverside alone has 10,900 people on incapacity benefit—the highest number for any constituency in the country. For many families with that long-term problem, formal education has not been seen as a high priority and there is a high level of alienation. That is why provision characterised unflatteringly as "other" is so needed.

Liverpool community college remains the arbiter on the provision of specific courses, although, as I said, its decisions are heavily constrained by funding decisions taken elsewhere. It is an exceptional college, whose skills for life agenda and approach to social inclusion and widening participation were judged by Ofsted to be "outstanding". The Ofsted inspection also found that there is "consistently good teaching", "strong strategic leadership" and "strong financial management" at the college. That is praise indeed.

I am concerned that a range of the college's courses is at risk because the national funding priority does not take full account of Liverpool's needs; similar problems are also found in respect of other urban areas. I wish to draw attention to the future of the long-standing course, "Second chance to learn", which is now in jeopardy. That stand-alone course is provided at the college's new city centre, Duke street premises, and attended by 180 students. It has run for 30 years, originally through the Workers Educational Association and the Liverpool university Institute of Extension Studies. During that time, 3,000 students have participated.

Although there are exceptions, most students are aged over 50, have limited formal educational qualifications—many have none—and do not progress to higher education. They do not fit employment-oriented priorities. Yet the course is highly valued. Recently, I met students who attend the course. They described their experience as "life transforming" and explained how it had given them new confidence, encouraging them to be active citizens fully engaged in the regeneration of local communities. They recounted how they had influenced younger members of their families, who otherwise would not have been so influenced, to become interested in education. That demonstrates how second chance learning has helped individual development and community cohesion.

The college, under the pressure of funding constraints, now proposes to disband the stand-alone course in the city centre. It plans to provide the individual subject options in the course through local drop-in study centres or DISCs. Those would become part of foundation programmes that address basic skills needs and work towards level 2 entitlement. The proposal has been met with consternation. It means the end of the stand-alone "Second chance to learn" course, which will no longer remain an entity in its own right and no longer be held in the city centre.

Students have told me how coming to a stand-alone course has made them feel part of something important and given them a feeling of belonging. They have explained how meeting in the city centre is stimulating and enables them to join students from other parts of the city whom they would not otherwise have met. They talk about how misconceptions have been broken down and how prejudice has been addressed. They talk avidly and enthusiastically about how going to a course in the city centre brings them into contact with younger students. They find that to be part of an important learning process for themselves as individuals. One student who had no formal qualifications told me:

"I have a thirst for knowledge. A light has been switched on; now it is to be switched off."

Another said:

"The course should stay city centre-based so that students like me, who have never wandered out of my own neighbourhood, can meet other students from across the city."

The students on the course are predominantly older people with few formal qualifications, who had a gross lack of self-confidence but found a new sense of well-being and optimism by attending the course. The local newspaper, the Liverpool Echo, has drawn attention to the city centre, stand-alone course. Numerous students, some of whom progressed to employment and others who found a new sense of confidence, praised its worth. They stressed its value in making them more aware and active citizens as an essential part of the widespread regeneration in Liverpool.

I appreciate the context in which the decision is being made. The Government's stress on employability is commendable, and certainly highly relevant to Liverpool, but it has led to a reduction in funds for confidence-building courses that develop and educate individuals, which are also required. Such courses might be the gateway to qualifications, but they are also important in their own right in encouraging active citizenship, awareness and confidence, and are part of urban renewal and local need.

More joined-up thinking at Government level is required. Civic engagement and social cohesion are important parts of the Department for Communities and Local Government's strategy on urban regeneration. Liverpool has benefited greatly from those regeneration strategies, with significant funds coming to the city, particularly into my constituency, to develop local neighbourhoods, improve housing and employment prospects and develop a sense of civic renewal.

In 2001, the Department of Health launched the national service framework for older people. That identified the importance of lifelong learning. The Centre for Educational Research and Innovation at the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development highlights the link between learning and health for older people. It seems perverse to jeopardise courses that have such a positive effect on both of those areas.

The Government's national priority of increasing employability is extremely important to Liverpool, but so is the need to build confidence and develop the individual. The facts that I have recounted today about the long-term deprivation in Liverpool, the need to upgrade basic skills, and the long-seated deprivation that leads to too many people feeling that education is not for them, emphasise the importance of courses that boost self-confidence and self-awareness. Those issues are being addressed successfully by Liverpool community college, which is an outstanding institution, but they are being put at risk by changes in funding priorities decided nationally.

Liverpool community college is renowned for its work with under-achievers. It has already secured, from its initial application, additional funding from Greater Merseyside LSC, which is aware of local needs, but is constrained by national priorities. A significant funding gap remains, and I urge the three players—the Government, the LSC and Liverpool community college—to ensure that those important parts of adult education do not fall victim to the schools-based priority. I urge both the Government and the LSC to make funding available so that both local priorities can be addressed.

Liverpool's needs require a combination of employment-related courses following the national priority and others that develop citizens as individuals. Those two objectives might well go together, but do not necessarily do so. This is an essential part of adult education in the area of under-achievement. Both aspects are important and a part of regeneration. "Second chance to learn" should remain a stand-alone, city centre course, and I call on Liverpool community college to review its proposal. I ask the Government to look again at the implementation of the strategy and to increase flexibility, so that national Government policy can bring the maximum benefit to areas such as Liverpool.

1.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) on securing the debate. I am aware of the level of interest that people in Liverpool are showing in the proposals of Liverpool community college to reorganise its "Second chance to learn" programme. I have also had representations from my hon. Friends the Members for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), and for Wirral, West (Stephen Hesford) and from my right hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth). I appreciate the opportunity to explain the Government's and the Learning and Skills Council's strategy in this context.

In response to my hon. Friend's opening remarks, I want to outline the Department's overall strategy for dealing with the nation's skills needs, and then to consider local issues in Liverpool and describe our commitment to providing learning to all those who missed out earlier in life, as she described, and to those who want to update their skills or to continue learning.

The Government have developed what I believe is a strong and coherent strategy. To meet our future skills needs, we shall ensure that people realise their potential through learning, both as individuals and as members of an adaptable and changing work force. We shall reinforce the priorities for the public funding of adult learning and we want to find the right balance between the state, employers and individuals for the costs of adult learning. We are reforming the further education sector to make it much more responsive to the needs of the economy, employers and individuals.

My hon. Friend described the situation in Liverpool in graphic terms, and I think that we all know that the global economy presents some unique new challenges. We live in a world where new markets, productivity and new skilled work forces are emerging with extraordinary speed. However, as my hon. Friend probably knows, our productivity levels are still among the poorest in western Europe, so boosting our productivity will be a key factor in our long-term future economic success; that is true for the whole of the UK, and for Liverpool in particular. Our skills gap—the gap between our skills and those of other countries—is one of the main reasons for our productivity being poorer than it should be in comparison to those countries. That is the challenge that faces us, and it is a stark one.

The Chancellor said in a recent Budget statement:

> "It is because education is the 21st century road to prosperity that Britain must become the best educated, best trained, best skilled country in the world. ... Unleashing the potential of every individual in the country is key to the economic success of the future of our country."—[Official Report, 16 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 267-8.]

The Government's skills strategy is essential.

I want to give some figures to bring home the scale of the skills gap. There are 12 million adults who lack a full level 2 qualification—the basic school-leaving qualification, the equivalent of five good GCSEs. Some 6 million adults lack basic literacy skills and 17 million adults lack basic numeracy skills. It is true that our plans to transform the fortunes of young people will improve those figures over time, as young people leave school better equipped with skills. However, as Lord Leitch demonstrated in his report, that is not enough.

Today more than 70 per cent. of what will be the 2020 work force has completed compulsory education, so if we are to tackle the figures that I have just given we shall have to transform the fortunes of our adult population at all levels. It is not only an economic imperative that we face; we know that adults with low skills have lower than average levels of employment and lower earnings. That is a point that my hon. Friend made. We have a stretching public service agreement target for 2010, which is to reduce by 40 per cent. the proportion of the work force without a level 2 qualification. However, as many as 25 per cent. of the work force lack that level 2 qualification today. Those with level 2 qualifications are three times more likely to receive further training than those without qualifications. It is a key to unlocking future individual success.

How do we match funding with those priorities? We have records of public funding for adult learning. Our planned funding for the Learning and Skills Council's major adult programmes is nearly £3 billion for both of the next two years. However, we cannot transform skills at every level through public funding alone. We have to prioritise where public funding is targeted. We have made it clear that our priority is to give help to those adults who need it most. We have prioritised for free provision those without functional literacy and numeracy and those without the foundation of employability skills, as represented by a first full level 2 qualification.

To support that shift, there must be a new balance of responsibilities between the state, employers and learners. We do not accept that the withdrawal of LSC funding—where that happens—means that a course automatically has to close. If employers will benefit, it is only fair that they share the cost. Where learners and employers are prepared to pay more, we expect providers to provide courses on a full cost-recovery basis.

We need a cultural shift that will lead to new and better targeted investment by employers in their work force and to individuals investing in themselves. There is a lot of evidence that individuals accept the case for investing in their own learning. MORI polling and recent research by the National Institute of Adult Continuing Education show wide acceptance that adults should make a contribution to the costs of learning.

There is a long backdrop to the moves by Liverpool community college to restructure its provision to meet the priorities that I have outlined. I mentioned earlier the national figures for adults without a level 2 qualification or with basic literacy and numeracy needs. My figures—I hope that these are in accord with the ones that my hon. Friend mentioned—show that 120,000 adults in Liverpool are without a level 2 qualification. That is 44 per cent. of the working population in Liverpool, as compared with 27 per cent. in England. That is a major gap that we have to fill. Some 80,000 adults in Liverpool are without basic literacy and 89,000 are without basic numeracy. My hon. Friend was right to highlight that need, and I am highlighting it too. It is because we have identified that need that we have no choice but to prioritise our resources to address the demand for learning. That is what Liverpool community college is doing.

Liverpool community college's "Second chance to learn" programme has been part of adult education in Liverpool for nearly 30 years. The programme currently helps 180 individuals, out of the college's 17,000 adult learners. Many of those 180 learners have been attending courses for a number of years—I have received correspondence from hon. Friends on that. Some of those learners travel into the city from the Wirral and elsewhere. However, the college has decided that the programme no longer meets the needs of many learners, mainly because it does not encourage progression to higher qualifications.

Mrs. Ellman: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Phil Hope: If I may say a little more but do not address my hon. Friend's concern, she may intervene on me.

The college recognises that the "Second chance" curriculum is an ideal base to support the recently established foundation programmes. The "Second chance" subjects have been tried and tested throughout the course's long history. They will attract a wider range of students if they are delivered in the college's local drop-in study centres, which my hon. Friend mentioned. The college will retain the best aspects of "Second chance" as part of a foundation programme for students that addresses their basic skills needs and works towards level 2. The broad range of subjects available through the programme will continue. That includes courses such as "Introduction to history", women's studies, creative writing, citizenship and sociology. Many students will have the opportunity of a second chance to learn when those subjects are delivered in local communities.

My hon. Friend mentioned the need for joined-up government and neighbourhood renewal programmes being funded through the former Office of the Deputy Prime Minister—the Department for Communities and Local Government, or the DCLG, as I shall get used to calling it. By delivering those courses in drop-in centres in local communities, we shall see a greater joining up between the needs of local communities and the courses that the college offers, because they will be provided where more students can access them.

Mrs. Ellman: I thank the Minister for his comments, which give a full explanation of how the Government see their policies unfolding. As I have said, I support a policy of creating greater employability, but my concern is that the needs of people who may not progress to further qualifications but who nevertheless get a sense of self-confidence and of becoming active citizens—another part of the Government's programme—are being put to one side in the search for greater employability.

Phil Hope: It gets complicated, in that there is a strand of funding that we call PCDL—personal, community and development learning—which funds learning for its own sake; it does not have to lead on to a qualification. That fund covers some of the themes that my hon. Friend described. We have protected the budget for PCDL at £210 million across the country, but the way in which that money is spent in different parts of the country is patchy. That is why I have asked the learning and skills councils to bring together the local partnerships, including themselves, providers, local authorities, the health service—which often provides education for health reasons—and voluntary, third-sector organisations, and to consider how the money allocated to PCDL is spent in their area, who goes on what courses, and how PCDL can be developed further. We are alive to, and committed to, that concept of learning for its own sake, but we are mindful that the ways in which budgets are spent locally do not necessarily meet all the needs or cover all the gaps.

As the hon. Lady mentioned, Liverpool community college recently received recognition from a number of sources for being a place of high-quality learning. It has two centres of vocational excellence and is involved in another, too. It has had good inspection results, and is a beacon college. It will receive extra funding for personal and community development learning in recognition of that excellence. This year, Liverpool community college received some £32.7 million—that is 61 per cent. more than five years ago. My hon. Friend mentioned £1.2 million that had been brought back to help the college. I can tell her that the Learning and Skills Council has now agreed to give the college an additional £450,000 to support adult learning, so there has been recognition of the local priorities and needs, and of how the college can respond to those needs.

We have mentioned further education, adult learning, particular courses and so on, but on the wider policy area and the direct funding that we are giving, we expect colleges to focus on meeting people's needs at work. Particularly for employers, there is the "train to gain" stream of funding, which is rolling out nationally from 1 August this year. That is a £230 million programme to help employees who do not have basic skills and level 2 qualifications.

Finally, on the worry about focus on level 2 leading to the withdrawal of adult courses, it is not our policy to lose good courses that lead demonstrably to progression and to level 2; we make that clear in our grant letter to the Learning and Skills Council. I say to my hon. Friend that too much of the kind of provision that is called "First Steps" or "Return to Learn" is not so much a pathway as a revolving door; people go round and round on courses and do not move on. That is why we announced our new development value, the foundation learning tier, in the White Paper.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Two o'clock.

Tourism (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

9.30 am

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): I welcome the opportunity presented by this debate. It gives us the chance not only to examine the potential of Northern Ireland as a tourist destination but to ask why more has not been done to maximise opportunities for tourism. I am sure that the new Minister is quickly coming to terms with her brief, but if she is not already aware of this, she will quickly learn how much Northern Ireland has to offer, both today and thereafter.

We have the natural resources to attract people for city breaks, weekend breaks and for longer stays, and it is essential that they know what is on offer, where it is, and how to benefit from it. We have much in the way of natural resources. Northern Ireland may not be the prime target for those seeking a two-week holiday in the sun— [Laughter]—but it is undoubtedly a fantastic place for short, and even not so short stays. I do not know why my colleagues are laughing; anyone would think that it occasionally rained in Northern Ireland.

Last weekend saw one of the largest and most spectacular outdoor events anywhere in the United Kingdom—the North West 200 motorbike races. The event lasted five days, and more than 100,000 people were attracted to it. Of course, I would be promoting that event, because it takes place in my constituency, on the north coast. None the less, it was a spectacular event and millions more saw it on satellite television. That is but a small indication of what can be achieved throughout the Province.

Because of our history and geography, our culture and our sport, Northern Ireland can offer attractions that cannot be found elsewhere in the United Kingdom. With a more peaceful environment and greater access to the Province through the better transport links that we now enjoy, we should be able to attract even more visitors, not only from Great Britain but from the Irish Republic, Europe and beyond.

Tourism is one sector in which we have lagged behind the others parts of the UK and our neighbours in the Republic, but that is finally beginning to change. Belfast has begun to discover itself as a prime venue for city breaks. Indeed, in the past two weeks both Portrush and the mountains of Mourne have featured in UK-wide competitions as the most desirable places to visit. It could be said that Northern Ireland's tourist time has arrived.

We are home to some of the most scenic areas in the UK. We have nine areas of outstanding natural beauty, and we hope that more will be added to the list. We have some of the finest fishing waters in the British isles, and we have the potential to develop a market catering for those interested in specific activity holidays. The development of such holidays—especially golfing or fishing—will spread the benefits of tourism beyond the cities.

I have not yet mentioned the giant's causeway, but despite the famously reported comments of Samuel Johnson, it is worth going to see it. All those assets mean that Northern Ireland has a natural resource base upon which tourism can be promoted. Although the problems of the past 36 years have resulted in us lagging behind historically, I believe that we have the potential to develop tourism immensely in the foreseeable future.

The job of marketing Northern Ireland falls primarily to the Northern Ireland Tourist Board. I believe that that organisation can do much more to improve the marketing of Northern Ireland, both to those who live close to the product and to those overseas. In any attempt to market a product, even one as excellent as ours, it is important to create a distinct brand identity. I believe that NITB needs to work to carve out that distinct identity—one showing that we are not just another part of the island of Ireland, to which people may take a day trip while staying in the Republic, but a destination worth coming to in its own right. That time spent will, of course, mean money spent in hotels, shops and restaurants, and ultimately the improvement of the overall economy for everyone in Northern Ireland.

Part of that distinct identity has to be rooted in the culture and traditions of the Province. It will come as no surprise to anyone that I will mention some cultural events and traditions with which I am familiar, which offer huge potential for tourism. If the Northern Ireland product is marketed solely from an "Irish" perspective, many visitors will, unsurprisingly, see the potential for exploring that Irishness from the Republic of Ireland, and will see little added value to be gained from coming to our country.

In my home city of Londonderry, the Maiden City festival is a very successful sequence of cultural events, held for a week every August to celebrate the relief of the city from the longest siege in British military history. It is a pioneering festival, which has led the way to this kind of tourism. Moreover, it has grown and developed despite a level of funding far below that granted to other events such as the West Belfast festival, although it is the type of event that is cherished and developed by tourism bodies across the globe. That example must be developed and replicated in other parts of Northern Ireland.

Throughout July and August, the Orange Institution and other groups have begun to take steps to help develop and market the commemorations and parades that they organise. They hold activities around them in order better to explain their history and significance, as well as to attract a wider audience. The July commemorations are some of the largest cultural displays seen not just in the British Isles but beyond. They are all organised and held with very little Government support or funding. Indeed, on occasion the NITB treats those events as unavoidable irritants. There is a sense that it includes such cultural events in passing, simply because they are difficult to ignore, but there is no real effort to develop the tourist trade surrounding them. I would like that to change, with the tourist board working in a real partnership with the organisers of those large-scale events to market them and exploit their full economic potential.

We have a rich history, which has not always been marketed to the wider international audience—and I now turn to what is known as the Ulster-Scots tradition, sometimes referred to in America as the Scots-Irish tradition. Yet when most Americans think of researching their ancestry and their roots, they more often than not look to the Republic of Ireland, and not to the region that history most definitely pinpoints as the area where they would be better off beginning their search.

I recently posed a parliamentary question asking what links there were between NITB and VisitScotland, to target potential visitors from the United States to both Scotland and Northern Ireland. I was informed that there were no such links, except for the usual meetings that would happen between officials in organisations like that. In recent years we have seen the establishment of Tourism Ireland, which has the remit of promoting the tourist potential in both countries on the island of Ireland. However, as is so often the case with such bodies, there appears to be an automatic assumption that the answer to most issues lies in Northern Ireland looking south. Yet Rabbie Burns country is as close to Larne as it is to Lanarkshire, so the NITB should look east as well as south.

My party and I have made it clear that we have no objection whatever to north-south co-operation where it is practical and brings a benefit. There will be some issues within tourism where that will obviously be the case. However, for many other aspects, there are east-west links that equal or far outweigh any north-south promotional links. The Government must take that issue seriously and start to put together official structures that recognise those deep cultural and historical links—in this case, to develop tourism and the wider economy.

The Northern Ireland Tourist Board should develop a specific Northern Ireland brand, and there needs to be acceptance in Tourism Ireland that Northern Ireland has a clear and distinct culture. That needs to be exemplified even when it comes to a very basic matter such as the commissioning, supply and promotion of mementos and souvenirs that reflect that ethos. If people look through information on the events and activities that Tourism Ireland promotes, they will find much devoted to Irish literature and culture; it is only very recently—within the last 18 months—that Ulster-Scots music and culture has featured at all.

I have made some criticism of the NITB today, but its recent publication of the proposed cultural and heritage tourism action plan is to be welcomed as a step in the right direction. The plan at least recognises some aspects of Ulster-Scots culture and associated aspects such as the plantation. I urge the Minister and the NITB to develop that process and carry forward those ideas, which could help to turn around some of the problems that I have outlined. Those ideas could also be allied with the focus on what Northern Ireland has offered to countries such as the United States, where there is a rich history to be explored and explained to many Americans who are interested in their heritage. That could not only lead to the promotion of tourism links between the United States and Northern Ireland, but could aid the economy and help to build economic links between the United States and Northern Ireland.

With Tourism Ireland, however, we start from a significantly lower base. There must be a cultural change in that organisation so that it recognises the product that it is helping to sell and the uniqueness of that product. Unfortunately, on some occasions, nationalists in Northern Ireland have focused on the political gain that they perceive is made through the establishment of a body such as Tourism Ireland, rather than on the fact that it is failing the area that they should want to be served. I hope that we can all unite in wanting to see a significant improvement today and in the future.

I stress that we have a massive marketing opportunity. It presents itself now, but will not last long. Northern Ireland will be featured next year in the Smithsonian Institution's annual folklife festival in Washington DC. That will be an opportunity for Northern Ireland to present itself on one of the biggest stages in the world. Millions of people go to that festival every July, and next July Northern Ireland will be centre stage. We have the opportunity to express to those millions of people the desire and the hope that they will come to the festival next July. I hope that the opportunity presented by the festival will be used to develop some of the themes that I have outlined, and that it will show the American public in particular what Northern Ireland has contributed to the development of their own nation, as well as building links for the future. The London Olympics in 2012 will also give Northern Ireland a tremendous opportunity to attract those who are visiting the games, as well as offering training for competitors. That applies to the United States and to other nations.

The Government, of course, cannot be held responsible for the weather—I hesitate to mention the weather again, because it seemed to cause much merriment earlier.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): We could do with a bit of it here!

Mr. Campbell: We will endeavour to see whether we can transport some of the water that we have in Northern Ireland to the south-east of England. That would be an excellent way to promote east-west relations, although it might be somewhat expensive. However, other important issues can be given priority to develop a tourism industry with a lot to offer. It can deliver much, but it needs a promotional push to take it forward.

9.45 am

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): May I say what a pleasure it is to speak before you, Mr. Martlew? I give you my best regards for your football team's performance in winning the championship this year. I welcome the debate—[Interruption.] It is halfway to Belfast.

I thank the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) for securing the debate today. I agree with a lot of what he said, particularly the fact that we cannot look at the situation in Northern Ireland as just an add-on to what is happening in the Irish tourist industry. It is different in many ways, and we should recognise, appreciate, respect and promote that difference.

I bring apologies from the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), Chair of the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs. The Committee has agreed to look next at what is happening in the tourist industry.

I shall speak about my experiences, which go back almost 20 years. Despite having a grandmother born in County Cork, I never managed to get to Ireland until the summer of 1989. I had just been made redundant from the coal mines, and my 68-year-old father and I decided that it would be good fun to go camping. We camped in south-west Scotland, and while we were there we saw an advert for a day trip to the Bushmills distillery, which is quite a long way from Kirkcudbright. It meant waking up at 4 o'clock in the morning, getting to Stranraer for 6 o'clock, taking a three-hour ferry trip and then hitting the road, going around the coast to Ballycastle.

Ballycastle was the first place in Northern Ireland where I spent any time, and if I do one thing before I die, it will be to go back there and take the boat to Rathlin island, which I understand is a very impressive place. Perhaps we could build that into the Northern Ireland Committee's itinerary.

We went to the Bushmills distillery, my father being something of an expert on whiskey. He was certainly an expert in how much he could drink. I do not know about quality, but he certainly understood quantity. That made the bus drive back to Belfast very interesting.

That was the start of a lot of happy trips to Northern Ireland. My old man and I used to go together and just bum around. We would take the car with no idea where we were going, stopping by the roadside, in hostels and in bed and breakfasts—whatever suited.

There was one occasion when I was more worried than on any other. My dad was what I would call a quiet-man republican. He believed in the cause, he sang the songs and he had the craic, but he did not have very good political antennae. One night, we were welcomed into a British Legion—I cannot remember whether it was in Portrush or Portstewart—by an old man wearing a white tuxedo with the biggest bow tie I had ever seen in my life. I said to my dad, "If you start singing republican songs in here, you're dead." Thankfully, he concentrated more on playing dominoes than on singing that night.

Mr. Campbell: Wiser counsel prevailed.

Mr. Anderson: Absolutely.

Despite the fun that we had, it was a worrying time. Daft things happened. My car had a Great Britain registration; were we in danger? We were stopped at checkpoints and when crossing the border. The sight of watchtowers and of helicopters in the air was not something that we were used to, although over the years I have come to know that my Northern Ireland colleagues had to live with it day in and day out for far too long.

In 1993, I became a member of the national executive committee of the trade union Unison. During my time there, I worked with people in Northern Ireland and had many happy times trying to find a way forward in the peace process for working people over there. One of my happiest memories is of 1996, when we had a conference in Newcastle, County Down at the Slieve Donard hotel. I recommend it to everyone. They should go there, too, before they die.

We also stayed in Kilkeel. We decided to make a holiday of it—we had gone across there and the union had paid, so we thought we might as well stay. We visited a place called the silent valley. If there is a more appropriately named place on this earth, I do not know what it is. It is for those who want real solitude. We could see the town below us, but we could not hear a thing. I would recommend it to anyone. It is an absolutely fantastic place.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the lakes in Ireland and the giant's causeway. That is one of Ireland's most visited places. So it should be, and so should other places like it—but the greatest reason to go to Northern Ireland is the people. They are genuine people, hospitable and warm. It does not matter what part of the country they come from; all of them make people feel welcome. Like me, and like some other people in the House, they come from a tradition of hard times and hard work. They have the attitude, "We don't have very much, but we'll share it with you." That is one of the greatest reasons to go there.

The place is now completely different from how it was 20 years ago—thanks in no small part to the people sitting in this room. Northern Ireland is vibrant, buzzing and alive. It has a positive future and our Government will play a major role in that future. There are new opportunities. There is now what I would call the "terrorist trail" in Northern Ireland—going round and viewing the murals. For people who have never been, that is probably one of the things that they most want to see, but there is so much more than that, and I hope that people will tap into it.

Last week that well-known entrepreneur, my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn), organised a tour of the historic pubs of Belfast for us the night before the sitting of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee. The event was purely investigatory—nothing else—but it was really interesting. That sort of trip has become an opportunity for people working in the tourist industry in Belfast, and shows visitors a whole new side of the place. The other good thing is that, as we were waiting for the plane at Newcastle airport at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, we noticed that the traffic was two-way. Geordies were going to Belfast and Belfast people were coming across to Newcastle. That is good for our country and for working together, and there is now a lot of hope.

The Committee is conducting an investigation into organised crime, and last week we split into two groups. Some of us flew to Crossmaglen, which is the only way for security staff to get in there. It was worrying to arrive by helicopter, walk out of the front door of the police station, look down the street at a beautiful village square and know that the people in the station would almost certainly not dare to go out there unattended. The good news, however, is that watchtowers are coming down and last year, for the first time in 26 years, the police started patrols, albeit in armoured vehicles, from the road to Newtownhamilton, so in a sense things are improving.

After the Committee produces its current report we will begin an investigation into tourism. We hope that what we come out with will promote the good news and build on the advice, information and evidence that we have seen. We want to do justice to the situation, and as part of that, we are going to Northern Ireland on 12 July to look at cultural activities that many of us have never been involved in before.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Hear, hear.

Mr. Anderson: I am looking forward to that—and I hope that I can get a hat big enough to wear.

To a certain extent, I have been involved in Irish politics for a long time, and I am not naive enough to believe that what has happened this week is anything more than a tentative start. Colleagues, both those in this Chamber and others in Northern Ireland, have got together to move forward, I hope, but we cannot move forward on terrorism, the peace process or anything else unless we are clear about three things. In our democratic society, there is no room for terrorists, criminals or wreckers. We do not want any of those people. We want to work together and, by using the tourism angle, we have a chance to build a new future not only for the people of Northern Ireland but for the people of the whole United Kingdom. I hope that the Government play their part in a big way, and that we will be led in this work by the people of Northern Ireland.

9.53 am

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson), who has done as good a job as the Northern Ireland Tourist Board has done—it will probably offer him some commission for the adverts that he has given us today. I noted what he said about the people of Northern Ireland—but I have to say that if his dad had started singing republican songs in the British legion in Portstewart, he might have had to revise his opinion somewhat.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on securing this important debate. As has been mentioned, the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee will investigate tourism and we intend to spend some time sampling some of the tourist delights. It will be hard work, of course, and certainly not a junket or a holiday. We will discover some of the things that the hon. Member for Blaydon mentioned.

I want to reinforce the final point that the hon. Gentleman made. If tourism is to be developed in Northern Ireland, it is essential that we put the past of terrorism and criminality behind us. The Government and everyone in the Chamber have an important part to play in pushing those who are reluctant, and still look over their shoulders at their past and want to keep some connections with that past, towards democratic behaviour.

Tourism in Northern Ireland has the potential to achieve one of the objectives that the Secretary of State has rightly said is important if the economy of Northern Ireland is to develop. It will help to move Northern Ireland from public sector dependence to a greater emphasis on the private sector. It is significant that tourism is now the fourth largest private sector employer in Northern Ireland, and it has great potential if we use the tools we have at our disposal to help it to grow even more.

The magnet for tourism, of course, is the city of Belfast. Nearly 70 per cent. of those who come to Northern Ireland come through Belfast and stay there at some stage. We have to recognise that if that is the magnet, attention should be paid to that part of the market. However, I represent a constituency on the edge of Belfast that opens up a different dimension, away from weekend city breaks—towards the natural heritage of Northern Ireland along the Antrim coast and the glens, the built heritage of Carrickfergus with its historic castle, walls and churches and the associated pageants, or the natural heritage, coastline and wildlife and opportunities for bird watching, walking and so on presented by the Antrim glens.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry pointed out that there is an east-west dimension to tourism. The town of Larne, which I represent, presents the gateway to the western coast of Scotland, through which nearly 600,000 people come every year to Northern Ireland as tourists. That is an important link that needs to be developed. It is significant that the strategic transport plan published recently by the Scottish Parliament does not even mention that gateway and that link. That is one of the reasons why we must emphasise the importance and potential—not only for us but for Scotland and the north-west of England—of that gateway and the way in which it can help develop tourism in both parts of the United Kingdom.

However, there are a number of issues that need to be addressed, and the first is promotion. Two thirds of the budget spent on promoting tourism goes to Tourism Ireland, which promotes the island as a whole but does not specifically promote Northern Ireland. I have no doubt that there is a need to promote both Northern Ireland and southern Ireland on the international stage and I also accept that many people who come to southern Ireland will eventually come to Northern Ireland. The flaw is that with no specific reference to Northern Ireland in much of the promotional material, on which two thirds of the budget is spent, a huge gap is left. It is significant that if there is to be any specific reference to Northern Ireland in the promotional material, extra money has to be paid. We have not sufficiently grasped that.

The Northern Ireland Tourist Board does its own promotion of Northern Ireland, of course. On top of that, local councils do some promotion. That creates a difficulty, which I find in my constituency with people who have bed and breakfasts, for example, or hotels. Much of the private sector is at the small business end of the economy. Those people do not know who to go to. Which agency should they focus on to promote their product? Should they go to Tourism Ireland, the Northern Ireland Tourist Board or their local council? At what level should they pitch and promote their particular facilities? That needs some attention.

Of course we need an overall strategy, and I believe that that is best done by the big agencies that operate on a world-wide platform. Once that platform has been created, we must look at ways of outsourcing it so that it is friendly to particular areas in Northern Ireland. The review of public administration and the creation of larger councils offer an opportunity to do that, and I see no reason, other than perhaps job insecurity, why the Northern Ireland Tourist Board should not outsource the promotion of what is available locally to the larger local authorities. That at least would provide a local connection between the small businesses involved in tourism and the local agencies, which are better placed to know what is available.

As my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry pointed out, because much of the development and growth of tourism takes place in rural areas, it can be environmentally sensitive. That tends to create difficulties in applying for planning permission. In the last three weeks there have been instances of such difficulties in my constituency. For example, an individual who sells fishing licences—fishing is a big tourism sector in Northern Ireland—operates in a small village off the main road, but bureaucracy in the Roads Service prevents him from putting up a sign pointing to where people may get a fishing licence so that they can enjoy that aspect of tourism. For the same reason, bed and breakfasts off the main road are also prevented from highlighting their location.

We have to be sensitive to that. There might be regulations, and we do not want road sides cluttered with a host of signs, but if we are to promote tourism, agencies such as the Roads Service in Northern Ireland need to be more sensitive to the need to promote businesses in that way.

Then we come to planning. Only last week, I spoke to someone who had diversified from farming into holiday cottages, had turned three of the farm outhouses into holiday cottages and was booked up throughout the year—even in the winter. That person wanted to add another cottage, but because of the area in which it would have been placed, even though it was within the curtilage of the farmyard, they were having to fight the planners. Again, the authorities were applying the planning rules too rigidly rather than considering the potential for further diversification in the countryside, and the further promotion of alternative sources of employment now that farming is in decline, especially in some of the hill areas.

A major project involving a disused quarry just outside the town of Larne in my constituency is fighting for planning permission. A company plans to build a cycle track of international standing and provide various ancillary and associated activities that could attract thousands of people to the area, but already there are planning difficulties. We need more sensitive planning policies if we are to develop tourism, as well as proper training, especially in the hospitality sector. Without that proper training, we will drive tourists away. Those are some of the issues that need to be addressed. Tourism is an important sector of the economy and it must be allowed to grow. I hope that the Minister will pay attention to some of the points made here today.

10.4 am

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): I join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on securing this debate. He is my constituency neighbour; indeed, he has the very proud honour of being my constituent. Like me, he lives in a city that should be very attractive as a tourist destination and has great ambitions and aspirations in that regard. It is a city that is well located in a river valley and has much history, some of which the hon. Gentleman touched upon. It is luckily located, with the giant's causeway not very far away on one side, with all that the causeway coast and beyond has to offer, and Donegal and all its riches on the other side. It also has everything that the Sperrins and Erne areas of Fermanagh and Tyrone have to offer. As a tourism region, the north-west of Ireland has much to offer.

In taking forward the opportunities for tourism, we must examine all elements of the tourism industry, including what makes successful tourism experiences in other parts of the world that we visit and in other parts of these islands. As someone who holidays not on the continent but throughout these islands, I am constantly struck when visiting the south-west of England and the south-west of Ireland by the ease of reference from one amenity to another, and by the constant cross-promotion of information on all the different amenities and events. That can be compared with the difficulty that many visitors to Northern Ireland have in finding out even what visitor amenities and attractions are within a 20 or 30-mile radius of where they are staying. There is a lack of integrated information and promotion to give people a good, effective, attractive tourism experience. Too often tourists are left to do much of their own work in finding out what is there.

Councils and others at a local tourism level have been trying to do something about the problem, as have the regional tourism organisations in recent years. They have tried to sell not just one isolated location but a whole region, so that people have plenty to occupy them and a range of experiences over a period of days. Unfortunately, the regional tourism organisations have had their funding cut. They have now been replaced by regional tourism partnerships, which the Government tell us will have a wider brief, but which will also have smaller budgets.

If we are to gear up our tourism and all the sub-regions are to play their part, it is hard to see how they are meant to do so with diminishing Government funding and the loss of some of the European money that has supported tourism projects and initiatives introduced as part of the peace programme, under the heading of seizing the opportunities of peace. There are issues that the Government need to address. It is all very well to produce documents that highlight the room that exists to grow the tourism sector, and show the relatively low tourism figures in Northern Ireland compared with other parts of the UK and the Republic of Ireland, but expansion will not happen unless we invest in it.

[Mark Durkan]

The hon. Member for East Londonderry and others raised the role of Tourism Ireland. As one of the people involved in the package of decisions that led to the creation of that company, I stress that it was created not as some sort of political gesture or gimmick but as a marketing company to enhance tourism marketing for the island of Ireland as a whole, and bring more tourists to it. We must all work hard to ensure that tourists who come to the island experience all that it has to offer. It is not just Northern Ireland that believes it sometimes misses out on the tourist traffic that comes to Ireland. Many of the counties in the south, above the Dublin-Galway line, feel that they too miss out, and that not enough of the coach tours take in enough of the whole island. That is not Tourism Ireland's fault; the southern half of the island simply has a well-beaten tourist track and a much more developed tourism infrastructure. That is all the more reason for us to invest more in our infrastructure in the north of the island, and particularly in Northern Ireland.

Some hon. Members present were recently in Killarney, at a meeting of the British-Irish Inter-Parliamentary body.

Mr. Campbell: As tourists?

Mark Durkan: They would probably count in the tourism statistics. [Interruption.] I am sure that Kerry will find a way of counting them as tourists—they are cute at that sort of thing in Kerry. However, the town of Killarney has more hotel beds than the whole of Northern Ireland, which tells us something about the scale of the opportunities that we are missing out on. Given that level of supply, and all the attractions in Killarney, it is obviously not Tourism Ireland's fault that foreign tourists very much want the south-west of Ireland to be part of their experience. We must therefore ensure that we build up our infrastructure, amenities and accommodation so that people know that is worth while being up in the north-west and other parts of the north of Ireland.

As we manage tourism in government terms, we must also tackle the disparate way in which so many tourism issues and visitor attractions are dealt with. When Departments were created on devolution, some of us proposed that tourism should be part of the brief of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure, but others argued that it should stay with the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Our hope and understanding was that the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment would deal with the hospitality sector—that is, hotels—and with selective financial assistance, but that the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure would take responsibility for co-ordinating tourism amenities.

Some heritage sites are with the Department of the Environment, while other attractions for tourists and local visitors, such as some of the forests, are with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. Many visitor amenities are owned by councils, while other amenities and interpretive centres are owned by arm's length companies, and community and voluntary bodies. They all have very different opening policies, and there is a lack of a clear, integrated information system. The idea was that the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure would marshal resources and deal with that side of things, but that never happened, and we have all missed out quite a lot since. There are therefore things that we need to rationalise and fine-tune if we are to determine which parts of the Government relate to and take responsibility for which parts of our tourism potential.

In all this, there is also the question of developing the tourism work force. One problem is that many people do not see the tourism sector as offering a long-term career. In addition, many business players in the sector feel that if they invest in work force development, somebody else or somewhere else will simply poach the fruits of their work. There is therefore a disincentive to such investment, and we need to look at how we can develop and improve our tourism work force properly, because the lack of investment clearly comes through in the tourism experience and perhaps sometimes leaves people who come to parts of Northern Ireland feeling a little less satisfied than they do when they go to other places.

Northern Ireland also needs to understand that as we grow tourism, the tourist trade will include not only the hotels and the bars but the small shops, the cafés and everything else; they are all part of selling the area and providing the information and added direction. Again, we need to develop that sense of awareness. In all that, the Northern Ireland Tourist Board and regional tourism partnerships have a strong role to play.

It is wrong for people to create a false tension between the role of a regional body such as the tourist board and the sub-regional bodies, such as the tourism partnerships, and the clear international marketing role of Tourism Ireland. Working all such systems and networks together, we can increase the number of tourists and ensure that they go away with positive experiences and, in turn, bring in more tourists.

Hon. Members have referred to signage. I agree with the hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson); people with small businesses who are stepping out and saying, "Yeah, we're going to take the risk and invest in the tourism potential of this place," should not find themselves rationed to one brown sign, and having to pick which of three or four perhaps very relevant roads it will be on. That is simply nonsense; people should not lack such basic support and co-operation.

We need to remember that growing our tourism industry will involve a lot of small firms and individuals diversifying, not least in rural areas. As they choose to diversify, make that investment and take that risk, people should not be handicapped by needless regulation and controls, without the assistance that—given all the noises that they hear from all the politicians, not least the Government—they have every right to expect.

I look forward to hearing about how the Government intend to address some of the budgetary issues of tourism support and the Northern Ireland Tourist Board's spend in the south of Ireland at the minute. Never mind marketing Ireland north and south together through Tourism Ireland; Northern Ireland has a very ready market to the south.

The Northern Ireland Tourist Board's spend in the Republic of Ireland was reduced this year and last, yet big money is about to flow into households in the south of Ireland, as the special savings incentive accounts are maturing. Big money is going to come in; there will be big disposable incomes. People are looking to spend the money in different ways; one has only to look at the Irish newspapers to see how many ads there are for this, that and the other, all based on that big money boost. We could bring in some of the money that is floating about there if people from the south come to Northern Ireland as tourists. But what are we doing? The Northern Ireland Tourist Board's tourist promotion budget in the south is being cut. That seems utter folly.

Again, I ask the Government to think again about how they can better assist what they say they want to assist through sensible and accommodating budgeting.

10.19 am

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): I, too, welcome the new Minister. This is her first encounter with us in an Adjournment debate, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on securing this one.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) spoke well about tourism in Northern Ireland. He has a reputation—a very decent one, I have to say—for being keen on motorcycles. Your predecessor was given the offer of a lifetime: to jump on the back of my hon. Friend's Harley Davidson—[Interruption.] My understanding is that she was about to take up the offer, but then—[Hon. Members: "She was rescued."] She was moved, and my hon. Friend was very disappointed because he had thought that the two of them could sail off into the sunset along the coast of East Antrim and away round by Larne. As I said, we would give you an insight—

Mr. Eric Martlew (in the Chair): Order. I am not interested in going on the back of a motorbike, although the Minister may be.

David Simpson: We could give the Minister an insight into tourism at first hand.

I will be brief; I just want to raise a number of points—more bullet points than anything else—on tourism. Because Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom, I believe that we should emphasise the British link more. The British tourism market is worth £74 billion annually, and that is rising, whereas the tourism market in the Irish Republic is worth a mere €4.5 billion. While it is certainly worth getting a slice of that, there is more to be gained by promoting in tourism the Britishness of this part of the island, to get a slice of the £74 billion.

I also wish to emphasise a couple of points to do with the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, relating to the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry. In 2005 London attracted 27 million visitors with a spending power of more than £9 billion—far more than the value of the entire Irish Republic tourism industry. It is time that the Northern Ireland Tourist Board started promoting the London link and heritage of the city, to tap into that lucrative and growing market. The Northern Ireland Tourist Board has on its website a map of Northern Ireland which depicts the city of "Derry" and refers to the "Walled City of Derry". Astonishingly, it also states that the city of Derry is also known as Londonderry, when it should in fact address the city by its proper title of Londonderry, and state that some locals refer to the city by the nickname of Derry. It is wrong that the Northern Ireland Tourist Board does not give Londonderry its proper name, and that should be rectified immediately. There is also no mention on its site of St. Columb's cathedral, which is a massive tourist attraction. That is another thing that the Northern Ireland Tourist Board should examine and rectify.

We should redirect money from politically driven north-southery to invest in the Northern Ireland infrastructure. I believe that between 2005 and 2008 the Government plan to spend some £30 million each and every year on seven separate north-south bodies such as Waterways Ireland, the Foyle, Carlingford and Irish Lights Commission and the Food Safety Promotion Board. I ask the Social Democratic and Labour party to join the Democratic Unionist party—not literally, but in calling for savings and efficiencies—

Mark Durkan: Do a David Ervine?

David Simpson: Yes, that would make news.

I ask the SDLP to join the DUP in calling for savings and efficiencies in the north-south set-up to help fund the Northern Ireland infrastructure. There can be no justification for continuing to spend more than £30 million a year on what is basically a political project aimed at mollycoddling nationalists and republicans. Millions of pounds can be saved from the cross-border budget. Why should roads and railways suffer because money is needed to run bloated cross-border bodies?

I turn now to the international airport in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea). I am sure that he will discuss that point, but I want to refer to it briefly. Secure access to Heathrow is vital for the economic development of Northern Ireland. The Government need to take action and seek changes to the EU rules that will allow protected access to secure the long-term future of our air link.

Northern Ireland recently enjoyed some good news on the air front: new routes have been introduced. They are welcome, but not all the travel needs of passengers will be met, which is why our links to Heathrow remain so important. It provides a gateway to the rest of the world on a scale unmatched by any other UK airport. Our location and lack of direct air services to destinations outside the UK mean that Heathrow is essential for local passengers and businesses—but in recent years, the daily number of Belfast-Heathrow flights has decreased from 15 to just eight, and that situation must be addressed.

Despite all the problems that Northern Ireland has had, we remain a warm and friendly people. In saying that, I am referring not only to members of my own party but to the wider spectrum of the community. We have a great future in tourism. As has been mentioned, we had a meeting yesterday in the Assembly in Northern Ireland involving the Business Alliance. It gave us some startling figures: over the next 10 years we will have to create about 140,000 jobs—an average of 14,000 a year, which will be difficult to achieve. That figure relates to the people who are already up and coming, and does not include people coming from other countries who will try to get jobs. The tourism side can help in that process. As many Members have said, we have work to do, but we are looking forward to it and I have every confidence that the people of Northern Ireland will achieve that aim.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Eric Martlew (in the Chair): Order. I would like to start the Front-Bench wind-ups at about 10.35 am.

10.27 am

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Martlew. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on securing this important debate, and I join other hon. Members in welcoming the Minister to her new responsibilities. I look forward to working with her.

I shall not go over many of the arguments that have been put, but I want to deal briefly with several issues. It is a pleasure to listen to the comments made by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan). I was born in the city of Londonderry, so I have a fond attachment to that part of the country. My parents live in County Fermanagh, in Ulster's lakelands, so I have good connections there as well. In respect of the tourism industry in Northern Ireland, I have good connections all over.

As a Belfast Member, my prime interest and responsibility relates to the city of Belfast. It has been mentioned that Belfast is the regional driver for tourism in Northern Ireland, and that is very much the case. Visitor numbers have risen between 1995 and 2005. While the number of overnight visitors to Northern Ireland has increased by 19 per cent. during that period, the corresponding figure for Belfast increased by 95 per cent. In those earlier days, Belfast was a byword for troubles, difficulties and all sorts of things, so we are starting from a fairly low base, but those figures show the extent to which it is a major driver in the tourism industry, especially for weekend and overnight visitors who come to the Province.

There is enormous potential. In 2005, it was estimated that Northern Ireland's tourist industry was worth £350 million, whereas the Irish Republic's was worth £2.3 billion. That shows the discrepancy that exists, and hon. Members have mentioned some of the reasons for it—the well-developed infrastructure and all the rest of it. There is enormous potential for the development of tourism to create jobs and economic regeneration in Northern Ireland.

I understand that Dublin is the third most visited city in Europe, in terms of weekend visits and so on. Belfast is coming up the list, but we should be attracting far more visitors to the city. On that front, I am concerned that the Belfast Visitor and Convention Bureau—one of the main agencies that can help to attract visitors to the city—faces a £1 million cut in funding. I would like the Minister to consider that, because clearly that cut will make it more difficult to attract visitors to the city. That needs to be addressed.

For comparison, 4 per cent. of the Republic of Ireland's gross domestic product is tourism; for Scotland the figure is 6 per cent., and for Northern Ireland it is 2 per cent. We need to develop a vision for tourism in Northern Ireland. Reference was made to the debate in the Assembly yesterday, led by my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson). In that debate, there was mention of the difficulties caused by the large public sector in Northern Ireland, and the challenges that Northern Ireland faces, with the decline in manufacturing industries and so on.

Tourism has enormous potential to create the jobs needed in Northern Ireland, but that potential will not be reached unless we create a real vision for tourists, and unless we market and invest in the tourism product in Northern Ireland; that has not been done sufficiently. Colleagues and I recently had a meeting with the Northern Ireland Tourist Board. We discussed in detail some of the products that need to be developed, and particularly some of the issues mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry, such as the whole issue of the Ulster-Scots heritage. Frankly, I am extremely disappointed with the approach that has been adopted. Not enough has been done to develop the tourism product, and much more work is needed.

On the investment in marketing, reference has been made to Tourism Ireland, and clearly there is a role for the international marketing of Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic. Tourism Ireland markets the island of Ireland abroad, in places such as Australia, America, Japan and the far east, but what causes me concern is the enormous amount of money going into tourism from Northern Ireland. By 2007-08, Northern Ireland will be putting £22 million into Tourism Ireland's budget; that is one third of the overall budget. Two thirds of the budget comes from the Irish Republic, as has been mentioned. By 2007-08, the entire budget for the Northern Ireland Tourist Board will be £11.1 million, yet £22 million is going into funding Tourism Ireland from Northern Ireland.

I recognise the need for a marketing exercise along the lines that have been described, and the role that Tourism Ireland plays, but given that hon. Members have talked about the need for investment, we need to think about this. We cannot sustain so great an investment in Tourism Ireland while investment is cut in other areas, as the hon. Member for Foyle mentioned. The Belfast Visitor and Convention Bureau is suffering cuts and the Northern Ireland Tourist Board has an insufficient budget. There needs to be more balance, and I appeal to the Minister to look into the issue carefully.

The money—it will be argued—goes into bringing people to Ireland, and so goes into bringing more people to Northern Ireland, but the fact is that only 20 per cent. of people coming to Ireland come to Northern Ireland, and most of that 20 per cent. spend far less time in Northern Ireland than in southern Ireland. I say strongly to the Minister that we need to think again about this. There is a need for investment in marketing the island of Ireland, but in my view things are not properly balanced. There is far too much money going into Tourism Ireland, as opposed to developing the tourist product and the tourism marketing of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board.

Finally, 2012 is coming up. The Olympics have been mentioned, but it is also the Titanic anniversary, so it is absolutely vital that the Government get a grip on the issue. Recently, I was at a meeting with the Minister's colleague, the Minister for Social Development, about the return of the Nomadic. I very much welcome the fact that it has been purchased and saved for the city of Belfast, and will be brought back there soon. It is an important part of the Titanic package, which I hope will encourage many visitors to come to Belfast in 2012. A £25 million lottery application for the Titanic project is under way, but I strongly urge the Minister to get a grip on the issue, because at present there is no Government commitment whatever to core funding for that project or indeed for any of the main signature projects that are part of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board's remit. That needs to be grasped, because we have a tremendous opportunity before us.

Cities such as Cork and New York are developing strategies to capitalise on the Titanic anniversary, but Belfast should be synonymous with it: it should be the place that people will not leave out of their Titanic itinerary. It has to be marketed, and that needs investment. I appeal to the Minister to consider that very strongly.

Dr. McCrea: We all have that vision, and want to get lots of tourists into Northern Ireland, which is absolutely correct, so how can it be acceptable that the international airport, to which people come from across the world, has no official train link to the centre of Belfast? Is it not time that that infrastructure was put in place?

Mr. Dodds: I agree, and I would encourage as many links to and from Belfast as possible, as it is the gateway from which people should be persuaded to visit other parts of Northern Ireland.

10.37 am

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on securing the debate. He is right to focus on the important issue of tourism, which has the potential to make a significant contribution to Northern Ireland's economy—perhaps greater than that of any other single industry.

Northern Ireland has a great many tourist attractions and it has a great deal to offer in that respect, from the new Titanic quarter in Belfast to the giant's causeway and the spectacular scenery in between. Heritage and environmental tourism also have great potential. Yet despite those attractions, Northern Ireland has done much less well from tourism than the rest of the United Kingdom or the Republic of Ireland. Given the recent history, it is understandable that tourists have been reluctant to travel to Northern Ireland, but the great progress that has been made in recent years has opened up tremendous potential.

It should not be an unrealistic ambition to increase significantly the number of visitors coming to Northern Ireland each year, thus increasing the revenue produced by the tourism industry from the tourist attractions themselves, and from bed-and-breakfast accommodation, restaurants and so on.

We should compare Northern Ireland with the Republic of Ireland, which has done tremendously well from tourism in recent years, attracting 6.5 million visitors annually. Tourism expenditure in the Republic of Ireland doubled in real terms during the 1990s and visitor numbers increased at twice the world growth rate. Tourism is definitely an area in which north-south co-operation can be strengthened and enhanced, which can only benefit Northern Ireland.

For tourism to succeed and grow, every opportunity should be taken to attract potential visitors to Northern Ireland. Government have a role to play in publicity and in the education system, which must ensure that the vast range of service providers are equipped with the necessary skills and knowledge to satisfy the needs of a range of potential visitors from different countries and cultures, with a host of diverse backgrounds and languages.

The Government have a role to play, too, in providing transport infrastructure for visitors to get to Northern Ireland and then to travel around. I declare an interest: I represent the constituency on the British mainland that is closest to Northern Ireland. Hon. Members mentioned the links with Scotland, which are extremely important. It is also important for hon. Members and the Government to think not only of the link eastwards from Larne to Stranraer but the link northwards from Antrim to Argyll. There is a shared heritage between Argyll and Northern Ireland—not only the Ulster Scottish but the Gaelic heritage. Christianity was brought to Argyll by St. Columba sailing from Ireland, so there is a series of common heritages.

A ferry service ran between Campbeltown in Argyll and Ballycastle in Northern Ireland for three years between 1997 and 1999. That popular service was operated by a private company under a strange contract awarded during the dying days of the Tory Government. It was strange because the company was given the ship as long as it operated the contract for three years. Of course, the inevitable happened. When the three years were up, the ship sailed away and the company used it elsewhere. It was a publicly owned and publicly paid for vessel, the Claymore, which was formerly operated via the publicly owned Caledonian MacBrayne. That was certainly a lesson in how not to award shipping contracts. They should be awarded on the basis of an annual subsidy, not by saying, "Here's a ship; after the end of the contract you can sail away." It was a big disappointment when the contract came to an end after three years.

Efforts to restore the service have been made by the Scottish Executive and this Government, and by the Northern Ireland Executive, when they were in existence. They have come very close, but never quite got there. The Scottish Executive have the lead role in that, but I hope that the Minister will be able to inform us of the current position.

Although Governments have a role in developing tourism, it is important that it should flourish in the private sector. It is important that there is confidence in the private sector to invest, and that tourists have the confidence in it to come. Both tourists and private sector investors must be confident that Northern Ireland has a peaceful and stable future, and that crime and terrorism are things of the past.

It is also important that we re-establish the Assembly and the Executive, so that Northern Ireland is once more seen by the rest of the world as being in a normal situation. It also goes without saying that a local Minister living in Northern Ireland, elected by the people of Northern Ireland, is far better able to judge what investment is required than any Minister appointed from this House. It is important that Assembly Members ensure, over the next six months, that the Assembly and the Executive are re-established. I am convinced that if the rest of the world sees Northern Ireland as having a stable and peaceful future, tremendous potential from tourism can be realised.

10.43 am

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) on securing the debate, and welcome the Minister to her new responsibilities. She could have had no better introduction to the very pleasant side of her Northern Ireland Office responsibilities than the description of the delights of all parts of Northern Ireland that hon. Members from Northern Ireland have painted. I expect that the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) will have told her a number of ways in which she can enjoy herself there—even on the rainiest of days.

Two themes have come through in the debate. First, that tourism offers tremendous opportunities for the Northern Ireland economy, and secondly that both the industry and Government have responsibilities to do their best to turn those opportunities into jobs, investment and prosperity. The industry has clear responsibilities to improve marketing and to seek to drive up standards of service at all times. It strikes me, from my anecdotal experience of travelling, that tourists are becoming more choosy. They want not only to see the best attraction described in a brochure or on a website but a high standard of service. If it is not delivered to them adequately they will not come back, and they will advise friends and relatives not to visit that destination.

The industry needs to focus on what tourists want from a visit to Northern Ireland. In some cases, it will be opportunities for family breaks, long weekends and so on. Other packages might include an island of Ireland tour, which would probably require thinking in terms of north and south. The reality is that an American or Japanese tour group will have limited time to spend on the island, and that time limit will mean that they will want to scoot around to different destinations as quickly as possible.

There may be a future for more golfing and fishing packages that are marketed on a north-south or Scotland-Ireland basis. A Scotland-Ireland distillery tour could well be promoted as a non-seasonal or winter activity.

There are responsibilities for the industry, but clearly there are also responsibilities for the Government. I shall touch quickly on several issues that I hope the Minister will address as she gets to grips with her new brief.

The first relates to a point made by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) about the need for co-ordination within Government. The Federation of Small Businesses in Northern Ireland recommended that if devolution is restored there should be a junior Minister with specific responsibility for tourism. At present, responsibilities are divided among different Departments and agencies. The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment has a target to raise the annual visitor spend in Northern Ireland, but the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure, the Roads Service, the Planning Service and the Department of the Environment all have responsibilities, and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development has an interest in promoting farm diversification. It is important to co-ordinate not just the budgets of the various Departments and agencies but their forward planning and ways of setting their various priorities, so that tourism does not always slip to fifth or sixth place in each Department's list. There must be a regional focus on the importance of the industry.

Connected with that is a point made by the hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson). We must remember that most tourist businesses in Northern Ireland are small, family-run businesses. People do not have time to search through acres of paper or pages on Government websites to find out what needs to be done, so how the Government disseminate best practice in an easily accessible form must be an important part of the strategy.

Improving transport infrastructure is of continuing importance. The point has been well made about the lack of rail links not just from Belfast International airport but from Belfast city. There are no direct rail links into the city centre, and anybody who has been stuck behind a tractor on the road between Dungannon and Enniskillen knows that there are some serious bottlenecks in the Northern Ireland road network that need attention.

A wealth of projects represented by promoters seeking Government financial support will compete for the Minister's attention. I hope that the Government will be able to push forward the pace of decisions on the proposed international sports venue. There has been a perfectly reasonable debate about the best location for it, but a sports venue that is able to host major international fixtures would be a big tourist asset. The promoters of the Ulster canal regeneration bombard me with letters from time to time, and I suspect that that is another project that will find its way on to the Minister's desk.

There are opportunities, but there have also been warnings in some of the Northern Ireland Audit Office reports. The experience from well-intended projects such as the Navan centre in Armagh, to which many hopes were pinned, is that money can be spent with good intention but customers may not come in. I return to my opening point: every decision that is taken about tourism in Northern Ireland must aim to provide what the customer wants to spend his or her money on.

10.50 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Maria Eagle): This has been an excellent debate, and a great one with which to start so early in my time as Minister with responsibility for such issues in Northern Ireland. I congratulate the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) not only on securing the debate—it is awkward enough to get time for debates in Westminster Hall—but on putting his points so coherently, forcefully and clearly.

I always try to deal at least with some of the points made by the Member who initiated the debate. Ministers never have enough time to deal with all of the many points that arise in these hour and a half debates, but I undertake to write to Members concerning any points that I omit to address. It is clear to me that most of the Members in the Chamber today are not as new to this as I am, and I have enjoyed hearing from everybody about the many attractions in Northern Ireland that should be pulling in tourists. I have no doubt that Members from all parties, regardless of any divisions, will agree that Northern Ireland has fantastic potential as a tourist destination, and agreement on that is a pretty good place to start.

The fact that we are starting from a low base gives us a chance to move quickly. There is no reason why we cannot start moving toward the position in which Northern Ireland would have been in the absence of past disadvantages and difficulties, and that should be the aim. There is significant potential for further growth, and notwithstanding the success of recent years we should not rest on our laurels. We should go further and faster to translate the potential into reality, because that reality can mean jobs for local people, increased business activity and increased balance between public and private sectors, all of which are tremendously important to the future of Northern Ireland. I see the responsibility for that as one of the most important that I have acquired in my new role, and I shall focus on it a great deal.

In 2005, there were some 2 million out-of-state visitors to Northern Ireland. That is quite a number—more than the number of inhabitants. It is a landmark that needs to be built on and a significant achievement. Visitor spending from that group topped £354 million, with a further £146 million spent by local people holidaying at home—it is not only visitors from outside who offer potential. The latest quarterly employment survey showed that more than 51,300 people were employed in the tourism and leisure sector, which represents a significant number of jobs for the local population. There is already improvement, there is great potential, and we should progress a lot further.

As the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) and several other Members mentioned, if Northern Ireland is to compete effectively in an international and increasingly global travel and tourism market, there must be knowledge of what customers want. We must match what is available in accordance with that principle, so that the available products are marketed as well as possible. Getting the products right and marketing them properly is the key to best performance.

I was interested to learn that some 69 per cent. of overseas holidaymakers to Northern Ireland use the internet when planning their trip; 65 per cent. actually book their flight or ferry online, and a further 27 per cent. book their accommodation online. We must ensure that we move with the trends in how people book and plan their trips—it is no good having lousy websites, and products that can be marketed only in the traditional way. We must be up to date, and it is important that Tourism Ireland and other institutions promoting tourism on the island of Ireland seek to achieve that.

I want to deal with some of the points raised by the hon. Member for East Londonderry, because this is his debate. He referred to the Smithsonian folklife festival. I am sure that we would all agree that that has enormous potential for showcasing the delights of Northern Ireland. We have until next July to get it right, but we need to get moving sooner than that if we are to do so.

I asked officials to let me know what benefit Scotland had gained, having had the same honour. The results were impressive, and I am glad that officials from the Northern Ireland Departments are talking with their Scottish counterparts to ensure that they learn the lessons that Scotland learned and do not miss any tricks, but exploit the opportunity to the full. Some 10,000 key travel prospects attended lectures on Scottish holidays, 44,000 people logged on to the VisitScotland website for travel information and key members of the international industry attended events in Washington. All of them now know far more about Scotland and visiting Scotland than they knew before. We have to ensure that the activities that we undertake this time next year present Northern Ireland with similar opportunities. We must design what we do to maximise those opportunities, and I intend to ensure that we do that.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, the 12 July celebrations and the Orange Order, and made some points about tricks that might be being missed, and commemorations and cultural displays that are not being properly exploited as products for visitors. I think that he said that the NITB treats some of those events as unavoidable irritants. I hope that he will accept that more links have been made recently in order to improve on what he sees as a poor record. Meetings have taken place between the Orange Order and senior NITB officials to attempt to ensure that the situation improves, so he should in future feel able to say nicer things about the efforts that are being made. Certainly, the main event on 12 July is now on the visitor website. Lots of people decide whether to visit on the basis of websites and what they see online. We hope that there will be improvements in understanding and better links, and therefore better marketing of all appropriate events in future.

I should like to say a word about the Ulster Scots traditions, on which several hon. Members commented. There were concerns that the tourist potential of those traditions—part of the culture of Northern Ireland—is not being exploited to the full, particularly among people in the United States of America seeking information about their family history. I am aware that there have also been a number of parliamentary questions. I have answered some and had a look at others. The Ulster-Scots Agency has made a contribution towards marketing materials that

[Maria Eagle]

Tourism Ireland and the Northern Ireland Tourist Board have produced specifically to try to market that sector. Again, I will not argue at this early stage that that has been exploited to the full, but I will say to the hon. Gentleman that we clearly recognise that there is an opportunity that has not been exploited, and we are determined to do more in relation to that tradition. I hope that in due course he will be satisfied that things are improving in that respect.

Many hon. Members, including the hon. Member for East Londonderry, made the point that Tourism Ireland should be looking east-west rather than just north-south. I heard what was said about money and resources, and about the focus of the institutions, whether Tourism Ireland or the Northern Ireland Tourist Board. Tourism Ireland's targets for growth in visitor numbers and revenue are higher for the north than they are for the south. That might not answer all the points that were made, but it demonstrates that we recognise that the industry is less developed in the north than it is in the south, and that the gap needs to be narrowed. All the institutions, tourist boards and various bits of Government—

Mr. Eric Martlew (in the Chair): Order. We must move on to the next debate.

Places of Worship

11 am

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): It does not matter which county, town or city of England one chooses, there are beautiful, small, great, sometimes grand churches everywhere, and no two are alike. We see the magnificence of wool churches and the splendour of the perpendicular style, where the perpendicular nave is little more than a stone framework for a gorgeous blaze of colour in stained glass—a style adapted to a country where the sun is a friend to be welcomed. There are small Saxon churches, grim, solid Norman churches in the style of their heavy-handed conquerors, early English churches and decorated churches. As Jeremy Paxman observed last week:

"Church spires are the great punctuation points of the English countryside. For the religious buildings of this country not only tell where we are geographically, they tell us where we have come from.

They are often the only place in the community which has a living, visible connection with the past. They hotwire us into our history."

And as Sir John Betjeman observed:

"From churches blue with incense mist, their reredos' twinkle gold

Chapels of ease by railway lines, and humble streets with smells of gas

I hear your plaintive ting tangs call from many a gabled western wall

To morning prayer or Holy Mass.

In country churches old and pale I hear the changes smoothly rung

And watch the coloured sallies fly from rugged hands to rafters high

As round and back the bells are swung."

Our places of worship are frequently places of architectural importance. English Heritage has statutorily listed 14,500 places of worship, many of them mediaeval. I have initiated this debate to support the "Inspired!" campaign by English Heritage, which is supported by many denominations and faith groups—Anglican, Baptist, Catholic, Jewish and Methodist—and trusts and organisations such as Friends of Friendless Churches, the Historic Churches Preservation Trust and the Open Churches Trust. In a recent letter to me, the Minister made it clear that he and the Government agreed

"about the importance of church buildings both as a focus for local communities and as an important part of our National Heritage and in vital services."

The Minister went on to observe:

"The forthcoming English Heritage 'Inspired!' campaign will be vital in providing information that will help the Government, churches and English Heritage itself in deciding where support would be most effectively targeted."

And he concluded that he was excited by English Heritage's campaign and would certainly be looking carefully at the results.

There is no ambiguity about what English Heritage is saying to the Government. Ministers do not have to wait; the facts are stark. Thousands of churches and other places of worship are crumbling and in danger because of a multi-million pound shortfall in funds needed to keep them standing. In its briefing for the "Inspired!" campaign, subtitled, "Securing a Future for Historic Places of Worship", English Heritage makes it clear that

"new research which English Heritage has just completed shows that although congregations valiantly managed to raise £67 million each year, the yearly amount actually needed for repair and maintenance is £185 million. That means there is a staggering £118 million annual shortfall which English Heritage and other grant making bodies simply cannot fill."

I recently undertook a survey in just one small part of my constituency, the Deddington deanery. I asked for an estimate of what parishes thought the cost of repairs and maintenance would be over the next five years. Adderbury church, which is a very fine parish church, of which John Piper did a very beautiful picture, will require £250,000. Banbury St. Mary's, which is a grade I listed church in the centre of Banbury, estimates that it will need £220,000.

I visited St. Mary's last Friday with the vicar, Janet Chapman, and the area dean, Ben Phillips. It is a magnificent church, built in honey-coloured Hornton stone, with a green copper cupola. The difficulty is that the copper on the cupola and the lead that seals the stone expand and wear at differing rates, so leadmen are now on the church roof in Banbury repairing the lead. Of course, with any of those exercises, there are now considerable and understandable associated health and safety costs.

It is estimated that Bloxham parish church, which Simon Jenkins considers to be architecturally one of the best 1,000 parish churches in England, will need £100,000. Indeed, Bloxham only recently had to spend approximately £85,000 on repairing the spire, which can be seen at 4 o'clock on Sunday in a programme on television about steeplejacks, starring Tony Robinson of "Blackadder" fame.

I shall not take hon. Members through every church in the Deddington deanery, but the total came to £1.5 million: that is what the community needs to raise over the next five years simply to maintain the fabric of buildings of considerable historic interest in one deanery in one county. English Heritage estimates that the cost of repairing all England's 14,500 statutorily listed places of worship would be £925 million—almost £1 billion over the next five years.

English Heritage is making some extremely modest requests of the Government. The thrust of its campaign is about understanding the problems of the need to repair crumbling churches and taking action before crisis is reached. That crisis is approaching—it will strike, perhaps not this year or next year, but certainly in the near future. English Heritage has a five-point plan, which I commend to the Minister and invite the Government to support.

English Heritage wants to make places of worship fit for purpose in the 21st century by reforming heritage protection legislation. It is asking the Government for a one-off payment of £2.52 million to allow it to rewrite outdated list descriptions for all grade I listed places of worship. The Government's own planning policy guidance observes:

"Generally the best way of securing the upkeep of historic buildings and areas is to keep them in active use."

The best way to secure the future of churches of historic and architectural significance is to ensure that they remain, if possible, living buildings at the heart of communities—visited, valued and enjoyed by all. As with any other listed building, a balance must be struck between changing patterns of use and the protection of the special architectural and historical interest for which the building has been listed. St. Mary's in Banbury, for example, is at the very heart of the town and is now used for public meetings, concerts and exhibitions.

Sensibly, English Heritage wants to develop partnerships between everyone concerned, to encourage planning ahead and a positive rather than reactive approach to the management of church buildings. English Heritage is asking the Government for £8 million a year for three years for various purposes. Those purposes include helping congregations to help themselves by appointing advisers in denominations who can offer support and expertise, helping communities and congregations to understand the repair priorities, and then helping individual congregations to make the most of their buildings.

Another use for the funding would be to create a maintenance grant scheme to shrink repair bills in the longer term. English Heritage wants to start a new maintenance grants programme to help the congregations that are least able to fund maintenance themselves. For example, the diocese of London is undertaking a private study in the City of London of the benefits of a centralised gutter clearance service, so that the gutters on all churches in the diocese, as well as vicarages and church halls, can be cleared twice a year. The diocese employs a contractor to clear the gutters and downpipes and check the drains, and while on the roof the contractor also undertakes emergency repair work such as fixing slipped slates. A simple checklist and digital photographs are used to show the condition of the roof and gutters and even hard-to-reach places, providing good information about what repairs are required. That is sensible "a stitch in time saves nine" work.

The funding could also be used to maintain a joint English Heritage and Heritage Lottery Fund repair grant scheme and augment it with a small grant scheme. The joint English Heritage and Heritage Lottery Fund repair grants for places of worship scheme is the largest single source of funds for repairs to listed places of worship in England. It gives out £25 million a year, but it is 100 per cent. over-subscribed. Government funding for English Heritage has remained static and, as a consequence, so have its grants schemes. The allocations from the lottery to the Heritage Lottery Fund have also declined, and although it continues to help places of worship with other grant schemes, English Heritage and the Heritage Lottery Fund help fewer congregations each year. English Heritage is therefore modestly asking the Government for an extra £4 million a year for three years, to start a grant scheme to help those congregations that are most in need to carry out smaller repairs. With that extra £4 million, they will be able to double the number of repair projects that English Heritage can support each year.

Lastly, English Heritage wants to make sure that safety nets are in place for redundant places of worship. It is an inescapable fact that, although four out of five people express a religious affiliation, the number of active worshippers has fallen. That, together with demographic changes, means that some areas have more places of worship than the remaining community can support. Some of those buildings are conveyed to the Churches Conservation Trust. Yet, since 2001, the trust's funds have been frozen, while, in the same period, it has been given responsibility for another 12 churches, most with big repair bills. The Friends of Friendless Churches, a small charity set up to save disused places of worship of architectural and historic interest from demolition, has already helped to save 100 churches and chapels in England and Wales. Not unreasonably, English Heritage is calling on the Government to reinflate funding of the Churches Conservation Trust as the main safety net for redundant Church of England buildings that are too architecturally and historically important to be deconsecrated.

In all, English Heritage is asking the Government for the incredibly modest sum of slightly more than £26 million over the next three years. I hope that the Minister will not consider me churlish if I put that sum into context by pointing out that it is almost exactly the same amount as the Home Office squandered and threw away on the costs of the preparatory work of building an asylum centre in my constituency, where no actual work was done—not a single sod turned, not a stone erected. The sum that English Heritage is requesting is modest indeed.

In fairness, I acknowledge that the Government have recently demonstrated their concern about historic places of worship. In the 2006 Budget, the Chancellor decided to extend further the scheme that means that churches are, in effect, spared the cost of VAT on repairs. I think that everyone who is concerned about a future for historic places of worship would thank the Chancellor for extending the scheme that refunds VAT to those important buildings. However, as English Heritage research has shown, much more needs to be done to avert a crisis.

The Government do not need any further information. In a letter to me in March, the Minister said that the "forthcoming English Heritage 'Inspired!' campaign will fill some of the gaps in our current knowledge of the extent of the problem and enable Church and Government to plan effectively for the future."

Well, there is no ambiguity in English Heritage's briefing. It is asking for a modest amount. I hope that the Ministers will shortly be able to confirm that the Government will support English Heritage's campaign in full, but even if the Government do everything that English Heritage wants, more will still need to be done. There will be work for congregations and for communities.

In my village of Bloxham, for example, we have set up the Friends of St. Mary's—a group of local people who recognise the considerable importance of the church as a building of significance in the life and landscape of the village. In the past three years, it has raised approximately £30,000 for the repair, maintenance and fabric of St. Mary's church. As Simon Jenkins observes:

"Bloxham is a steeple, a window and a chapel. The steeple is a work of art in itself, early 14th century and the finest in Oxfordshire. The octagon and spire rise 200 ft. almost sheer from the road. Every surface of the tower is carved! Below the parapet is a frieze of men and beasts. The West doorway arch has carvings of the apostles in small niches. The masons seem to have usurped all conventions and set free their imagination."

He further observes that Bloxham, like many churches, has had things of beauty added over the centuries so that

"the last phase of Bloxham's development came with Street's restoration and employment of Morris & Co. to the glass. The chancel and interior is largely Street, as are the pulpit, choir stalls and marble reredos. The chancel window glass is an early masterpiece by Morris, Burne-Jones and Webb. It depicts saints, angels and King Alfred set before the heavenly city. The colours are bold and the effect dramatic. Even more lovely is the vividly coloured window of St. Christopher in the South wall of the chancel which was executed in 1920 to a Burne-Jones design."

The debate is not simply about English churches. The issue should be of concern to every Member of the House whether they represent city, suburb or countryside. English Heritage launched its "Inspired!" campaign in St. Mary Magdalene, Paddington, which is regarded as an exceptional grade I example of high Victorian gothic. Perhaps because of its proximity to the Grand Union canal, incoming waters threaten the church's internal decoration.

Colleagues do not have to wander far from the House to find London churches that are breathtaking in their beauty. We can see the galleries at St. Martin-in-the-Fields, which are a normal feature in Georgian churches; the lavish asphodel sanctuary of St. James the Less in Pimlico; the heavy Norman piers of St. Bartholomew-the-Great; Inigo Jones's St. Paul's in Covent Garden; St. Augustine's in Kilburn, which is one of the most important Victorian churches in London; All Saints, Margaret street in Marylebone, which has breathtaking panel painting of Victorian polychrome; as well as St. Alfege in Greenwich, St. Giles in Camberwell, St. Barnabas in Dulwich, St. Mary in Rotherhithe, St. Anne in Limehouse and Christchurch in Spitalfields. Every town and city has churches of significance and value. Those should not be crumbling; they should be a real asset to the community in which they are found. We have a collective duty to save our historic churches from rot and ruin.

Not surprisingly, in an article in The Guardian last Friday, Simon Jenkins observed that "the English parish church nationwide" is a

"dispersed museum of history, art and architecture".

Everyone who cares for England and for our heritage should consider paying a small amount for the upkeep of a local church or making a donation to a national charity that cares for places of worship. Even if one is not in a position to make a monetary contribution, many hundreds of people contribute to the upkeep of churches of historic significance by helping with fundraising, mowing the grass or simply keeping the furniture dusted and the churches polished. Our churches and places of worship—whether church, mosque or synagogue—are a shared treasure, a shared heritage and a shared challenge. I am sure that the churches and communities can rise to that challenge. It would be good if the Government could lead the way.

I conclude with a poem written by Andrew Motion, in support of English Heritage's "Inspired!" campaign:

"In the mind's eye, in the memory-store, for now
The church sets sail but stays where it was built,
Its anchor hooked into the parish-heart.

In the green yard, in the deep grass, for now
Each summer-tide swells up and leaves the dead
Untouched inside their plots of tilted earth.

In the flint nave, in the window-shafts, for now
The glassy saints grow limber with the sun
That ripples through their robes and walk again.

In the blind vault, in the dry hush, for now
The coffins hoard their argosies of dust
And darkness gleams as definite as light.

In the slow years, in the centuries, for now
The villagers arrive to load the ark
That saves their lives and settles here as home.

If, as a nation, we do not respect and preserve our past, what is our future? It is through the churches of England that we learn who we were and thus who we are and who we might become. If we lose that learning, we lose the collective memory that is the essence of us all.

11.17 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy): I thank the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) for securing this debate. It is not often that we hear the poet laureate quoted in full in the hallowed corridors of Westminster, and we are all grateful. This is, as the hon. Gentleman will know, an issue of great importance to me, both as the Minister with responsibility for culture and on a personal level.

Let me start by making it clear that the Government fully recognise the importance of our historic churches. Historic places of worship are an invaluable part of this nation's heritage. They represent the finest of our historic buildings and are showpieces of the most accomplished design and workmanship. From Canterbury cathedral, to the Shah Jehan mosque in Woking, or the historic Cheltenham synagogue, they help to tell the story of this country in a way that no other group of buildings can, and they are a vital part of teaching us about who we are and where we come from.

Beyond that, historic places of worship host an array of vital services that are often forgotten, ranging from nursery groups and lunch clubs for the elderly in our communities, to many sporting activities after school and on weekends for our young people. They can only do that thanks to the armies of volunteers attached to churches. The Church of England alone constitutes the largest voluntary organisation in the country and is present in every part of England. With that importance in mind, the Government have in place a range of policies and funding designed to support our historic places of worship.

We ensure the protection of historic churches through the listing system. More than 45 per cent. of grade I listed buildings are churches. The heritage protection reforms that we intend to introduce in the coming years will make that protection system work more effectively for owners, managers and users of those buildings. We provide substantial funding to contribute to the upkeep of historic places of worship. Funding already in place from Government and lottery sources will total around £60 million this year.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, congregations carry the large burden of dealing with the repair bills of our parish churches for leaky roofs, broken windows, repointing and so on. That is why we created a unique scheme to tackle the problem: the listed places of worship grant scheme. A unique scheme within the heritage sector funding system, it returns the VAT paid on repairs to listed places of worship. Approximately 8,000 churches have benefited and more than £43 million has been paid out since 2001 to those churches. The scheme provides an average of £1 million a month to support those churches and it is important that that is on the record. In the Budget, the Chancellor announced that the scheme would continue until 2011 and would be extended to cover professional fees and repairs to clocks, pews, bells and organs. That extension and extensions to the linked memorials grant scheme mean that £70 million of new money has been committed.

Alongside that targeted help on VAT, another major part of the funding that is already in place is the joint repair scheme for places of worship operated by English Heritage and the Heritage Lottery Fund. That scheme is worth around £25 million this year, and with this year's grant has paid almost £90 million since it began. This year, the repair scheme will, for example, enable St. Mary's, Tunstead in Norfolk to repair its magnificent 15th century arch-braced roof: £136,000 has been offered as a grant.

In addition, my Department provides £3 million a year to support the Churches Conservation Trust, which looks after the finest of the churches that are no longer needed for regular worship. The trust does an excellent job of conserving the 335 historic churches in its care and is increasingly giving consideration to how its churches can be opened up for greater use by local communities.

English Heritage gives £1 million a year for cathedral repairs. The £40 million given under the scheme since 2001 has seen a major backlog of repairs in our cathedrals all but eradicated. In addition, the Heritage Lottery Fund puts more money into churches for repairs, new works, conservation, treasures and events. Including its contribution to the joint scheme, the HLF has put £300 million into church and cathedral buildings since 1994. Approximately 9 per cent. of all the money given by the HLF goes to our historic churches and faith buildings.

Our support for historic places of worship is not only about the heritage protection system and direct funding. It is about trying to reflect the needs of those buildings in wider Government policy making. That is why my colleagues in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs have been looking at the contribution that faith buildings make to community cohesion in rural areas. Funding such as the £12.5 million faith communities capacity funding is in place to support churches and to empower local people. All of that will help to keep those buildings alive and in use.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that, by any analysis, that is a substantial package of support and one of which the Government should be proud. Of course, there is always more to be done and the hon. Gentleman highlighted English Heritage's "Inspired!" campaign that was launched last week. English Heritage's research is extremely valuable and improves our knowledge of the state of repair of our national church buildings. The hon. Gentleman will have seen, for example, that the diocese of Oxford has been shown to have a large number of churches in need, although that diocese also has the most churches of all the dioceses in England. That information is enormously helpful and we would like that sort of approach to be taken with a wider range of historic buildings.

We also welcome the English Heritage pilot studies and capacity-building activities, both planned and ongoing, which will help to inform debate in the coming years and show whether funding is appropriately targeted. As English Heritage's work makes clear, we need an effective partnership between Government, church denominations, heritage specialists and the public.

The challenge facing us is not small. Church buildings' estimated repair need is considerable. As I said, we are helping the churches to meet that challenge through a comprehensive package of funding; but we need to move forward and we must do so together. Our assistance can only be partly about money. It is also about giving church organisations access to support networks and advice at national, regional and local levels. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that too many congregations remain isolated from that information and advice. We need to improve our knowledge of what works to keep churches in use, and consider innovative ways to keep churches as living buildings in their communities. "Inspired!" will help towards that.

It is clear that although some dioceses and parishes are able to spread good practice and move forward, to maintain their buildings and move forward, and to apply for grants from English Heritage or the Heritage Lottery Fund and move forward, others remain more isolated, have less capacity, and are less able to do that. We must tackle that problem together.

Tony Baldry: English Heritage has asked for £26 million. We are just about to start another spending round, and bids will be made to the Treasury. Will the Minister give the House some indication of whether his Department will press the Treasury for the money that English Heritage has requested as part of that spending round?

Mr. Lammy: As any Minister would say, one does not give funding commitments when one is entering the spending round. Now is the time for dialogue and discussion about what are the significant issues. By any analysis, the £130 million that we give English Heritage as a non-departmental public body is a large sum. The organisation has been able to find efficiency savings to put back into the front line, it has responded to a quinquennial review, and a peer review is approaching. The Government will certainly take that work forward as we enter into the spending round.

As English Heritage has pointed out, and as the Bishop of London recognised when he spoke at Synod in February, the work is not for the Government alone. The churches face a major challenge to galvanise further support. We are told that 89 per cent. of the population visited a place of worship during the past year, and we know that even non-churchgoers have an affiliation and affection for the village church. Churches need to capture and capitalise on that support.

I know that hard-pressed volunteers work miracles when it comes to fundraising, as well as undertaking vital community services. We need to consider whether church buildings can be enjoyed in new ways—as visitor attractions, educational resources, or centres of community activity—all of which open up alternative routes for funding. We need to discover whether existing community services and new alterative uses for churches can attract new sources of funding, and we must ensure that they get that funding.

We in Government will continue to listen to and work with the denominations and faith communities, as we seek to secure a sustainable future for our historic churches. I look forward to working with the hon. Gentleman on that in the coming years.

UK/Poland Relations

2.30 pm

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): Thank you, Mrs. Anderson, for allowing me to introduce the debate. I am pleased that you are in the Chair and I look forward to you chairing our proceedings over the next one and a half hours.

It gives me great pleasure to open this debate on Anglo-Polish relations, which is a subject close to my heart. I shall give a historical account of the Anglo-Polish relationship and then I shall give a SWOT analysis—SWOT is an acronym that we use in business; it stands for strengths, weaknesses, opportunities and threats—of the current Anglo-Polish relationship, consider how we can improve the relationship and examine some of the opportunities that it provides. Towards the end of the debate, I shall put to the Minister a proposal for a strategic UK-Polish partnership that would challenge the Franco-German axis, which has run the European Union for far too long. That axis has been so powerful that it has ultimately decided much of what the EU has done over the past 50 years.

I passionately believe that the United Kingdom—the fourth largest economy in the world and a major military power—has the opportunity, within my generation, to become the leading partner in the EU and to take control of the future strategy and vision of the EU. However, it needs strategic, key allies—junior partners—in order to be able to play that leading role. Poland is one of the key allies that I believe we need.

I would like to inform the Minister of how excellent the British ambassador to Warsaw is. I met Mr. Crawford last December during a brief visit to Warsaw. He represents our country extremely well. He is not frightened to put forward our stance. He does not suffer fools gladly and he does a very good job in being quite strong with the Polish Government and protecting our interests.

This is a topical debate. This week's newspapers tell us that 350,000 Poles live in the United Kingdom. Many of them are young people—people of my age; I still consider myself relatively young at 34. They are also professionals. Many of them are highly skilled people who have finished university degrees and have come here to work and contribute. Nearly all the new national health service dentists in Shrewsbury have come over from Warsaw. The local primary care trust invited me to have dinner with them and to talk to them in Polish, as it was trying to encourage them to settle in Shrewsbury and become NHS dentists in my town. Many other Poles are plumbers, builders and decorators, and they do a great deal for this country.

I was dismayed, irritated and angry to read what was said by the chef Antony Worrall Thompson. The rather diminutive Mr. Worrall Thompson—I think that that is the most polite term I can find to describe him—was rude and condescending about Polish people in this country. He said that they spoke poor English and were poor waiters. I believe that they are very hard-working people, and I hope that the Minister will say when he responds to the debate how hard-working they are and how wrong Mr. Worrall Thompson is to criticise them.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): I would not want us to be seen unduly to criticise Antony Worrall Thompson, who is, after all, a distinguished supporter of the Conservative party, because he did subsequently recant, and God loves a sinner who repenteth. The expression that he used—rather grudgingly, I suspect—was that the Poles "work incredibly hard".

Daniel Kawczynski: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, whom I know from our time in Ealing. He has a large Polish community in his constituency, is well informed about Polish affairs and represents his Polish constituents extremely well. I am glad for that clarification, but I was irritated when I read the article.

Stephen Pound: As were we all.

Daniel Kawczynski: Indeed.

I have been examining the figures for the trade between our two countries since the fall of communism in 1989. As the Minister will know, Anglo-Polish trade is growing at a huge pace year on year and has reached more than £1.5 billion. British companies are making massive investments in Poland, and one has to go only to downtown Warsaw to see the number of British supermarket chains that have set up in business there. When one goes round Poland, one sees that British companies are at the forefront of investment in oil exploration, petrochemicals, building and agricultural supplies and of the effort to rebuild the country, which was left in a difficult position after the fall of communism.

The two countries also work closely in the European Union and have a good partnership. When I speak to MEPs in my area of the west midlands, such as Mr. Bushill-Matthews, they inform me that Polish MEPs and British MEPs work together closely on many issues and have very similar opinions about EU regulations and legislation.

We are fighting side by side in Iraq, and Polish soldiers are fighting to maintain peace in a region close to the British sector. Yet again, we are fighting side by side, nation next to nation. There is a long tradition of Polish soldiers fighting alongside British soldiers. That was certainly the case in the battle of Britain and at Monte Cassino and Arnhem. Today, we again see British and Polish soldiers fighting side by side.

Speaking as somebody of Polish origin, I find it difficult to think of a time in the past 100 years when Britain has not come to Poland's aid. I sometimes think that we in this country do not blow our own trumpet enough, because Britain has done more for Poland than any European country has. I am proud of that, and we should all remember the lengths to which this country has gone over the past 100 years and before to help Poland in good times and bad. We should be proud of our stance.

Centuries ago, Poland had a large empire, which stretched almost from the Black sea to the Baltic—Poland was a powerful country. It entered a union with Lithuania and was the major power in central and eastern Europe. Unfortunately, it was invaded by its neighbours and gradually lost much of its empire, to the extent that it disappeared from the face of the map. By the first world war, there was no Poland. After the war, the treaty of Versailles enabled Poland to come back into being. I raise that because it was the British empire that insisted in 1918 that there should be self-determination for the Poles, among other nations. The British empire ensured that Poland was recreated from the lands that were stolen from her by the Germans, Austro-Hungarians and Russians.

Early in the morning on 1 September 1939—I feel very emotional about this—when the German tanks crossed the border, Britain and the British empire came to the aid of Poland. We did not have to, but we did. We had a treaty that in the event of invasion, Britain would come to Poland's aid: it was a far away country, yes, but we had that treaty and we fulfilled our pledge. We had much at stake, and there followed five years of war for our own country—the bombing of our cities, the near-destruction of Coventry and the loss of thousands of civilian lives and those of our soldiers. It all started because this country acted honourably in her commitment to help a smaller, far away European country.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): During this passage of the hon. Gentleman's exposition of the history of Poland, would he also like to remember the contribution made by Polish air force and navy personnel during the world war, including in the battle of Britain and in defence of Britain with their navy and defensive convoys? That contribution is fondly and well-remembered by many people throughout the United Kingdom.

Daniel Kawczynski: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention; I was going to come to that. There are accounts that one in five airmen in the battle of Britain was Polish. The Poles certainly played a huge part in the battle. When one talks to some of them, one discovers that they did so because they had lost their country to the Nazis. They were almost kamikaze-like during the battle of Britain because they had nothing to lose and were determined to fight against the Germans because their country was occupied. They played a significant role in the defence of this country, as did many other eastern Europeans, such as the Czech pilots.

Stephen Pound: The hon. Gentleman is being extremely generous in giving way and we will try not to trespass on his generosity and kindness.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) is too modest to mention that he is the son-in-law of Commodore Wronsky, who commanded the Beyskwycza, which sunk the Bismarck. That is something that many other countries prefer to forget, but those of us who love Poland greet it with glory and pride.

In addition to his comments about Polish heroism in the navy and air force, which is beyond parallel, will the hon. Gentleman mention the forces of General Anders, the work in Monte Cassino and throughout northern France and the numerous occasions when Polish heroism saved British lives?

Daniel Kawczynski: I concur. The Poles fought in Arnhem with the British and played a leading part under British command at Monte Cassino in liberating that bastion along the spine of Italy, which ultimately led to the downfall of the Mussolini regime.

I am extremely proud of that; that is why I have kept my very difficult-to-pronounce surname. As I said in my maiden speech, when I was in business many people said to me, "You must be mad if you think you're going to get into the House of Commons with a surname like that. You should change it and anglicise it. Dump that name and get an English one." I refused to do that. I feel extremely proud of my beloved grandfather and the many Poles who fought with the British during the war. It goes to show the sort of people the British are that they are prepared to elect someone with a totally unpronounceable surname as their MP. I am proud of my Polish background, and that is why I have kept my name.

Forgive me, Mrs. Anderson, for that slight deviation. As I said, the British empire came to Poland's aid in 1939. Unfortunately, after the war, communism descended on Poland. As Winston Churchill said, the iron curtain descended in Europe from Szczecin in the north to Trieste, and those countries were sealed up and locked away from the rest of us for more than 50 years under communist tyranny and dictatorship.

Solidarity was crushed in 1981 when General Jaruzelski imposed martial law. There were tanks on the streets in Warsaw in December 1981. People were repressed and the full communist apparatus swung into action to destroy the uprising that was initiated by Lech Walesa and thousands of brave Poles on the streets of Warsaw.

I was a child at a school in Surrey and we collected food parcels of coffee, tea, tinned fruit and all the little luxuries that the Poles did not have because there was martial law, the borders were sealed and the economy had collapsed. That happened not only in my school in Surrey, but throughout the country. School children and parents gathered food to send to Poland to help the Poles during martial law. That is another amazing example of how Brits want to help Polish people.

During those communist days it was illegal to listen to the BBC World Service in Poland. Anyone caught doing so would be punished severely by the authorities. Yet many Poles in the quiet of their homes, late at night and with the curtains drawn, tuned in to the World Service. It was a great comfort to them.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): Would my hon. Friend agree with an early-day motion that I tabled late last year on the closure of the World Service Polish language service? I am not passing comment on the economics of that, but it seems a good time to have a memorial to all of those from the eastern European countries who were involved in the World Service for those 50 years. Would he agree with my call for a memorial?

Daniel Kawczynski: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. The cutting back of the World Service in that area is regrettable. The Poles listened to the World Service clandestinely. It was so important because they could hear on the airwaves that there was an alternative to communism, that there were free people out there beyond those borders and that there were democracies and an alternative lifestyle.

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): And jazz.

Daniel Kawczynski: Yes, and jazz, and all the other clichés like jeans and whatever. There was an alternative lifestyle to the communist dictatorship. The only political point that I will make—it is not really political but it is important—is that in the 1980s people like Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan finally stood up to the brutes in Moscow like Brezhnev and Andropov. The Poles love Margaret Thatcher because they remember that she stood up for freedom and democracy throughout the world. Even today in Poland, Baroness Thatcher is held in high regard for the role that she played in the ultimate destruction of communism.

After the collapse of communism, Britain again was at the forefront of helping Poland. Britain fought to ensure that Poland was able to join NATO so that it could be under that umbrella of military nations that would guarantee its security. When a country has been invaded as many times as Poland has been and its borders have been mucked around as many times as Poland's have been, being part of an established military pact like NATO is extremely important. Once Britain had secured membership for Poland within NATO it was at the forefront of ensuring that Poland became a member of the European Union.

Britain was a key to expanding the EU to the east. It was one of the few EU countries to admit Polish workers. That is an amazing point, on which I should like to reflect for a moment. Great Britain has always gone along with the ethos and spirit of the EU, and I give credit to the Labour Government for that. They decided that, because the 10 eastern European countries were coming into the EU, their workers should have the same rights as those from other EU countries. France and Germany, and many of the other EU countries, would not allow that and wanted to treat the Poles as second-class citizens. They said that yes, they could join the EU, but they did not want them working in their countries. What sort of relationship is it to have a second-class nation within a group? A country is either a full member or it is not. If memory serves, only three countries allowed Polish workers in at the beginning, and Great Britain was one of them. It was the only major EU country to allow them in.

Stephen Pound: Ireland.

Daniel Kawczynski: The hon. Gentleman mentions Ireland, but I would not necessarily classify Ireland as a major EU power, important ally though it is.

Poland realises the solidarity of Britain and attaches great importance to us. I am convinced that it sees us as the future leader of the EU. I met the President of Poland, Mr. Kaczynski—his name is identical to mine except for a 'w'—when he came to meet the then-leader of my party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), in 2003. I was party to their talks. Mr. Kaczynski was then the leader of his political party, but now he is the President of Poland. He spoke to me in this very Palace and said, "We see Britain as a key strategic ally. We are looking towards you. We are looking towards you in the United Kingdom for leadership and vision within the European Union. If you make a bold stance, grasp the nettle and take control of the direction of the EU, we will be behind you." Those were the words of President Kaczynski. I hope that the Minister will take them on board.

I return to the Franco-German axis. I feel passionately that there must be an alternative to the current Franco-German vision of the EU. I was born on the day on which Edward Heath took us into the EEC—24 January 1972. My generation has never had a say in the relationship that we have with other EU countries. I am convinced that my generation of politicians will ultimately make a big impact on how the EU is run. We will forge alliances with countries such as Poland, finally to take on the Franco-German vision of the EU.

These are warm words, and they are good, but we need to tie the Poles in.

Dr. Howells: I am enjoying the hon. Gentleman's speech immensely. He has reminded us of the way in which, as he rightly put it, Poland's borders have been messed around with for so long. Without good relations with the French and the Germans, which is the great rationale for the EU, those borders would stand a chance of being badly messed about with again. The hon. Gentleman should not be too hard on the Franco-German alliance.

Daniel Kawczynski: I shall try my very best, although I have my personal views.

I have spoken warm words, but I want to hook the Poles with a fishing line into our orbit and our sphere of influence. That is why I wish to come to the nub of what I want to communicate to the Minister. I was very disappointed with the Poles over the recent European Union rebate.

In my estimation, Britain has never, ever let the Poles down, yet on the critical issue of the United Kingdom rebate, which Mrs. Thatcher fought so hard to secure in 1984 from President Mitterrand and others, the Poles let us down badly, despite all the support that we have given them. I say that as someone of Polish origin. They were so determined to get hold of extra investments from the European Union that they fell for the French and German interpretation and decided that the best way to do so would be to get rid of the UK rebate.

I am disappointed with the Poles on that score. Rather than sacrificing the UK rebate and demanding more money from Great Britain, which is one of only two net contributors to the EU budget, there are many other ways to increase funding for eastern European states: for example, greater efficiency in respect of the money that the EU already spends, less corruption within the EU and greater management of its resources.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. He is being rather hard on the Polish who, like ourselves, have a strong national identity and will fight for their own interests, quite properly. It was the French failure to reform the CAP that let down the EU.

Daniel Kawczynski: Perhaps I am being a little hard on the Poles, but I have to balance my argument; I cannot say only nice things about them as I want the Minister to take what I say seriously. Every relationship has strengths and weaknesses, but the Poles should have looked for an alternative as far as the rebate is concerned. I was disappointed that our Prime Minister capitulated and gave up our UK rebate. I was hoping that the Poles would help us to retain it.

If the Minister is made aware of the two or three key things that the Poles are interested in, and if we get under their skin, know what they want and show them that we understand their priorities, perhaps they will look at us not just metaphorically but in real terms as their No.1 ally and as people with whom they should associate and be close partners. The Minister said that I must not be too anti-German and I have to be careful what I say, but there are sensitivities. [Interruption.] I will come on to the anti-Russian bit in a minute; that is another ball game.

I want to discuss the oil pipeline from St. Petersburg to Poland, which the Germans want to build. Why do I raise that issue? I want to look at the Minister—into his eyes—and say, with all my heart, that there are undoubtedly sensitivities left over from the second world war. Many Poles alive today could tell the Minister horrific stories about life under the occupation. My grandmother is one of them; an 81-year-old lady who lives in Warsaw and suffered under the Germans.

My wife bought me some video tapes of the second world war recently; I watched sections 2 to 7 and missed out the first, because it was on the invasion of Poland in 1939. I could not bring myself to watch that video because it was too painful for me, and I am speaking as a 34-year-old who was born years after the second world war.

As a child, I sat on my grandfather's lap and listened to him describing what the Poles had been through, not just in 1939, but for the five or six years of occupation. When I finally watched the first videotape about the invasion of Poland in 1939, I saw the German soldiers come up to the border post, snatch from it the symbol of Poland—the white eagle with a crown—and throw the symbol on the ground. And then the tanks rolled over.

Hundreds of thousands of Poles were killed in that invasion. I feel very emotional about it even today and I find it difficult to speak about it, so I shall move on. I mention it, however, because I want the Minister to be aware. He may think, as do some English people, "What on earth is he talking about? It is such a long time ago and he is over-dramatising it."

Dr. Howells: The English might.

Daniel Kawczynski: I must tell the Minister, however, that the raw emotions persist, and they need to be understood. Recently, the Polish Minister of Defence, Mr. Sikorski, referred to the pipeline and said, "We are very sensitive about German-Russian pacts." That is not surprising, because the last one was the Molotov-Ribbentrop, the pact that carved up Poland. It is important for British Ministers to understand the sensitivities and emotions involved, because they exist and they are raw. As long as there are people still alive who lived under German occupation, or grandchildren of such people—like me—nobody should forget what happened back in 1939.

Germany intends to build a pipeline from St. Petersburg to Germany, which will bypass Poland and the Baltic states. That is outrageous. When I went to Warsaw, Minister after Minister mentioned it to me. They said categorically, "We are in the European Union, and the EU is all about a cohesive uniform strategy." Even the EU energy commissioner has lambasted the Germans over the proposals. We are living in sensitive times when the Russians are turning off gas supplies, and when there is great sensitivity over energy resources generally. In that context, it is outrageous that the Germans can somehow ignore their neighbours and build a huge pipeline under the Baltic sea to provide themselves directly with gas and oil from Russia, despite being part of an EU that is trying to cobble together a pan-European policy.

That proposal goes against the spirit of the EU and against the interests of Germany's neighbours, and Polish Ministers feel extremely strongly about it. When the Minister speaks, I hope that he will assure me that he will use his office and prestige in Europe, not to mention the respect within which he is held in Europe, to rebut Germany's position on the pipeline and present a critique of it. If a country like the UK is prepared to stand up for Poland and say to Angela Merkel, "No, we are not prepared for you to go against the spirit of the EU in this way", that would resonate hugely, not only in Warsaw but in capitals throughout eastern and central Europe.

I have spoken for some time, so I shall come to my second and final issue, which is the Katyn forest. This is the anti-Russian bit.

Stephen Pound: With some justification.

Daniel Kawczynski: Indeed.

Katyn forest is something that is very close to my heart, because my own family suffered in the massacre that took place there. During the 1939-40 invasion of Poland, the elite of the Polish military—the generals—and the elite of society were taken to a forest where tens of thousands of them were massacred by the Russians. They were ploughed down with sub-machine guns and killed. Stalin said that the way to control a country is by cutting off its head. He hoped that he could control Poland by destroying the elite of Polish society and the military generals.

The massacre was devastating to Poland, but even today—I recently had dinner with a gentleman whose parents were also involved in that massacre—the file on this issue has not even been opened. Many families are struggling to come to terms with the deaths of relatives and dear ones who were killed by the Russians in the Katyn forest in 1940. I ask the Minister to look into this issue. That will cost him and the Government nothing. I am not asking for money to be spent: I am asking the Minister to use the UK's power and influence to put pressure on the President of Russia, Mr. Vladimir Putin, to open the KGB files on the massacre. That would resonate greatly with the Polish authorities, and would show them that we are interested in helping them to lay the ghosts of the second world war down to rest in peace, and in establishing a modern relationship.

I have outlined two important issues, which I hope that the Minister will address. I have been in the House for more than a year now, in which time I have tended to focus on my constituency—I try as hard as possible to focus on my constituency. However, it has been a great pleasure for me, as someone of Polish origin, to highlight the passion that I feel for Poland. I am passionate about Poland working with the United Kingdom, those two countries coming together, and building a new Europe together.

Several hon. Members rose—

Janet Anderson (in the Chair): Obviously, a number of hon. Members wish to speak, and I will try to fit them all in. We would normally move towards the winding-up speeches at about 3.30 pm but, with the indulgence of Members, I think that we can allow a bit of flexibility to try to get everyone in.

3.8 pm

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Thank you, Mrs. Anderson. Before I make much of the truncated version of what I would have liked to have said [Interruption.]—I mean no criticism of the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski)—I tell the Chamber that my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) would certainly have wanted to be here this afternoon, but his mother died last week. I am sure that, as one of our few Members of Polish origin, he would have wanted to be present, and that, were he here, he would have had the sympathy of us all.

I sincerely congratulate the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham on securing the debate. He towers above many of his contemporaries, both physically and intellectually. I knew him well when he fought—extremely well—a neighbouring seat to mine in Ealing. His reputation followed him to Shrewsbury and Atcham, where it blossomed into the achievement that we see today.

The hon. Gentleman described, in effect, three Polands, the first of which is the Poland of the heart, which has always existed, even in the period of more than 100 years in which there was no such physical entity. At that time, there was no geography of Poland, yet Polish language, culture, tradition and literature thrived, flourished and endured. In every part of the world in which freedom was fought for—from south America to the Paris commune to the Caribbean—there were the Poles. Every war of independence and freedom throughout the 19th century saw a Polish presence. That says much of the Poland of the heart, which endures even in the dark days.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the period of military rule under General Jaruzelski, when a man such as Father Jerzy Popieluszko, God rest and keep him, could be taken out and murdered by thugs at the behest of the state, his body dumped in a river, and it was hoped that that murder could be covered up. Despite all that, the Poland of the heart thrived, endured and flourished.

The hon. Gentleman also described the Poland of a few years ago—of the heroes of RAF Northolt and the invisible community with which I grew up. I saw people every Sunday in my church community in west London, yet had no idea that they were Polish. It was not until 1966 that Father Kazimierz, one of the first Polish priests in London who the hon. Gentleman will remember well, was part of the Polish millennium celebrations, which coincided with the world cup.

I recall that in those days, many of my Polish friends anglicised their names, and I give so much credit to the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham for refusing to do that. There were so many Pawels who became Pauls, Jans who became Johns and Krystynas who became Christines. I give the hon. Gentleman much credit for his pride in his name. At that time, many of my friends started to wear Union jacks. I said to them, "It's marvellous that you are all supporting England in the world cup", and they said to me quietly, "Well, yes, but actually we don't really want Germany to win". That was honest.

The Polish community was one of the hardest working, most decent, almost crimes free communities that I have ever known. That community is a credit, and not only to our country or the major areas of settlement—one thinks of the huge Polish community in Scotland that has settled in Glasgow, Edinburgh and Inverness. In fact, I think that four people of Polish origin have played football for the Scottish national team, although not with conspicuous success, but perhaps that was because of the other seven players in the team.

In my part of the world—west London—we have been blessed by the size of the Polish community in terms of urban concentration. We like to say, "After Warszawa and Chicago stands Ealing". The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) was formerly a distinguished councillor in the London borough of Ealing—a political opponent of mine, morning, noon and night—but a man whose respect for the Polish community will take second place to no man. He is here to endorse that. There is a risk of our being slightly sentimental about the Poland of that period, but justifiably so because no one who saw the occurrences at the Lenin shipyard and the birth of Solidarity, can be anything other than emotional.

The important thing that we need to discuss is the Poland of today and tomorrow—the current Poland. The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham referred to the 350,000 Poles who have come here and the 204,895 who have registered to work. Not everyone is delighted with that; a number of my constituents have complained vociferously about it. A number of plumbers and bricklayers who I know have said, "This is outrageous; these people turn up on time; they work all day; they finish when they are meant to; their vans never break down on the north circular; they never have suddenly to leave for a family bereavement; and they finish the work on time and on contract. How can the honest British workman hope to compete against that?" I like to think that the spur of the Polish workers will actually raise standards throughout the work force of west London.

May I address a stereotype? The new figure—the Bob the builder of the day—is Pawel the plumber. People speak of Pawel the plumber as if Poles come to this country to work in manual trades only. For every Pawel the plumber, there is an Anna the architect, or a Krystyna the cardiologist. There are Poles at every level, including dentists, as has been said. That is absolutely right. We think of Dr. Jan Mokrzycki, who is president of the Federation of Poles in Great Britain. He is a distinguished dentist who took one look at my teeth and refused me an appointment.

We must recognise that Polish people have brought skills of all levels. However, it is important that the House recognises that there are tensions between some in the older settled Polish community and some of the incomers. On Sunday, we celebrated the 20th anniversary of Our Lady Mother of the Church on Windsor street in Ealing—a Polish church opened in 1986. It was a packed church which now has seven masses on Sunday and has been run marvellously by the Marian Fathers over the past 20 years. The conversation there has been very much about the new and the old Poles. I like to think that Poles are Poles, whether they are new, third or fourth generation. It is important that we place on record in this place our appreciation of and respect for our allies who have been with us, shoulder to shoulder, over the generations and centuries. It is intensely important to mention that.

We have some difficulty in that one of my constituents, Mrs. Gill Rodican, has recently complained to the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis about notices printed only in Polish asking for witnesses to report crimes in Ealing. That is an example, I think, of insensitivity rather than of an inherent problem. I appreciate that it is not in the remit of my hon. Friend the Minister, but I shall certainly raise the matter with the commissioner, because if Polish on Polish crime exists and we need witnesses, those signs should be bilingual. They should not be only in Polish, because of the feeling of difference and strangeness generated, with which some people have problems.

Overall, Poland is now a major emerging trading partner with the United Kingdom. I pay credit to the economic and commercial department of the embassy of the Republic of Poland, particularly the Minister Counsellor Krzysztof Trepczynski, for the work that has been done, and to the Polish information and foreign investment agency which encourages that bilateral trade between us.

The UK and Poland are natural partners. We have a long history; we are family. We should be closer trading partners. I shall not follow the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham entirely down his road, which leads to an alternative to the Franco-German axis. I like to think of a European axis, involving all the countries. However, I understand entirely where he is coming from, and appreciate and respect his view. However, talk of new and old Europe is not helpful.

I like to think of Poland as Poland—it has emerged from the permafrost and the dark overcast skies of the communist era and is only now stretching its sinews and feeling the strength in its muscles, and giving voice to the huge creative urge that sustained it during the decades when there was no geographical Poland. Now in every aspect of its life—industry, the arts and commercial activities—a new Poland is emerging. The hon. Gentleman referred to British shops in Warsaw, Crakow and Gdansk, and even in Lódz. They are to be found throughout over Poland. That is the relationship of the future; it is a relationship of equals, which was forged in the heat of war and has been tested by adversity, but ultimately it is a relationship between two nations, based, I hope and trust, on mutual respect.

I shall not entirely endorse the comments that the hon. Gentleman made about the pipeline, because I am not sufficiently well versed in that subject. However, I look to my hon. Friend the Minister to continue to support and endorse the activities of the British chamber of commerce in Warsaw and the British commercial interests in Poland now, and to make life a little easier for the bilateral trade and commercial relationship between the two countries, with which there are still problems.

Above all, I do not think that it is unfair to ask my hon. Friend, at this time, so close to the anniversary of the Warsaw rising, to go—if he has any doubts as to the awful reality of what happened at Katyn—to Gunnersbury park in west London and stare up, as I know he has, at that great black granite obelisk that lists the names of the cream of a country's culture, slaughtered and stuffed in the ground. He will think, as I did, of two things: first, how Poland can never die. Where one Pole lives, Poland lives. No matter how many are slaughtered, that will never kill Poland. Secondly, he will think of the sheer length and breadth of that memorial column and the names and occupations listed.

I do not believe in debts of honour overriding everything, but if ever a country owes a debt of honour to its comrades this country owes one to Poland. Poland has suffered greatly. The United Kingdom and Poland can work side by side, shoulder to shoulder for a new, emerging, strong, commercially successful Poland, which will finally achieve the potential that every one of us knows lies deep within that rich soil.

3.20 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound), whose powerful speech touched this House. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) for what was a most impressive and wide-ranging speech. I shall be brief, and touch on only two issues. One is a general matter, and the other is a constituency matter relating to Poland.

I pay tribute to the members of the Polish community in Wellingborough. They live in the heart of Wellingborough, they are a most important section of our community, and they have their own Dom Polski club, to which I am kindly invited now and again.

I sit somewhere between the two Members who have spoken on the European Union issue. Of the £100 billion that British taxpayers have paid to the EU since this Government have been in power, only a small proportion is relevant to the expansion of the EU. I think that all parties welcome the EU's expansion.

We have, in Poland, an ally. We always talk about our special relationship with America, but we also have a special relationship with Poland. That is partly because of history, going back to the second world war, and partly because they share the same ideals and principles as us as a nation. They are hard-working, they believe in enterprise and they have a strong belief in their own national identity. However, they look outward on the rest of the world, they believe in free trade and they reject protectionism, and there is nothing that the so-called Franco-German axis can do about it.

The European Union is waking up to the idea that we should have an EU based on what the countries of the EU want, which is a single market and free trade, not protectionism and the protection of French farmers so that Africans lose out. We have common purpose with the Polish community and Poland.

The constituency situation that I want to raise is extraordinary, and I hope that the Minister will be able to help. I have not been able to find an answer to it through my inquiries with the Government so far. As we have heard, Polish people are allowed to work in this country. They have free access, and we were one of the few countries that granted it. In my constituency, most dentists, for whatever reason, have gone private. I have received a huge postbag from people complaining about it, but if one wants to find an NHS dentist in Wellingborough, one is sent outside the county. There is none available in my constituency.

A Dr. Chan, who is a leading dentist in Rushden, which is an important part of my constituency, rang me a while ago to say that he had a Polish dentist—fully qualified, with perfect English, so there was no problem on that ground—who wanted to work in Rushden under the NHS. It would have been of great benefit to my constituency, because a considerable number of people would have been able to get the NHS dentist treatment that they cannot get now. The primary care trust has refused to employ that dentist. I guess that it has done so on the ground of funding, but if all other NHS dentists have gone private, is there some way in which the Government can direct the PCT to employ a Polish dentist? It would help ease the dentistry burden in my constituency.

It seems that the rhetoric, which was discussed earlier, is not being realised in my constituency. There is a real issue, and I wonder whether the Minister could give any advice or help in his winding-up speech. In conclusion, it has been a great pleasure to sit in the Chamber under your chairmanship, Mrs. Anderson, and listen to two most powerful speeches.

3.24 pm

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): I cannot follow the powerful speeches that we have heard this afternoon, but it has been a great pleasure to listen to them, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on securing the debate.

In addition to the sentiments expressed this afternoon about the United Kingdom's historical relationship with Poland, and about how Poland has changed its face with astonishing success—being first on one side of Europe and then the other after the fall of communism—I wish to speak about our present and future relations with Poland. First, however, I shall reflect briefly on the extraordinary journey that Poland has made, and the terrible events that have happened there, as has been underlined in two powerful speeches. Indeed, despite the UK's experience of war during the 20th century, we would find it difficult fully to comprehend what happened in Poland.

My mother in law will later this year be the embodiment of the Polish congratulations song "Sto Lat!"—she will be 100 years old in the summer. She was born as a Russian subject, and she lived under occupation for the first part of the century. She became a Polish citizen in adulthood, and then again lived for seven or eight years under occupation. She arrived in the UK, having left Poland during the chaotic period immediately following the end of the second world war. She was welcomed to the UK as someone who had played a substantial role in her family and community, and she built a new life in the UK. She is now a UK citizen. Perhaps one person can encapsulate Poland's experience; it is a personal reflection of the events about which we have heard this afternoon.

Thinking of past relations between the UK and Poland and about how Poles, at crucial junctures in UK history, have given freely of their lives with courage and commitment can assist us in putting that relationship into context, I was pleased to see Poland join the European Union in 2004. I attended a meeting in Wroclaw shortly after Poland joined the EU to discuss a number of issues about Poland's future in Europe, and the lack of realisation among Poles about their country's significance as an EU player surprised me. In fact, its weighted EU votes give Poland the same significance as Spain. It is a significant and large player.

Although I do not entirely go along with the suggestions of the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham about the Franco-German axis, the way in which matters are discussed within the EU is changing rapidly, and one result of Poland's accession is that those discussion and alliances will inevitably be different. Having a strong friend within those discussions and alliances will be important to us in making our way within the EU. Indeed, Poland is to start talks on joining the eurozone in 2009, so it might not only become the significant player that I have described but join the eurozone before the UK. One might perhaps reflect on that for future reference.

It is also important for our relations with Poland to understand where it now sits in the EU. After all, Poland will potentially be a great asset when Europe comes to determine what happens next for the European countries beyond Poland's borders. Of course, Poland has unique issues in terms of its borders, because it not only borders several other countries that joined the EU in 2004 but has a long border with Belarus, which is, to put it kindly, one of the most enigmatic countries in eastern Europe. It also borders Ukraine. In addition, there is also the border with Kaliningrad, which will continue to give rise to complicated relationships and arrangements, and there is the question of how that will work its way through relationships with the EU. As an EU border state, therefore, Poland faces several significant issues, and it is important that we support Poland strongly in that role and understand those issues so that we can clarify them together. At the same time, the relationships that Poland can form with countries immediately outside the EU will be of great benefit to the EU and to us in particular.

[Dr. Alan Whitehead]

As has been mentioned, Poland is the UK's sixth largest investment market. The emergence of British shops and companies in Poland is not only significant, but has been greatly welcomed by Polish citizens. Poland is also this country's largest trading partner in central Europe. There are therefore real and serious issues in terms of trade and mutually beneficial bilateral arrangements.

As has also been mentioned, many Poles have come to the UK to work, following Poland's accession to the EU. Many of them have come to my constituency, although there has always been a large Polish community in the Southampton and Eastleigh area, and it continues to be of great benefit and assistance to the area. The community that is now emerging in my constituency and the wider Southampton area is industrious and, despite having been here only a short time, it is becoming increasingly coherent and is determined to make a positive contribution to the UK's economy. Although there are concerns about housing and services in the Southampton area—the same applies elsewhere—the contribution that the Polish community can make to the economy of our city and to the life of Southampton is overwhelmingly positive, and we should view it in that light.

My final thought is to welcome the further influx of Poles to Southampton through the doors of Southampton football club. Our club manager has recruited Bartosz Bialkowski and Grzegorz Rasiak as leading players, and he recently saw what I believe was a scintillating encounter between Wisla Krakow and a team whose name I cannot pronounce, so I anticipate that further players will come forward. The contribution of Poles to the UK economy, and the drive of Southampton football club to retain its premiership status next season—[Interruption.] Next season. It will be there for all to see. I remain firmly committed to ensuring that relations between Poland and the UK, warm as they are, continue to grow. I will strive to ensure that that relationship continues to be as good and positive in the future as it has been in the past.

Janet Anderson (in the Chair): We are very short of time, so we must move on to the Front-Bench responses.

3.36 pm

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): I start, as is obligatory, but in this case highly appropriate, by congratulating the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on having secured the debate. I have heard the main town in his constituency pronounced at least two different ways, and his surname many more ways than that, and I have yet to receive a satisfactory answer as to what it is. Perhaps he can put me right afterwards.

As has been said in previous contributions, the most evident sign of Anglo-Polish relations is the large influx of people from Poland who live and work in the United Kingdom; that is a testimony to the success of EU enlargement. There is a lot of opportunity in this House to make speeches and other interventions that are critical of the European Union, and I agree with some, but certainly not all, of those criticisms. However, many regard the enlargement from 15 to 25 member states as having been, in most regards, a considerable success. It was enlightened of our country to embrace it in the spirit in which it was intended. Large sectors of our economy—one thinks of things such as fruit-picking and packaging—would collapse without the influx of labour that we enjoy, particularly that from eastern Europe In my constituency—

Mr. Hands It is not only fruit-picking and packaging. Some 6 per cent. of my constituents come from Poland, and their contribution is vital for the economy of London, particularly that of west London.

Mr. Browne: I strongly concur, and I was going to make precisely that point. It is not just the lower-skilled seasonal industries that are affected. In my constituency, Poles work in everything from slaughterhouses to dentistry—some people might think that those are not that far apart, but my intention was to convey a range of businesses—and perform tasks that would otherwise not be done, or not done to the same standard. I shall be interested to hear the Minister's assessment of the success of the experiment. Hundreds of thousands of Poles have come to live here. What can we learn from that in relation to Bulgarian and Romanian accession in the years ahead?

Poland's economy is growing. It is not growing as much as those of other countries in that part of Europe, so we should not regard it as an unqualified success. None the less, it is growing, albeit with an unsustainably high level of unemployment, which in part explains why so many Poles have come to live here. There are still considerable problems with its infrastructure and the heavy degree of bureaucracy of its public sector. I hope that those issues will be addressed by the Government of Poland in co-operation with other countries in the European Union, including Britain.

I should also be interested to hear what the Minister's thoughts are on the supply of energy to and through Poland, a particular topical subject, which is obviously relevant to the people of that country but also concerns people here and elsewhere.

I concur with some of the comments made earlier about the opportunity for alliances with Poland and other countries in eastern Europe. Britain has displayed a progressive and enlightened approach to the new member states of the European Union. I hope and believe that that will serve us well, not only because it was the right thing to do but because the people from that part of Europe will see Britain as a potential ally, as those countries emerge and grow more confident in their democracies and their economies.

The current Polish Government, however, give cause for concern to most people who are democrats. There are some extraordinary characters in the Polish Government, including people with narrow, nationalistic views and, in some cases, deeply illiberal views on personal freedom. I do not wish to quote The Economist magazine as though it were the Bible, although most people regard it as a fairly authoritative journal. Of the Law and Justice party, which I understand is, overwhelmingly, the largest party in the Polish coalition Government, it says:

"Law and Justice, and particularly its populist allies, delight in picking fights with gays, feminists, secularists, liberals, the media, ex-communists, uppity foreigners (especially in Brussels) and anyone else who crosses their path."

Stephen Pound: Many people have assumed that that stereotype is accurate, but many of us who met Prime Minister Marcinkiewicz at Chatham house last year put those very questions to him. I do not have time to refute every accusation, but I counsel the hon. Gentleman to look to the reality rather than the hysteria.

Mr. Browne: I hope that what the hon. Gentleman says is true, partly because that would be greatly to the benefit of Poland; but also because I am extremely concerned by the sort of allies that the Conservative party is seeking, as it trawls round newly entered member states looking for alliances to form an alternative to the European People's party. I am making an entirely serious point about the opportunities for influence by the UK's major Opposition party. If the Conservative party chooses to associate itself with political parties that hold such views, that would be regrettable for the British interest, as well as narrow party interest.

In summary, we must remember that Poland is an immature democracy. Countries do not come to fruition in economic or democratic terms overnight, but a huge amount of progress has been made. There is great cause for optimism, particularly among young people who have opportunities that did not exist 20 or 30 years ago. The House wishes them well and I hope that we shall make the most of an important opportunity to find new allies for Britain in Poland and elsewhere across eastern Europe.

3.43 pm

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): This has been such a good debate that it is a shame to interrupt it with Front-Bench replies. It has been a genuine privilege to listen to the hon. Members who have contributed, many of whom have considerable knowledge of and deep personal connections to Poland. I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) both on securing this debate and on an extraordinarily good opening speech, which set the scene in exactly the right way.

My hon. Friend drew attention to our relationships with what has historically been a close friend and should be one of our strongest allies in the European Union. He personifies the close ties between our countries; indeed, it might be said that he has taken them to new heights. He described Mr. Worrall Thompson as diminutive, which is not something that is usually said about me, but we might all be considered diminutive next to him. We are grateful to Poland for bringing us my hon. Friend and doing a great service to the House and our country.

Our friendship with Poland stretches back into history. Before the debate, I read the excellent note prepared by the Library, which reminds us that the relationship goes right back to the 16th century. The ties between Scotland and Poland go back to the family of Bonnie Prince Charlie, whose mother was Polish. So none of this is new. Today and throughout history, we have been inspired by stories of the heroism of the Poles in defence of their homeland. A number of hon. Members referred to that and the fact that many thousands of Poles fought with great distinction alongside British servicemen in the second world war.

For my generation—I am slightly older than my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham—Poland's fight against Soviet oppression provided new inspiration. My hon. Friend spoke about the food collections at his school. I remember as a schoolboy in the early 1980s proudly sporting the red and white Solidarity badge on my school blazer.

Stephen Pound: That was compulsory in the union.

Mr. Brady: Well, it was not compulsory at Altrincham grammar school, but I was proud to wear the badge.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham pointed out, it was this country, under Conservative Governments and then a Labour Government, who rightly championed the cause of Polish freedom and then the cause of European Union enlargement and Poland's accession to the EU. My hon. Friend raised important concurrent issues relating to the Baltic pipeline and the question whether the Katyn forest massacre investigation should be reopened. I hope that the Minister will take up those matters; perhaps he will deal with them in responding to the debate.

The enlargement of the European Union corrects a great historical injustice. Some Conservative Members and perhaps even some Labour Members will this evening be at a dinner that the 1922 committee is holding in tribute to Baroness Thatcher. We remember what Margaret Thatcher said in her famous Bruges speech:

"We must never forget that east of the Iron Curtain, peoples who once enjoyed a full share of European culture, freedom and identity have been cut off from their roots. We shall always look on Warsaw, Prague and Budapest as great European cities."

It is important to set the debate in context. The closeness of the ties, and the friendship that we feel, unite both sides of the House of Commons. It has been apparent during the debate that we all wish that friendship to go from strength to strength.

I shall wind up my remarks quickly so that the Minister has a chance to do justice to the debate but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said at the outset, it is vital that we work closely with a country that shares so many of our views, in particular about the need to develop a more open and flexible European Union that is more fitted to addressing the future. My hon. Friend talked about the creation of a strategic Anglo-Polish axis. That is an exciting prospect. It would allow the United Kingdom to work ever more closely with Poland in helping to build the sort of European Union that we want and which would be in the interests of all members of the EU, especially the new member states.

3.49 pm

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): As ever, it is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mrs. Anderson. I am sure that you will not mind me congratulating the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) on securing the debate. I am responding to it on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe, who is serving this country valiantly at this very moment in Strasbourg. He has responsibility for Poland in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

I acknowledge the keen interest of the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham in the land of at least some of his ancestors. He spoke with great authority and passion and, most important from my point of view, I enjoyed his speech immensely; it was very insightful. I welcome the opportunity to debate the United Kingdom's relations with Poland. For most of our lifetime, as we have heard, Europe has been cruelly and unnaturally divided. Those divisions have ended, thanks not least to Poland's determination, courage and fortitude. I remember well its fights. In 2004, Poland took a momentous step when it joined the European Union, and no Government were more delighted than ours to see the Poles take their place at the European table.

We have heard a great deal about hon. Members' personal connections, and I shall tell the Chamber about some of mine because such connections are important. I grew up with a lot of kids who were the sons and daughters of Polish coal miners who came to my valley, the Cynon valley in Aberdare, at the end of the second world war and became an important part of our community. My father was an aircraftman in the second world war and fought alongside Polish pilots. He grew to feel warmly about them, but he always warned me that they were both the bravest and the craziest people that he had ever met. I rediscovered that fact in the 1960s when I began climbing in the Alps. In those days, there were standards routes to Alpine peaks, north face routes, north face directs and routes that we used to call "Polish routes" because they were suicidal. That said a great deal.

There was a lot of laughter earlier about how Poles expressed themselves at that time, when the dead hand of communism kept their country away from its orientation towards being a great European base of culture and creativity. I remember meeting Polish climbers for whom climbing was important as a way of escaping. They could look healthy, patriotic and Polish, and they were allowed to go to the Alps. They were mad, but it was wonderful. They were all crazy about jazz, which has always been the music of rebellion. They were great painters, poets and novelists. Polish novelists won Nobel prizes. The greatest thing about being in Poland now is that one can rediscover, as in the case of Czech and particularly Hungarian writers, a great heartland of European literature. People are once again free to move across frontiers, which is a wonderful achievement.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound), in his inimitable style, gave us details of the community relationships that are so important. The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) also reminded us of them. While he was speaking I remembered being taken to a Polish club—I shall not tell the Chamber in which town it was—and being shown into a large room where there were groups of some elderly men, some not so elderly, but no women. I tried to move across from one group to another and was warned, "Don't do that, they haven't spoken to each other for 25 years." It reminded me of Wales, actually. They are great people for sectarian fights.

I cannot give an answer to the point that the hon. Member for Wellingborough made. I know that in some areas people have gone out and recruited Polish dentists. I will ask about the matter—it is worth a try in this place—but I suspect that the hon. Gentleman will probably get a more informative answer from the Department of Health.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) congratulated his mother in law on her great longevity. Her life encapsulates the history of modern Poland, which is an amazing story. My hon. Friend reminded us that Poland's influence within the EU is already equal to that of Spain, which reinforces what the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham said. We must take our alliance with Poland very seriously. The balance of power is shifting and will continue to do so.

I have just returned from Bulgaria and Romania, and they have mighty problems. However, I remember the Poland of the 1970s, when my friends from Solidarity would come over and tell me what was going on. I did not believe them. I did not believe that helicopters were shooting on the street demonstrators who were trying to create democratic and trade union rights for themselves. We had no idea of the severity of that oppression. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman mentioned it, because the situation has changed dramatically, and we must take it seriously.

I am sure that everyone who has spoken and listened will pay tribute to the contributions that emphasised the great part that Polish people not only have played in this country's history but are playing now for our economy. We were, along with Ireland and Sweden, the only countries that offered Polish workers free passage to move and work. Now, I notice that a great queue of European countries is trying to do the same, because if there is one thing that we have begun to understand, it is that if we are to compete in the world economy, we must have the skills to do so.

Mr. Hands: My hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham and I have a long-standing invitation to visit POSK, the Polish cultural centre in King street. It is a fantastic institution that may offer some pointers towards integration, because it offers services not only about Polish culture but to Polish immigrants and migrant workers about England and Britain. Will the Minister join us in a visit some time in the coming months? It is not that far away; it is only 20 minutes on the District line.

Daniel Kawczynski: And there is a delicious restaurant.

Dr. Howells: It is a kind and generous offer. I may have to pass it on to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe. He is in Strasbourg, but I shall make him aware of it.

The hon. Gentleman makes a very important point, and there is a great deal of discussion about integration. It was no easier to integrate in 1945-46 than it is or is not now. We should have these discussions, but we should not become obsessed with the integration of one ethnic group or one people. We should consider the best examples that we have, and the Polish workers have provided us with some of the very best examples.

Importantly, the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) highlighted the fact that many workers are over here because unemployment is so high in Poland. It is at 18 per cent. It is scandalously high for young boys and girls at 40 per cent.—40 per cent. youth unemployment. It is no wonder that they are flocking to this country. The hon. Gentleman is right. We must help in whatever way we can to let the Poles know that alongside liberalising the economy and slimming the bureaucracy, the high levels of taxation and unemployment have got to go if Poland is to, as it will, flex its muscles as a great economic power. It should do so in that crucial geographical position in Europe.

We have not talked much about the following important subject, because we have not had a great deal of time. However, Poland is the EU's eastern frontier. We must help the Poles with it, because it is leaky. The hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham did not get a chance to talk much about it, but we must understand that many of our problems, whether with organised crime, drug smuggling, people smuggling or arms smuggling, are caused because everybody wants to get into the EU from that eastern direction. The Poles live in a tough neighbourhood and they always have done. We have drugs liaison officers working on the frontier, and people trying to help with the border crossings to systemise the way in which vehicles are checked. It is an important subject, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raised it.

I am rather grateful that I have no time to talk about the pipeline. It is really a matter for the Germans and Russians. If I were a German or Russian, I would probably build it along the Baltic sea floor myself.

Sarah Ann Paice (Child Support Agency)

4 pm

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): It is a pleasure to have secured a debate under your chairmanship this afternoon, Mrs. Anderson, to discuss the case of my constituent Mrs. Sarah Ann Paice. It is with some reluctance that I raise the case of an individual constituent, but its history has been so profoundly frustrating for her, her family and the workers in my constituency office that I thought it appropriate to bring it to the Minister's attention.

Since I secured the debate I have been contacted by representatives of the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and an organisation called One Parent Families, who have highlighted issues that echo strongly in the facts of the case. I hope that the Minister will therefore find the present discussion helpful in the context of the Henshaw review. I should like to thank personally Mrs. Janet Allberson of One Parent Families and David Tinline of the CAB for briefing me.

Let me make it clear at the outset that I fully support the principles that lie behind the present child support system. Those of us who are parents have a responsibility, both moral and financial, to our children and that responsibility should continue regardless of whether or not a marriage or a partnership continues. As a former practising solicitor I am also aware that the court system that the child support system replaced was cumbersome, and often extremely slow and unresponsive to all parties involved. There is always a danger of seeing the grass as greener on the other side of the fence, but my limited experience of matrimonial courts in the days before the Child Support Agency was that they were themselves a source of great frustration. The involvement of the courts does not always help; that said, however, the case of Mrs. Paice illustrates the failures of the current system.

My constituent Mrs. Paice separated from her husband David Paice in September 1999; at that time, they had three teenage children. From that time until September 2002, Mr. Paice paid the mortgage for the matrimonial home in lieu of child support. Without notice, he stopped doing so because, as Mrs. Paice subsequently discovered, he remarried around that time. In May 2003, Mrs. Paice received a letter telling her that Mr. Paice should pay £4,267.49 for the period 9 July 2002 to 26 May 2003, which is now almost three years ago. That payment was not made and, as the House will hear, approximately that sum is still owed today.

By February 2004, Mrs. Paice was informed that the arrears of child maintenance had increased to £5,397.95. However, a monthly payment of £440.92, was specified to be paid by Mr. Paice. During that period Mrs. Paice made numerous calls to the Child Support Agency and the case was shifted from the Belfast office to the Birkenhead office to the Nottingham office and then back to Belfast again. None of Mrs. Paice's efforts resulted in payment of the money that was owed to her. In February 2004—more than two years ago—she first approached me for help.

[Ian Lucas]

It seems to be characteristic of the CSA that orders are made and communicated to the parents who are looking after children, but are not enforced. As a result, parents such as Mrs. Paice who have the obligation—a heavy one, as those of us who are parents know—to bring up teenage children, with all the pressures that that imposes, frequently manage without any of the money that has been awarded to them. The real source of frustration for someone who is under financial pressure is that they are presented with a piece of paper that states that they are entitled to thousands of pounds, but they do not receive the money. That must cause anger to such individuals. It is vital that orders are enforced, at least in part, and in most cases in full.

In Mrs. Paice's case, an original order was delivered to her. It appeared to be helpful, but it was not enforced. She received further communications before payments were made, and the order was changed—in fact, the payment was reduced—but still she received no payment. The figure was then reduced further. By March 2004, Mrs. Paice had received a notice from the CSA indicating that £77.98 per week was to be paid. Again, the amount had been reduced without the previous sums owing being paid. By that time, the arrears had increased to £5,107.80—a very large sum indeed. Mrs. Paice still had financial obligations and was coming under more and more financial pressure but she was not receiving the arrears that were owed to her.

By April 2004, a deduction from earnings request had been served on Mr. Paice's then employer, the British Army, to collect £411.19 per month from him, comprising £387.36 for regular maintenance and £23.83 to pay the arrears, which had increased still further to £5,548.72. Assurances were given that the money would be paid into Mrs. Paice's account. The money began to come in but, in July 2004, the amount was reduced to £361.83 without any notice being given to her. Later, she was given an explanation and the matter continued to some extent satisfactorily until May 2005, when Mr. Paice left the Army. As a consequence, Mrs. Paice stopped receiving payments in April 2005. The money that she had been relying on since the previous year stopped, again without any notice.

To Mrs. Paice, the CSA appeared throughout to be more responsive to the payer than the payee. One can well understand her feelings. When the payer's circumstances changed, something happened immediately, but there was no suitable response when Mrs. Paice came under increasing pressure.

A further review of Mr. Paice's position was completed in July 2005. It indicated that he should pay just £66.19 per week—a substantial reduction. To rub salt into Mrs. Paice's wounds, she became aware that a lump sum payment that Mr. Paice had received from the Army when he left had not been taken into account to discharge the substantial arrears that were owing from the period two or three years earlier. Still worse, a further assessment of Mr. Paice in November 2005 indicated that his liability was nil.

In a letter in January 2006, the CSA concluded:

"We do not feel there is evidence of delays or errors which can be attributed to the Agency."

By 16 January 2006, arrears stood at £4,007.15. Mr. Paice agreed to pay them off at £5.70 per week. On that basis, by my rough calculation, full payment will take 13 years, by which time Mrs. Paice's youngest child will be 26.

Mrs. Paice is very angry about the way in which her case has been dealt with. She feels that she has not made progress and that she has not received satisfactory responses from the Child Support Agency. She believes that a substantial sum remains to be paid, close to the amount of arrears that existed in 2003. I know that the Minister is not the person responsible for the circumstances of the particular case, but since he has had an opportunity to consider it, I ask him whether he believes that there has been maladministration.

Why was the lump sum payment that appears to have been paid to Mr. Paice not used to pay off the arrears owed from 2003—arrears that should have been used for the benefit of the children, who were growing up in that period? Does the Minister really believe that it is appropriate for an award to be made for payment of arrears over a 13-year period?

I have one final but important point concerning a recommendation made by One Parent Families that, in certain limited circumstances, when a resident parent believes that the Child Support Agency has not dealt satisfactorily with a case, there should be an opportunity to apply to the court to raise the matter there. In my experience it can sometimes be beneficial to secure court attendance by an individual—or in this case two parties—to clarify the circumstances of a case and to try to secure an effective order. I believe that that proposal is worth considering. Both in this case and in others that I have dealt with involving the Child Support Agency, there is far too much evidence of orders being made, sent out, never acted on, never enforced and, above all, never paid.

4.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) on securing the debate. Obviously, the subject matter is of concern to him and is extremely important to his constituent, Mrs. Paice, whom he has served well by bringing the matter to my attention in this manner. I welcome the opportunity that the debate gives me to try to help in this particular case, subject naturally to some constraints on what I am able to say. If there is time, I shall also comment on some wider child support issues, and set out some of the steps that the Government hope to take to deal with the more substantive points illustrated by Mrs. Paice's case.

The case underlines the reasons for the Government's conclusion that the current operation of the CSA is inadequate. That is why we have agreed to put an improvement plan in place immediately, and why we have asked Sir David Henshaw to review how we might deal with child support issues in the longer term. I shall talk about that review, if time permits.

My hon. Friend has raised questions about the policy for implementing deduction from earnings orders against people in the armed forces. To make policy work, child support legislation must link with other legislation, and that applies in relation to those who serve in or have served in the armed forces. To support the Child Support Act 1991, amendments were required to the Army Act 1955, the Air Force Act 1955, the Naval Forces (Enforcement of Maintenance Liabilities) Act 1947 and the Merchant Shipping Act 1970. In effect, the agency was given provision to recover maintenance through deductions from the pay of soldiers, airmen, sailors and merchant seamen.

The agency does not issue deduction from earnings orders against armed forces personnel because pay or allowances made to a non-resident parent as a member of Her Majesty's forces are not defined as earnings for the purposes of child support legislation. Instead, the agency can request that the armed forces make deductions for child maintenance under armed forces law. That is known as a deduction from earnings request.

The order and the request are designed to work in precisely the same way and to treat service personnel and civilians equally. In cases in which full maintenance is not paid, the non-resident parent remains liable for any arrears, the money owed is not written off and the agency can either pursue the non-resident parent through other appropriate enforcement measures once it has a liability order to secure the debt, or it can impose a deduction from earnings order if the non-resident parent subsequently obtains civilian employment.

The agency is bound by forces regulations. If, in exceptional circumstances, armed forces personnel decide not to action the agency's request to deduct the maintenance, it cannot impose the deduction from earnings request. However, as the individual remains liable for the maintenance and any arrears, the agency still has a range of other collection and enforcement powers to secure payment.

In the case that my hon. Friend has raised, the non-resident parent spent some time in the armed forces and paid child maintenance regularly, through a deduction from earnings request, until he left the armed forces last year. Regrettably, the deduction from earnings request was initially issued to the wrong forces payroll and had to be reissued. The relevant service then deferred its implementation for six weeks to give the non-resident parent the opportunity to pay voluntarily. All that resulted in cumulative delays of three months, but regular payments were then maintained by the non-resident parent.

Five months after he left the armed forces, the agency was able to trace him to a new civilian employer, and a deduction from earnings order was then imposed. Since he was reassessed as having a nil assessment, based on his reported low income, he has made regular contributions to his arrears through a deduction from earnings order. The agency is taking steps to improve its ability to trace non-resident parents in similar circumstances to those I describe, for example, by increasing its use of information held by the Inland Revenue.

I understand that my hon. Friend has specific concerns about the arrears owed to Mrs. Paice and the amount that is regularly paid by the non-resident parent. I am also aware that Mrs. Paice believes that the non-resident parent might have sufficient means to pay some of those arrears in a lump sum. Current legislation does not enable the agency to access any lump sum payments to non-resident parents until the payments are in their possession, and only then with the authority of a court.

The current deduction from earnings order has been calculated based on the information provided to the agency by the non-resident parent. However, the agency realises that the arrears arrangement will not recover the debt over a reasonable period. The agency will now ask the non-resident parent to increase the amount that he is paying towards the arrears. If that request is refused, given that the agency has already obtained a liability order for the arrears, it will swiftly explore the options for further enforcement action, such as the use of bailiffs.

In the light of recent cases in which deduction from earnings orders were not effective in recovering large sums over a reasonable period, the agency revised its internal guidance to make it clear that further enforcement action should be considered if arrears cannot be recouped sufficiently swiftly through a deduction from earnings order. The agency has been taking action to improve enforcement; for example, during 2005-06, 10,300 liability orders were granted, an increase from 7,200 in the previous year. The agency intends to build on that and deliver further improvements in line with the operational improvement plan announced to the House on 9 February.

To return to the case that my hon. Friend has raised, I understand that there has been some uncertainty about the agency ceasing to pursue the non-resident parent for regular maintenance. The agency records show that on 4 October last year, Mrs. Paice asked the agency to stop pursuing regular maintenance effective from 3 July 2005, the date that one of the qualifying children went to live with the non-resident parent. Written confirmation of that closure was sent to Mrs. Paice and the non-resident parent on 8 November 2005. The correspondence made it clear that that decision would cease action to pursue maintenance in respect of both the qualifying children.

My hon. Friend's letter to the agency on 6 December stated that Mrs. Paice did not want the case to be closed. The agency subsequently telephoned Mrs. Paice on 13 December to discuss her concerns and to let her know that it would look at her case to decide whether there were sufficient grounds for a revision of the closure decision. On 19 December the agency wrote to Mrs. Paice to inform her that there were not sufficient grounds for a revision, and therefore the case would remain closed.

I asked the agency to look at the matter again and as a result it has determined to overturn the original decision to close the case. In the agency's view, upon re-examination, the records of the original telephone conversation with Mrs. Paice do not provide sufficient detail to determine whether she was invited to carry on her case in respect of her youngest child. The case will now continue as if it had never been closed.

My hon. Friend also asked whether I think that the case has been poorly handled. I have to say that I do—I agree with him. The case has not been handled in the manner that the agency's clients should expect. The agency is currently moving from a process of complaint handling to one of client resolution. In line with that approach, and having acknowledged the errors that it has committed in respect of the case, the agency will do three things for my hon. Friend's constituent.

First, it will consider whether Mrs. Paice has suffered a financial loss due to the delay in first contacting the non-resident parent after Mrs. Paice applied. If so, the agency will pay her redress to meet that loss. Secondly, in recognition of the poor handling of the case, the agency will award her a consolatory payment. Thirdly, and finally, the agency will identify the arrears that have built up as a result of its own errors and delays and will award Mrs. Paice an advance payment of those arrears.

I will be happy to meet my hon. Friend and an appropriate representative of the agency to go into further detail on the personal aspects of the case. Other matters that he has raised are probably better dealt with in that way rather than in a public forum. I happily extend that invitation to my hon. Friend and to others whom it would be relevant to include.

The bigger question is what we should do about child support generally. This case has highlighted some possible procedural issues involving the agency, and the difficult and sensitive nature of child support. Following the review carried out by the chief executive of the agency, Stephen Geraghty, we concluded that the present child support system is incapable of delivering the outcomes that we desire for child support. The problems are not only in the operations of the agency; they are in the legislative framework that supports it—

On resuming—

Mr. Plaskitt: I shall begin to conclude again, Mrs. Anderson.

We announced on 9 February that we have asked Sir David Henshaw to consider the redesign of the whole child support system. In his speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham mentioned the suggestion from One Parent Families. I know that the organisation has met with Sir David, and I hope that it has put that idea to him, because it is certainly interesting. Sir David is gathering a range of ideas and will report to us later in the year.

Stephen Geraghty's review of the operations of the agency also identified a number of areas where improvements can be made in the short to medium term. That has formed the basis of the agency's operational improvement plan, which sets out how performance in client service will be improved over the next few years. We are investing an additional £120 million over the next three years to implement the plan. Of that, £90 million will support the recruitment of more staff and the deployment of more agency people to client-facing processing work and enforcement activity. We will also work to improve the agency's ability to trace non-resident parents through the use of data from credit reference agencies and Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs. We have also set aside £30 million of the investment to allow private debt collection agencies to recover over £100 million more of historic debt during the period of the plan. Work has already begun to introduce the improvements, and it will continue while Sir David constructs his redesign.

We know that there are problems with the child support system, but it is now time to learn the lessons from the past and to create a new system to ensure that parents meet their responsibilities to support their children and do not have to endure the shortfall of service that my hon. Friend's constituent has experienced. As we have frequently said, relationships may end, but responsibilities do not.

Gowers Review

4.41 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I thank the Speaker for granting the debate. As hon. Members will know, in December 2005 the Chancellor announced that he was asking Andrew Gowers to head a review of intellectual property rights. I welcome the review and hope that it will propose measures that are fair to both content owners and the public, and that it will be based on solid evidence and research rather than the wild assertions that abound in this topic.

The Gowers review has to consider numerous different issues. It will, I hope, listen to the strong arguments for altering the IP rights on databases. The rules introduced 10 years ago across the European Union appear to grant excessively restrictive copyrights over collections of non-copyrightable material. The 2005 study by the European Commission suggested that the restrictive copyrights had led the European database industry to become less productive than the American database industry, where no such rights exist. There is, I believe, a strong case for change.

The review will also need to consider calls for the updating of the so-called fair dealing exemptions in copyright law, especially in respect of the statutory right to private copying. No such rights exist and that is perhaps the clearest example of a law that is out of touch with the modern world. Only last week, it was reported that 55 per cent. of Britons break the law by copying music that they have purchased on to different devices, such as iPods.

The main topic that I wish to address relates to the calls for the extension of copyright on sound recordings. The debate is often characterised as one between the competing claims of rights holders and those of consumers, but I do not see those rights as opposed and want to propose a way forward that benefits both.

At present, copyright on sound recordings lasts about 50 years. Many bodies, such as British Phonographic Industries Ltd., and individuals, such as Sir Cliff Richard, have called for that 50 years to be extended unconditionally to 95 years. They cite many examples to justify such an extension.

First, they argue that it would harmonise our law with that of the United States where, as a result of the Sonny Bono Copyright Term Extension Act 1998, sound copyright exists for 95 years. After all, UK companies argue, they are valued in part according to the number and length of copyrights held and therefore lose out to US recording companies. Secondly, they argue that revenue streams from back catalogue sales provide the funding for new ventures and to promote new talent: increase the length of copyright, they say, and there will be more money for such new ventures. Thirdly, leading performers, such as Sir Cliff, and session musicians argue that they need the revenues that flow from copyright payments on their old recordings as a sort of pension fund. They are particularly concerned because some of their early recordings may soon go out of copyright. Fourthly, many proponents of an extension see the lapsing of works into the public domain as a danger to their preservation and availability.

The arguments against a blanket extension are also powerful, and should be heard. When the United States extended its copyright, it was said that that was necessary in order to > "Harmonise...US copyright law to that of the European Union, while ensuring fair compensation for American creators who deserve to benefit fully from the exploitation of their works."

So the United States extended its copyright to align with us, and now we have proposals to harmonise with it. There is a danger that constant leapfrogging will extend copyright indefinitely. There are now calls in the United States from, among others, the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists and the American Federation of Musicians, for the liberalisation of sound copyright laws.

Britain has a wonderful music history, but a blanket extension could render much of our musical heritage inaccessible to the public for a very long time. After all, the extension of copyright in the United States does not appear to have guaranteed the re-releasing of old recordings. A study for the Library of Congress found that only 14 per cent. of back catalogue material had ever been reissued. The older that material gets, the less likely it is to be re-released—indeed, less than 2 per cent. of the oldest material is re-released. Thus, those opposing blanket extension here argue that we risk locking Britain's rich cultural music past away so that it is enjoyed by nobody and of value to no one.

Opponents also challenge the idea that back catalogue revenues provide investment for new ventures and to support new artists. Peter Jameson of the BPI argued in The Guardian on 24 April that such investment had contributed to a boom in new British music, citing artists such as Arctic Monkeys, James Blunt and Kaiser Chiefs. However, Arctic Monkeys are with Domino Records, which was founded in 1993 and rarely re-releases records that predate itself, and James Blunt was signed by the US label Custard Records, which was set up only in 2004 and so has little back catalogue material to release; the same is true of Kaiser Chiefs, who are signed to B-Unique, which was also founded in 2004. Those are hardly good examples of recording companies that rely on significant revenue from the back catalogue profits that would be under threat if we were to stick at the 50-year copyright term.

As for Sir Cliff's campaign for hard-up musicians, copyright was never meant to be a pension fund. More importantly, if old recordings are rarely re-released, there will be little income stream either from the copyright or from airplay revenues. The real problem facing old musicians is that their works are rarely commercially available. The argument that demonises public domain is countered by the evidence that public domain has allowed Britain to be at the forefront of historical music research and has led to a boom in low-cost classical music akin to the boom in low-cost classical literature such as Penguin Classics. Public domain also benefits other musicians, filmmakers and artists who use old recordings in new pieces of work, so it can be a good incentive for new ventures.

The Gowers review will need to find a way forward that takes account of all those claims and counter-claims. I have a proposal that will benefit creators, rights holders, consumers and our culture as a whole: conditional extension, which would allow rights holders to take out a 45-year extension to the existing 50-year copyright term. However, with increased rights accompanying extended copyright would come increased responsibilities.

First, to re-register a rights holder would have to pay a nominal extension fee that, while not prohibitive, would prevent record companies from extending copyright as a formality. It would also encourage commercial re-releasing of back catalogue material to help to offset the fee. Meanwhile, the fee would help to cover the administration costs of the new system.

Secondly, the proposal involves specific provision for compulsory licensing. A rights holder who did not make commercial use of a recording would be required to license the rights to any interested party. The fees payable by the interested party would be based on a fees structure set by a body authorised by the Government for the purpose. Essentially, it means that the rights holder has a "use it or lose it" responsibility. Such an approach would encourage record companies to re-release their back catalogue material, but if they did not do so it would enable niche companies and small businesses to demand the right to re-release recordings themselves. As a result, consumers would benefit, as it would help to ensure that copyright term extension did not restrict the choice of music available to them; indeed, it would lead to greater choice of back catalogue releases.

Thirdly, the caveat for archival responsibility would require that work be held in good archived condition in accordance with prevailing technological standards. Sadly, it seems that in the past back catalogue material has sometimes been damaged or misplaced, especially when companies merge, move or shut down. In one such example, Decca, a major British recording company, was taken over by Polygram in 1979 and all the metal masters of the company's pre-1950s 78 rpm recordings were destroyed. Similar things have happened elsewhere: for example, in the 1960s a United States company, King Records, used all its metal masters as infill for a car park for its new office block. Our proposal would mean that many more recordings would survive and be kept tracked centrally. That would have the added benefit of reducing the number of recordings of so-called orphan works, where copyright ownership is unknown.

Such an archival responsibility should place no significant extra administrative burden on the recording companies. After all, they have to submit detailed information on their records to rights collection societies, such as the Performing Right Society and Phonographic Performances Ltd. The extra burden is in ensuring that an original sound recording is treated as an historical artefact and exercising appropriate curatorial responsibilities to ensure the protection of our cultural heritage.

Those three proposals for conditional extension of copyright to 95 years will, I believe, allow recording companies to be valued in a way that allows them to compete with US companies. It will also help the musicians being championed by Sir Cliff Richard and others, because their older recordings are more likely to be commercially exploited, rather than left to languish in obscurity.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on gaining this debate. As chair of the all-party jazz appreciation group, I would wish to talk to him for longer. It is clear that he does not mix with jazz musicians, because he does not understand the problems of people such as Tommy Whittle from my constituency. Now in his seventies, he still leads a group, but he was mainly known as a sideman and he relies on a constant flow of income from old recordings with the BBC orchestras and other jazz big bands to sustain him and his wife, who was a singer, in their old age.

I take the point that the hon. Gentleman made about culture. Many people believe that we should focus on the artist, but nothing in what he says about charging companies for an extension would encourage them to re-release. If we do not have an extension to 95 years, other companies may release and not pay the artist who made the original recording. Unless we can square that circle, Tommy Whittle, and others such as Jack Emblow, who has played in many films but has never recorded in a band of his own, and even Kathy Stobart, who played for many years and who won the parliamentary award for services to jazz last year, will receive an income from their recordings after 50 years have passed. We must consider such people, who are not the Cliff Richards of their age; they are not megastars. It is not the big companies that will suffer if the hon. Gentleman's proposal is adopted. It is the people I have mentioned who will not continue to be paid under the extension, and they will therefore receive no money under the copyright law.

Mr. Foster: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He will be aware that about 4,500 musicians have signed up to PPL's demands. However, I support a move that will extend copyright to 95 years. I believe that the measures that I propose will help to ensure an increased re-release of back catalogue material. That, I believe, will help Tommy Whittle. He may be lucky enough to have his material constantly re-released, and he may benefit from that, but as I said, the evidence shows that only a small proportion of material is re-released and in the case of some older material, less than 2 per cent. of the back catalogue is reissued. The measures I am proposing will encourage re-release, while providing the extension to 95 years that those 4,500 musicians request.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): I think that I must declare a registrable interest as a member of the Musicians' Union and PPL, although in the environment in which I trade I do not have a financial interest in the subject of the debate, because our interest in the music copyright—not the dots, but the sound recording—is time-limited to five or 10 years. The interest to the musicians is the key matter. Does my hon. Friend's interesting suggestion take account of technological changes and the fact that much distribution now happens via download?

Mr. Foster: Indeed it does. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's contribution. He will have noted what I said about the archival responsibility to ensure that material is kept in a condition appropriate to prevailing technologies. There is a requirement to make sure that it is available in the most modern forms.

I believe that the proposals will ensure that individual recording companies can be valued in a way that enables them to compete with US companies, they will help musicians as I have described, and by encouraging the re-release of more material they will give the public more choice. That is better for musicians and record companies, for the economy and for consumers. It is better for all of us because it protects and preserves Britain's rich and varied musical heritage. I hope that the proposals will find favour with the Gowers review.

4.57 pm

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): I am most grateful to you, Mrs. Anderson, and to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), for allowing me to contribute briefly to the debate, and to the Minister for agreeing to that.

We all agree that sound copyright is important for all media, new and old, and we welcome the Gowers inquiry. Increasingly, we operate in a world where the vital business ingredient is intellectual property, so it is right to pursue ideas about that. I think, however, that the hon. Gentleman has somewhat missed the point given the realities of the digital age, on which I think he has rather missed out. The "use it or lose it" approach may, as he pointed out, have been relevant when companies physically produced records or CDs that then had to be produced and distributed, but we have moved on, and in the digital age of downloading in which we now live, his arguments are somewhat archaic.

In the hon. Gentleman's proposal, which is not particularly liberal and is rather convoluted, there is a danger that performers and record companies will be kept as second-class creators compared with other creators. The principle of copyright and resale rights is long established. I believe that the hon. Gentleman supported the droit de suite artists' resale right that we debated recently, which sits oddly with his comments today.

The point is surely that in future back catalogues will be online, and our idea of a blanket extension will be an encouragement to make that music available. Charging fees will become an incentive to do nothing and a licence for CD burners in China and the developing world to nick recordings.

I know that the hon. Gentleman's office has been besieged by representations on behalf of Sir Cliff Richard. My office has not, as far as I know, received a single representation on his behalf. I do not know what that says about me, Sir Cliff Richard or his fans. No doubt the hon. Gentleman will be asked to recover from the ordeal of the debate in one of Sir Cliff's many villas around the world.

Of course, I have sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's arguments, but I do not agree about the ratcheting up of copyright periods in Europe and the United States. I hope that the Minister agrees that it would be far easier to adopt the proposal we made during the last election, which was that in the interests of the industry—producers, consumers and originators—it would be best to make the case in Europe that the copyright period for music protection should simply be extended from 50 years to 75 years.

5 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): I congratulate the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on securing this debate. Although it is a short Adjournment debate, there is a remarkable level of interest in it, as shown by the interventions of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and East Falkirk (Michael Connarty), who was unable to stay to the end of the debate, and the hon. Members for Birmingham, Yardley (John Hemming) and for East Devon (Mr. Swire).

My office has not had any representations from Cliff Richard, although I hesitate to mention that because I do not want to tempt fate. If I do receive representations, I shall pass them swiftly to Andrew Gowers who will, I am sure, give them due consideration.

The debate has illustrated not only that there is a high and active level of interest in the subject, but that the issues at stake are extremely complex and the interests and interest groups are many and varied. In considering the issues in depth Andrew Gowers is providing an important service for the Government and the House generally, and we look forward to his report.

It is important to bear in mind, notwithstanding the focus of the hon. Member for Bath in his opening speech, that intellectual property rights are no longer a narrow niche issue, but are an essential facet of any successful modern economy, particularly as economies are increasingly based on the quality and breadth of knowledge that they contain. Within that broader field, it is important to debate the role of copyright in the 21st century. On the broader front, our UK economy is increasingly driven by knowledge-based, intellectual property-reliant industries. The creative industries alone accounted for 7.8 per cent. of value added in the United Kingdom in 2003 and grew by 6 per cent. per annum between 1997 and 2003, which was twice the rate of growth of the economy as a whole. Overall, the creative industries were worth £11.9 billion in 2004.

In this age of a modern knowledge-based economy, the need to reward creativity while continuing to encourage the free flow of ideas is more important than ever. That is the essential balance that must be struck in policy terms. The intellectual property framework must incentivise innovation while ensuring that the public have access to that innovation. However, the world is changing rapidly—the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley alluded to this—and the existing framework is being tested by two trends.

First, globalisation has broken down the boundaries between markets, giving rise to enforcement challenges. Secondly, digitisation has radically altered the way in which knowledge is created, disseminated and shared. Those are the principal reasons why, just before Christmas, the Chancellor invited Andrew Gowers to conduct an independent review of our intellectual property system to ensure that it is fashioned for the purposes that we require of it in this century. I am not sure that I would go as far as the hon. Member for

[John Healey]

Bath and describe parts of it as being out of touch with the modern world, but it is clear that, depending on what Andrew Gowers recommends, now is the time for a proper review of whether some aspects of it need to be overhauled.

The roots of our concern do not lie only in the changes in the modern economy and the reasonable representations that the Government have received from a number of quarters. In our manifesto at the last election, the Labour party included a commitment to "modernise copyright and other forms of intellectual property so that they are appropriate for the digital age."

That is the importance of the Gowers review to the Government. The call for evidence for the review prompted more than 500 responses from a wide range of interest groups, as hon. Members might have anticipated. Those carrying out the review are now analysing those responses and undertaking further research before making what we expect to be precise, practical policy recommendations. The review will report in the autumn to the Chancellor and to the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry and for Culture, Media and Sport. I know that culture, media and sport is a policy area that the hon. Members for Bath and for East Devon follow closely from their respective Front-Bench positions.

Today, the hon. Member for Bath has focused on one of the issues being examined in the review: the term of protection on sound recordings. As he knows, protection is harmonised across the EU and, as such, is to some extent an area of EU competence. I think that the hon. Member for East Devon made that point. Any changes in the length of protection must therefore be made through the Commission.

The Gowers review is independent and was set up to make recommendations to the Government. As the hon. Member for Bath would expect, I am not in a position to anticipate or pre-empt what Gowers might report. The hon. Gentleman said that he hoped the report would be based on solid evidence. The Treasury is supporting the Gowers review, and in the best traditions of the Treasury we will do our best to ensure, as will Andrew Gowers, who is a distinguished journalist, that his recommendations are indeed solidly based on the evidence that he is gathering.

The question of the length of copyright on sound recordings turns on what impact adjusting the length would have on investment, on performers and on other affected interest groups. As the hon. Member for Bath made clear, it is an extremely complex area of debate. There are conflicting needs, claims and counter-claims, which are precisely what Andrew Gowers is considering.

The broader intellectual property system is not one of rewards or, as the hon. Gentleman put it, a pension fund for old musicians. It is one of incentives to invest and innovate; that is its importance to the economy. It must encourage new innovators to create and generate ideas in the knowledge that they will be remunerated for their endeavour. We must ensure that creators continue to be incentivised to contribute and innovate in the future.

It is not only the length of the copyright term that affects the remuneration of artists but the scope of that term. In the EU, while the term is 50 years, artists also receive royalties every time their song is played in a bar, restaurant or hairdresser's. In the US, under the bars and grills exception, few such royalty payments are made. The definition of "public" and therefore the scope of protection of sound recordings is far broader in the EU than in the United States. The Gowers review will consider the impact of changing the length of term not only on artists and their immediate industry but on industries that use sound recordings, such as broadcasting, tourism and internet service providers. It is vital to say again that the intellectual property system stimulates innovation and creates value across the whole economy.

The crux of the debate, as the hon. Gentleman made clear in his speech, is how to strike a balance. Andrew Gowers is considering the areas that the hon. Gentleman touched upon, and I undertake to ensure that he gets a copy of this afternoon's debate. I know that he will take seriously the points that all hon. Members have made as part of his deliberations.

Digitisation and globalisation create challenges and opportunities for our copyright regime. We need to ensure that the UK responds in the right way and the right areas. By doing so, we can sustain the success that our economy enjoys in the globalising and increasingly knowledge-based economy. It is not just the Chancellor and I who are looking forward to the recommendations of the Gowers review; the level of House interest in this short debate this afternoon demonstrates that the recommendations that Andrew Gowers comes up with will be keenly awaited and, I am sure, keenly debated when he publishes them.

I hope that we will be able to return to this debate, because in many parts of the House, there is clearly an interest in doing so. I had expected a contribution representing the views of the Musicians Union, but I did not expect that we would also hear the views of the all-party jazz appreciation group. Clearly, a number of Members with interests in the area will also be looking forward to Andrew Gowers' report when we finally publish it.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eleven minutes past Five o'clock.

Darfur Crisis

[Relevant documents: Second Report from the International Development Committee, Session 2005–06, Darfur: The killing continues, HC 657, and the Government's response thereto, HC 1017; Fifth Report from the International Development Committee, Session 2004–05, Darfur, Sudan: The responsibility to protect, HC 67; and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6576.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Michael Foster.]

2.30 pm

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): It is good to see so many Members here, despite business elsewhere in the House having finished. That reflects the deep interest that Members on both sides of the Chamber have in the tragedy that has affected the people of Darfur, particularly over the past three years. I should say frankly, at the outset, that the crisis is a test of the international community's willingness to act when crimes against humanity are committed. I hope that our debate is very much set in that context. I commend the Select Committee for both of its inquiries into Darfur in the past 15 months; I also commend the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who is here and who ably chairs the all-party group on Sudan, and all other hon. Members for their continued interest in what has been going on.

In three years of war, millions of innocent Darfuris have lost their homes, their livelihoods and, frankly, their dignity. As hon. Members will be aware, conflict has been rife in Darfur since the 1980s, but in the beginning of 2003 it reached new heights, with the rebel attack and the overt involvement of Government forces and the Janjaweed militia, following the formation of the Sudan Liberation Movement. The crisis has been littered with agreements signed and not honoured. I refer in particular to the humanitarian ceasefire agreement signed on 8 April 2004 by the Government of Sudan, the SLM, and the Justice and Equality Movement. I also refer to the security and humanitarian protocol signed on 9 November 2004 in Abuja. The truth is, however, that none of the parties that signed those agreements has abided by any of them, and insecurity has continued to hamper the huge humanitarian relief effort.

As Members will be aware, in May 2004, the African Union Mission in Sudan—AMIS—was deployed, and it has been in the region ever since. Another thing to which it is important to refer, if just in passing, has taken place since then: the signing of the comprehensive peace agreement in January 2005 in Nairobi. That finally brought to an end the north-south conflict that had lasted about a generation in Sudan, claiming more than 2 million lives. That agreement has given Sudan a more representative Government than it has had for a very long time. The UK played an honourable part, both in supporting the negotiations and in the agreement's implementation, including by providing political and financial support.

The UK Government have also played an important role in the UN Security Council in pressing for action to be taken on the crisis in Darfur. Members will be aware that we co-sponsored Security Council resolution 1556, which called for the disarmament of the Janjaweed. We supported Security Council resolution 1591, which provides for travel bans and asset freezes on individuals involved in the Darfur crisis who have committed violations of international law or other atrocities, or who have in other ways impeded the peace process. We co-sponsored resolution 1672, which was adopted on 25 April this year, and which finally—I underline "finally"—imposed targeted sanctions on four individuals from all sides of the conflict. The fact that it took so long was certainly not for want of effort on the part of the British Government; there was, of course, a process to be gone through.

I, for one, unreservedly welcome the imposition of those sanctions, because it is at least a sign that the international community is serious about calling to account those who, by their actions, prolong the suffering of the people of Darfur. We have made it clear that we think that more names ought to follow. We are also pushing for an extension of the arms embargo to the whole of Sudan. If only every country represented on the Security Council had been as determined as the British Government to hold people to account for what they had done.

The UK also sponsored UN Security Council resolution 1593, which referred the situation in Darfur to the International Criminal Court following the report by the UN International Commission of Inquiry. That was an historic moment, not only in the context of the crisis in Darfur, but more generally, because it was the first time that the UN Security Council had referred a matter to the ICC. That, too, was not achieved without a struggle. That moment will come to be remembered because it showed that although we fought hard for the principle of the ICC, with support from Members on both sides of the House, it is no good having the thing if it is not actually used to investigate people and call them to account for what they have done. I am glad to say that the ICC has already begun work on identifying the individuals who were responsible for the crimes against humanity and the war crimes that the International Commission of Inquiry said had been committed in Darfur.

I now want to deal in slightly more detail with the challenge that we face.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I welcome what the Secretary of State said about UN Security Council resolution 1593. In the context of his remarks about the investigations that are under way into individuals who are suspected of involvement in war crimes, crimes against humanity and, possibly, attempted genocide, will he tell us whether any decisions have been made about an initial list of people who will be prosecuted?

Hilary Benn: I know that the hon. Gentleman has taken a close and passionate interest in the crisis in Darfur, and I applaud him for that. I can tell him that, in his most recent briefing to the UN Security Council on 13 December 2005, the ICC prosecutor stated that

[Hilary Benn]

"the Office had made good progress" in the investigation's first phase and that the next phase would "seek the further assistance and cooperation of the Government of the Sudan".

We have certainly made it clear to the Government of Sudan that we expect nothing less than full co-operation. I can also tell the hon. Gentleman that, as far as I am aware, the ICC has raised no concerns about co-operation since that last briefing. If there is any further information, beyond that which is available to me, that I can make available to the hon. Gentleman in response to his question, I will write to him with it, if that is all right.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may or may not know that the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) and I met Musa Hilal in Khartoum. Obviously, that predated his being cited as one of the individuals in question, but, with the best will in the world, he was clearly under no constraints whatever at that time. It would be good to hear that we are talking to the Government in Sudan about what they intend to do to bring such people to justice.

Hilary Benn: Our ambassador in Khartoum is in regular contact with the Government of Sudan. However, I should tell my hon. Friend, who has also achieved great distinction, because of the way in which he chairs and leads the all-party group and keeps the House well informed about what is happening, that several of us talk to a considerable number of people as we seek to support those who are trying to resolve the crisis. That is the sad truth, and I will therefore need to check whether particular representations have been made about the individual to whom my hon. Friend referred.

Once people have been put on the sanctions list or otherwise identified by the organisations that are investigating these events, however, all hon. Members would clearly expect those bodies to take the appropriate action against them. It is too late to undo the terrible crimes that have been committed, but if the international community is to achieve justice for those who suffered and lost their lives and, indeed, more widely—that is why I referred to the crisis as a test—we must send a message to those who are thinking of committing such actions in other places that they will eventually be caught if they do.

Elsewhere, we have seen the indictment of Charles Taylor and those who have been brought before courts in Arusha in connection with the Rwandan genocide. What is being done is important because bit by bit, inconsistently and sometimes hesitantly, the international community has the power to demonstrate that we will not sit back and let such things happen. Have we got things right? No. Have we got a long way to go? Certainly, but those steps forward really matter in showing that we are serious about trying to put into effect the fine words that have been passed in declarations and agreements over many years. We find them in the UN's universal declaration of human rights, in the text on the founding of the UN and in the agreement on the responsibility to protect, agreed by the millennium summit last September. However, someone on the receiving end of the trauma in Darfur might be inclined to say, "Those are fine words and I am glad to read them, but when will someone apply them to me?" That is the real test.

Darfur is the most complex humanitarian operation in the world today. Nearly 14,000 people are working there in extremely difficult circumstances. In the past three years, thousands of innocent people have been killed. The figures range from 80,000 to 400,000. The truth is that no one knows, and frankly no one is ever likely to know, how many people have lost their lives in the conflict, but we do know that about 2 million people have been forced to flee their homes and a further 1.5 million have been affected by the conflict. Reports continue of sexual violence, in particular against women and children.

I, along with other hon. Members here today, have visited some of the camps: Kalma, near Nyala, and el-Meshtel and Abu Shouq, which are near el-Fasher. There, we saw with our own eyes the conditions in which people are forced to live, and we heard testimony from women, men and children about what had happened to them to make them flee their homes, and about the continuing insecurity that they face, in particular when they venture out of the camp. That burden is felt particularly by women, because the task of looking for firewood falls on them. Sadly, they are from time to time attacked as they go beyond the confines of the camp.

I pay tribute to the UN, the non-governmental organisations and the 14,000 individuals on the ground—some are international, but the vast bulk are Sudanese—who have worked tirelessly in very difficult circumstances to try to provide for the needs of the people forced to flee their homes. Their efforts mean that today we can recognise that, compared with two years ago, malnutrition and mortality rates have fallen. Last year, they fell below the emergency threshold. That was entirely due to the international relief effort in terms of money, and the skill, dedication and commitment of those staff.

However, because of the increase in insecurity since last autumn, those improvements have begun to be reversed. There has been further displacement of people. Since the beginning of the year, just under 200,000 more people have had to flee their homes because of fighting, a significant proportion of which is down to the rebel movements. In some areas, the UN and the NGOs have had to reduce their presence and operations because of insecurity. That is the first point.

Secondly, banditry and harassment on all sides have got worse and more brazen, and are getting in the way of the ability of humanitarian agencies to gain regular access to the worst affected areas. Sadly, humanitarian workers have to deal with such situations in a number of countries, as I saw for myself in Somalia yesterday. I shall digress slightly, if you will allow me, Mrs. Dean, to pay tribute to the people working in southern Somalia, who frankly, in some circumstances, are putting their lives on the line—the same is true of people in Darfur—to ensure that others get the help that they need. We all owe them an enormous debt of gratitude.

We have continued throughout to lobby, press and urge the Government of Sudan to ensure that they place no obstacles in the way of those trying to carry out the relief effort. That is the only country in the world in which as Secretary of State for International Development I have had to raise—I have done so willingly—individual cases of consignments of goods that have been held up. I remember one case in particular from a couple of years ago: 30 tonnes of medical supplies brought into the country by Médecins sans Frontières had been sitting in a container in Port Sudan for three months. Those supplies were desperately needed by the people of Darfur, but the necessary permit had not been obtained. Experience has shown that one has to keep up the pressure to ensure that the Government of Sudan support and help those humanitarian agencies.

The third, and sad, fact is that those humanitarian workers have now been affected by a funding crisis as some donors, frankly, get a bit weary. UN agencies responsible for some of the most important needs in Darfur are being forced to make major cuts to their programme; most significant of all is the decision of the World Food Programme to halve the rations provided in Darfur. That means that malnutrition will worsen. I am pleased that the United States Government have decided to speed up the delivery of their substantial contribution, which had, I think, been undergoing the congressional process. I hope that that will mean that full rations can be restored as soon as possible.

Hon. Members will be aware of the leading role that the United Kingdom Government have played in providing humanitarian relief. We are the second largest bilateral donor after the United States of America. Since September 2003 we have allocated more than £93 million to UN agencies and NGOs. We have provided a further £45 million in support of the UN's 2006 Sudan work plan and its eastern Chad appeal. We are pressing other donors to do more. Two weeks ago I announced that the UK is to provide a further £9 million to the common humanitarian fund, which will help the UN to react more quickly and flexibly to the crisis in Darfur and to meet humanitarian needs in other parts of Sudan. It is a desperately poor country, in large measure because of the conflict that its people have had to endure over the past generation and more.

That means that our total contribution to the UN work plan this years stands at £54 million—more than we provided last year. I wish that that was true of all the other donors, but it is not. We are also providing £18 million to NGO operations, £5 million to the Red Cross for both Darfur and the south of the country and £4 million for the relief effort in Chad. I shall continue to urge other donors to respond as generously as they can. The people of Darfur need that.

The second thing that we have been doing is backing the African Union Mission in Sudan, which has deployed ceasefire monitors and a protection force and police since the middle of 2004. Until last summer, the last but one time I went to Darfur, there was no doubt that in the previous 12 months the presence of that force had improved security. That was what I was told not just by the AMIS force itself and its commander at the time, but by the UN agencies to whose representatives I spoke in both north and south Darfur. However, since the autumn the situation has deteriorated, not for want of effort on the part of AMIS but because of the increasing failure of parties to various ceasefires and humanitarian agreements to honour the obligations that they have entered into. The result has been a new wave of people who must flee their homes.

The situation has become very difficult. When in February I met Major-General Ihekire, who took over, as I remember, about four weeks previously, he was very frank and said, "I haven't got enough troops on the ground." That was the first time that the AMIS force commander had said that. He said he needed more. As hon. Members will be aware, AMIS does not even have the 7,700 troops and civilian police that were envisaged for phase 2 of the operation, because it was hard to find an additional battalion from Africa. We should recognise, also, that the force faces an enormously complex and challenging task.

We should pay tribute to the African Union, despite the difficulties: if it had not taken the initiative and put in that force, who else would have gone to do that work? Its presence is a demonstration in deed by Africa that it is prepared to begin to take responsibility for solving conflict on that continent. It has added to the sum total of forces that are capable of doing that work, and in doing so has made it easier to decide to act. We face two problems when such situations occur in the world. First, is there the will to do something? Secondly, if there is the will, are there people who are prepared to do the work?

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): Given that the 7,000 or so African Union forces are obviously not able to deal with a crisis on the scale of the one that is under way, what size of force does my right hon. Friend anticipate would be needed? Is it realistic to imagine that such a force could come, if not from the AU, even from the UN, given the large number of other UN commitments around the world?

Hilary Benn: My hon. Friend, who also does a great deal of work on the issue and did so when he was the Minister with responsibility for Africa in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, raises an important question. The straight answer is that the purpose of the UN planning mission, which I was about to mention, is to find an answer to that. Self-evidently, judging by what the major-general told me, 7,700 is not enough in a vast region of Sudan, which is an enormous country. I think that the Secretary-General of the United Nations talked at one point about 20,000; I stand to be corrected but I recall the figure.

The planning mission's job is to determine things. Blue-hatting will solve the financial problem, because assessed contributions will bring the money, but it will create a big challenge. We will need to ensure that there are sufficient troop-contributing countries so that the force has the resources that it needs.

Mr. Drew: The hon. Member for Buckingham might refer to this, but when we were last there we had the opportunity to meet the peacekeepers who were responsible for the ceasefire in the Nuba mountains. The one message that I took from that was that it was not numbers that made the difference, but organisation, logistics, a clear knowledge of what people were doing and earning the respect of the people among whom they were trying to keep the peace. I hope that the Nuba mountains are still at the back of the minds of those who are considering how this situation can be made to work.

Hilary Benn: My hon. Friend makes an important point. Those circumstances were slightly different, in that the security situation was not anything like as difficult. I received a briefing on how those missions worked; independent monitors, one from either side, were involved and could deploy quickly. It was an effective operation, but it was operating in circumstances where the parties were not slugging it out in the way that has continued to occur in Darfur.

There needs to be a combination of things. The first is sufficient physical presence, in particular we need to provide protection for people—the current primary need of those in the camps—and to prevent more people from being forced to flee from their homes. There also needs to be an effective mechanism for when things go wrong and there are incidents, that will allow us to get in there, investigate quickly, publish reports, call people to account for what they have done, and refer it to the mechanisms that have been created. Such mechanisms would include the sanctions committee—if evidence becomes available, that committee can examine it and take action against the individual—and the International Criminal Court in those circumstances.

John Bercow: I am not an expert in military planning, strategy or logistics, but I ought to be able legitimately to look to those who are for advice. If the right hon. Gentleman agrees that sufficient troop numbers are, if not a sufficient condition of progress, at any rate a necessary one, can he advise at what point the judgment will be reached about the appropriate number? My anxiety—this is the alarm bell ringing in my head—is that even once a judgment is reached about the appropriate number, there is every danger that it will be phased, that it will take a long time, and that the deployment will not happen all at once. So, 1 October is the start date for the UN, not the finish, is it not?

Hilary Benn: The hon. Gentleman raises another important point. That is why the UK has for quite some time been considering the capacity of the AU mission, while recognising the difficulty of the situation in which it found itself. It is important that as we have this discussion we do not appear to criticise the AU mission, because without it we would have been in a much worse position. However, we acknowledge the complexity of the task. This is the first big operation that the AU has done, apart from deploying the small number of troops that it put into Burundi, which was successful, and that is why we have given a lot of practical support. I was about to discuss that.

It is for the UN planning mission to ask precisely the question that the hon. Gentleman put in order to get an answer as quickly as possible. Depending on how fast troop-contributing countries can be found, the UN mission can then get in. One or two things have happened, not least the meeting of the peace and security council of the AU, that helped to move things on.

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): Could the Secretary of State clarify whether the Sudanese Government have formally agreed to the UN troops moving in? I read in Sudan Tribune this morning—not my normal read—that Sudan was ready to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers, but the detail said that Sudan was ready only to negotiate.

Hilary Benn: General Bashir had said that in the absence of a peace agreement he was not prepared to consider a UN mission coming in. The best information that I have currently is that the Sudanese Government have indicated that they are thinking about that, but I have not seen a definitive answer. The issue is relevant to a point that I intend to make about the UN Security Council's decision on Tuesday. If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I shall come to that.

The third thing that we have done is provide support for a peace agreement. As we all recognise, the only answer is for people to stop fighting and to use politics, debate, argument and elections to determine what will happen in Darfur, rather than killing each other and innocent citizens of that region. That is why we have offered a lot of support to the African Union. It is important that we should recognise that the process has been led by the African Union. In the same way as security and the work of AMIS have been an African-led process, so too have the peace talks in Abuja.

We have kept a presence there, and the then Foreign Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), now the Leader of the House of Commons, travelled there in February—to be a bit unparliamentary about it—to read the Riot Act to those who had been negotiating and say that, frankly, our patience was running out, not least because the international community was paying for the consequences of the war. We are all paying to keep people in the camps because of the failure of the parties to the conflict to do what they did—in the north and the south—when they finally fought themselves to a standstill and realised that Sudan would never progress while people continued to fight. They can do exactly the same thing again if they want.

That is why the African Union set a deadline of 30 April for the next phase of the negotiation. The AU tabled an agreement. The Sudanese Government said that they were prepared to sign, but the three rebel movements said that they were not. It became clear over the weekend just before the local elections—that is how I remember the date—that the negotiations were in difficulty. That is when I and Bob Zoellick, the US Deputy Secretary of State, along with one or two others, went to Abuja to see whether we could help out, with the extremely skilful support and assistance of President Obasanjo of Nigeria—he was brilliant, if I may say so.

In trying to get the parties to focus on what needed to be done in that four-day period, during the final stages of the negotiations, we proposed some further changes to the agreement, to try to bring the rebel movements on board. On 5 May there was a signing, at which the Government of Sudan and the largest rebel movement, led by Minni Minnawi, put their signatures to the agreement.

That was a significant moment, but challenges remain. I hope that it will still be possible for the two other rebel movements—the faction of the Sudan Liberation Army/Movement, led by Abdel Wahed, and the Justice And Equality Movement, led by Khalil Ibrahim—to sign. Those two need to be on board, particularly Abdel Wahed's group, because although the Justice And Equality Movement has a national political objective, it has a small number of fighters in Darfur, whereas the other two groups are concerned particularly about Darfur.

The agreement provides for power sharing, with a guaranteed significant role for the rebels in Darfur, in the Government in Khartoum. It provides for wealth sharing, including arrangements for compensation for individuals who have lost their homes. The agreement provides for peace and security with a ceasefire, disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration, and would deal with the Janjaweed, moving a large number of the rebel forces into the Sudanese army.

Above all, the agreement would provide what the rebels have been fighting for; namely, regional government for Darfur. The agreement says that, within a maximum of three years, subject to a referendum and the will of the people of Darfur, if they vote for regional government, they will get regional government. In those circumstances, what is the justification for carrying on fighting? Or, are the rebels so impatient that they are not prepared to allow people to express a view and to wait a maximum of three years? By the way, in-between there will be elections to all state legislative councils and national elections in Sudan, which the comprehensive peace agreement provides. In my view, there is no justification whatever.

I want to make progress because I know that many hon. Members want to speak. What is the immediate task? The first is for the people of Darfur to know what is in the agreement. That is urgent. The African Union is working on that as we speak, with help from the United Kingdom, Germany and Italy. We have also been in conversation with the BBC World Service, which has tried to publicise the agreement.

The second task is to work with the parties—the Government in Sudan and Minni Minnawi's group—to ensure that they get on with it. At a practical level, we have offered English language training to Minni Minnawi who requested that for 100 members of his group. We are also looking at ways to support him in setting up an office. Those are practical matters for anyone who wants to take the post provided for in the transition and who will be the senior assistant to the President and the fourth person in the presidency with significant influence over the composition of the transitional regional authority. Where that person will be based, when they will get to work and when they will go to Khartoum are practical issues in implementing the agreement. Frankly, there are ways in which we could make life difficult for those who stand in the way of peace.

Above all, the agreement provides for the people of Darfur to participate in what is known as the Darfur-Darfur dialogue, but there is an issue about the extent to which the movements represent all the people of Darfur. The crisis is complex and the Darfur-Darfur dialogue is a convocation of people—the final agreement refers to 800 to 1,000 representatives. It would be one way of testing how people feel about the way forward and ensuring that there is an inclusive process to bring together all the tribes, interests and other views to ensure that progress can be made.

On Monday, the AU Peace and Security Council welcomed the agreement, called for its implementation and confirmed—I refer to the point made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett)—that transfer to the United Nations mission should go ahead. The AU Peace and Security Council previously said that that is what it wanted in principle and that preparations should take place, but it has now confirmed that that is what should now occur. The following day, UN Security Council resolution 1679, which the UK co-sponsored, was passed unanimously and called on the parties to implement the agreement, urged the other rebel groups to sign it, and called for the strengthening of AMIS, an acceleration of the transition to a UN force and an immediate end to violence and atrocities.

Now that we have a peace agreement signed by at least one of the rebel movements we must go ahead with the practical tasks in hand, particularly the rapid deployment of a UN force. International pressure must be maintained on the Government of Sudan—the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West referred to this—because just as there is no justification for carrying on fighting now that there is an agreement, there is no justification in my view for the Government of Sudan to resist or obstruct in any way the preparations for a UN handover. After all, there is already a UN force in south Sudan—UNMIS—which is helping to oversee the implementation of the north-south peace agreement. There cannot be any objection in principle to having UN forces in Darfur.

The immediate test is to give visas to the planning mission so that they can go to Darfur and start asking the questions that the hon. Member for Buckingham and others asked.

John Bercow: In the event that the Government of Sudan objected to the transfer to a UN force or sought to slow down the process, what would the Secretary of State deduce from that behaviour?

Hilary Benn: I hope very much that that will not be the case, but if it were I would deduce that there was no willingness on the part of the Government of Sudan to enable the process to succeed. I would anticipate and hope that both the AU Peace and Security Council and the UN Security Council would take a dim view of that. The truth is that this conflict, trauma and tragedy have gone on long enough. The agreement is significant, but it is not a solution unless it is implemented. That is the truth, and we must make that happen. In the end, the responsibility falls on the parties to the conflict to make it happen, with the support, encouragement and help of the international community.

I hope that Members believe, as I do, that the UK has played an honourable role in trying to bring the crisis to an end. However, the international community as a whole will have cause to reflect on how things got to the current situation. I praise the African Union for what it has done but above all, today as always, our thoughts are with the people of Darfur, who have the greatest interest in the trauma now being brought to an end. They have suffered far too much, and what they want more than anything else is the chance to go home and live their lives in peace and tranquillity.

3.5 pm

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): I am grateful to have an opportunity to contribute to the debate. I echo the opening remarks of the Secretary of State when he said that the fact that so many Members are here to discuss this important subject reflects the concern that is felt throughout the House about events in Sudan. At the outset, I praise the Government's contribution to the processes that are in play in Sudan, and the Select Committee, which produced an excellent report earlier this year, and the all-party group on Sudan, which the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) leads so well.

I also want to echo the Secretary of State's final words. He said that the British Government had played a useful—indeed, I would say pivotal—part in the processes that have taken place in recent weeks. He then made the extraordinary understatement that when this very unhappy situation has been resolved, as we all hope it will be, the international community will have cause to reflect on what has happened in recent months and years. He is certainly right about that, as I hope to demonstrate.

Kofi Annan's comments on Monday put the matter into the correct perspective. He stated:

"The agreement signed between the government of Sudan and the largest rebel movement in Darfur on May 5 gives the world one more chance to bring peace to that unhappy region. The Peace and Security Council of the African Union is meeting...to see how best to take the agreement forward. The rest of the world must also engage rapidly and without reservation if the opportunity the agreement offers is not to be lost...Darfur is still far from being at peace. Last Monday, while the United Nation's top humanitarian envoy was visiting a camp for displaced people, rioting broke out and an interpreter for the African Union Mission...was hacked to death."

I also pay tribute to the Secretary of State for his efforts. I believe he has been in Darfur on five occasions recently, and the genuine anger that he clearly feels came across when he was last on the "Today" programme to comment on recent events.

At the heart of the debate are two key factors on which the international community will want to reflect. The first is that it is far from clear that it has learned the lessons of Rwanda. The appalling events that took place there from early April 1994 and over the ensuing 90 days, the paralysis of the international community, and the failure of the organs that are part of the international community and which we expected to react to what was taking place, must have given everyone profound pause for reflection.

It is all too obvious that many of those lessons were not learned. They certainly have not been applied to the situation that developed in Darfur. During the past three years, I have been struck not by the progress that has been made, but by how little progress has been made.

Mr. Mullin: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the case of Rwanda is not entirely analogous? It was much more obvious what was happening there and the lines were clear, whereas in Darfur one of the confusing factors has been the number of different rebel movements, which do not all get on with each other, sometimes attack the very aid convoys that have gone to help people, and appeared at one time to have an agenda for causing a great deal more disruption rather than less. Peace was not on their agenda either, and that has made the situation much more complicated.

Mr. Mitchell: What the hon. Gentleman says is true, but the international organs and institutions to which all of us in the civilised world look to take action appeared to be just as paralysed in the circumstances in Darfur as they were in Rwanda. Although I agree that the situations are not analogous, nevertheless the paralysis in the United Nations that pertained then has also pertained in Darfur.

I visited Darfur last month with my right hon. Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary. We went to el-Fasher where, thanks to Oxfam, which does such brilliant work in the camps in Darfur, we could see for ourselves what was happening on the ground. We also visited Khartoum to talk to Government officials about what was happening. My abiding memory of that visit was the sight on the tarmac at el-Fasher airport of a Sudanese attack helicopter—almost as a direct insult to the international community and a symbol of Sudanese indifference to world opinion. We were informed that that attack helicopter flew frequently and, as we heard from direct evidence in the camps, was used against the people of Darfur. There is still a huge amount to do, and a huge amount on which the international community needs to reflect.

Will the Secretary of State comment on several points made in the main conclusions to the excellent Select Committee report published earlier this year? Conclusion 2 reflects the Committee's concern about the ability of the aid agencies to deliver assistance. In view of the representations that I, the shadow Foreign Secretary and others made to the Sudanese Government, is the Secretary of State happy that the actions taken by the Khartoum Government to make life more difficult for the aid agencies, and in particular personnel trying to get into Darfur, have been resolved? Will he update us?

In conclusion 3, at paragraph 9 of the report, the Committee was concerned that

"The UK Government should propose to the UN Security Council that it should apply credible sanctions until the GoS"—

the Government of Sudan—

"has complied."

Notwithstanding the events of recent weeks, will the Secretary of State update us on that?

Mr. Drew: Later, the report describes the reality of the problem with trying to impose sanctions, because the one country that could put the squeeze on Khartoum is China. Given the hon. Gentleman's knowledge of Zimbabwe, I am sure he will agree that it is no good the west saying, "All these things we must do", if the Chinese continue to undermine any influence the UN has.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman is right. He brings me on to my next point, which relates to conclusions 5 and 8. The Select Committee makes it clear that it is important that, in support of an African solution to an African problem, the surrounding countries put pressure on the Sudanese Government.

The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. If the surrounding countries are willing and able to put pressure on those countries that are not behaving as they should, that is the most powerful way to influence a situation. There is nothing more clear than the situation in Zimbabwe to demonstrate that. The fact that Britain complains about the behaviour of President Mugabe has far less effect—in fact, it arguably bolsters the President—than when South Africa or the other surrounding countries take exception to what is being done.

If we are to put more pressure on the Sudanese Government to ensure that they stand by the agreements that they have signed and implement the changes that they have agreed, will the Secretary of State update us on the support that other countries are giving to the process?

John Bercow: In talking about sanctions and the other punitive measures that we envisage as necessary, it is perhaps as well to be clear in our minds about the scale of the abuse of human rights that has taken place and, to a significant measure, continues to take place. In that context, is my hon. Friend aware of article 2(c) of the UN convention on the prevention and punishment of the crime of genocide, under which "Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part" constitutes a form of genocide? My impression on my two visits was that what was taking place was genocide. Is that also the view of my hon. Friend and our right hon. Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary?

Mr. Mitchell: That is my view. My hon. Friend makes the point extremely clearly.

The 10th recommendation of the report talks about the importance of African solutions to African problems. Can the Secretary of State update us on the pledge made by the Prime Minister, which was referred to yesterday in Prime Minister's questions, to train 20,000 peacekeepers by the end of this year? In response to a question from the Leader of the Opposition yesterday, the Prime Minister specifically mentioned how important that would be to Sudan.

I want to turn briefly to a point mentioned in passing by the Secretary of State, which is the decision last year at the millennium development goals review summit to embrace a duty to protect. The Secretary of State rightly said that people hear those fine words but wonder what they actually mean. For the people the shadow Foreign Secretary and I met in the camps, those words are truly meaningless.

My substantive point is that in implementing the agreement and ensuring that the parties to the agreement, as well as those who have not yet signed but will, stand by what they have agreed and said, we will see whether the international community can summon up the political will and sense of urgency to ensure that peace comes to Darfur and that the people in the camps can return in safety to their homes and villages. When we met them, they were quite clear that they would not return unless there was a more substantial force in Darfur. What plans have been developed to translate the African Union force into a blue-hatted force? The timetable is very tight.

The UN and African Union officials whom we met during our visit were people of very great calibre and ability. I think in particular of the African Union's No. 2, General Kamanzi from Rwanda. Indeed, the Rwandan element of the African Union, one of the best groups in the Union, is a symbol of the President of Rwanda's comments who, when asked to deploy a force as part of the African Union, said that his country had suffered terribly and that it would make a significant contribution to the African Union force in Darfur, which it has. I hope that the Secretary of State will be able to tell us what progress has been made in that respect.

The Opposition believe that we need a muscular chapter 6 engagement. The difficulties of getting a serious United Nations mandate in Darfur to take the necessary action were eloquently underlined in an intervention by the hon. Member for Stroud, who pointed out that the Chinese have been extremely difficult over the wishes of much of the international community. The United Nations does not lend itself to an easy solution because of the veto structure. I fear that a proper muscular mandate will prove difficult. I hope that the Secretary of State will comment on that.

An astonishing coalition exists throughout much of the world in support of the resolution. It is extraordinary to see complete agreement in America, from left-leaning liberals to the religious right, about what needs to happen in Darfur. Although America may have been preoccupied elsewhere, it agrees about the steps that the international community must take. I hope that the Secretary of State can tell us that the European Union, too, is playing its part in resolving those difficulties.

The Secretary of State mentioned the World Food Programme announcement, which has caused such concern. Britain has done much to support that programme, and I hope that he will be able to tell us that other European countries are putting their shoulders to the wheel to help with this extremely difficult humanitarian situation. We need to provide adequate food, yet we are advised that the amount of food available means that those in receipt of it will receive only 1,000 calories a day, which is barely subsistence level.

Within the constraints set out by Kofi Annan, there are grounds for some optimism. I am deeply concerned that the international community will find it difficult to put muscular, persuasive force behind the agreement signed in Abuja. I hope that the Secretary of State will say a little more about what is to happen on the ground in respect of the translation from the African Union force to a UN force. I very much hope that the challenge in respect of the Sudanese Government and the situation in Darfur will be met through the international collective will as expressed through the United Nations and as supported forcefully by the Secretary of State and his colleagues in the British Government. I hope that that challenge will be faced down and that real progress can now be made for those whom the Secretary of State mentioned, who have had to live in the camps, often in desperately serious and worrying conditions, so that they can return to where they lived before in peace and security.

3.25 pm

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): I am glad to join in this debate, and I thank the Government for bringing this subject before the House. Not only do Members of Parliament have a great interest in this issue, but the British public are increasingly taking an interest, too. The public are rightly preoccupied with issues such as that campaigned for by Make Poverty History and with trade, aid and debt, but Darfur is now coming on to the radar screen. We as MPs will need to account to them for what is happening, as well as reflecting their interest in this debate.

We are at a tense and fragile moment for peace in Darfur. We all applaud the peace agreement signed in Abuja last week by the Sudanese Government and the largest of the rebel groups, the SLM faction led by Minni Minnawi. That is a significant achievement. We also join in the congratulations to the African Union on its leadership. By chance, I had a brief word with the Secretary of State shortly after he returned from Abuja, and he talked strongly about the effectiveness of the African Union in this situation, in moving discussions forward and providing a frame for an effective process. We congratulate him and the former Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). The United States, in the person of Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick, has also always played a role.

However, I remain very concerned that the two smaller rebel factions have not signed this agreement—most significantly the faction led by Abdel Wahed, who has the widespread support of the Fur people. We often forget that Darfur is the land of the Fur, and Abdel Wahed is a Fur. Although he has relatively few fighters at his command, having split with Minni Minnawi about a year ago, he has overwhelming support within the Fur community. His refusal to sign the peace agreement was based on the issue of compensation, and there have been riots across Darfur—in the west, the south and the north—in the past few days over compensation. We must be clear that people who lost their villages and livestock, either to the Janjaweed with the Government in complicity or directly to the Government through aerial bombing, are looking for restitution, and the restitution offered under the peace agreement is relatively modest: $300,000 as a one-off payment and an additional $200,000 over two years.

People will say, "Look, there is international aid, which will be coming in to support recovery, so this will not be the only money in play," but I understand from people close in on the ground that because of the suffering that is put at the doorstep of the Government, many of the Fur people feel that it is imperative that the restitution comes from that Government, as that would in a sense be an admission of the damage they have suffered and, so to speak, a down-payment on a different future. I wanted to raise that issue and to ask the Secretary of State to tell us more—if he is unable to do so now, then whenever that is appropriate—about the compensation issue and how that obstacle can be overcome.

The peace agreement also sets up a structure for power sharing, with the rebels now to play a role in government. Sometimes such arrangements work, and sometimes they do not, but the rebels will now have the opportunity to have, in effect, a vice-president, a senior assistant to the President. However, if I understand correctly—perhaps the Secretary of State will help me if I am wrong—that is likely to be Minni Minnawi, and Mr. Minnawi is a Zaghawa. He is not Fur, and I do not know how this arrangement would be adjusted if the Fur were to come into the agreement, but we have surely largely missed the point if the largest ethnic group does not play a role in the Government structure. I have serious issues to raise about that. We know that the rebels will have guaranteed seats in the national state assemblies and will be involved in the ministries, but how will those jobs be divided up between the many factions? Has any of that been resolved? We know from the example of Iraq that it is easier to appoint members to a Government than to turn them into a Government.

I have also been troubled that whereas the discussions in Abuja pretty much engaged the national and regional leadership, from what I understand of Darfur and Sudan more generally, tribal leaders are key participants in what happens. Nazir Saeed Madibu heads the most significant or important tribe in Darfur and has managed to keep most of his people out of the conflict by creating pacts with neighbours and taking a different, individual stand. There are others like him and I should be interested to know how those people will be brought into the process.

The Darfur-Darfur dialogue seems a long drawn-out, distant process, which is what troubles me. It seems critical that the individuals concerned should buy into the peace process as soon as possible, if things are to move forward. How realistic is the idea of planned elections by July 2009? Can they be delivered? How willing will the Khartoum Government be in three years' time to hold a referendum leading to an autonomous region of Darfur?

Security is a key precondition of the peace that we hope for. The peace agreement calls for the disarmament of the Janjaweed. Most of us would probably believe that all groups should be disarmed and that a reformed Sudanese military is needed—or one whose leadership is committed to a very different role. Otherwise arms and conflict will not be taken out of the situation. How realistic is the idea of integration of the rebel forces into the Sudanese military, given the history on both sides? Once again, Iraq is an example of a place where such an issue has been discussed from day one, and has proved nearly impossible to implement.

Any hope of security requires the transfer of peacekeeping authority from the struggling African Union, which has inadequate resources and about 7,300 troops, to a UN peacekeeping mission. What is the likelihood that the Sudanese Government will fall in line with that idea?

Mr. Drew: Don't hold your breath.

Susan Kramer: I leave it to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett), who has been following the Sudanese press, to provide an update on those concerns. The length of time needed for that transfer is a difficult issue, and the sedentary comment that I heard seems quite pertinent.

If we assume that there is an agreement to move to UN peacekeeping, we must presumably re-hat the African Union troops, but who will make up the numbers? Like the Secretary of State, I have seen 20,000 cited as an effective, meaningful number of troops to deploy.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: When the Secretary of State comes to address that point, will he advise us what else is meant by a UN force? Clearly, it is possible to re-hat the African Union soldiers, who are, within the constraints upon them, doing such a good job, but have there been discussions with NATO about providing logistical support—heavy lift support? There are, for example, 2,000 French troops close to the Chad-Darfur border, with aircraft. Clearly, NATO could make a significant contribution to a UN force. What consideration has been given to that?

Susan Kramer: The hon. Gentleman anticipates the direction of my comments—I am glad to have given a good steer. It seems critically important that the UN force should as far as possible be made up of troops from other African countries, or, potentially, from the Arab League. How do we deal with the concern that deploying white troops—troops from the west—on the ground will be treated as an echo of an imperialist past? I have concerns about bringing in NATO; I understand the logistical need, but how do we do that without creating a concern about those troops that could fracture an already fraught and rather fragile Government in Khartoum? I was concerned to hear a statement by President Bush in which he basically said that there would be NATO stewardship of the UN peacekeeping operation. That is an area in which we have to think things through extremely carefully.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Lady is entirely right, and no one is suggesting that NATO troops be placed on the ground—indeed, the Government have eloquently set out how non-African troops could be a magnet for conflict, rather than a help in resolving it—but it is clear that only an organisation such as NATO has the heavy lift equipment and the logistical support to give real muscle and mobility to African troops on the ground. I would be grateful if the Secretary of State addressed that point.

Susan Kramer: Our difficulty in finding the appropriate peacekeeping force—the African Union is not in a position to provide a sufficiently robust on-the-ground presence—is an indictment of the international community. We have so often talked of Africa sorting out its own problems; here, in many ways, is an example of Africa attempting to sort out its own problems, yet we have not provided the resources, the back-up or the resilience that would have enabled the African Union troops to manage the situation without giving rise to the questions that we now face.

I do not want to take up too much time, but let me quickly turn to two more issues, both of which have to do with aid. International donors are standing in line to offer recovery aid to Darfur. I raise a note of caution, not about the amount of recovery aid or the need for it, but about its timing. My concern springs from various conversations with non-governmental organisations in the area, which pointed out to me that sequencing matters. We must not attempt to bring in aid before there has been disarmament, before issues such as compensation are agreed on and the Fur are tied into those agreements, or before the issue of forced land ownership has been resolved. Hon. Members will know that many people have been displaced and land has been occupied, particularly in west Darfur, which has some agricultural potential. There is fear that recovery aid would lock in that occupation, rather than deal with the issue of who owns that land.

We have not tackled the issues of tribe-on-tribe violence or most issues of extortion—"self-protection payments" would be the language that we would use if it was happening on our streets—and that needs to be resolved before recovery aid is moved in. The Government have not yet lifted their unofficial embargo on trade outside the main towns. I just wanted to sound a note of caution about the overall situation and get the Government's comments on that. There is real fear that if recovery aid is brought in, people who are displaced will return to their villages, although they are unsafe, and rebuild them, that new livestock will be provided and that people will then merely become a magnet for yet another attack. So I raise the issue of the preconditions, and ask the Government how they intend to approach that set of issues.

Humanitarian aid is obviously an entirely different matter and is desperately needed. We were all shocked to find out that only 20 per cent. of the UN's appeal had been funded, and that the World Food Programme had to cut rations by 50 per cent. We understand that food stocks in the country are very low, and that the only way to get large amounts of food in now could be through airlifts, which are extremely costly.

I have been told that the World Food Programme has done an excellent and very much unsung job in distributing food, despite the violence. In the light of what has been happening in Darfur, the very fact that the WFP has been able to reach out to remote areas and reduce malnutrition rates is entirely to its credit. However, we are entering the hungry season, and as Members will know, that is not only when food stocks are at their lowest, but when most energy is needed to cultivate the next harvest, which will be in September.

Some might say that we should fill the gap with aid, but it seems to take some five months between a pledge of aid to Darfur being made and food being delivered on the ground. The World Food Programme was telling people as early as January that the crisis was coming, and it pointed to the timetable, but aid has been slow to arrive. Although I congratulate the Government on putting in another £9 million, that was in May, and the question is whether we will have a far more significant crisis on our hands by the time that money is available on the ground.

I have a couple of questions about that for the Secretary of State. First, he is one of the architects of the United Nations emergency relief fund, but where are its representatives in Darfur now? Secondly, he is one of the architects of a co-ordinated approach to aid, which, in Darfur, takes the form of the UN common humanitarian fund. Those on the ground tell me that that approach seems a positive idea, but that the bureaucratic layers that have been added to the process have delayed aid distribution to such an extent that we face a potential crisis over the next several months, until new aid, as it were, turns into food or cultivated crops provide in-country resources.

John Bercow: Given that the World Food Programme has received only 32 per cent. of the funds that it needs in 2006 to sustain its operations and that there is an estimated funding gap of $443 million, does the hon. Lady agree that it would be reasonable to put every member of the United Nations that signed up to the idea of the peace agreement on the spot by asking them exactly what they will contribute in pounds, shillings and pence that they have not previously contributed? It logically follows that that is the only way we can plug the gap.

Susan Kramer: I could not agree more. It would be the ultimate tragedy to lose the chance of peace because we failed to follow through and to lose so many Darfurians, if not quite a generation, through lack of food aid, just when we thought that we had achieved a resolution of the conflict. What people at large very much want to tell this Government and Governments across the globe is, "Don't give us the spin. Give us the beef" and, in this case, "Deliver the food." I therefore agree that the hon. Gentleman's suggestion is significant.

I shall make just two more quick remarks before I sit down. We must be conscious of the context of the Darfur crisis, and it would be helpful to understand how much Darfur is at risk from surrounding instability. Civil war is spiralling out of control in Chad, and many of us are anxious to ensure that at least the Chadian rebel strongholds in Darfur are closed down and dealt with in the context of the peace agreement. East Sudan is scarcely ever discussed, but many people say that a potential humanitarian crisis is developing there, on a scale that overshadows the crisis in Darfur. Who on earth is negotiating with the Eastern Front rebel group? Knowing more about that would help us to set the current issue in context. The Secretary of State talked about the success of the north-south comprehensive peace agreement in the south, but many feel that it is not playing out with quite the robustness that was intended. Simple measures, such as the promised publication of data on oil resources, which would allow us to understand the allocation between north and south, do not seem to have worked their way through into practical reality.

Darfur, like Sudan generally, was once a peaceful multi-ethnic society. Then came drought, and people started to move, to look for other land and to displace other people. In a strange way, we have seen a microcosm—a very localised form—of the disruption, conflict and suffering that comes from climate change. There is a lesson in that, but if we cannot deal with Darfur, as contained as it is, I wonder how we will deal with the much larger dislocation that climate change will cause in the future.

3.44 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer). I shall come back to some of the points that she made. It was also good to hear the spokesman for the official Opposition, the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell), who went to Darfur and, I am sure, learned a lot.

I also want to say how much I appreciate the efforts of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—I have been able to put that in print in the form of an early-day motion. He addressed the all-party group on Sudan just after he had got off the plane from the Darfur peace talks. I thought that he could not do any more, but he went off to northern Uganda and Somalia and returned to address us today. I do not know whether there is much more that one can say about his stamina, let alone his interest in these issues, with all the problems that they bring with them.

It is easy to criticise some groups for the way in which they raise money and for some of the lobbying that they undertake. However, the all-party group on Sudan is a model for what it has tried to do in this place and beyond. I pay tribute to my predecessor, Hilton Dawson, who was a wonderful chairman and who went to Darfur with the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) and me. I also pay tribute to our current co-ordinator, Senait Petros, who keeps us wonderfully well informed of everything that is happening with Sudan, and to her predecessor, Sultana Begum.

I do not want to speak for long because this will be a consensual debate, albeit we could disagree on what more could be done and what lessons could be learned. However, something that may not have come out as clearly as it should is that, although we have had to analyse and play our part in trying to resolve the recent crisis, many of the problems date back some considerable time. Anyone who has time to read the two recent books on Darfur by Flint and de Waal, who are well known commentators, and by Gérard Prunier, whom I have had the opportunity to meet—yes, I will put those books back in the Library shortly—will at least gain an understanding that these are, in some respects, age-old conflicts. I am talking about the question of who belongs to the Fur and who belongs to the Zaghawa. The Masalit is another tribe that is very dominant in Darfur.

Sadly, tribal conflict goes back a long way. In many respects, this is where, as always, the British come in, because it was largely our decision that put Darfur in Sudan. We cannot escape that responsibility. With regard to what the hon. Member for Richmond Park said, I would not exaggerate and say that this is the first conflict for which global warming has been directly responsible, but it certainly contributed, in that the nomads have been driven south and have come into conflict with the pasturalists. In many respects, the conflict is about land—who has the land and who is keeping animals there. One should never underestimate the importance of animals. One lesson that the hon. Member for Buckingham and I learned was that, as much as seeing people starve to death is terribly difficult to come to terms with and when we see dead donkeys we think, "Well, thank goodness they are not children", the Darfurians would say, "But those animals are our future." If people do not have a donkey to carry firewood back to the settlement, they have no future—they will die.

Let me explain another fact from which we can never escape. As the hon. Lady mentioned, Sudan—that huge area that we call a country—has suffered from the problem of balkanisation for a considerable time. Many of the antecedents of the conflict came from the south; in the early days, the Sudan People's Liberation Movement/Sudan People's Liberation Army had a lot of influence over the Sudan Liberation Army/Sudan Liberation Movement. Furthermore, the work of Mr. al-Turabi through the Justice and Equality Movement cannot be underestimated, given that it added to the belief of those in the Darfur area that they were getting less than those who had taken up arms in the south, and made them ask why they should not take up arms, as they could become beneficiaries by fighting in that conflict.

The hon. Lady was right to mention east Sudan. I make no apology for asking that this time, please, the world must get ahead of the conflict, given that there is already evidence that it is happening on the ground. We have to prevent it from happening, not just pick up the pieces. It is vital that we look at what is happening in the east of the country and continue to support the comprehensive peace agreement in the south. Given that the eyes of the world have been on Darfur, the danger is that it is easy to say that that is where the aid and effort should go, but the south might begin to slip back into problems.

We have reached a good stage. Six months ago, some of us would have despaired about whether there was ever going to be anything like a peace agreement. There will not really be peace be until we get it on the ground. However, Minni Minnawi's faction has been willing to come formally into discussions via my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's good agencies and Robert Zoellick, through the Sudan Government. It is good that that has moved forward rather rapidly.

However, as the hon. Lady said, there are still the other two factions—that of Abdel Wahed, and the Ibrahim faction of the Justice and Equality Movement. Both are still outside the process. One hopes that they will see the benefits that the Minni Minnawi faction gets—sooner rather than later—and that that will encourage them to lay down their arms.

One of the challenges that has not been mentioned is who will disarm the Janjaweed. It is easy to cast aspersions. In an intervention on my right hon. Friend, I mentioned the role of Musa Hilal. In his eyes, the Janjaweed was not a tool of the Sudanese Government, although he was occasionally seen in a Government of Sudan army colonel's uniform. He lectured us at length about his justification—that his people had for years been abused and shut out from the opportunities to share in the riches of the area, let alone the wider country.

In recent times, it has been clear that some of the things going wrong on the ground have been not about political movements, or even about people feeling that they are justified in doing the things they do because of what has happened previously, but about sheer banditry. That is the difficulty with putting a force in on the ground. We need numbers because the operation is not only for peacekeeping, but policing. People have grown used to the fact that they take what they believe to be theirs—even if it is not theirs in any way, they still take it.

The all-party group has built a relationship with the Sudan Organisation Against Torture, in the face of the most vicious attacks by the Government of Sudan, who demand that the British Government stop funding it. We have continued to fund it. It brings to our attention some of the worst aspects of depravity, whether they be the attacks on villages or the summary justice that is issued on the back of them, where the so-called "perpetrators" are arrested and all sorts of things happen. One can never cease to be amazed at the irony that we must get used to when dealing with Sudan. In terms of the Darfur-to-Darfur dialogue and civil society, some of us found it difficult that the representative who was put before us as the best person to talk on behalf of civil society when we were dealing with the south-south dialogue was Mrs. Garang. She, of course, was the wife of John Garang. Some of us found it difficult to understand that we were dealing with civil society, because her husband was leading the SPLM.

Likewise, the previous time that we were in Darfur, we heard a wonderful lecture by the Minister for human rights—at least, he called himself that—Ali Osman Taha's brother. He said that the best thing to teach people about human rights was to indulge in Hudood—lopping people's hands and legs off—because they then understood what human rights were all about. Irony is strong in Sudan, and it is sometimes difficult to bring ourselves back to western values and understand how we approach the problem.

As the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield said, there is clearly an issue about the role of international non-governmental organisations. The worst offences against them are the delaying of visas and people making it difficult for them to operate on the ground. I hope that my right hon. Friend will say something about how we will engage with the Government of Sudan in particular, this time, so that we allow those organisations to operate freely and with a degree of effectiveness that has not been possible in the past. We are all aware that we do not know what has been happening in whole areas of Darfur, because the NGOs have not been able to get into them. They have had no protection, and that is as much to do with the Sudanese Government as it is to do with the rebels' activities.

The UN Security Council visit on 5 to 9 June will presumably begin to examine how the UN can take over from the AU. I pay tribute to the AU. It can be much criticised about the things that have not gone as well as they might have done, but, as my right hon. Friend said, this is its first real test. It has performed as well as could be expected and in many respects better than that, but there is still a shortfall in manpower.

There is also an issue about how the transference of power is to be managed: whether things go through NATO or directly to the UN. It is a bit worrying that, in a sense, as the transition occurs, people take their eyes off the ball. The last thing we want is the AU to start thinking it can withdraw troops because its job is over. In addition, those who have been funding it might think that they might as well start funding the UN or NATO as an interim agency. In reality, we must keep people doing the jobs that they are doing. We cannot allow a further vacuum to develop. That is an important consideration.

The humanitarian situation is everything. I have talked about the human rights abuses. We sometimes grow used to them, but we must never ignore them, and they need to be highlighted. There is an idea about a donor conference; I gather it is being planned for

[Mr. David Drew]

September. It would be useful if my right hon. Friend told us what is expected. We clearly need more money. How will that be organised? What is being sought? Are we seeking just money, money and food, or money, food and the means to be able to move to the UN mandate being properly delivered? Who else are we trying to bring on board? It would be wonderful if the Chinese could think outside their self-interested approach to the country and be brought on board as part of the resolution rather than as a large part of the problem because of their specific role, as I said to the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield.

John Bercow: I am slightly alarmed by what the hon. Gentleman just said, because I understand that Kofi Annan said on Monday that there will be a pledging conference of donors in June, not September, and that it is incredibly important that donors should not wait for that conference, but should make clear commitments and be "very generous" now.

Mr. Drew: The hon. Gentleman is probably much more knowledgeable than I am. It is quite likely—my right hon. Friend will arbitrate between us—that the September conference has been brought forward to June, which can only be a good thing. The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that dates slip occasionally. The main thing is that the world is engaged and that matters are properly organised, because we have only one chance to get it right.

On the comprehensive peace agreement, for the Darfur-to-Darfur dialogue to stand any chance, we must learn from what has been going on in the south. It is early days there, but all the evidence is that the only chance for long-term peace in Darfur is if we develop not just a political solution, but one in which civil society has a specific mandate and responsibilities. It must play its role in a way that will, over time, bring about a normalisation of events on the ground. Given the history of the area, what is normal is very difficult to understand from our western point of view, but we have to work incredibly hard to build up the things that will prove that we are making a difference to people's lives in education, health, social services and how people are catered for. That simply has never occurred, and that has been the stimulus for people taking up arms, because they think, "What difference does it make? We might as well fight for what we believe we can achieve," rather than see a growing dialogue.

I would be interested to know a bit more about how we are learning from the south-to-south dialogue, primitive as it might be, in relation to the Darfur-to-Darfur dialogue, and how genuinely civil society can grow, take its part, take responsibility and be given a real role, given that the history of Sudan tells us that the Sudanese Government will start interfering. I expect that the hon. Member for Buckingham will have something to say on that.

I leave things on a negative note, because my speech has been largely positive. We have all learned to our cost that what the Government of Sudan say is not necessarily the whole truth or something that we can take as read. It would be good to hear that the inclusion of Ministers from the SPLM into the Government is beginning to make a difference, and that the Government, with their unified command, can be trusted to deliver the things that the world—not just the UK or EU—expects of them. We know why Sudan did not get the presidency of the AU. If the Government of Sudan want to achieve that status in the future, they must be able to deliver not only the words but the actions on the ground. That is very important, and I hope that we can trust them to do that.

4.4 pm

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The people of Darfur have been victims of some of the most egregious human rights abuses inflicted on anyone, anywhere in the world at any time in recent memory. It is important to recognise the significance and enormity of the suffering that has taken place and not simply jump on to the next stage. Aerial bombing, mass shooting, widespread rape, destruction of crops, theft of livestock, poisoned water supplies, and human beings chained together and burned alive have all been part of the cocktail of barbarity that has scarred the conscience of the world.

I intervened on my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) because some time ago I concluded that genocide versus non-genocide, which is a discussion that could take place about what has transpired in Darfur, is not a semantic debate. It is not simply a matter of the choice of terminology of one individual or another. It is a matter of real significance both because we understand that certain consequences and actions ordinarily are expected to flow from a judgment in international law that genocide has been committed, and because it is important that our moral conscience should be stirred by what has happened.

My impression is that the events that have taken place—the calculated and remorseless evil that has been committed in Darfur—do amount to genocide. In those circumstances, and with the best will in the world and recognising the merit of constructive discourse for the purpose of future progress, I find it incredibly difficult simply to take at face value the commitments that have thus far been made. It is especially difficult when those who have entered into those commitments and to whom we were particularly looking for statements and signatures are people who have themselves conspired to commit that genocide. As the Secretary of State will understand, I refer principally to the Government of Sudan.

There has been a good deal of consensus among right hon. and hon. Members today, and, in a sense, it is healthy. I do not seek to puncture that for the sake of doing so, and I do not dismiss its merit in total, but it is important to issue this caveat: the present period is simultaneously one of great opportunity and one of supreme danger. I say "supreme danger" because in practical terms we must learn from the experience of the past. We are all fond of invoking the importance of learning from past experience, of seeking to develop better practices for the future and of acknowledging the need never again to tolerate genocide and mass slaughter, but what does that mean in practice?

Let us think of what took place in Rwanda in 1994. If we are not careful, there could be a direct parallel between the Arusha peace agreement and the present situation. In the end, the Arusha peace agreement was signed and progress towards its implementation was starting to be made, but the extremists were planning the ultimate genocide. In other words, people of thoroughly ill will were planning to use a period in which there was a semblance of good will—and, dare I say it, perhaps accidental complacency—to force through the slaughter that they had in mind. I do not want something similar to happen in Darfur. I mention this—the Secretary of State's brow is momentarily furrowed—because I am concerned about the scale of the killing that might still be taking place, and it worries me that I cannot get accurate figures.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: My hon. Friend is confronting directly the issue that I skirted around but which I put in several ways to the Secretary of State. What provisions or plans are the international community making in case, as a result of events that have taken place, it is unable to enforce its will upon the Government of Sudan and other warring parties in Sudan? What provisions or planning does the Secretary of State believe the United Nations and others should be making to confront that possibility?

John Bercow: That is a pertinent intervention from my hon. Friend. I have been unhappy for some months about the sequence of events. It seemed intolerable that earlier this year, foot-stamping by the Sudanese Government effectively vetoed an urgently required UN troop deployment. It was put off ostensibly until September, but it might prove to be longer than that.

I want to focus briefly on the key issues. First, in so far as the African Union mission in Sudan is concerned, will the Secretary of State at least say something more about what is envisaged? What additional help will be provided, how much is it expected to cost, and which countries are, so far, committed to providing a contribution and at what level? Is there to be simply a ratcheting-up of numbers of personnel, or a change and a strengthening of mandate in the period between now and the start of October?

It seems in no way alarmist but merely a sober reflection of reality for the Aegis Trust, a magnificent anti-genocide organisation and sponsor of the "Protect Darfur" campaign, to observe that unless significant action on security is taken now, there is a danger of a void that would, in its word, be "disastrous"—the threat then being that Darfur would deteriorate into what the trust describes as irretrievable chaos.

I understand that the Secretary of State is not the sole player; he cannot act alone. However, at a time when we are saying that it is good that there is a peace agreement because it is much better that there should be than there should not be, it is important that we do not neglect our constitutional responsibility to ask exactly what is going to happen, when it will happen, who will ensure that it happens and, as a result, what we can expect to be the consequences of improved security.

If we then press the fast-forward button to the intended transfer of responsibility to the United Nations, as far as one can reasonably foresee or guarantee, will that transfer take place on 1 October? If it takes place on that date, does that mean that a full deployment will begin that day and be completed shortly afterwards? Or does it mean simply that some other agreement or statement will be the recipient of signatories on 1 October?

I do not wish in any sense to trivialise what is an incredibly important debate, in respect of which I have not the slightest doubt about the sincerity, integrity and commitment of the right hon. Gentleman; but in such situations, I sometimes worry that when we are told that something is going to happen—for example, that there will be a troop deployment and that it will begin in October—it is analogous to the conversation that one might have when ordering a taxi from a hard-pressed firm. One says to the controller, "When will the taxi come?", and he says, possibly after a moment's hesitation, "It'll be 15 minutes, sir." And one says, "Do you really mean 15 minutes, or do you mean that you would like it to be 15 minutes, but in practice, it is much more likely to be half an hour?" I would rather know. I ask the Secretary of State in all sincerity, will he give us a little more information?

I admire the right hon. Gentleman greatly, and I think that he is an extremely good Secretary of State for International Development. I also happen personally to have a very high regard for the former Foreign Secretary, the Leader of the House of Commons, the right hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). I hope therefore that it will not be taken in the wrong spirit if I say that although I greatly esteem both right hon. Gentlemen, I do not exonerate the Government entirely from responsibility for the sorry saga that has beset the people of Darfur. It is not really good enough simply to blame others. DFID has done a superb job, but I have been much less sanguine about the foreign policy response of the international community, in respect of which the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has had a part to play.

Today is not the day to explore in detail whether sequencing took place, inadvertently or calculatedly, but we must all examine our consciences very carefully and unsparingly, with a view to trying to ensure that foreign policy responses in the future are much more robust and that they reflect the words contained in international agreements and public protocols. I think, for example, of the United Nations' responsibility to protect and the UN millennium review summit, which was referred to earlier.

We would like to have some idea, just on the numbers, of what the Secretary of State might consider an appropriate peacekeeping force. I was honest enough to say—and if I had not been, it would probably have been readily discovered in any meaningful exchange—that I have no expertise whatever in military planning, strategy or logistics. However, it worries me greatly that we still do not seem to have much sense of what the scale of the peacekeeping commitment is intended to be.

On the one hand, the Aegis Trust has proffered into the public domain the figure of 25,000 troops, which it judges might be required for the peacekeeping task. On the other hand, General Romeo Dallaire, who is not exactly uninformed about such matters, having had the searing experience of trying to cope in wholly inadequate circumstances in Rwanda, long ago suggested that 44,000 troops would be required. There is also the view of Major General Collins Ihikere, the AMIS force commander, who is on the record somewhere as speculating that up to 60,000 troops could be required.

There is a huge difference between the figure of 7,000 talked about for the African Union force and the figures that I have quoted; indeed, there are even huge differences between 25,000, 44,000 and 60,000. Is the truth of the matter that the judgment will not really be made on the basis of the peacekeeping requirement, but will end up being involuntarily made on the basis of the relative parsimony of the individual contributor nations?

If that is the reality, we ought at least to be honest with ourselves about it. If we know that far more troops are needed, but that far fewer will be provided because countries are not prepared to cough up, let us please at least abandon the truly stomach-churning hypocrisy of claiming that the international community is now seriously concerned about bringing an end to the genocide. One might conclude—it would be sad, but probably inevitable to have to do so—that the international community was not that bothered about black Africans dying in Darfur, as opposed to people dying in Yugoslavia, Kosovo or Iraq.

Will the Secretary of State tell us something about the interesting idea of police-keeping and apply his remarks to the real crisis of insecurity and the sense of terror that had been pervasive in the camps for too long? On both my visits, with the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) and subsequently with members of the Select Committee, the most striking feature was the spontaneous and unprompted response from people suffering in the camps. As the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) knows only too well, when they were asked, "What's your greatest concern? What is the biggest handicap you face? What is the most striking impediment to progress in your lives?", they all said, "Lack of security. We are not safe. We are terrified." If then asked the supplementary question, "From what have you fled and what are you frightened of?", the answer was, almost always, the Government of Sudan and the Janjaweed and other militias.

I would be interested to hear more about security in the camps, because there is desperate concern that they will eventually prove to be not temporary places of refuge for a suffering, impoverished and starving population, but the permanent sanctuary of people who simply dare not go anywhere else for fear that they will be killed or raped if they attempt to do so.

My last point for the Secretary of State, which I want to float with colleagues, concerns the significance of the International Criminal Court. I can be explicit and very generous, although no more generous than I think the facts warrant. The British Government have been completely robust and sound on the importance of referrals to the International Criminal Court. My impression is that both the Foreign Office and DFID have been committed from the outset. I believe that it is in no small measure due to the efforts of the Secretary of State and the former Foreign Secretary that the United States Administration came on side. I was quite worried about that because on the one hand the United States Administration had been the first to say that there was genocide in Darfur, but on the other hand we know the real reservations about and even hostility to the International Criminal Court that President Bush and his team felt and articulated. The fact that the British Government had a hand in persuading the United States Administration not to veto a referral to the ICC was a very significant development indeed.

As the Secretary of State probably knows, I am by nature and disposition a suspicious soul and I make no apology for that. I can well understand that there might be a point—it could even be now—at which some people would be inclined to say that I should not focus too much on that matter at the moment because it is important to establish security, to tackle the humanitarian crisis and to try to make progress towards referendums and the development of life and so on, and that it would rather cloud the issue if I were to bang on too much about referrals to the ICC. My view is that it is important to establish the position and get some commitments on referrals to the ICC.

What worries me is that in the name of securing peace and preventing a resumption of aggressive hostilities by the Government of Sudan it might be suggested, either expressly or implicitly, that it would be a good idea to go gently on referrals. It is imperative that there should be no impunity for those who are guilty of slaughter. Those individuals, wherever they come from, who are suspected of genocide, war crimes or crimes against humanity must be dragged, kicking and screaming if necessary, before the International Criminal Court. We have the advantage of precedent and the knowledge that flows from it. Yes, important work has been done in relation to war crimes in Rwanda, but it is frankly a damning indictment of the international community that the whole process from start to finish will have taken approximately 14 years.

I shall not refer in detail to any of those circumstances because we are debating Darfur, but right hon. and hon. Members will be aware of the controversy surrounding Charles Munyaneza who is suspected of responsibility for war crimes and attempted genocide in Rwanda and is currently living in Bedford in this country. We do not want, in years to come, individuals to seek asylum in Britain when they are suspected of bestial war crimes in Darfur and when it is said to be too late to do anything. I say that, as the Secretary of State knows, with no hostility to the legitimate pursuit of asylum. He will understand that on such matters I take a liberal conservative view. I greatly value the reputation of this country as one that gives sanctuary to those fleeing prosecution, but we cannot allow our procedures to be abused by those who are seeking to flee their just desserts and the acceptance of responsibility for what they have done.

I want it to be made clear that the people who are suspected of such crimes will be referred, that we will get regular updates and be told what is taking place and that resources will be invested. There are two reasons for that. First, it is right that those who are guilty of slaughtering other people should pay the price—I mean that in strict juridical terms. I am not arguing for revenge, or calling for the death penalty; I do not believe in state murder. But they should be forced to accept responsibility for what they have done. Secondly, it is vital that they are brought to book for the simple reason of deterrence. If ever we are to reach a situation in which we can genuinely say that it will never happen again, we must ensure that we can show that those who did it before copped it as a result.

I have spoken with some force and passion on these matters because I have immensely strong feelings about the subject. It has been so far a worthwhile debate. I listened with the greatest interest and respect to what the Secretary of State had to say, but we must focus on the details. We have to be particular and we have a responsibility, in a sense, almost to be pedantic. Better that we be pedantic in focusing on the detail than we be guilty of the rather unedifying spectacle of telling each other how well we have done. I do not think that we have a right to do that when so many have been killed and when so much suffering continues to take place. The truth is that far too many people in Darfur have suffered too much for too long with far too little done about it. Some progress is now being made and I have every confidence that the Secretary of State will exercise his good offices. I hope that he will take the prods that I have offered this afternoon in the positive spirit for the benefit of people in Darfur in which they were intended.

4.27 pm

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): The situation in Darfur is possibly the greatest humanitarian crisis of our time. If there is one part of the world where everything that could combine to cause the maximum of human suffering and misery did so, Darfur is it. Conflict, with the Arab militias and the Janjaweed, too many guns, a corrupt Government, global warming, religious divides, refugees, famine, human rights abuse, civil war and poverty: the scale of the problem, like the scale of the country, is different from that here in the UK.

The debate so far has been excellent. I particularly commend the speech by the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), who is always a hard act to follow, but there have been excellent speeches from members of all parties. The Chairman of the Select Committee, whose report was mentioned earlier today, would have been here were the Select Committee not visiting the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

The numbers might be estimates, but they are all staggering, with more than 3 million people needing food aid and up to 300,000 estimated by the UN to have died in Darfur during the conflict. Millions have fled their destroyed villages with many heading for camps near the main towns or over the border into Chad. The Janjaweed patrol outside camps: Darfurians are killed and women raped if they venture too far in search of firewood or water. Some 200,000 Darfurians have sought safety in Chad, but many are camped along the border and in danger of attack. There are also those who, although they have not been displaced, have been impoverished by the collapse of the rural economy caused by the continuing violence in the countryside.

Early in 2006, a total of 3.5 million Darfurians, more than half of the region's population, were in need of humanitarian assistance. Nowhere is Sudan's humanitarian crisis as acute as in west Darfur, and the United Nations estimates that 716,000 people have been uprooted and have taken refuge in internally displaced persons camps over the past two and a half years.

The images from my last visit are lodged in my mind, and they will be brought back to life this summer when I hope to return. They are images of villages burned out, attacked in a co-ordinated way from the sky and the ground, and of Antonov bombers and helicopter gunships sitting side by side with the white helicopters of the AU, mentioned by the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell). They left me and others with no doubt about what had been happening and who were involved.

We visited camps where we met women and children and old people but relatively few men: the men were either dead, fighting or missing. We watched people walking for miles with nothing and starting again with the few basics of life—PVC sheets, food, some soap, containers for water, but not much more. We saw women taking their lives in their hands as they risked everything to obtain firewood, while in the distance they could see men waiting to rape them or possibly kill them.

I pay tribute to the non-governmental organisations and the workers, who are doing an excellent job. Many of them are young and some are inexperienced, but they have real commitment. They are from various organisations including Médecins sans Frontières and Oxfam. However, I pay special tribute to Save the Children, which pulled out of Darfur following the execution of two of its staff in a roadside incident. That incident followed another two of its staff being killed by landmines.

Even with the work that is going on in Darfur, the UN estimates that it has no access, or only limited access, to about 650,000 civilians who need assistance. Those people are living close to the edge of a cliff that has a very long drop. Relief workers are struggling to reach hundreds of thousands of civilians in dire need of food, water, shelter and protection from further attacks. Jan Egeland, the UN's emergency relief co-ordinator said recently that humanitarian access was the worst it had been since the spring of 2004, and:

> "The world's largest aid effort now hangs in the balance...If we are to avoid an imminent, massive loss of life, we need immediate action".

The work being done by those agencies in villages with no water, no sanitation, no food, little health care and little security makes the task ahead—at least to restore security, which, as the hon. Member for Buckingham said, is the basic requirement; the rest will follow—all the more important.

DFID's role in the reconstruction and the funding promised by others is important. I pay tribute to the Secretary of State for once again briefing Members immediately on returning from his trip. It is not the first time that he has done so. I clearly remember that after visiting the earthquake in Pakistan he flew straight back and reported to the House.

I would like to raise a number of issues following on from that visit and the recent signing of the peace agreement. The UN force must be deployed as a united force, not as a common enemy from outside. As the Secretary of State said, there is no reason for it to be a problem. If the UN force can continue to hold the peace in the south and to bring peace in Darfur region, it will have been a great success.

Even in areas where humanitarian agencies have had safe access to civilians, the Sudanese Government have obstructed relief activities, as we heard from the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). In fact, one could go so far as to say that they had conducted a campaign of administrative harassment; the restrictions included delaying visas and travel authorisations, using laws to regulate the activities of NGOs and imposing arbitrary and onerous regulations on humanitarian agencies.

We saw that happen also during the 21-year civil war in south Sudan; the Government regularly blocked humanitarian agencies, using tactics ranging from outright denials to flight bans and an array of other obstacles. Those delays must not be allowed to continue in Darfur. The role of the Sudanese Government was mentioned by the hon. Member for Buckingham, who is not known for mincing his words.

The recent peace treaty almost assumes that the Sudanese Government are an innocent party, hoping to resolve the problem by incorporating the rebels into the army and the police. To a certain extent, the fact that up till now there has been co-operation between the Sudanese Government and those groups is being ignored. That point was raised by the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield.

We can learn from what is happening elsewhere. Following the conflict in Sierra Leone much training was given to former combatants in carpentry, mechanics and blacksmithing, but, because the economy had not taken off, there was little or no demand for those skills or the products that they produced. Blacksmithing tools are now lying stored in a warehouse. It is important that the wealth of the country is spread, or the divide will remain and the frustration will grow. The unemployed youth who previously went out to fire a gun will be even more frustrated if he is trained and then finds out that no one wants his skills. The country is rich in oil revenues, which must be spread throughout the country, so that the economy can once again come to life. There is a risk that if the economy remains poor, or remains in the hands of a few, conflict will return.

Avoiding a return to violence after it has stopped is a challenge for all involved, and much reconstruction work is required. The basic infrastructure of roads, water supply, health facilities and education is lacking in many parts of the country. The democratic institutions need to be rebuilt and such basics as water supply will make a huge difference.

We must take heed of what is happening in the south after the signing of the peace agreement and the civil war. The war caused the death of about 2 million people. According to humanitarian agencies the death toll was one of the highest in any war since 1945. It ended with the signing of a peace agreement, but in the fight for control of southern Sudan one in five of the southern Sudanese population was killed.

Expectations in the south have, however, been raised, and those who have been fighting are waiting for a peace dividend. If there is no sign of that the ingredients for conflict will be present, and the conflict could resume. My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) mentioned compensation. The danger in compensation is that individual political groups will try to outbid each other in offering large amounts. That will raise expectations and, when those are not fulfilled, the frustration may end in violence.

We look forward, following the signing of the peace agreement, to elections to regional government in Darfur. However, I have a word of warning: we should not expect that the advent of elections will necessarily bring immediate peace. When the Select Committee recently took evidence, a witness answered our question about what factor was most often overrated in post-conflict situations by saying that it was elections: often, there is an expectation that conflict will reduce after everyone has had their vote, when, in reality, there is usually a lull before the elections, when everyone thinks that they will get their way through the ballot box, but conflict resumes when they lose.

I hope that those who have suffered most will have access to compensation to help them rebuild their lives. They are starting from a low level and will not need a huge amount to get them back on the bottom rung of the ladder. However, what is needed in Sudan and Darfur is good leadership and the recognition that those who led the fighting are not always the best people to lead the reconstruction. We look to Sudan and Darfur to produce politicians whom we can trust. That has not been the case so far.

Other hon. Members have mentioned the permanence of the camps. That will be a problem. The World Food Programme has been successful in supplying food to those who are hungry. Oxfam and Médecins sans Frontières have been providing water, sanitation and health care facilities. People are now being urged to go back, if peace holds, to their villages, where there are few, if any, of those facilities.

We must also keep in mind the contribution of other parts of the world to the conflict in Sudan. There are, as I said earlier, too many guns in the country. There have been concerns about the rise in imports to Sudan from Libya. Libya has had sanctions lifted and can now import weapons. Old, second-hand weapons are leaving Libya and crossing the border into Sudan. There is also concern about the supply of arms from Russia and the fact that Sudan's oil is going to China. As was mentioned earlier, it is all part of one, large problem, because the oil from Sudan is fuelling the fastest-growing economy in the world, which has one of the most rapidly growing rates of pollution. That affects global warming, which affects the very nomads and herdsmen who find that they have nowhere to feed their animals and there are conflicts over land rights.

John Bercow: The hon. Gentleman's warning about the fragility of the situation is salutary, as is his reminder that elections should not be regarded as a panacea. Would he agree that, at least for a period, the emphasis of any financial assistance from the international community should be on humanitarian aid on the one hand and security, security, security on the other, before we get on to things such as education, education, education? I make that point not out of a spirit of meanness, but because we have a fiduciary responsibility to contribute our resources to best effect, and not to leap ahead of ourselves.

John Barrett: One key issue relating to security is planning for what happens next. If I may take the hon. Gentleman back to the planning for the war in Iraq, there was no doubt that, by a certain date, a certain number of troops had to be in place and certain actions had to follow. There is a real concern that, even with the best of intentions, dates are not met and security is not delivered on time. If that security is not delivered, nothing else can follow. Large sums of money have been committed by the UK Government and others—it is good to hear that the US announced an additional $225 million in emergency aid this week—but all the money pouring into the country will not solve the problem without security and without good governance.

On the increased involvement of the US, it was mentioned both on the liberal left and on the right that there seemed to be a feeling in the US that the subject is now at the top of the agenda. I pay tribute to a number of people, including celebrities such as George Clooney and Mia Farrow, who have brought the issue on to America's television screens. In the past, public opinion has often followed where the news crews have been. I am sad to say that there are many regions of Sudan that news crews cannot get to, so there is much more to be concerned about.

When the hon. Member for Buckingham and I were in Sudan with the Select Committee, there had been killings in Port Sudan in the east. The Sudan Organisation Against Torture detailed exactly what happened, and we were left in no doubt that the Sudanese Government had played their part. We got details of the killings of young men, young women, and older women and men; no one was immune. It is good that the issue is at the top of the agenda in the UK, the United States and many countries around the world. We must not allow what has gone on for far too long in Sudan to continue, and I hope that with the recent signing of the peace agreement, we are heading towards the light at the end of a very long tunnel.

4.43 pm

Hilary Benn: With the leave of the House, I would like to respond to this excellent debate. I say that not because there has been a cosy consensus, to address the point made by the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) directly, but because, in the past two-and-a-bit hours, we have laid bare the practical and moral choices and challenges that we face in trying to do something about the trauma that the people of Darfur have suffered. I shall take each speech in turn and do my best to respond to the many points raised.

I begin by paying tribute to the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) for the interest that he has taken, for his visit, for the pertinent questions that he asked, and for going to the heart of the moral challenge that we face. I shall try to respond to each of his questions. As far as humanitarian access is concerned, one bit of progress—they are small steps—was made earlier this year. I raised this point during my visit a couple of months ago. The Government of Sudan have been operating a fast-track process to clear humanitarian workers' visas and permits. They proposed to bring that process to an end, but others were able to persuade them to extend it to the end of the current year.

That is one example of the constant struggle—I use the word deliberately—that we must engage in to get a lobby as each case comes up. It is a responsibility of the ambassadors and representatives in Khartoum and of each Minister to play our part. I will continue to do what I have done throughout: if people bring cases to my attention, including hon. Members taking part in this debate and others, I will take them up. Experience has taught me that that is the only way to keep up the pressure.

During the course of my visit, one of the questions concerned AMIS's difficulty using the el-Fasher airport at night. It had been said that the problem was a lack of lighting. Because of my visit there, I was able to say to the Minister, "Well, that's very curious. I've seen the lighting on the apron and the runway, and as far as I understand it, the problem is you providing someone to open up the control tower, turn on the lights and provide air traffic control after the hours of darkness so that if AMIS wishes to fly in and out, it can do its work." It was as absurd as trying to apply a curfew to AMIS in Darfur in the interests of security instead of applying it to those causing trouble.

Have the Government of Sudan complied? Self-evidently, none of the parties has complied. That is why one of the individuals against whom sanctions have been applied is someone from the Government of Sudan military. The Select Committee report to which the hon. Gentleman referred asked the Government to get on the case and do something about it. That is why we have been working so hard to get the sanctions committee to do its work—to look at a list of names, to weigh up the evidence and, if the evidence is sufficient to justify sanctions, to get on and apply them. That is how to send a message. It is not by saying to the parties, "Please do what you promised"; it is by demonstrating the consequences.

Have others in Africa helped? As well as paying tribute to President Obasanjo, I pay tribute to President Konare, as he is known, of the African Union and President Sassou-Nguesso, the chair of the African Union. They both came to the final stages of the negotiations in Abuja and lent their weight and moral authority on behalf of the nations of Africa. They put pressure on the parties, who were invited in one by one to sit at the table and be asked, "Are you going to sign? What's the problem? Why won't you do it?" I do not think that the one signature, that of Minni Minnawi, would have been achieved if the African Union had not demonstrated its determination to help in that practical way.

On the African stand-by force, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the G8 countries that committed to help with that training are well on target to meet their commitments on training requirements, and that the AU is making progress in setting up the necessary logistics to make the force work. If he is interested in more information about that, I shall be happy to provide it.

The hon. Gentleman raised a point about the UN force, as did the hon. Member for Buckingham and others. We have heard various estimates in this debate, ranging from 12,000 to 40,000. To be honest, I have no more expertise than the hon. Member for Buckingham. That is why the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations exists. It needs urgently to get in there and make its assessment through a UN technical assessment mission so that it can confirm what the right numbers are, what the mandate should be and how the force should be composed. UN Security

[Hilary Benn]

Council resolution 1679, which was passed recently, was important because it called for that to be done by 23 May.

The hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield is absolutely right to want practical steps. The first practical step to answering all the questions about how the UN force should work and be composed is getting the team in so that it can work. But in all honesty, because of the loss of time, the chances of getting a force up and running by 1 October are very slim. That is the truth, because that team has not been able to get in and start the process of preparing.

One issue that the UN force is going to face is providing water for troops. I spoke to the deputy head of the DPKO in New York a month and a half ago, and I remember that she put her hand on a map of Darfur and said, "There is not a lot of water north of this line." Such practical considerations will have to be addressed if the force is to be able to do its job. I assure hon. Members that we will press for a sufficient number of troops and a strong mandate at the UN Security Council in exactly the same way as we did in the debates, about a year ago, on the size of the MONUC—Mission of the United Nations in the Democratic Republic of the Congo—force in the DRC. Some people did not want an increase in those forces at all, and some wanted a lot. Britain pressed very hard for an increase.

NATO has already been providing logistical support, including heavy lift, to get the AU troops in and out of Darfur as their terms have rotated. All of us in the international community, including NATO, need to consider what further practical support to the AU mission is required. Another practical thing that Britain has done is to provide vehicles, because AMIS said that, "If we don't have vehicles, we can't get out and do our job." That is why we have taken responsibility for one of the fuel contracts, so that there is enough fuel to put in the vehicles and helicopters for AMIS to do its work. I have to tell hon. Members that about 90 per cent. of helicopter hours currently available to AMIS are spent resupplying its own troops. Its representatives need more capacity to spend a greater proportion of their time going out and about and doing their jobs.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) made an extremely well-informed speech. She is absolutely right to say that this is a tense and fragile moment. I very much welcome what she said about the African Union. She reminded us about the tribal make-up of the conflict when she talked about the Fur. That is important, because it is one of the layers of complexity in Darfur. It is not a reason for not trying to do something, but it is important that we understand what we are dealing with.

I want to address the hon. Lady's point about compensation directly, because I feel strongly about this. I spent a lot of time in Abuja trying to point out to Abdel Wahed and his people what is in the agreement. I entirely accept her point about the importance of compensation psychologically and politically. It is part of the culture: you kill my family, you take my goods. Compensation is one of the ways in which the people make amends. We may find it hard to understand that the loss of life can be expunged by the payment of money, but that is part of the culture in Darfur.

As for any help that anyone else can give to try to get the point across, it is all in the Darfur peace agreement, which provides for the setting up of a compensation commission, which would have wide powers on the form and nature of compensation, including that for loss of life and loss of land. You name it, it is there. The draft that the AU tabled said that the Government of Sudan would make a contribution to the compensation fund, but no sum was mentioned. So the second thing that we did in Abuja was to ask the Government of Sudan what they were going to do. They said, "We will make an immediate initial contribution of $30 million."

There is also provision in the Darfur peace agreement for a reconstruction and redevelopment fund. The Government of Sudan have committed to put into that fund $300 million this year and $200 million next year and the year after, making a total of $700 million. Perhaps I should not say this, but I will: if we want to be creative once we have signed an agreement and are getting on with implementing it, it is perfectly possible to say, "As an aid to reconstruction and redevelopment, people will need to resettle themselves in the places that they have been burnt out of." There is a big pot of money that could also be used to make payments in recompense for loss of livelihood, animals and household utensils if one cared to look at what has actually been negotiated by the rebel movements and had the confidence to say, "Look, you wanted compensation: look what we brought back." I say this with force and passion, because I learned something most forcefully during those peace negotiations, which was my first opportunity to participate in such negotiations. I learned that the texts and demands are important, but there comes a moment when we have to decide whether to make the psychological step from being a victim and a demander, a fighter and an outsider, to saying, "I am now going to take that step for peace and be part of trying to implement a solution to the crisis." I could see Minni Minnawi doing that, and through the medium of this debate—though I do not know whether he will read it—I would plead with Abdel Wahed to do the same.

John Bercow: Send it to him.

Hilary Benn: Well, some people have even closer contact with him than others.

The point is important because, in truth, any movement's leader must be concerned about what its members will say. That is why I referred to people being able to see what is in the agreement. It is perfectly understandable that leaders want to feel sufficient confidence to turn around and say, "Look what we have been able to achieve." I really believe in the DPA; it delivers on compensation. The hon. Member for Richmond Park was right to highlight that because it is central to the points that Abdel Wahed has been making.

On the post of senior assistant to the president, in truth we do not yet know who will occupy it. The agreement makes provision for the movements to nominate. If the three movements sign, they have to agree between themselves who to nominate, but at present only one movement has signed. So, yes, that appointment will currently be in the gift of Minni Minnawi, but whether it will be him or someone else, I do not know. That will be down to him and his movement to determine.

On the tribal leaders, the hon. Lady was right and answered the question by referring to the Darfur dialogue, because its central purpose is to bring into the process those other interest groups in Darfur which are not necessarily represented by the movements, but which need to play a part in addressing the many concerns and issues that surround this complex crisis. That must not be a distant process, and people must get on with implementing it as soon as possible.

Is integration realistic? I was encouraged by the approach taken by the Government of Sudan general who came to the negotiations. When we were trying to craft additional changes to the agreement as a way to make progress, he was discussing those in practical terms and they had obviously thought about it. There is evidence from other conflicts around the world that if we have the right approach it is possible to make the transition happen. Minni Minnawi and his group have been particularly concerned about security, and the changes made to the agreement in trying to respond to them show that that is possible, but much of it is down to trust. The truth is that people want to see each party to the agreement doing what it has promised if that trust is going to be applied in those circumstances.

John Bercow: My point is slightly different from that of the practicality of the integration. I have read that it was proposed to integrate 1,000 people from rebel forces within the police and security structure, and that figure struck me as being very small. Do I have that wrong?

Hilary Benn: In the original agreement, I think that it was in the area of 1,000. That was changed after four days of negotiation. From memory, I think it is 4,000. In addition, I think that 1,500 will go into the police forces. [Interruption.] I apologise, it is 1,000. So, there are 5,000, which is a significant increase on what was in the draft tabled by the AU. There was a lot of debate about exactly how many forces the rebels have, but we made significant progress and it was key to unlocking the agreement from Minni Minnawi's group.

The hon. Lady is right about the timing on recovery aid and issues of land. Dealing with those is going to be difficult. She was also right about the World Food Programme, which is the most outstanding organisation. I saw that for myself yesterday in Somalia, and what it did to stop 6 million people starving to death in Afghanistan three years ago was extraordinary. On the central emergency response fund, $20 million has so far been put in. The truth is that there have been some delays in getting the common humanitarian fund up and running. It is a pilot. As I have said right from the start in proposing the common humanitarian fund approach, it will not be any good if it does not work speedily to deliver the money.

I remain absolutely convinced of the rightness of an approach that says we look at what we have and at the needs, and we get one person to take an overall view of how we will divvy up the cash that we have to meet those needs. I know that that is a different way of doing things for some UN agencies, which have had their own long-standing relationships with individual donors. To be honest, not all of them like the change. However, when we have needs and a certain amount of resources available, it is the logical way of handling matters. Nonetheless, we have to move quickly and we must therefore distinguish between, on the one hand, the speed of operation, which is an important issue, and, on the other hand, the amounts that are available.

The excellent contribution by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) revealed the depth of his knowledge. He drew to our attention the competition for land and for water, and the issue of banditry. He also raised the matter of the east, to which the hon. Member for Richmond Park referred. In Sudan, there is a big issue about the balance of power between the centre and the periphery. That is what such matters are all about, in part.

As for the discussions and the conflict with the Abuja Congress, if that is an issue—and it is—can we skip the fighting and go straight to negotiating? In the comprehensive peace agreement, which is why it mattered so much—I will come back to the point made by the hon. Member for Buckingham and the role that Britain played—all the elements that we need to make a deal are there, such as on power sharing, wealth sharing and transitional arrangements. I hope that, having learned the bitter lesson from the 25-year civil war and the conflict in Darfur that, as other parts of Sudan legitimately express their desire to share in power and wealth, the people of those parts of the country do not go through the same cycle of violence and suffering.

On the donor conference that I was asked to arbitrate, the truth is that there are two conferences. There will be the AU pledging conference on further support to AMIS scheduled for June. There will also be the donor conference in support of Darfur's reconstruction and redevelopment, which the Dutch are hosting, and which is scheduled for September.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: So we were both right.

Hilary Benn: Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud and the hon. Member for Buckingham were both right. They were just talking about different events.

We agreed in Abuja that the senior assistant to the President will be asked to represent the Darfur peace agreement and the people of Darfur in implementing the agreement, because that is the role given to the transitional authority. The senior assistant will be asked to present an initial plan on what they will do to support reconstruction and development and ask the international community how they can help. The plan will be about food, redevelopment, education and health and all the things that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud rightly pointed out, people want when there is peace.

I say to the hon. Member for Buckingham that I welcome his prods and passion in what was a characteristically powerful and elegant speech. One of the ironies that befalls those who seek to do something to help is that we are also lightning conductors for the intense frustration that every one of us feels about the lack of progress. The hon. Gentleman was right to remind us of the cocktail of barbarity. He was right to ask us to reach deep into our consciences. I want to come back to that point at the end as it goes to the heart of the debate.

Will people do what they promised? As for the Government of Sudan, we can at least look at the comprehensive peace agreement and have some encouragement. In the end, they did a deal. Yes, it is slow and imperfect, and there are frustrations, but it is happening. That should give us some cause for hope—not naïve optimism, but hope. Above all else, we must hang on to hope and combine it with a good dose of hard-nosed realism, which, as ever, the hon. Gentleman contributed to the debate. I also say to him that there is some evidence of a reduction in violence since the signing of the comprehensive peace agreement. I hope that Jan Pronk will continue to keep up to date on that, and I hope that it endures..

John Bercow: I am extremely appreciative of the Minister giving way yet again. He has been immensely generous. I do not dispute his point about a reduction in violence; I have no basis for doing so. Does he know whether the reduction has been on the part of the Government of Sudan or of the militias, in so far as we are supposed to regard them as divisible?

Hilary Benn: The honest answer is that I do not know, but I will inquire and write to the hon. Gentleman. I can say that, in recent months, an increasing proportion of the insecurity has been down to the rebel movements. If I can give the hon. Gentleman one gentle prod in return, I hope that he uses some of his fire and passion to give the rebel movements a hard time for what they have been doing, because they, too, have been inflicting suffering. In The Guardian yesterday, there was a report of inter-SLMA fighting that had caused great suffering and some loss of life.

On AMIS and funding, the UK has given £32 million so far. When I was there two months ago, I said that we would give another £20 million and we are on our way to honouring that pledge. Others will be able to make progress at the pledging conference to which I referred, but the problem of troop numbers remains. In the past year, the AU has found it impossible to get, in effect, the remaining battalion that is required to get up to the 7,700 mark. On the UN force, I hope that I have covered the points already. Ditto for the police—to whom the hon. Gentleman referred—because they have not yet been able to get the numbers that they want. That links to a point about insecurity in the camps, raised by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett), which I shall come to.

The hon. Member for Buckingham said that he did not want a debate on the FCO, but if he does seek to drive a wedge between DFID and the FCO, I will take my mallet and resolutely knock it out again, because I do not think that that would be fair. This issue was the subject of great debate in the Select Committee. It was alleged that there is too much concentration on the comprehensive peace agreement and not enough on Darfur. I do not believe that to be the case. I shall return to the broader context in a moment. It was right and proper to continue to try to shepherd the comprehensive peace agreement to a conclusion, first because it brought an end to that conflict and secondly because it provided the framework that has been drawn on for the Darfur peace agreement and it is the framework available to deal with conflict in other parts of Sudan. If we had not secured that, we would, heaven forbid, have been in an even worse situation, so I resolutely argue against the hon. Gentleman's point.

On the International Criminal Court, the hon. Gentleman was inadvertently too kind to me. I deserve no credit whatever in that regard, but my right hon. Friend the former Foreign Secretary deserves enormous credit, because the skill, passion and dedication to which the hon. Gentleman referred was demonstrated by my right hon. Friend in getting the UN Security Council to the point at which that resolution was passed. That was remarkable and I hope that history will record it. The hon. Gentleman is right: we need to ensure that when such matters are referred to the ICC, some consequence follows. That is why I am glad that it has started work. I hope that it finds evidence and, if it does, that it will indict people and they will be called to account, for the reasons that I set out in my opening remarks.

John Bercow: I raised the issue for the purposes that I described at the time, and it is important to have this on the record. Does the Secretary of State agree that it is vital that no one who is reasonably suspected of atrocious acts should be allowed impunity on the ground that he is assisting in the war against terror?

Hilary Benn: I do agree. I expect the International Criminal Court, an independent body, to do its work. That is why I said carefully that it must look for evidence and, if it finds evidence, make indictments. That is the point of an independent international criminal court; it is why we fought so hard to get that in place.

Mr. Drew: This is not a dialogue with the hon. Member for Buckingham through the Secretary of State. My right hon. Friend will be aware, given his recent visit to northern Uganda, that five people from the Lord's Resistance Army have been indicted. The jury is still out—no pun is intended—on whether that is helping to resolve that dreadful conflict. If the International Criminal Court means anything, somebody has to find the people who have been indicted, or it is a useless process. That is why it is so important for action to follow indictment. Does the Secretary of State agree?

Hilary Benn: I do agree. There is a connection, because the LRA has also been present in Sudan, which we are discussing. The five—Kony and Otti and the other three—had plenty of time to give up if they wanted to. The fact is that they did not. Now the ICC has indicted them and, as I said to President Museveni when I spoke to him on Tuesday, there is a responsibility on all of the countries now affected—northern Uganda, southern Sudan, the Democratic Republic of the Congo where the bulk of them are now to be found—to get together. This is a threat to regional security. Those individuals have to be found and shipped off to the Hague where they belong. The rest of the fighters should come back into society because President Museveni has very wisely said that he will consider an amnesty in relation to them.

Finally, may I say to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West, who made an extremely thoughtful and important speech, that the insecurity that women face is one of the characteristics of this terrible conflict. One question that occurred to me when we went to the camps—I do not know whether it occurred to him—was why the men do not go out with the women when they are collecting the fire wood. That might act as a deterrent to those who attack them. It is a real problem, and in the absence of sufficient AU patrols—they have had police stations in the camps and are trying to increase their number—it is something that people could do now to ensure that their women are protected.

The hon. Gentleman made a really important point about elections and referendums, not because they are not important—they are desperately important—but because, as he said, some people do not like the results. That tells us that there has to be a culture that comes with the use of elections and referendums as a means of resolving debate and argument. That means that, like it or not, sometimes one loses and the other side wins, and if one is not able to accept that there can be real difficulties.

John Bercow: Some of us have had more practice at that than others.

Hilary Benn: I did not hear the whole of that comment. The official Opposition have had a lot of experience recently.

On the permanence of the camps, we might find—it has certainly been the case in the camps around Khartoum—that some people choose to stay where they are living. That will have to be worked through. When I spoke to people in the camps in Khartoum a couple of years ago it was clear that the younger generation did not fancy going back—they had been there for a long time because of the length of the north-south conflict and it was the only life they knew—whereas members of the older generation were keen to return to the homes that they had lost. On arms imports, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West is right. That is why we want an arms embargo.

My final point brings us back to where the hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield started, and to the powerful points made by the hon. Member for Buckingham and others. We should reflect on Kosovo, Iraq, Pol Pot and Rwanda. We should ask where the international community was when 200,000 or 300,000 people were shot in the head and dumped in the desert. Rwanda sticks in our minds. I do not know whether other Members have seen the film "Shooting Dogs". I watched it and I wept. The most painful part of that film—an excruciatingly painful and raw piece of film making—was a scene at the end in which a we saw a hapless spokesperson from the United States Administration of the time struggling not to use the word "genocide". That really brought into stark relief the point made by the hon. Member for Buckingham.

In the end, we asked the international commission of inquiry to go and do its work on behalf of the United Nations, and it reported on what it found. Whether we describe that as genocide, crimes against humanity or war crimes, what matters is whether we are prepared to do anything about it. What has been at the heart of our debate today is how, as an international community, we have struggled to turn the fine desires that we expressed in words and resolutions at the millennium review summit into doing something to prevent such things from happening to people. That is the biggest challenge that the world faces so far as peace and security are concerned. We have an institution whose job it is to do it, but if it cannot reach agreement and somebody exercises a veto, nothing happens. On the other hand, when countries decide to take unilateral action, others tut and say that that should not happen. Such action should have legitimacy only if it is taken by the international community through the institutions that we have created.

We have been discussing what happens when crises, suffering and pain fall between the cracks of the system that we have created. I come back to the point that I made at the end of my opening remarks. In the end it is down to two things: have we the will to do anything about it, and are people prepared to contribute—to play their part? I say that not in the sense of trying to pat the British Government on the back; that would be wholly inappropriate, although we have tried hard to do our bit. Do we all need to do more? Yes, we do, because the fact that the suffering in Darfur continues is to the shame of every one of us.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes past Five o'clock.

[DAVID TAYLOR in the Chair]

East Midlands Police Forces

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Jonathan Shaw.]

9.30 am

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I start by welcoming the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety to his new responsibilities. The police force is not yet in the same mess as the immigration service, and I hope that he will not allow it to get into such a mess. If he follows my advice and that of my hon. Friends, he will find himself on the way to ensuring that it does not do so.

I know that whoever is in the Chair has to be unbiased, Mr. Taylor, but it is worth pointing out that you are an east midlands Member of Parliament. In a recent Adjournment debate on police reform you said:

"We have a similar situation in the east midlands, where there is no support for an east midlands-wide force but that seems to be our fate."—[Official Report, 30 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 1078.]

I hope that we can persuade the Government not to go down that road, as the merger has no local support. I am pleased to see a number of my colleagues from the east midlands on both sides of the House. In the main, I have yet to find anyone who publicly supports a police force of the size and nature proposed.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Is it not the case that there is not only no local support but no geographical coherence? On Friday I made an interesting visit to the constituency of the hon. Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt)—I gave him notice of my visit—and I then went to the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan). By the end of the day, I had travelled nearly 200 miles from my home, but I still had not left the east midlands. We could have journeyed on to Skegness to complete the picture.

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. Interventions should be brief; an awful lot of Members wish to contribute to the debate.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. I often say that there is no such place as the east midlands. It is what is left over once the rest of the country has been divided up. I do not know of a place called "the east midlands" that is recognised as such. The idea that Lincolnshire and Northamptonshire have something in common with Derbyshire is for the birds—or possibly for the Government.

Mindful of what you say, Mr. Taylor, but wishing to allow a few interventions, I shall try to speak for only 15 minutes or so, so that others have an opportunity to contribute.

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): Building on the point made by our hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), is the change not another part of the Government's plan for regional government, which is deeply unpopular?

Mr. McLoughlin: I shall come to that aspect, because I think that the proposal is regionalisation by the back door. When the Government attempted to get regionalisation through in the north of the country, it was overwhelmingly rejected. The first area that they chose for such a referendum was one where they thought they would find sympathy and support for the idea, but it was rejected. If the Minister is going pursue the merger, he should at the very least let the people decide. He should put it to a referendum. I am keen for that to happen—I would be very happy about it. The Government were keen on referendums until they started going wrong for them, and they seem to have gone a bit cold on them since then.

Not all is lost, however. The idea was undoubtedly the driving ambition of the former Home Secretary, who has since departed the scene. In response to a question by the Leader of the Opposition, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), the Prime Minister said:

"We have to listen to what people are saying and, obviously, there are different views about police reform. One possibility is for strategic coming together on certain issues, rather than mergers".—[Official Report, 25 January 2006; Vol. 441, c. 1425-26.]

I agree. That would be a sensible way forward. I do not say that there should be no change at all. What I am saying is that I oppose the creation of a super-regional police force, as it would have no coherence.

The idea behind the mergers was to enhance the protective services that combat serious crime crossing county borders. However, according to a confidential report drawn up by Tim Brain, the chief constable of Gloucestershire, the Government are aiming at a lower standard of co-ordination. He says that the project "will not do what it says on the tin. If restructuring does not significantly improve protective services, the question must be asked: 'Why are we restructuring?'".

Why are the Home Office and the Government insisting on it? According to Tim Brain, the implementation of the plan nationally will cost the equivalent of 25,000 police officer salaries. As the Government are refusing to commit additional funds to pay for the mergers, the effect would be a serious depletion of front-line policing. It is front-line policing, not protective services, that fights the crime that most concerns my constituents and those of my hon. Friends. Tim Brain concludes that "the impact of such a cut would destroy any realistic hope of developing neighbourhood policing".

In the past, the Government have said that they are keen on neighbourhood policing.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): Quite right.

Mr. McLoughlin: As my hon. Friend says, quite right. In some respects, we fear the Government's plans in most respect of some of the rural constituencies. I do not believe that the system is broken, so why must we interfere with it? I hoped that the Government would have taken account of what has happened in the past when they have interfered with things, only to reverse them back to the state in which they inherited them.

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): My right hon. Friend makes the correct point. Is he aware of the deep concern in Lincolnshire, where there are already worries about the lack of police visibility, that the east midlands merger will transfer resources away to big conurbations such as Nottingham, where there is serious crime? That is inevitable, and it will be greatly to the detriment of those who live in Lincolnshire.

Mr. McLoughlin: I agree with my hon. Friend. Although I do not have the exact figures, Nottinghamshire has far more police officers than Derbyshire, despite the fact that the counties are of similar size. I am not relying on this morning's report about crime levels, but there is no doubt that crime levels are higher in the centre of Nottingham than in other parts of the east midlands. What will happen to the police force? It will be concentrated in that particular area. Perhaps that might please my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), but it is a problem.

We have not yet seen the details of the precept rationalisation that could come about as a result of the proposal. Since 1997, the people of Derbyshire have seen an increase of 165 per cent. in the police precept in the county, because we have been paying for extra police officers to try to catch up. Will that money just disappear into other parts of the region on an equalisation basis? Those are only some of the questions that have not yet been answered. That is part of the problem with this reorganisation and rationalisation: it is being rushed to far too great a degree.

It is interesting to note that the chairmen of the east midlands police authorities and the chief constables have already outlined their serious concerns to the Home Secretary. All five police forces voted not to volunteer for a merger on the grounds of affordability and the ability to enhance professional services quickly. They object not for narrow-minded political reasons, but because they want to deliver the best policing service for the local people. They are concerned that the new merger plans will hinder their ability to do so, and I think that they are right.

Despite objections from all the police authorities concerned, the former Home Secretary announced on 11 April that he still intended to proceed with the merger to a full east midlands police force. That was rejected by the five authorities on 7 April, but four days later the former Home Secretary said, "I don't want to listen to what the police authorities or Members of Parliament say. I intend to push forward with the merger." Opposing views were totally disregarded, and that is a serious issue.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) mentioned, the east midlands is not the easiest of areas through which to travel. It is not like travelling north-south, which is relatively easy in this country. The configuration of the roads means that travelling east-west is far more difficult. That is one of the problems that a large force such as the one proposed will face.

The east midlands police authorities have estimated the cost of a regional merger to be £101 million for its set-up plus £45 million in ongoing costs, with £15 million in potential efficiency savings. The Home Office has estimated the cost of a regional merger to be £80 million, plus £20 million in ongoing costs, with £16 million in potential savings. The big difference between what the Home Office and the regional police authorities say relates to the set-up costs, and I am more inclined to believe the regional police authorities than I am the Home Office, simply because they are the people on the ground doing the job. We have to listen to what they say.

Mr. Alan Duncan: Is not the lesson of past mergers—clearly, the same will be true of this merger—that there are very high transitional costs and no real economies of scale, and as soon as the merger has happened, sub-structures and divisional units are set up in an attempt to restore the local connection that was lost through the merger?

Mr. McLoughlin: Yes. There is also something to be said for a chief constable being accountable to local people. I am not sure that a chief constable overseeing five forces would be sufficiently accountable to local people. That is one disturbing element of the proposals. I have not always agreed with the chief constable of Derbyshire. In fact, before he retired the previous chief constable appeared on a Labour party political broadcast in 2001. I do not want to know the politics of chief constables; I want them to do their job properly.

Lord Denning said that a chief constable should be answerable to the law, not to politicians. One problem that may result from the size of the proposed forces is that we will get chief constables who are more directly accountable to the Home Secretary. At the moment, Labour Members may think that a marvellous idea—my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe might have thought it a marvellous idea when he was Home Secretary—but I say to Labour Members that they should not be so arrogant as to think that they will always be in power. One day, they may not like chief constables being directly accountable to the Home Secretary.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): At the second generous reference to me, I thought that I might intervene. My right hon. Friend is making a powerful case, but he did say that he does not oppose all change. Does he accept that if the present system of local accountability in Derbyshire is a model of perfection, that may be the exception? We now have the opportunity to examine how to make accountability work more effectively on whatever scale. Certainly most inhabitants of my constituency are not aware of the existence of the police authority; they do not know what it does. It is hardly the strongest system of local accountability.

Mr. McLoughlin: I totally accept that. I am not sure that my right hon. and learned Friend is not responsible for the present system of police accountability, but I shall put that to one side for a moment. In all seriousness, I am not arguing that the present system is perfect and does not need changing. He has just spoken about accountability and I agree with him about that. However, what is proposed will remove almost all local accountability. At the moment, imperfect as the system may be, we have 22 or 23 people serving on the Derbyshire police authority; under the proposals, it is likely that only four or five people will be appointed to serve on the regional authority. The present system may not be perfect, but what is proposed to replace it is wholly imperfect.

I do not mind some change, as I have said to my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert). I do not mind more collaborative services among police authorities—for example, it is ridiculous that every police authority has its own payroll system; such services can rightly be centralised. However, we do not need to centralise everything at regional level. The payroll could be administered nationally—it is ridiculous to have the sort of payroll systems envisaged under the new police structures. If the Home Office is seeking change for the sake of efficiency, there are many other ways to achieve that without disregarding local accountability.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Is that not part and parcel of the Government's plan? There will be a complete disconnect between, for instance, the people of Leicestershire and their police force, because it will be an east midlands police force, based somewhere else. The problem is already to be seen in the East Midlands regional assembly: it is totally unaccountable to anybody, yet has been set up and will march in tandem with the new police authority.

Mr. McLoughlin: I agree. There a huge amount that I could say, but I see that I am coming up to the 15 minutes I promised you, Mr. Taylor, and I am mindful of other hon. Members who have given up their time to be here this morning. I will therefore draw my remarks to a conclusion.

We have discussed accountability in some detail. I believe in accountability—in a Member of Parliament, a local council or a parish council being able to challenge a chief constable directly. I have talked to a number of my parish councils—I think that the modern term for them is stakeholders, but perhaps I will not become quite as modern as that—and have received a communication from parish council in Doveridge, which is right on the edge of Derbyshire. Earlier this year, in an excellent example of police-community relationships, Doveridge neighbourhood watch was fortunate enough to have the chief constable address its annual general meeting. It is difficult to imagine a chief constable of such a vast organisation as the proposed force taking the time and trouble to visit such a small community on the border of its territory.

I cite Doveridge not only because the parish council has written to me and expressed a view, but because it is not far from Sudbury open prison, and we know some of the concerns that have been raised about open prisons lately. It is therefore perhaps a good thing that the chief constable can go along and reassure people of the services that he will provide in Doveridge, because some of the absconders from Sudbury open prison have committed incredibly awful crimes.

Tissington parish council, which is very small council, has said:

"The proposed merger is hastily drawn up, lacks accountability and has no known community support. It would be unwieldy and inefficient in management and there are no local perceived benefits."

Brailsford parish council writes:

"We see no...reason to make such extensive and important changes in what seems undue haste. We foresee that a merger of this size would mean resources were channelled to the larger cities and leave the rural communities with very little support."

Stoney Middleton parish council has said:

"The proposals seem to be expensive, ill thought out and detrimental to effective policing in the county. They will also make the police force less accountable".

I could go on to quote Longford, Matlock and various other parish councils that have brought their concerns to me, but I will not, because other hon. Members wish to participate.

There are some salient questions. Where will the extra funding necessary for the plans come from? Can the Minister assure me that council tax payers in West Derbyshire will not have to foot the bill for a scheme that they do not want and that will not provide the level of service that they currently enjoy? How will the Minister justify the new regional authority's ability to offer accountability with a ratio of only one member to every 200,000 people—in effect, three constituencies having one person as an accountable member on the authority?

The five police forces affected by the plan have severely criticised it and do not want it. In their professional judgment, they think that the plans will hinder policing rather than improve it. Local politicians do not want the merger to go ahead, as we feel that it will prove counter-productive in the fight against crime. Perhaps most important, local people do not want the changes. They want a local, accountable, responsive community service, not a large, unwieldy and remote one.

I have not yet met anyone in Derbyshire who wants the merger. The police do not want it, parliamentary representatives do not want it and local people do not want it. According to the answer that he gave to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, even the Prime Minister is lukewarm. So why on earth go forward with the changes? I ask the Minister, on the first day of his new job, to say that he will not embark on what will be a fiasco for the police service in the east midlands, but that he will reverse these crazy decisions and make a positive name for himself on day one in his new job.

Several hon. Members rose—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. In line with the convention on debates on local and regional issues to which a substantial number of Members want to contribute, I intend to call the Front-Bench speakers 20 minutes before the end of the debate—at 10.40 am—and half of that time will be for the Minister. If the 10 Members who want to speak before then bear in mind that they have 50 minutes left to do so, I shall try to get everyone in.

9.50 am

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): I am delighted to follow the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) and I congratulate him on securing the debate. I also congratulate him on defying the convention that influential figures in the House should not speak on such issues; he spoke forcefully on behalf of his constituents. He accepted the case for change, although he has not told us what change is necessary. None the less, change is necessary, and it is important to recognise that the proposals before us come from the police themselves. We need change, and the notion that 43 police forces is the right solution for the present day is just wrong.

Although I have questions and doubt, there is a need for change, and I know that just from looking at my own authority in Nottinghamshire. A think tank report out today says that there are more crimes in Nottingham than anywhere else in the country, and high levels of homicide and serious organised crime—often related to drugs—have led to real policing problems in Nottinghamshire. There has been abstraction of police officers from rural to urban areas, and the Nottinghamshire police have had to call in resources from elsewhere. Members will also remember the chief constable's comment that he had "lost control". All that seems to indicate that, faced with serious levels of crime, we in Nottinghamshire need a larger, more strategic police force.

However, I have doubts, concerns and questions similar to those that the right hon. Gentleman expressed and I would like the Minister to acknowledge those questions and look for solutions. First, it is important that there is neighbourhood policing. The goal set out in the Labour party's manifesto is to have neighbourhood teams in place by April 2008. The debate about police changes has focused very much on the regional level and the strategic police force, but it needs to focus on the locality and the neighbourhood, because people want police officers who understand and respond to their concerns. It is important that the commitment to neighbourhood policing is not lost in the debate about larger structures. It is important to accept and acknowledge that larger strategic police forces must work hand in hand with neighbourhood police teams.

Secondly, we need to ensure that the new authority is properly resourced. I shall not repeat the figures that the right hon. Gentleman gave, but it is clear that there is always a cost to change, because change in itself is dysfunctional. I am concerned that police forces in the east midlands have been traditionally underfunded, as previous Home Office Ministers have acknowledged. There is a clear difference between local voices and local police forces on the one hand and the Home Office on the other about the cost of change, although figures are coming closer through discussion. One of the important things that we must do is set up a process to examine those figures and reach proper conclusions. Unless we have a firm financial structure, there is a danger that the new neighbourhood teams will be eroded by a lack of financing.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): I am glad to see at least one Nottinghamshire Member on the Labour Benches, but does the hon. Gentleman not agree that, with Nottinghamshire's population growing by 4.1 per cent. between 1993 and 2003, compared with a national average of 2.7 per cent., Nottinghamshire's case for extra resources and funding is overwhelming?

Paddy Tipping: There is a case for extra funding and resources for the Nottinghamshire police. However, I remind the hon. Gentleman, who takes a close interest in such matters, that police numbers are at a record level in Nottinghamshire. We need to talk not only about extra resources but about their good and efficient management. I am not confident that we have had the best such management in Nottinghamshire, and that view is also taken by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary.

Thirdly, the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire talked about governance. If it goes forward, the new east midlands strategic force will cover an area larger than Belgium. It is really important that local people feel that they have ownership of the police. That may not happen sufficiently at a top, police-authority level, so it is important that a new strategic authority should have the powers and structures to involve people at a basic command unit level or through crime and disorder reduction partnerships. It is important that people have a say about the problems in their areas and a way of finding solutions, and I know that the Government are taking measures to enable that to happen. It cannot be right for there to be large strategic authorities but no say at a more local level.

Finally, I turn to council tax equalisation; again, it is a governance issue. I am far from clear about how it will be achieved. We need far more clarity from the Home Office about taking that forward.

Given the four concerns that I have mentioned, I believe that the timetable for change is far too rapid. Change is inevitable, but we need a timetable and framework for change that allows time for the problems to be not only discussed but resolved. I acknowledge that when a change is made, it is important to take its benefit quickly. However, on the face of it, the move to change in the east midlands is far too quick. There needs to be greater consultation so that we can find real solutions that will meet the needs and aspirations of people, not only in Nottinghamshire but across the east midlands.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. Again, I urge hon. and right hon. Members to observe a self-denying ordinance. They should keep their contributions to less than five minutes to allow their parliamentary colleagues to be called.

9.58 am

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): On behalf of the people of Kettering, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on securing this debate. I am 100 per cent. opposed to the abolition of Northamptonshire's own police force and to its absorption into an east midlands police service. The absurdity of the Government's merger plan is that Northamptonshire will end up paying more for a police service that will provide fewer police officers to patrol our local area.

I recently spent 22 days with the parliamentary police scheme in and around Kettering. It is my firm view that local people there do not want the headquarters of Northamptonshire's police to be in Nottingham; they want more police officers, not fewer, to patrol our local area. A full regional merger would cost £100 million up front and a net additional £30 million a year. Where is the sense in that?

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the proposal to merge the police forces has resulted in the loss of the chief superintendent in Wellingborough, who is being sent to my hon. Friend's constituency of Kettering?

Mr. Hollobone: My hon. Friend, as usual, is absolutely correct. Under the merger plans, we were promised greater emphasis on neighbourhood policing, but the constituencies of Kettering, Corby and Wellingborough now have one basic command unit instead of two, and Northamptonshire now has two basic command units instead of four. As a direct consequence of preparations for the merger plans, there is now less local emphasis on policing. I urge the Minister to allow the five forces, or some combination of them, to adopt a federated structure of inter-force co-operation and not impose a merger on them.

I impress on the Minister that we are talking about a huge area, stretching from the borders of Oxfordshire to the outskirts of Greater Manchester. When the county is divided up, Northamptonshire is always on the edge, and given the gun crime and gang crime that we have heard about in Nottingham, policing in Northamptonshire will not be a priority for the new east midlands police service.

The budget shortfall faced by the five police authorities in the east midlands is already £17 million for 2006-07. They are five of the most underfunded police authorities in the country. Over the past 10 years, in pounds-per-head terms, their income has risen by 24 per cent; that is compared to a rise in inflation of 28 per cent. In 2005-06, the average amount spent on policing in England was £174 per person. In the east midlands it was £143 per person, which is 82 per cent. of the English average. All five police authorities were underfunded on that basis, and in Northamptonshire the figure was £139 per person.

Steve Green, the chief constable of Nottinghamshire police, has written to the former Home Secretary, and I hope that the letter is on the current Home Secretary's file. That letter, dated 28 April, says:

"The current offer from the Home Office does not provide the necessary financial support and...without substantial additional funding, this region cannot achieve the minimum standard of Level 3 in protective services, let alone any prospect of future improvement to Level 4."

I shall go on with the letter, because this is an important point:

"It is equally clear from the Home Office analysis that the relatively small amount of additionality that would eventually be released through efficiency savings would not become available for investment in protective services until 2014. This situation fundamentally undermines the principal case for amalgamation. Dennis O'Connor's report clearly asserted that the East Midlands represents the area of greatest risk in the country".

The merger proposals are not welcome in Northamptonshire; they would undermine local policing and they enjoy no local support. The Northamptonshire branch of the National Association of Retired Police Officers is against the plans, as is Bill Dredge, who is the chairman of Northamptonshire neighbourhood watch, and Dr. Marie Dickie, the Labour chairman of the Northamptonshire police authority. The chief constable of Northamptonshire is worried about the loss of officers.

In conclusion, the new Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety is talked about as the great persuader; that is why he has been put into his present job. I urge him to follow the advice of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire and on behalf of all the residents of Kettering I ask him to think again, before it is too late.

10.4 am

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): It is worth noting that the only reason why we are having a debate on police restructuring is that Her Majesty's inspector of constabulary, senior organisations within the police such as the Police Superintendents Association of England and Wales and, according to a poll in The Times today, the vast majority of senior police officers all want a restructuring of the police to make it more efficient and effective in the battle against crime, both strategically and locally.

The right hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) is right to say that it is simply not sustainable to have 43 chief constables, 43 personnel departments, 43 finance departments and 43 press officers, or to have all those constabularies using different technologies and protocols, and in some cases having real problems communicating with each other. The status quo is therefore definitely not an option.

There are two dimensions to the proposed restructuring, and I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman fell between two stools and did not give either of those the necessary importance. The first dimension is the strategic level, whereby organised crime operates not within localities—the towns and villages of our constituencies—but nationwide and regionally. We must have a system to fight organised crime and terrorism that is not locally based within divisions or even existing constabularies, but which has a bigger remit. That is why it is important to pool resources and strengthen the police at a strategic level.

The other aspect, which is probably more important for the current debate, is the local level. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) has pointed out, within the existing divisional structures, police officers already have increased accountability through consultative committees and forums—certainly in Derbyshire—and even down to ward and beat level. In High Peak, we already have police officers whose text numbers and e-mail addresses are known to the people in their wards. They are directly accountable to the people they serve. That is a welcome development and I want more accountability—not at county level, but at division and ward level, and in localities. The good practice that already exists—

[Tom Levitt]

Derbyshire is well advanced in neighbourhood policing—should be made more widely available and should be used elsewhere.

Will the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire, on that understanding, join me in saying that B division of Derbyshire constabulary, which is the divisional command unit shared between our constituencies—it covers the whole of mine, and not quite all of his—should not be merged and should remain as the basic command unit? Does he agree that, if we are to take neighbourhood policing seriously, it is important that there should be no fewer divisions than there are at present?

Mr. McLoughlin: The hon. Gentleman is trying to have it both ways. I agree about B division, and I have no problem in supporting its continuation. It is likely to survive if Derbyshire keeps its chief constable, but it is highly unlikely to survive if there is an amalgamated force of five different authorities. We, the two local Members of Parliament, can have an influence on the chief constable, because there are only 10 Members of Parliament in Derbyshire. A chief constable with 44 Members of Parliament in the area covered by his force might well ignore us.

Tom Levitt: One advantage of the debate is that the Minister is here to listen and has heard us, on a cross-party basis, say that the divisional structure in Derbyshire should remain as it is whatever the final outcome. I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's support for that view.

The last word on accountability is that most people in my constituency would have difficulty in saying exactly where the police headquarters is. Perhaps that does not apply to the right hon. Gentleman's constituency, which is closer to it. However, it does not matter where the chief constable is based. The location of the communications room, which is the place that people phone up, does not matter. People want to know that the divisional commander is on the ball and that their local policeman is on the beat in their neighbourhood. That is the level of accountability that I want, and I believe that it can be retained and strengthened under the new proposals.

I am pleased that the right hon. Gentleman did not show a very strong inclination to go down the road of federation. It has been proposed on some fronts that we should adopt a loose federation of constabularies, but that has all the disadvantages of the current system with few of the advantages of the new proposal. The most important thing about federating constabularies is that it makes long-term planning impossible. As long as the federation is loose, it will not lend itself to such planning.

Mr. McLoughlin: I did speak in favour of federation as preferable to what the Government are providing. There is a federation between Derbyshire and Nottingham: they share a helicopter, and I welcome that. It has been a useful part of the system and has not stopped long-term planning.

Tom Levitt: Of course it is sensible to share particular services, but that does not mean that the strategic decisions of the different authorities are necessarily being taken in line with each other. The debate has evolved already in that the two-county proposal that was on the cards a little while ago is no longer there. It proved deeply unpopular in Derbyshire, and it is right that the Derbyshire-Nottinghamshire proposal has been taken off the agenda and that we should be talking solely about the five-county proposal.

I agree that there are problems, and I hope that the Minister will address them. They are to do with not just the different council tax precepts in the five authorities that will be brought together, but with the hugely different pension arrangements and pension scheme funding in the different constabularies. There is historical underfunding in Derbyshire, which is a much worse-funded authority than Nottinghamshire, for example. We need some equalisation. We also make a legitimate demand that the cost of the mergers should not either fall on council tax payers or result in reduced services. We know that it will take some years for the cost benefits of the merger to work through, but in the interim there must be no cost to other services or council tax payers.

Like the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), I have taken part in the police service parliamentary scheme. We get a wonderful insight into how police operate and the huge diversity of services, and the scheme also allows us to see how well police officers are doing throughout the country. We have record numbers of police officers in Derbyshire and elsewhere, as well as falling crime. In Derbyshire, we have rising detection rates and some of the lowest crime levels in the country. We are proud of our local policing services. This is not an easy project to manage, and it must not be rushed. It is a year since it came on the timetable, and with a four-month consultation I think that it will take at least two years to put into operation.

I stress to my hon. Friend the Minister that it is important to get things right, rather than to get things quickly. If the debate is centred on what people want in terms of policing in their localities and neighbourhoods, and the quality of service that they see on the street outside their front door, and if assurances are given on that, there will be a lot more willingness to go along with different options for strategic organisations above that level.

I am pleased that the debate is taking place, as it offers us all an opportunity to put the issues on the record. I hope that the problems and issues that I have raised will help the Minister to guide and work with police authorities to reach a solution that we can all live with.

Several hon. Members rose—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. I urge hon. Members to stay within the five-minute limit.

10.12 am

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): I am grateful to be called and will try to keep my remarks very brief.

The Minister and I were first in the room this morning, and I said to him that his Department has traditionally been a bed of nails for Ministers. I know that he is on his first day. I will not betray confidences by saying what he said to me, but he did smile. One thing that I would have thought should be going through his mind is the fact that he is in a Department that is widely seen as absolutely chaotic: convicted criminals who should be deported are not, there are problems with the cleaners at the Home Office being illegal immigrants and there are difficulties with the Criminal Records Bureau recording innocent people as criminals. It is indeed chaotic.

I was looking at my hon. Friends the Members for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) and for Newark (Patrick Mercer)—gallant Members who have served in the armed forces—and thinking what they, as soldiers, might say to the Minister. They would probably say that he should try to shut down one of the fronts. The Home Office seems to be fighting on so many fronts, so surely this is a great opportunity for the Minister to get further promotion with his boss, and at the very least to adopt the Rushcliffe model. Rather than going the whole way, maybe he could reach an accommodation or solution with my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin), the Conservative Chief Whip, whose debate this is—I am not looking for promotion—and the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping). There is common ground.

There is almost universal disapproval of the proposals; no one wants them. Even the chief constables who were so heavily influenced by the Home Office when the Terrorism Bill was before the House—who were strong-armed into coming up with a position and briefing us—have changed their positions. One or two may covet the job of super-chief constable or Metropolitan Police Commissioner of the shires, but even they have come round. They do not want this nonsense. No one does.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire said, accountability will be hopeless and it will suffer. The situation will be like the one in Hinckley. I have no chance of speaking to the chief constable for the west midlands, which is on the other side of the A5, but I have the mobile phone number of the Leicestershire chief constable in my pocket. I have had it ever since the Home Office gave it to me when it was trying to influence him, but we shall not go into that.

Members have spoken eloquently about the chaos and ridiculous costs of merger. I ask Members who have been in the House for a while—I have been here as long as some—whether there has ever been a reorganisation that has not cost more than expected. My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) alluded to that. Such reforms—for example, health reforms—always cost more and there is always some difference.

This is completely the wrong tack, and we should take a leaf out of the New York police force book. That force works within certain precincts and uses sophisticated computer systems. In an age of information technology when communications are improving all the time, why are we told that we must accept vast, Stalinesque, monolithic structures that are totally unaccountable? Surely, with all the electronic wizardry around now, police force can talk to police force. It is not the case that the protocols are all wrong.

I say to the hon. Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) that there may be some problems with Devon and Cornwall police communicating with Cumbria, but the West Midlands and Leicestershire constabularies use a good mutual aid system to deal with nightclubs in Hinckley and Nuneaton. There is no problem—the argument is complete nonsense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker— I am not supposed to call you that in Westminster Hall. It is Mr. Chairman, I know. We cleared that earlier on.

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. The convention is "Mr. Taylor."

David Tredinnick: Thank you, Mr. Taylor.

I ask any hon. Member of the House, who is more accountable to their constituents—Members of this old and honourable House of Commons or Members of the European Parliament? What is the answer? Who represents constituencies the size of Belgium? Is it us? No, it is not. It is MEPs, who have an impossible task in relating to anybody. The same principle applies in this case. Let us be done with the nonsense of vast structures and get back to some sensible local policing.

10.17 am

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on securing the debate, which is terribly important. I also congratulate the Minister on his new appointment. I am sure that he will handle it with the same aplomb as he has handled all his other appointments. I am pleased that there are three Nottinghamshire Members here today, as I believe that they will underline the importance of the issue to the county.

I shall not iterate points that have already been made about Nottinghamshire. The fact remains that this morning we have been told that Nottingham stands high—in fact, at the highest and most lamentable point—in the crime statistics for the country. Our constabulary is constantly under pressure: it is underfunded, understaffed and overtasked, and constituents in Sherwood, in Rushcliffe and certainly in Newark and Retford feel that they are not receiving the correct services from police officers whom they largely admire and who do a splendid job, but who do not have the resources to do what they are required to do.

I have already made the point about Nottinghamshire's population increasing by 4.1 per cent. in the past 10 years, as opposed to the national average of 2.7 per cent., and points about underfunding have been made more eloquently by others than they would be made by me. The hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) is dead right—the situation must change. If we are to deliver better policing to Nottinghamshire, the structure must be better.

I probably differ with the hon. Gentleman on one or two details. I believe that we can achieve some economies of scale, but it worries me very much that a large sum of money will be spent on a wonderful new police station in a place such as Newark, yet the city of Nottingham—and, I have no doubt, cities such as

[Patrick Mercer]

Leicester, Northampton and others within a large five-county police force—will continue to act as a magnet for police officers and the dreaded policy community support officers.

Many officers are abstracted from rural constituencies such as mine, as well as Sherwood and the Rushcliffe constituency, to go into the city to fight gun and drug crime, which mercifully have not yet struck the streets of Newark. None the less, we have all sorts of difficulties and we require our officers to be based locally, to have a local focus and to be accountable to local people in a local way. I believe that the scheme the Government are espousing will destroy that.

We have a federated police force structure in the east midlands and it has worked pretty well. I suggest that there is no better example of how police forces co-operate than the way that Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire co-operated on the prosecution of my Labour predecessor in Newark. The three forces worked splendidly to produce a wonderful result, at least in the short term, and showed how a federated police force can work particularly well. As my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire said, if we go down the Government's suggested route, we will end up with a leviathan of five counties and, in theory, a single chief constable.

As sure as shooting, and in the same way that the national health service has turned itself inside out over the past five or six years, we will shortly see another restructuring of those large forces with less accountability at local level, more costs, lack of focus and lack of resourcing. There are bound to be changes because that is a law of nature. My right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Sherwood alluded to that.

There can be economies of scale. Looking to my shadow responsibilities, when I first heard about the plans, I wondered what use they would have. They could be attractive in fighting terrorism, and in that respect they may make sense, yet the model that has already been adopted for terrorism stretches from the Welsh border to the North sea. It has nothing to do with the five-county structure that is being prepared. If we want more effective structures, let us consider what is in place: undoubtedly, there could be economies of scale and there are ways of doing things better, but I deeply resent the loss of local accountability and of local policemen serving local people.

I believe that the Home Secretary is seeing sense and that he is beginning to row back on the proposals. If anything that my right hon. Friend, my colleagues and friends on the Government Benches say today persuades the Government that this is the wrong course of action, the debate will have been worth while in spades.

10.22 am

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): I add my congratulations to the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on securing this important debate. We are geographical neighbours but not, I hasten to add, political neighbours. Our constituents share many common interests, and Derbyshire police are one.

The objections to the creation of an east midlands super-force fall into three categories. The first is the undemocratic, rushed and sham way in which the proposal is being forced through and the consultation is supposedly taking place. The hon. Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt) said that it is important to get these things right rather than to get them quickly. What has happened so far provides no assurance of that.

These changes in policing are the biggest in this country since the service was created in 1829, yet they are being rushed through in just a few months. On 22 September 2005, the Home Secretary wrote to police authorities saying that there were plans to merge police forces to create super-forces. He said that within just five weeks he wanted police authorities throughout the country to come up with proposals for mergers. On 11 November, they were told to prepare their preferred options by 30 November—just 19 days later. At the start of December 2005, police authorities were told to produce their final single preferred option by 23 December—just three weeks later.

To force through such drastic changes in such a short time is undemocratic and rushed, allowing no time whatever for adequate consultation with the public. In that rushed time scale, the Government refused to consider federations and local forces, which we have discussed in the past hour. They refused to allow consideration of co-operation on wider issues—for example, combating serious and organised crime, terrorism and even common payrolls—yet the same Government who refused to allow consideration of federation have insisted that the fire authorities do precisely that—federate to run joint control rooms. There seems to be no logic in a system whereby one branch of the emergency services federates while another cannot consider it.

Finally, in the past few weeks the pace of rushed, sham consultation picked up speed, and on 20 March the Home Secretary announced that he intends to merge the five police forces into one east midlands force. He asked each police authority to inform him by 7 April whether it would like to proceed voluntarily to merger. Without exception, every force in the east midlands—like most throughout the country—said no, they would not like to proceed with a voluntary merger for all sorts of well thought out reasons.

Tom Levitt: Although I support the merger in principle, it was important that Derbyshire constabulary and the others did not go down the volunteer route because had they done so there would not have been the four-month consultation. Even if they had been in favour of it, they still should have opted for the consultation.

Paul Holmes: That is exactly the point I want to come to next. On 11 April, having been told on 7 April that the five forces did not want to merge, the Home Secretary said, "Well, you're going to anyway—I am going to force it on to you." There is a four-month period for objections, which we are in the middle of now, but the Home Secretary had already made it clear that at the end of that period he would introduce a statutory instrument, using powers in the Police Act 1996, to impose a merger. Therefore, the whole consultation is a sham, and the whole thing so rushed it is meaningless.

The second group of objections is to do with funding issues, which we have already had examples of from around the region. Derbyshire is traditionally underfunded, particularly since the dark days of the 1980s when a left-wing council leader, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), fought battles with a right-wing Conservative Government led by Baroness Thatcher.

In 2005-06, the average funding increase for police forces across England was 4.4 per cent., but in Derbyshire it was only 3.75 per cent. despite the traditional underfunding of the force. Over the next two years up to 2008, Government funding plans require a further £6 million of underfunding or cuts in Derbyshire police, which has led to the police authority writing to every Derbyshire MP, to say in blunt terms that that means there will be a reduction in police officer numbers, less resources for neighbourhood policing and reduced opportunities to make full use of advances in forensic science that would otherwise improve detection rates.

That is a grim background to start with, but we must look next at the financial implications of this forced merger. We have had the details, so I will not go into them all, but the east midlands police authorities, which must be the experts on this, say that the set-up costs will be about £101 million and the ongoing costs £45 million. However, the Government—the Home Office—say, "No, we will fund this at £80 million on the set-up costs and £20 million on ongoing costs," which is considerably less. That can mean only that there will be a reduction in the services provided as a result of this merger.

There are other issues such as pay harmonisation. It will cost £9.4 million each year to harmonise the different pay structures across the five forces. The Home Office has made a partial commitment by saying that it will fund the cost for the first three years only. What happens after that? Either the council tax goes up or police numbers go down. There is also precept equalisation, and again there are different levels across the five forces—there is a 30 per cent. differential. How will that be harmonised out, given the capping guidelines of the former Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, which would not allow harmonisation to take place in that time scale?

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): On precepts, my understanding is that it will take at least three to four years for them to merge, so during that time we will have the same police force but some areas will be paying significantly more than others, which is unacceptable.

Paul Holmes: Absolutely. That leads us to my final group of objections to this forced merger, which involves the principle of local accountability. The size and diversity of the east midlands have been referred to, so I will not go into that, but the geographical differences and communications difficulties in respect of a force running from Northampton at one end to Skegness at another, and to High Peak and Chesterfield at yet another, speak for themselves. However, there is local accountability for a force such as Derbyshire. Let me highlight that by referring to an issue that has been raised.

In one or two of the previous four years, Derbyshire police authority has increased the council tax precept by well above the rate of inflation specifically to fund more beat police. I argued at the time—I have not received any comeback from my constituents to say otherwise—that my constituents would support that because they would see beat police on the ground making a difference. The right hon. Member for West Derbyshire says that his villagers have not seen a difference, and perhaps they are not so keen, but we have certainly seen a difference in Chesterfield.

However, would council tax payers in Chesterfield, West Derbyshire or High Peak be willing to pay extra council tax for more police if those police were going to Nottingham, Leicester or Northampton—or anywhere else in that giant super-region? It is not practical. For three different sets of reasons, I urge the new brooms at the Home Office to think again. Unfortunately, I do not have much confidence that they will.

Several hon. Members rose—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. I shall call the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), but I must point out that the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) also wants to get in before 10.40 am.

10.30 am

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on raising this topic. It is a long time since a Government Department has produced a proposal for which there is less support in the House; more important, less support among those in the police service who will have to put the proposal into effect; and most important, as my right hon. Friend pointed out, less support among our constituents. It is worth pausing to reflect on why there is so little support in any part of the community for the proposals.

The fundamental reason is that the arguments advanced in favour of the proposal remind me of nothing so much as "newspeak", as defined by George Orwell in "1984". Ministers and their apologists have offered series of arguments that bear no relation whatever to what most of us, and most of those in the police service, expect to be the reality. We are told that the merger is important in order to improve accountability. Since when did a shift of authority from a largely county basis to a regional basis improve accountability? It stands common sense on its head.

We are told that the merger is necessary to improve cost efficiency in the police service. Never mind the fact that the police believe that the Government have underestimated the cost, the Government themselves admit that it will cost £80 million, and that one day, five years hence—perhaps—there may be a payback, assuming that the Government do not change their policy again. Hello? Which world do the Government live in?

Finally, we are told that the proposals are important because they will assist operational efficiency. I do not understand the logic of telling my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (David Tredinnick) that the efficiency of the commander in Hinkley in dealing with nightclub louts, shifting between Hinkley and Nuneaton, will be improved by bringing Nottingham into the loop. Will someone please explain that to me and, more important, to the policemen and women who fear that it is another scheme dreamed up by the Government that will undermine the efficiency of their service and the delivery of that service to local people?

When I reflect on why such a friendless proposal was driven so hard by the previous Home Secretary—we hope that it will not be driven so hard by the new one—I can draw only one conclusion. It is yet another proposal dreamed up in the bowels of a Whitehall Department that may look good on a bureaucratic organogram but simply does not reflect operational efficiency on the ground—or, more important, common sense.

10.34 am

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), who made a powerful speech. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on securing such an important debate; the number of Members here today is testimony to that.

I shall concentrate on something that affects my constituency of Wellingborough. I founded a campaign called "Listening to Wellingborough and Rushden", in which a regular survey is made of the constituency. Not only do we have a snapshot of people's worries at any one time, but we can compare those snapshots, month to month and year to year. You might think, Mr. Taylor, that education would come top of the poll in Wellingborough, because a secondary school has been closed under the Labour Government; or you might think that it would be health, because many of my constituents must wait more than six months for an NHS operation; but neither of those issues are at the top of the poll. Law and order consistently tops the poll and, interestingly, in the past few months the gap between law and order and health and education in the survey results has been growing. The perception, at least in Wellingborough, is that crime is getting worse and people are more concerned about it. That is how things are under the current arrangements.

Further examination of the survey results, to see what specific concerns the people of Wellingborough have about law and order, shows that they are worried about vandalism, foul language, yob culture, arson and mugging. Those problems would, I believe, have a very low rating in a regional east midlands police force. The problems are so bad on some estates that one or two families are terrorising the law-abiding citizens of Wellingborough. I recently met a delegation from the Croyland ward in my constituency. They had put their heads above the parapet: usually people are too scared to say anything when there is vandalism and yob culture, but these people had said "Enough is enough; we want something done about it." What they want is more local police on the street, catching criminals and deterring crime.

Let us think a little about where Wellingborough is. I had hoped, Mr. Taylor, to bring in a map to show hon. Members, but I understand that parliamentary procedure does not allow it. Perhaps I can describe it. Northamptonshire is right at the bottom end of the east midlands and Wellingborough is right at the bottom of Northamptonshire. Rushden, where I live, is the second town in the constituency of Wellingborough and is right at the bottom of the constituency. If I walk 100 yd I can be in Bedfordshire. That is where Rushden is. The new centre for policing will be further up the map, in Nottingham, and somewhere even further up the map will be the edge of the east midlands. To the people of Wellingborough, the proposal is ridiculous.

The basic command unit has already been changed to fit in with the new plans, so my chief superintendent has moved from Wellingborough to Kettering. At the moment I have meetings with the chief constable, and I used to have meetings with the chief superintendent. Those will disappear if we have an east midlands force.

We heard earlier in the debate that Nottingham has come out pretty poorly in the crime figures. Leicestershire has come top of the ranking for assaults. If there is an east midlands regional force it will be the duty of the chief constable to put his resources where there is most crime, so what will happen? Police officers will be taken from Wellingborough and moved to Nottingham and Leicestershire. That is the fear not only of the people of Wellingborough, but of the chief constable of Northamptonshire. We will lose policing, which will go towards Nottingham and Leicestershire. The people of Wellingborough will lose out.

At the moment my constituents do not have enough police out on the beat catching criminals and deterring crime. If there were an east midlands police force, any policing of that kind would disappear entirely and crime in my constituency would go up and up. In the "Listening to Wellingborough and Rushden" survey, law and order would become an even higher priority.

10.39 am

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): I congratulate the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on securing the debate. The issue is important and is likely to affect not only the east midlands but many communities in the country. I am sure that many of the concerns that the right hon. Gentleman has raised today are shared by police officers, residents and, indeed, Members of Parliament from south Wales to Suffolk. It is regrettable that several hon. Members have had to seek Adjournment debates on the issue as a result of the Government's attempts to sidestep debates on the Floor of the House on such a hugely important matter.

I shall start by outlining the areas in which I and my party agree with Government policy. It is clear that in some instances small police forces do not possess the resources to deal effectively with some serious crimes. Several recent high-profile cases in which a particular force required assistance—Soham is just the most obvious example—have demonstrated that the Government were right to explore ways in which police forces could better co-operate and support each other; that much is not in doubt. It would be wrong to suggest that Liberal Democrats oppose closer co-operation between different forces and agencies. For example, we have called for a national border force to bring together the disparate agencies that deal with border security, including the relevant police, customs and immigration officers. We have also called for a new national body to deal with financial crime, which seems to be a low priority for the Government.

I do not agree, however, that the nuclear option, if I might use that phrase in this context, of axing entire police forces is a sensible way to deal with the issues. In my view, the answer is staring the Government in the face. The recently established Serious Organised Crime Agency gives the police a ready-made resource on which they can call if they need to. If SOCA could take responsibility for level 2 crime, as my party has suggested, we would have the ideal solution, because serious crimes and crimes that take up disproportionate resources could be tackled without, in effect, bankrupting smaller forces and, crucially, local communities in the east midlands and beyond would remain strongly linked to their local police forces.

My experience of local government in the past 10 years has demonstrated to me in the clearest possible terms that, despite their rhetoric, the Government remain committed to centralisation. They seem to believe that an office in Whitehall can deal with community policing better than a local beat bobby can. One has only to speak to local police officers in a constituency to realise that much of their work is dictated by Home Office targets and politically inspired initiatives. Worryingly, that trend is replicated across a broad spectrum of services, including the NHS, where central mismanagement has led to local funding crises, and local authorities, which must somehow reflect local priorities while trapped in the central Government straitjacket.

In pursuing the regionalisation of police forces, we need to remember that current regional structures in the east midlands, as in the rest of the country, are the result of arbitrarily drawn administrative boundaries with no democratic structures underpinning them. The amalgamation of police forces would result in the abolition of police authorities and the loss of the link to elected councils through local authority members. Although the Home Office argues that new structures of accountability can be built around basic command units, that would create the worst of both worlds, because such structures would be too distant from local communities to provide meaningful discussion of neighbourhood priorities, and too fragmented to provide meaningful scrutiny of decisions that are taken at force level.

I turn now to the practical pitfalls of the mergers policy as it affects forces in the east midlands and elsewhere. Like all regions, the east midlands is diverse, with large metropolitan areas and distinct rural localities. Should the proposals be implemented, there is a real danger, as has been said, that officers and other resources will be drawn away from the quieter areas to police urban crime hot spots. Chief constables of smaller forces act as champions for their areas and can lobby for a fair share of resources, but that simply will not be possible under the new model.

In addition, there is precious little evidence that big forces perform better than small ones, which serves only to confirm suspicions that the real motive behind the policy is to save money. The HMIC baseline assessment in 2004 found that, regardless of size, all forces were classed as "fair" or "good" at tackling level 2 crime. If the resources required for mergers come from the neighbourhood policing strategy budget, that would signal in the clearest possible terms that the Government's priorities lie with centralisation, not local policing.

Amalgamation would also reduce police accountability and responsiveness by distancing force HQs physically and figuratively from the communities that they serve and by sacrificing coterminosity with local authority boundaries. However, it is not only coterminosity with local authority boundaries that is threatened, because the relationships between other agencies, such as—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. I urge the hon. Gentleman to bring his remarks to a close.

Mark Hunter: I shall do so, Mr. Taylor. The relationships between other agencies such as the Crown Prosecution Service, the courts and the probation service could also suffer. The last thing we need to do now is to allow the gaps in knowledge between the police and the probation service to grow wider. If ever a Government Department was desperate to buy some good will it is the Home Office, and the new regime now has the opportunity to take on board the views expressed this morning and to put a stop to the plans.

10.45 am

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on securing this debate, and I welcome the Minister to his new position. His predecessor as Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety lasted for two weeks; I hope that the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) lasts longer. Commentators have described the mini-reshuffle that took place yesterday as reshuffling the deckchairs; I hope the Minister enjoys life on the deck of the Titanic. When icebergs appear, it does not make sense to steer the ship straight towards them, but that is what the Home Office has been doing in relation to police amalgamation, in a totally unnecessary distraction from the job that the Department should have been doing. It is clear that the previous Home Secretary was too distracted by this process. I hope that the Minister and the new Home Secretary will think again—we hear that they are considering doing so.

My right hon. and hon. Friends raised a number of important concerns about the absurdly tight timetable for the amalgamations and the lack of consultation with local people. I shall wish to focus on three points made by the hon. Member for High Peak (Tom Levitt), because I think he was wrong on all three counts.

First, the hon. Gentleman made some suggestions about local accountability and people's ability to get hold of their divisional commanders and to have their e-mail addresses. He suggested that the survival of the basic command unit, although that is not assured in respect of the one he referred to in west Derbyshire, would be an adequate substitute for the loss of the chief constable. He said that nobody minded about where their chief constable resides, but actually, that matters a great deal, especially for a force that will cover an area of 6,000 sq miles and serve 4.2 million people. It matters, not only for the reasons that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire suggested in terms of direct access on the part of Members of Parliament, but because power and decision making has to lie somewhere. Ultimately, somebody has to run the force and decide where resources will be deployed, and it would be a fiction to pretend that a BCU commander will be able to respond to people in the local community and say, "Yes, I will do this," or "I will do that," when in fact the force is run by the chief constable who is miles away. All Members will feel the loss when we find that our local communities are no longer able to have any influence at all over the proper decisions being made by the chief constable.

[Nick Herbert]

Secondly, the hon. Member for High Peak suggested that the federation of forces was not a viable option. I think that he is wrong. There is plenty of evidence in the midlands that federation, or the sharing of services between forces, is a viable alternative—look for example at the midlands counter-terrorism support unit, which operates in the east midlands. The option of sharing services was suggested by the Prime Minister, no less, as an alternative to amalgamation, which his own strategy unit warned would be a risky undertaking. It has not been properly considered by the Government. It was recommended by the Association of Police Authorities, but the impetus to achieve co-operation between forces has now been lost because there will be no incentive on the part of the strategic forces, some of them much smaller than the east midlands force, to share services.

Finally, on funding, I hope the Minister has seen a copy of the paper prepared by the Association of Chief Police Officers' head of finance, the chief constable of Gloucestershire, which was reported in The Daily Telegraph last Friday. If he has not done so, he should read it. The ACPO conference will debate it this week. The report represents a salutary warning to those who believe that amalgamation will somehow allow a reinvestment of resources into enhancing protective services. We all agree that there is a gap and that protective services need strengthening; the question is how we do that. ACPO's head of finance warns that because of the triple counting of services, and because amalgamations will cost money—£77 million in respect of the east midlands force—resources will not be available for investment into protective services and there will be an impact on neighbourhood policing.

I end by quoting the conclusion of the report:

"Ultimately unless additional funding is identified the early years of Force amalgamation are likely to be a period not of service improvement but a period of rapid and significant reduction in service provision as the new forces desperately try to balance their books."

If the Minister does not take account of that warning, he is making a severe mistake. I urge him to listen to what almost everybody has said this morning, and to think again.

10.50 am

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Mr. Tony McNulty): I congratulate the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on securing the debate—something that the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) on the Front Bench did not do, by the bye, in the rush to make his contribution.

Nick Herbert: Yes I did.

Mr. McNulty: None the less, it has been an extraordinarily useful debate, certainly for me, given my current circumstances. I congratulate the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire and others on both sides on the broad tone of the debate. It has been essentially non-partisan, or cross-party—whichever way one wants to view it—and it has been well informed. I would expect no less from the MPs of the east midlands.

As a London MP, I find that policing in London is different from policing elsewhere, but I do, and will increasingly, appreciate what policing means outside London and in other areas. By the bye, I do not think that I heard the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter), who speaks for the Liberals, congratulate the Government on leaving his Greater Manchester force alone, which I thought was a bit churlish.

The points that right hon. and hon. Members have made are important, but most—not quite all—of them started from the premise that the status quo is not terrible. Our broad position starts from that. As hon. Members will know, the Government's plans for assorted forces up and down the country are clear. However, none of the speakers went to the ditch to defend, in absolute terms, where we are now with policing. I am enormously grateful that that is the starting point. The present model is some 30 years old and, purely in terms of the development of society since then, bears greater scrutiny.

I take on board all that has been said about merger being at one end of the scale—the nuclear option, I think it was called—and all sorts of collaborative work and other options on the road to merger being at the other end. We should be clear that the proposed merger model does not preclude that sort of collaboration, or a federated structure, beyond and outside regions. As the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer) suggested, there must be ever greater collaboration across the country and across regions, not least on counter-terrorism, as he says.

Before I come to matters of substance, let me say that I take on board what has been suggested about the timetable. If hon. Members feel that they have not had sufficient face time—for want of a better phrase—with Ministers to talk through the issues in detail, I am more than happy to ensure that that happens. I am not sure that I would welcome all 44 east midlands MPs in the same room, all barking and baying at me at once, but we can certainly look into the details of how that should happen. I would welcome that opportunity, too. However valuable the Adjournment debate is, we can discuss these matters in far more detail in much smaller groups. I am more than happy to do that, whether on a county basis or otherwise, and I will afford the same facility—because it would help me as much as anyone—to the Front Benchers; I will come and hear their concerns.

Many of the complaints about what the Government are trying to do—quite naturally, in terms of hyperbole and rhetoric—involve attacking straw men and putting forward simplistic models. If all that the Government were offering was a rush to merge regional authorities, many of the concerns about accountability, remoteness and day-to-day operational policing would be well made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: I will in a moment, because I am keen to understand the Rushcliffe model mentioned by some speakers.

What is on offer must be, and be seen to be, inextricably, all the three elements, which are neighbourhood policing, a redefinition of basic command unit accountability, and the broader strategic structure.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Many years ago I encountered the same problem relating to force sizes and accountability. Will the Minister accept in this debate that the accountability and contact that mean most to many MPs and their constituents is at divisional level and local level, and that it will take much longer than the Government's present timetable to explain how accountability and contact at those levels can be improved as we move towards a giant overall organisation covering five rather disparate counties?

Mr. McNulty: I am grateful for that intervention because in broad terms I agree with it. As I said at the beginning, I am not metrocentric. I appreciate that London is policed differently, but to return to the London parallel, I have never had cause, in specific local terms, to ring up Scotland Yard for anything. However, like the hon. Member for Newark, I have the numbers and other details of my local basic commander—borough commander, as we call it. That is where the accountability lies.

It is important to say that all three elements that we are discussing are significant. I take the points that people make about neighbourhood policing and wanting the police to be highly visible on the streets in their neighbourhood. That is part of the debate. I take the point that the divisional level, the BCU level, must be the focal point for greater and enhanced communication among local communities, local representatives such as MPs and councillors, and local police forces. None the less, the case is made for forces to cover a wider area.

I ask hon. Members to take seriously what I say about seeing people and talking these issues through in far more detail during the objection period. Everyone can bandy about assorted quotes from chief constables. I accept that, so let me do it. The chief constable of Leicestershire says that merging five forces into one is going in "the right direction and will provide, in time, greater flexibility and effectiveness".

I accept that that is a qualified statement, but the chief constable accepts the broad thrust of where we are going.

Mr. McLoughlin: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: Funnily enough, I have no quote for Derbyshire, so I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am sorry that the Minister has no quote for Derbyshire. May I press him on one point? At the moment, we are in a four-month consultation period. My understanding is that it will end sometime in July. Will the Minister assure us that an announcement will not be made on this issue on 25 July, as the House rises, and that we will have the opportunity to discuss it so that the House can properly measure the proposals?

Mr. McNulty: I can give the right hon. Gentleman an assurance on the first point, because I understand that the four-month objection period finishes around 11 August, rather than in mid-July. Therefore the small window at the end of July wherein he suggested there might be parliamentary debate does not come into play.

Let me say this as clearly as I can, because there have been intimations in the press. The new Home Secretary starts from the premise that the current position is simply untenable and the direction of travel of what we have suggested is the right outcome. Quite rightly, as a new Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend reserves the right to take a look at things such as timetables and all the other elements that go with that. With or without that, local MPs are right to raise what are very important issues—none of which I traduce as trivial—such as council tax precept equalisation, the disparity between urban and rural areas and the disparity between the starting financial bases of each of the counties. Work is being done on those matters. In fact, the east midlands business plan for the merger was one of the best of those submitted, but work continues.

If hon. Members are suggesting that more time is required, I am not shocked or astonished by that and I will certainly take their suggestions back to the Department. I have commented on the Home Secretary's position. If the concern is that they have not had sufficient time at ministerial level to talk their concerns through, I will give an assurance that that can happen for the east midlands and elsewhere. I take seriously the concerns expressed by hon. Members and I will take them back to the Department, but the current position is untenable. We want to go in the direction outlined in the merger plans. Policing is far too important to ignore the genuine concerns raised by hon. Members from all parts of the Chamber—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. I ask contributors to and observers of the police forces debate to leave quietly.

Sunday Trading Hours

11 am

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to debate Sunday trading hours and to do so with you in the Chair, Mr. Taylor. I welcome my very good friend the Minister, who is responding to this debate. He represents a London constituency and, in that capacity, I hope he will join me in welcoming the goals of the Evening Standard campaign for small shops in the capital.

I studied, as I am sure the Minister did, the remarks of our right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade, who, while in his current post, said in the recent Commons debate on confident consumers:

"I am determined to...strike the right balance."—[Official Report, 11 May 2006; Vol. 446, c. 566.]

I am pleased that he used that phrase, because the right balance is what the whole question of Sunday trading hours must be about.

I speak as a fully paid up and long-standing member of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. The issue is crucially important to the union and its members. We need to strike a balance between more than the interests of shop workers, whom I believe are the majority, who do not want longer Sunday working hours, and consumers, whom I believe are the minority, who do. This issue is about the right balance between large and small stores, and between the character of Sunday and that of other days of the week. It is also about the work-life balance and the balance between the interests of those who are affected by the traffic, deliveries and servicing of Sunday trading and those who want to shop.

We should all recall that there was intensive and prolonged debate on all those issues before the passage of the Sunday Trading Act 1994, which was itself a considered compromise between those who wanted no Sunday trading, those who wanted deregulation and those who wanted a significant bit of trading for large stores, more freedom for small stores and protection for affected workers. It was a compromise—it struck a balance—and subsequent developments qualified it, notably the welcome introduction of the minimum wage and Christmas day protection.

The balance has, on the whole, worked better than opponents at either end of the spectrum expected. People can shop in large supermarkets and stores for much of the day and they can use smaller shops outside those hours, yet Sunday remains a bit different, and shop workers retain some protection in law and in practice. If we were seeking to change that Act, there would be a much stronger case for entrenching legally the right to premium payment and for strengthening workers' protection against pressure to work on Sundays when they do not want to do so, rather than for moving in the opposite direction.

Sunday trading is one of the subjects on which we never get everyone to agree. I do not see any evidence that opinion has shifted much one way or the other. We should not keep compromising with those who want a total free-for-all. If we were to do so, we would allow them to salami-slice their way to complete deregulation, which is not what most people want; it is not even what all the big retail chains want. The onus is on those who want longer or deregulated hours to make the case. I do not think that they have succeeded in doing so, and they have not convinced the public.

From what my constituents in Oxford tell me, and from opinion polls, I see no tide of opinion in favour of longer opening hours for large stores—quite the contrary. For example, a British Market Research Bureau survey for the Association of Convenience Stores found that 68 per cent. of the public did not want large supermarket chains to open for longer hours on Sunday. Of the remainder, a further 14 per cent. said that they would reconsider and not support longer opening hours if they threatened small businesses. USDAW's NOP survey found that 62 per cent. of the public do not want longer Sunday opening hours. Even a survey of people who were out shopping on a Sunday conducted for the lobby group, Deregulate, found that only 56 per cent. favoured longer opening hours. That is hardly a ringing endorsement from those in the public whom one might expect to be most in favour of longer hours.

The inquiry by the panel of parliamentarians, including my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed), who is present, found widespread opposition not only from religious groups and trade unionists but, significantly, from groups such as Working Families, the Mothers' Union and CARE, and particular concern for the effects on family life and especially parents' ability to spend time with their children. That is an issue, rightly, of growing concern.

Such important considerations were given surprisingly little attention in the cost-benefit analysis commissioned by the Department of Trade and Industry. Indeed, some important arguments were explicitly excluded from the analysis, such as people not wanting trading because it is the Christian day of rest, restrictions being necessary to protect workers from pressure to work on a Sunday, and a collective preference for a quiet day. In a rather haughty get-out clause the authors, from Indepen, state:

"We have not attempted to evaluate these arguments quantitatively."

They ought to have added "qualitatively" as well. They go on to say:

"If they have merit, it would be necessary for Ministers to make judgements as to how their merits compare with the net benefits of liberalisation that we have quantified."

I urge Ministers to do just that. Some of the most important arguments are at stake in the decision about what sort of a day we as a society want Sunday to be for workers as well as consumers and for us all as human beings.

Colleagues will, I am sure, have scope in their speeches to consider such matters and other issues from the cost-benefit analysis in further detail. However, it is important to stress three key points. First, the cost-benefit analysis report sees no net job generation from further deregulation. Secondly, the gains that it claims, such as the effect on prices, derive largely from the progressive erosion of premium payments. Even if the reduction in consumer prices and higher profits were to materialise, it would largely be at the expense of low-paid workers. It is inconceivable in such circumstances that the already extensive pressure that shop staff feel that they are under to work on Sundays—more than half of staff reported such pressure in an USDAW survey—would not increase.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I do not know whether my right hon. Friend has been the fortunate recipient of a paper from Deregulate, but it states:

"Our proposals are supported by...many who work on Sundays in the industry because they may want to top up pensions, or are the 170,000 students facing debt who find it convenient to work at weekends or are those recruited through 'Jobcentreplus'."

There it is; we are doing this on behalf of those who are most in need. Does he think that that is a good argument?

Mr. Smith: I have not seen that briefing from Deregulate, but that does not surprise me. Indeed, the cost-benefit analysis commissioned by the DTI pointed to both students and single parents as potential recruits for additional Sunday working. As far as the latter are concerned, who is looking after the children while those lone parents are out working? As USDAW's surveys have shown, many people are not doing such work through choice but out of necessity as a means of keeping body and soul together. No one would dispute that Sunday working suits some people. The thrust of my argument is not that it does not, but that many people feel under increasing pressure to work when they do not want to do so. Moreover, as the cost-benefit analysis report showed, the premium payments that attract some people to work on Sundays at the moment have been progressively eroded, from the typical double time, at the time of the 1994 Act, to time and a half, time and a quarter and, in many cases, single time. That pressure would get worse.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): My right hon. Friend made the valid point earlier that we should consider strengthening the rights of workers to guarantees of premium payments. Does he accept in any case that there are many exploited workers even now, both in the sectors brought into Sunday trading by the most recent changes and in those that could always trade on Sunday? People need proper protection from being forced to worked to work on Sundays for inadequate remuneration.

Mr. Smith: I certainly accept that, and that point is clear from surveys and the anecdotal evidence of workers in the industry.

The third key point that came out of the cost-benefit analysis was that small stores will lose out, especially on current out-of-hours sales, for which they are a substitute for large store provision. Given the report's precision on the benefits that it claims will come from extending hours, it is striking how vague its conclusions are about the quantitative effects on smaller and convenience stores. How many small shops would close and how many jobs would be lost? We must give weight to the conclusion drawn by the Association of Convenience Stores that liberalisation would have a "devastating effect on local convenience stores".

We should also bear in mind the sector's survey, which showed that as many as 30 per cent. of independents would be likely to close if Sunday trading hours were extended and that 44 per cent. of retailers would be forced to cut staff.

To draw to a conclusion, the case for further deregulation has not been made; indeed, there are good grounds for being apprehensive about its effects. I hope that the Government, having reviewed all the evidence, will come to the same conclusion. If by any mischance they do not, I would seek assurances, first, that there would be votes on primary legislation in Parliament before any change could be made and, secondly, that any such votes would be free votes, so that MPs could vote according to their conscience and judgment.

I hope that the situation does not come to that and that the Government will share my view that they have many more important and constructive things to do than bring in longer Sunday trading hours. Doing so would put shop workers under unacceptable pressure, further diminish the special character of Sunday and lead to the closure of many more small shops. Let us keep a civilised balance and stick with the 1994 Act.

I leave the last word to Heather Morris and Debbie Davidson, shop workers who gave moving accounts of what the possibility of more Sunday working meant to them at a seminar that USDAW organised for MPs. They pointed out that Sunday working hours are already longer than the six hours for which the shops can be open, because of preparation and clearing-up time. They said:

"Sunday is losing its tradition of being a family day. We look forward to having Sunday tea together because we can no longer have Sunday lunch together.

Some of us don't have the luxury of choosing to work on Sundays or choosing to work in retail. We are hardworking people...there to support our families."

One added:

"I know dearly how important families are. How important it is to spend time with them, to create memories for our children, keep traditions and family life alive.

I want to spend my bank holidays at home with the family—but we are open. I want to spend Boxing Day with my family—but we are open. I want to spend Easter with my family—but we are open.

I would urge you to remember—when you sit eating your Sunday roast at home, know that we will still be there working—right up to 5.30.

But know too that when you are enjoying your sandwiches, cake and tea at 6 o'clock that evening, we too are at home enjoying ours, with our sons, daughters and grandchildren.

So for us—allow us that at least."

I hope that the Government will do just that, and drop the idea of longer Sunday trading hours.

Several hon. Members rose—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. It is my intention to call the Front-Bench speakers at 12 noon. Six hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye, so will hon. Members observe those limits? You can do the arithmetic yourselves.

11.15 am

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), whom I congratulate on securing the debate on this important topic.

[Mr. Andrew Turner]

With due deference to the Minister, I am not sure that this ball should be in the court of the Department of Trade and Industry in the first place. The DTI is there to advocate the interests of the employer, of business, and more and more, sadly, of big business. Many other aspects of this debate need to be taken into account before any conclusion is reached, such as the effect on children and family life, which the right hon. Gentleman mentioned. I do not consider the DTI to be well placed to take account of the needs of children and family life. I hope that what he said about the need for families to have time together will be taken seriously before any conclusion is reached on this proposal.

I hope also that serious attention will be given to the likely impact on our towns and cities, and on the roads between them and the adjoining villages. We already have six-days-a-week congestion, and we are in danger of having seven-days-a-week congestion. That means that we will need more bus services to be provided on Sundays and more filling stations to be open. If Sunday trading hours are extended, premises both in and out of town will be used for even more hours than they are now, people will expect bus services to run earlier, and people who live in town centres will be awoken earlier.

Take, for example, someone who lives in the centre of Ryde or Newport in my constituency—I declare an interest because I live in the centre of Newport. It is not unusual for large delivery lorries to arrive at supermarkets such as Somerfield and Sainsbury's well before the official opening hours of those stores on six, no seven, days a week. If the time at which those stores can open is made earlier on a Sunday, people will be disturbed earlier by delivery lorries. In my constituency, there will be more pressure for people to work on the ferries earlier, so that the delivery lorries can cross the Solent in time to reach the supermarkets before they open.

The proposals will have an impact on employment, as I am sure the Minister understands, but they will also have an impact on the condition and state of our towns and villages. People quite like walking around Newport and Ryde on Sundays, because there is less traffic and congestion. Sundays would become very much like any other day if the proposals of the big conglomerates were to take effect in the manner under consideration. I hope that the Minister will consider carefully with his colleagues in the Department for Communities and Local Government the impact of Sunday trading on planning and local government.

I hope that the Minister will also consider the impact on tourism. Obviously, there is some demand for some stores to be open on Sundays, but for the most part it is small stores, shops and businesses that open on Sundays to deal with the needs of tourism. Thankfully, most tourism has not yet been taken over by the Sainsburys and Tescos of this world; there is already a danger of that with garden centres, which are increasingly being swallowed up by big chains. There was a time when I felt some sympathy for the desire of garden centres to open on Easter day, but no longer, because for the great part they are no longer small, local businesses that breathe money into the economy of their local area, although many still are.

I hope that the Minister who has this difficult responsibility will allow the Department of Trade and Industry to shed its traditional appearance, and that it will look more carefully at the whole range of community interests across the nation.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the seminar provided for right hon. and hon. Members by USDAW and the "Keep Sunday Special" campaign. The contributions of Heather Morris and Debbie Davidson were moving. In particular, I remember their references to the hours at which people have to start work. Supermarkets have to open on weekday mornings with all the shelves full and all the bread freshly baked, and that would have to be translated to Sunday mornings if Sunday trading was to be extended in the same way. We were told that the bakers have to start work at 4 o'clock in the morning if fresh bread is to be on the shelves by 7. There is no reason why that should not happen also on Sundays under proposals currently up for consideration.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): May I place on record my support, on behalf of my constituents, for USDAW's "Save our Sundays" campaign and for the "Keep Sunday Special" campaign? I congratulate my hon. Friend on his remarks about the impact of deregulation on family life. Is he as shocked as I am to hear that there are 1.4 million families with dependent children in which both parents already have to work throughout the weekend?

Mr. Turner: I am surprised that the number is as great as my hon. Friend suggests. I am concerned about it, however, because those children deserve to have time with their parents—with both parents together—and they need to see how, ideally, families should work. I know that it is difficult for people to bring up children, and I know that many children are not fortunate enough to be brought up by both parents; but we do not want more children to be forced for reasons of economic necessity to be left by their parents on Sundays as they are left on other days of the week.

I was speaking about the effect on shop workers. It can be argued that shop workers are grown up people and can make up their own minds when they want to work and when they do not want to work; they can take what is on offer or they can work elsewhere. That is the traditional argument of the big conglomerates. I subscribe to the view that people should make their own decisions on where and when they work, but it is not sufficient for us simply to wash our hands of our responsibility to them and to the shop workers of future generations.

It is not because of how much shop workers are paid that I worry about them working on Sunday: I am sure that many students are happy to work on Sunday. I am concerned about the extension of Sunday trading because of the consequences for communities and families. I am concerned also about its impact on those families who already run small businesses, because it is a form of unfair competition. Large businesses are backed by a huge amount of capital, and they can spread that capital and the cost of that investment over seven days a week; but a family running a corner shop naturally wants some private time, and it will be much more difficult to spread the cost of the investment over seven days a week with full opening hours.

I believe that if such a proposal ever came before the House in the form of legislation, we should look again at the further regulation of Sunday trading. However, I suggest that further regulation should not be imposed nationally but that it should be for local authorities to impose it within the current regulations. I suggest, for example, that local authorities ought to be given the power to limit further the hours of Sunday trading for all or any class of business if they so desired. For instance, they could permit sole traders to open for the full six hours but require larger traders to open for less. They could permit locally owned businesses to open for the full six hours but restrict other businesses. They could permit small garden centres or farm shops to open the full six hours but not permit other businesses to do so. The House will need to take account of those considerations if the proposal ever forms legislation, but most important is that the Minister considers carefully the views of his colleagues in other Departments as well as those of the public on this unpopular proposal.

Several hon. Members rose—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. There are five Members wishing to speak and 35 minutes left.

11.25 am

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Thank you, Mr. Taylor. The pressure is on—I understand that. There is a great temptation for people to stand up and say that they will be brief. Having already lost a couple of minutes, I shall try to keep to a narrow point.

I thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) for securing this debate. It is important that the Minister and his team know the strong feelings of Back Benchers not just from one party but throughout the House. I am grateful that my right hon. Friend mentioned the document, "Whose Convenience?", in which I declare a bit of an interest. It did what the Department of Trade and Industry failed to do, examining the social effects of extending weekend working and Sunday trading.

My right hon. Friend highlighted one of the big problems, which was that the DTI focus was too narrow. The cost-benefit analysis was based solely on the economic arguments of extending Sunday trading, but as other hon. Members have said, the real problems with extending Sunday trading are the effects on family life, parenting and relationships.

I come to the issue with my faith. I am one of those who believe that it is possible for Members of Parliament to have a strong faith and to bring it to policy making. My faith underlies much of what I have to say. I keep Sunday as special as possible, but I recognise that in a secular society it is impossible to impose my views about Sunday on everybody else. I am flexible, but I try as much as possible not to shop on a Sunday and to make it a special day. Such an approach can even help MPs to ensure that they see more of their families.

MPs have some choice in the matter. To a certain extent, apart from a few things that we have to do throughout the year, we have some choice about how we structure our week. The people who will be most affected by the proposal probably have very little choice. The hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) raised this matter earlier, when he said that 1.5 million families include people who have to work on Sundays. If we extend trading, we will make that much worse.

Because of my faith, which underpins my values and the way in which I look at society, I believe that "God measures a society...not by the size of its GDP or by the efficiency of its markets, but by the quality of its relationships."

"God" could be changed to "we".

This is one of the two or three areas about which I feel strongly. As people know, I have a great passion for sport and for international development. The third area that I wish to pursue while I am in the House is getting the balance right for encouraging, fostering and nurturing relationships, as that is the key to solving many of today's social ills and problems. The Government can assist and create environments, but the single biggest thing that they can do is to create time for families to encourage and nurture relationships.

I thank those who helped to write the report. As usual, those of us who are named in it probably did very little work. The credit goes to others who are here today. I shall not refer to the whole of the report, but what is interesting in paragraph 3.5, which deals with the effects on family life and parenting, is that it was not just the usual suspects who provided the strongest opposition to a relaxation of the six-hour rule. Obviously, organisations such as the TUC and USDAW were involved, but it was nice that others such as Morrisons were as well. I was encouraged by that. We should remember when we castigate the big supermarkets that companies such as Morrisons recognise that there is a balance to be struck. The British Shops and Stores Association, Working Families, the Mothers Union and CARE were also involved, and it was the National Centre for Social Research that highlighted the number of people who already work long hours.

It is a little late in terms of the work that has already been done, but it is imperative when the Minister and his colleagues consider the report, that they consider introducing primary legislation. I and other hon. Members urge them to give us a free vote so that we can all have our say. [Hon. Members: "Hear, hear."] At that point, the Minister will get the message that there is no great support for the measure in the House or the country. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East rightly said, even research done among those who had chosen to go shopping on a Sunday showed only 56 per cent. support for extending Sunday shopping. Clearly, support is not that large in the country; indeed, other research and opinion polls generally show about 70 per cent. opposition.

There is nothing for the Government to gain by extending Sunday shopping. Given that they want to generate good news stories rather than bad, why would they generate another bad news story unnecessarily? They should just kill this one off at the end of this Adjournment debate, and we could all walk away happy, praising the Minister as he went on his way. Perhaps one or two extra Members need to be present to convince him, but he would make friends here and across the House if he killed the proposal off today, rather than waiting for the summer recess. We need to get our values right in society, and that is also true of the work-life balance. The Department has introduced several welcome legislative changes, which have started to address the need to get the work-life balance right, and it would be strange if it took the retrograde step represented by the present measure and undermined much of the good work that has been done.

As I said, my other interest is in sport, and I chair the National Strategic Partnership for Volunteering in Sport—we actually got consultants in to come up with a shorter title, but that was the one that they came up with. However, the body is important because we speak on behalf of the roughly 2.5 million people who volunteer in sport. As everybody who has volunteered will know, however, the increased pressure of work is squeezing people's ability to give regular time to volunteering. We all volunteer, but we also know that sport is increasingly changing. The 3 o'clock Saturday afternoon kick-off has changed and the mini rugby clubs and the football teams are full. Indeed, my little eight-year-old son has just started playing football and was supposed to have been in a tournament on Sunday. However, it is impossible to get the balance right, and we need to create extra time.

The Institute of Management did research into lifestyle measures and asked people whether they had time for other interests. Even in 1997, 77 per cent. of people said that they did not, but by 1999, about 87 per cent. said that they had little time for additional interests. When they were asked whether their extended hours were damaging their health, 71 per cent. said that they did, so people recognised the problem. When they were asked whether their hours had an effect on their relationship with their children, 86 per cent. said that they did. As we know, the time that people enjoy together with their family is a vital part of the week. We must recognise the need to get the work-life balance right when we have our children. One of those who was surveyed said that he was working as hard as he could to spend lots of time with his grandchildren. That is great, and it will be some consolation to him, but it might not be a consolation to his children.

We need to get the balance right to free up people's time. The biggest contribution that we can make is to create time so that families can spend quality time together. That will deliver not only a better Sunday but a better quality of life right across the nation in terms of what we as families and individuals achieve.

11.33 am

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): I too congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) on obtaining the debate. I should declare that I am a life member of the Association of Town Centre Management, although I do not believe that it has a particular view on Sunday trading.

The question I ask myself is where the call to extend Sunday hours comes from, because it does not seem to come from us in Parliament, and as we have heard, it does not come from those who work in shops or from the public. Surveys show very low public support for changing the law; indeed, the Department of Trade and Industry commissioned a cost-benefit analysis by Indepen Consulting Ltd, which bears that out. It surveyed the current situation, and page 16 of its report shows that 13 per cent. of adults aged 16 and over shop at supermarkets every Sunday, while 7 per cent. shop at other large stores every Sunday. The conclusion that most of us would draw from that—oddly, the Indepen report does not draw it—is that 80 per cent. of adults do not shop at supermarkets on Sundays and 93 per cent. do not shop at other large stores on Sundays. Even the Department's own commissioned report seems to bear out that lack of public support.

So who wants change? Not necessarily all the big four supermarkets. A representative of Sainsbury's quoted in Retail Week late last year said:

"Our customers tell us they are happy with our opening hours and we have not had any demand to change them."

Of course, however, if change should come I am sure that Sainsbury's would follow the other big supermarkets in extending its hours. I can only conclude that the pressure comes from the big three supermarkets, if not from all of the big four.

I am sure that the Minister will want to take into account the fact that the Competition Commission has now been asked by the Office of Fair Trading to carry out a new inquiry into the grocery trade, and in particular the effect on it of the big four supermarkets. In addition to all the other reasons that have been given that support my belief that it would be unwise for the Government to proceed with an extension of opening hours at present, it would be unwise to proceed with any proposals for change while that Competition Commission inquiry is under way. If the Minister wants a reason to kick the idea into the long grass, that is very respectable one for him to make use of.

I welcome the assurance, given by one of the Minister's colleagues at the USDAW conference a month or so ago, that if any change were to be proposed in future it would be subject to a vote in Parliament—I hope that it would be a free vote—and would not be dealt with under the powers that might be given to Parliament under, for instance, the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill.

An argument urged by some supporters of extending hours—whoever those shadowy characters might be—is that it would mean lower prices for customers. However, the Indepen report gives no evidence that that will be so. It merely asserts it. It does not mention, for instance, the fact that in the past the Competition Commission logically said that supermarket pricing depends on local competition; the effect of change on that competition and on the smaller, independent convenience stores and other independent retailers concerns me. We all know the figures about closures of independent convenience stores in the past few years: 2,000 of them closed last year, and their sales are regularly down an average of 5 per cent. a year. The recent report by the all-party small shops group, "High Street Britain: 2015", which I am pleased to have played a part in preparing, showed the pressures to which those small shops are already subject.

The Indepen report states that extending hours will "impact negatively on small stores that are primarily substitutes for large stores" and could have a positive impact on "small stores that are complements to large stores".

What the report ignores is the fact that in the past few years the number of small stores that complement larger stores has decreased, and the number of small stores that act as substitutes has increased. That is because the larger stores have extended beyond their usual grocery base the range of goods and services on offer to customers, to include DVDs and CDs, white goods, clothing, magazines and newspapers, pharmacy services, photo processing and so on. More and more of the small stores near the bigger stores are not complementary to those bigger stores, but are substitutes, and the Indepen report completely overlooks that important factor.

In Brighton and Hove we are lucky. We have a good, successful sub-regional shopping centre, where most of the big multiples are represented, and we also have a vibrant and diverse area of small, independent retailers around the Lanes and the North Laine, which many people who have visited Brighton will know. The North Laine and the Lanes are currently voting on whether to become a business improvement district. We do not know how the vote will turn out, but by making it possible to set up business improvement districts the Government are helping small retailers who want to help themselves. If they extend the opening hours of larger stores they will put small retailers under still further pressure rather than helping them. I urge the Minister, as others have done, to look at the evidence, which is that the public and Members of Parliament do not want it, and to take the matter no further and forget about it.

11.40 am

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) on securing the debate.

It seems to me that we have seen a steady erosion of time off and special days. I remember a long debate many years ago when I was a councillor about whether we should allow the market to open on Good Friday. We said no, but Good Friday is now a normal working day for many people.

It is important to protect family life when we can. People have strong views about Sunday trading, which have been expressed in the House many times. Most of us accept that the decision was made to allow stores to open for a limited number of hours and that it will stand. When that decision was taken by the House, there were a number of safeguards in place to ensure that people did not have to work on Sundays if they did not want to and to ensure premium payments. However, all the evidence from the survey carried out by USDAW is that those safeguards are being eroded. Eighty per cent. of people who work in shops now work on Sundays and say that it is difficult to have a Sunday off. Almost half are unhappy about that.

Let us be clear: we are talking about many low-paid workers who feel under pressure to work on Sundays if they are to keep their jobs and who need to work on Sundays to keep their wages at a decent level. We should tackle that rather than force people into longer and longer hours to earn a decent wage. Sunday working is not always as voluntary as it seems.

I believe that the pressure on stores to open longer is taking valuable time away from family life. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed), I try not to have engagements on Sundays. We have a choice, but many people do not, and parents need that time to spend with their children. It is difficult to find child care on a Sunday and even more difficult for carers. We should not forget that many people who work in shops are also carers and have family responsibilities.

The cost of Sunday working has an impact on us all. It has an impact on local authorities, which must provide more cleaning services and ensure that transport is running and rubbish removed. It also has an impact on the emergency services, which have many more calls to accidents on Sundays as traffic builds up. If we extend opening hours, it will not be long before Sunday becomes a normal working day for many more people than those who work in shops.

The cost falls on all of us in the community. What for? Who has ever starved to death because a shop was not open on a Sunday, never mind that it is not open for a few extra hours? Who has ever found themselves in real difficulty because they cannot suddenly run down to the shops to buy an extra tin of beans? Let us try to put the matter in perspective: what we are trying to protect is far more valuable, even though it cannot be measured. What is important is not always measurable—it is the right to a decent family life and to be able to spend time with children. It is important to us as a society that our children are properly brought up, otherwise the price will fall on us all.

It is time we stopped defining ourselves as a nation by how much we shop. Going to the shops is beginning to be a definition of life and leisure. There are more important things: family, sport, volunteering and what people put back into their communities. We need to protect that community time, as well as those workers on low wages who work very long hours in shops, who can have their hours changed at a moment's notice. They deserve what we consider our right.

Like many others, I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to kick that deregulation into the long grass. Hardly anyone wants it, and I certainly do not believe that the House wants it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Miss Anne Begg (in the Chair): Order. I want the Front Benchers to begin summing up at midday, so I ask the two Members who would like to speak to keep their remarks to that time limit. We will then be able to get them both in.

11.45 am

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I shall be brief, so that my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac) can get in to speak.

I wish to make three quick points. I might be wrong, but I am led to believe that Tesco has now withdrawn from Deregulate, which is promising. Tesco is now calling for partial deregulation. I hope that that is a result of the pressure brought to bear by USDAW. I am pleased to say that Tesco has always recognised USDAW and has good industrial relations with it.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): But does the hon. Gentleman accept that Tesco and businesses large and small would need to open for longer hours if there was deregulation because of the commercial imperative to maintain their market share? That would damage the workers and our communities.

Mr. Drew: That is the case, and I hope that other supermarkets will see sense.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that although Tesco has pulled out of the Deregulate campaign, which calls for complete deregulation, it intimated that it is in favour of nine hours of trading on Sundays? That is a false compromise that should be rejected by the Minister and the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Drew: I think we are on to a winner here. We should take half a loaf at the moment, but we want the full loaf, as we want Tesco to leave things as they are. I share the views of my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), and I share the faith of my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed). I think that we should be going backwards towards more regulation, but that is just my political stance.

I have two other points to make. The first is a serious point about the damage that deregulation would do to our smallest stores. Anyone who has seen the evidence from the New Economics Foundation on clone towns and ghost towns could not help but worry that deregulation would be another nail in the coffin of those smaller stores that choose to open on Sundays—and people choose to work in them.

I do not wish to ban such working, because everybody needs some services on Sundays and we should protect those services. People can get basic groceries and materials outside the normal restricted hours on a Sunday. However, I still believe that we should restrict the hours of opening for all services, bar the emergency ones. We should protect those services, which are so crucial, and keep them in operation.

Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): I visited a convenience store in my constituency the other week, and the Association of Convenience Stores and USDAW should be congratulated on ensuring good public debate and that Ministers know just how badly deregulation will affect our constituencies and constituents.

Mr. Drew: I agree with my hon. Friend, and I share the view that there should be a free vote. I do not blame the DTI, as I think that the pressure for deregulation comes largely from the Treasury, although I might be wrong. I hope that the DTI will stand up against the Treasury, if that is the case, and tell it that this is the wrong way to go.

My next point refers back to Deregulate, which I mentioned when I intervened on my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East. It says that 80 per cent. of the population agreed with the statement that politicians should not be involved in setting opening hours on Sundays. Well, there is a good reason why we are here, is there not? We might as well let the market take over everything, and then why would we need to exist? Let us not have democracy; let us just have the market running everything. I hope that the next point was, "And you will be required to work on Sundays." We would then have seen whether that same 80 per cent. put their hands up and said, "Great, we can't wait to go out and work on Sundays."

It is pure hypocrisy for people to say that others should work on Sundays when they are not prepared to work on Sundays themselves. We should say to them, "If you want it, you do it," because a lot of people do not have that choice. They are forced into working Sundays, and they are the people we should be protecting.

11.50 am

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) on securing this debate on Sunday trading. One matter that I want to focus on is work-life balance, although I must say that I do not like that phrase and wish we could find a better one to describe the subject. [Interruption.] Yes, time off. That is an excellent idea. Another related matter is the effect that these longer hours would have on families.

As we have heard, there simply is not a demand for longer shopping hours on Sundays. I hope the Department of Trade and Industry takes note of that; I am speaking as a former DTI Parliamentary Private Secretary. Survey after survey and opinion poll after opinion poll says that that is not wanted. The strongest opposition to longer hours comes from those who are concerned about the likely effects on family relationships and community life, and we have heard some excellent contributions demonstrating that.

Let us look at the submission from Shirley Dex, professor of longitudinal social research—whatever that is—at the university of London's Institute of Education. She observes that recent changes in the labour force

"have shown that very large proportions of mothers and fathers, sometimes both, work on Saturdays, Sundays or both weekend days", and adds that that proportion would inevitably increase as a result of further deregulation.

Professor Dex also notes that a number of studies have found significant dissatisfaction among parents working atypical times, with the amount of time they have spent with their children being of serious concern to them. That dissatisfaction was shared by children. We have talked about parents today, but the effect on family life is also a worry for children, who will not be able to see mum and dad as much as they would like.

The professor concludes that the main benefit of working at weekends is additional household income, but the majority of parents who work at weekends find that that seriously interferes with their ability to have a family life.

However, in this context we are not just talking about children. As has been mentioned, there is also an impact on people with caring responsibilities, such as for an elderly or disabled relative or somebody who is terminally ill. They have even fewer options for finding somebody to look after that relative than parents do for their children. It is phenomenally difficult for people to get somebody in to look after an elderly relative—perhaps somebody suffering from Alzheimer's.

Bob Spink: One in 10 adults.

Shona McIsaac: As the hon. Gentleman says, the figure is one in 10 adults. We should be concerned about this. Rather than just wanting a free-for-all, as some have said, we must be very careful here.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East said that he is proud to be a member of USDAW, and its contribution to the debate has been praised. I am also a member of USDAW, although it has been many years—probably decades—since I worked in a shop. USDAW has analysed what its members have said about Sunday deregulation. The evidence from people working in shops on Sundays who are USDAW members is overwhelming: they say that they would find it difficult to get babysitters and it would have a dramatic impact on their family life.

The DTI has as part of its remit the subject of work-life balance, as well as trade and industry. That is why the idea of deregulation on Sundays should be kicked into the long grass, as my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) said.

There will also be an impact on convenience stores. We have heard about the representations made by the Association of Convenience Stores. It, too, says that deregulation will have a dramatic impact on communities. If the larger shops are allowed to have a free-for-all, there will be closures of smaller shops, which will have a devastating impact on communities in many smaller villages, as well as in suburban and rural areas, particularly where there is no public transport.

I heard what the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) said about possible increases in public transport, but in many rural areas in my constituency there is simply none. People rely on small suburban and village shops, but I make no bones about the fact that those will close if there is deregulation. That will isolate people, particularly the elderly.

We have seen the potential effect on families, people with caring responsibilities and elderly people who perhaps cannot drive, or are no longer allowed to, and who have no public transport available. Such people will be isolated in their communities, which does not improve quality of life. This move would be seriously detrimental to the quality of life in Britain today. Yet again, I ask the Minister to kick it into the long grass.

Finally, I want to touch on the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), who was right in saying that Tesco has pulled out of the campaign for total deregulation. On 10 May, the Financial Times stated:

> "Tesco has abruptly pulled out of the retailers' campaign to deregulate Sunday trading in a move that will undermine the lobby for longer opening hours."

I heard it mentioned that Tesco does not want total deregulation, and perhaps wants partial deregulation or slightly longer hours, but I do not care. It was one of the main backers of the campaign to deregulate, and it has pulled out. That is a serious blow to the deregulation campaign.

We have looked at this issue as a debate between convenience stores and supermarkets, but it is far more than that. Do-it-yourself and furniture stores, clothes shops and car showrooms are involved. This is not just about supermarkets; we are examining the whole retail sector. Whatever the reason, Tesco pulled out of backing the campaign. That is a blow to those who want deregulation of Sunday trading, and, as Tesco says, "Every little helps."

11.58 am

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): I fear that I am about to shatter the cosy consensus that has been building up today, so I have my flak jacket on.

I shall begin by explaining that Liberal Democrat policy is to have a free vote on this subject.

Shona McIsaac: That is not policy.

Lorely Burt: If hon. Members will give me a chance, I will go on to make some more points. I shall seek to give a balanced view of the arguments, so that I can represent the opinions on both sides, and then give my view, which is mine alone and is not intended to be representative of my party as a whole.

The Government consultation is designed to evaluate the economic costs of relaxing or removing Sunday trading restrictions. Several hon. Members have asked: what about the social costs? It is incumbent on us, as Members of Parliament, to consider them, although it is not up to us to dictate the way that people and their families should spend their Sundays. The Sunday Trading Act 1994 has become outdated. It is a good time to re-examine things. I have looked through the various studies that have been done, and I have been trying to assess—

David Lepper: Will the hon. Lady explain why she believes the 1994 Act has become outdated? Perhaps she is going to explain that later in her speech.

Lorely Burt: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right: I am. Patterns of behaviour and consumer expectations have changed in the ensuing 12 years. Several hon. Members asked who exactly seeks to make the changes and who says that they are necessary. Having looked at the various studies, I think that what the results are deemed to be depends on which interest group one asks to assess the study: they all seem to come out for their own interests.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The hon. Lady said earlier that it is not for politicians to dictate how people spend their Sundays. Another hon. Member—with his tongue in his cheek, I think—said something similar. Does she think that it is for politicians to require a police force to be provided on a Sunday to protect the property of the shops that open for those long hours?

Lorely Burt: It is incumbent on the police force to be available on Sunday, as on every day, as are so many groups in our society, including farmers, police, and people who work in the fire services, care services, hospitals, catering, entertainment, TV, sport, security, transport and distribution. One might ask: why are our retail staff so very different?

[Lorely Burt]

Helen Jones: Does the hon. Lady seriously expect that council workers should now work a full shift pattern on a Sunday, as should those who work in the ambulance service, police and so on? Their shift patterns are different at the weekend. Will she put on the record whether she would expect, if we had full deregulation, such people to have a normal, weekday working pattern on a Sunday?

Lorely Burt: In my conclusions, I shall not suggest that we should have full deregulation, so the hon. Lady's question does not apply. However, I acknowledge that there might be incumbent effects if Sunday trading hours are extended even slightly. That will have a knock-on effect on others.

Helen Jones: I thank the hon. Lady for that answer, but will she clarify it? If she wants to extend Sunday trading hours, even without what she calls full deregulation, exactly what will be the cost to local authorities of providing extra services on a Sunday? What does she expect the working pattern for the emergency services to be? If it is not a full, normal weekday pattern, what will it be?

Lorely Burt: On costs, the only costs and benefits that I am in a position to quote are those from the Department of Trade and Industry study, which measures the economic benefit as an additional £1.4 billion a year, but that is in revenue, not in expenditure.

Bob Spink: Is the hon. Lady aware of the high and increasing level of consumer debt?

Lorely Burt: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because I was about to say that given that we have only a finite amount of expenditure, the question of where that additional £1.4 billion of revenue would come from is concerning.

Shona McIsaac: It would probably come from convenience store customers who have had to transfer to large supermarkets and are seduced by all their three-for-two offers.

Lorely Burt: I am grateful, and I shall elaborate on this issue as we go on, so perhaps the hon. Lady could be patient and allow me to make a little progress. I am conscious of the time.

I shall round up my comments about the "for" group, but I assure the House that I shall be glad to speak about the "against" group. Some people want an extension, particularly the big retailers. I exclude supermarkets for the moment, because I have something special to say about them. It is estimated that garden centres lose £45 million a year because of the restriction on Sunday opening hours, as do DIY and high street shops and similar organisations.

Let us consider the pattern of consumers. The hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (David Lepper) said that only a small number of people shop on a Sunday. I shop on Sunday with my daughter; it is a family activity and we do it together. I do not know where everyone else is, but the nice shopping areas in the high street such as clothes shops and shoe shops certainly seem to trade very well given the present Sunday trading hours.

David Lepper: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way again, but I ask her to note that the figures that I cited and to which she refers came from the report commissioned by the DTI and carried out by Indepen, and not from one of the interest groups to which she referred—perhaps to cast doubt on the validity of those surveys.

Lorely Burt: I take that point, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I was merely making a personal observation.

I turn to the arguments against and to those workers who are being constrained. A lot of time has been given to them. However, some like to work on Sundays because they have the opportunity to do so, despite disparaging remarks about students having to pay off their student debts or people wanting to supplement their pensions. As for the traditional family, if the primary carer goes out to work on Sunday—let us say that it is mum—then the children will be left with dad. That gives the children an opportunity to have some quality time with the parent who remains at home. [Laughter.] I give that argument for what it is worth.

Helen Jones: I am listening to the hon. Lady's argument about choice. Is she suggesting that the same ought to apply in the House? If she thinks it is valuable for people to have the choice of working on a Sunday, will she table a motion that the House should sit on Sundays, thus giving ourselves a chance to work then?

Lorely Burt: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that suggestion. Many hon. Members already work on Sundays.

Helen Jones: Here, away from their families?

Lorely Burt: Speaking personally, I often go to my local television studios to make recordings on Sundays, and I attend community events on Sundays. It is not a great deal of fun. MPs work a phenomenal number of hours. All hon. Members in the Chamber would agree.

With some relief, I now move on to the arguments against. I shall talk first about the idea that Sunday is just another day. Whatever one's religious beliefs, there is something to be said for Sunday being one day in the week that is slightly different. We have been talking about family time. Families can also spend time shopping. Some families choose to have their Sunday roast together, but patterns of family behaviour change over time.

My family used to have a traditional Sunday lunch, but kids today often do not want to do that. They want to do other things instead. We might watch a football match together, but those professional footballers will be working on a Sunday. [Interruption.] I note the sedentary remark made by the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) that those footballers may well be reasonably well rewarded for their endeavours. Their case is certainly nothing compared with that of the shop workers to whom we referred earlier.

My main concern, which has been raised, is the idea of the Tescopoly—the monopoly of the supermarkets—and the threat that large supermarkets pose to small retail shops. A recent study discovered that a third of trade for small shops occurs outside the hours of 10 and 4 on a Sunday. I note with great regret that 7,337 independent retailers closed between 2000 and 2004. It is incumbent on hon. Members, who certainly need no persuading in this room, to remember that employing local people is important, as the creation of more local jobs means that more money goes into the area, and such businesses source more products locally and can choose whether to open or close. I will not repeat the points about worker concerns over the erosion of premium payments and the pressure to get them to work, because those points have been made already.

In conclusion, several comments have been made about Tesco's withdrawal from the Deregulate lobby group. My view, for what it is worth, is that perhaps Tesco has its hands full with the Competition Commission. I do not know. The recommendation or suggestion that we could perhaps raise hours from six hours to eight on a Sunday would seem to me to be a reasonable compromise and so, hopefully, something of that nature might meet with approval from all sides of the House.

Several hon. Members rose—

Miss Anne Begg (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Lady has had more than her fair share of time and was coming to the end of her remarks.

12.12 pm

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): I begin by congratulating the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) not only on securing the debate but on making incisive and thoughtful remarks about the entity of the debate. Hon. Members will, I suspect, be more interested in hearing what the Minister has to say, so I shall attempt to be reasonably brief.

As we have discovered in the debate, Sunday trading is an issue about which many people understandably feel strongly. It is a complex issue: it appears on the surface to be about retail trading hours, but it is also about employment rights. It would seem to be merely an economic matter, but self-evidently it is fundamentally a social issue as well. Sunday trading hours are a matter for families as consumers and as workers.

The Government, as we know, have undertaken an initial consultation. It did not start out as an initial consultation but it has suddenly become that. They have now commissioned a cost-benefit analysis, which has been discussed in this debate. Ministers have said so far that they are considering the balance of views, but we have yet to hear a clear statement of intent from Government. I hope that the Minister will correct that omission and put on record the direction in which the Government intend to travel and, indeed, whether they intend to ensure that their Back Benchers take that path with them in the form of a whipped vote. My view is that the Government need to be very careful in ensuring that they get a sensible balance between the needs of families, workers and retailers, so that those who shop may choose to do so but those who choose not to work are properly protected. There has to be a clear case for change.

The Sunday Trading Act 1994, and its amendment through the Christmas Day (Trading) Act 2004, were the result of a classic British parliamentary compromise. The 1994 Act was designed to reflect the different concerns of those whom I have mentioned and of many Christian groups. It also reflected the nature of retailing in society in 1994. Clearly society and our lifestyles have changed since then. We live in a more mobile and multicultural world. We are, whether we like it or not, a more consumer-led society. The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) articulately expressed why that is often a bad thing in our society. Whether we like it not, for many people in this nation, shopping is an essential part of their leisure. We have seen the arrival of the internet. We now face the peculiarity of being able to shop online with Tesco at 6 o'clock on a Sunday evening, but not being able to go to its supermarkets.

There have been notable changes in habits in relation to retailing. I am told by experts in the industry that whereas 10 or 15 years ago, we used, on the whole, to go to the supermarket once a week—I say "we"; it is usually my wife, I admit—now the pattern is to go there two or three times a week. Habits have changed and the result is that the convenience sector is growing faster than the traditional supermarket. That is why large retailers entered the convenience sector a few years ago and are competing directly with the independents. In many of our communities—I am surprised that this was not debated today—the large retailers can circumvent the Sunday trading laws because they own convenience stores that are below the 3,000 sq ft threshold. It is important to remember that when considering any change in the law that the Government may be thinking about. In many of our towns, the Sunday trading laws are irrelevant to the debate between large and small retailers.

It can be argued—many people do—that in a free market it is up to retailers to decide when they trade, based on consumer demand, and there is much to be said for that argument, but it depends on the market being free, open and fair. In recent years, many small shops have closed. I think that the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (David Lepper) said that about 2,000 such shops had closed in 2004. Many more are threatened. There is a growing chorus of concern about the pricing tactics employed by larger retailers when opening new stores.

The recent decision by the Office of Fair Trading to refer the whole of the grocery market to the Competition Commission confirmed that there are clear problems in that market. The inquiry must be comprehensive. A narrow inquiry that failed to address the allegations, whether the issue was predatory pricing or unfair contracts, would leave a shadow over the market. That would be bad for consumers and for retailers, large and small.

Some people have argued that with that significant inquiry under way, the Government should delay their plans to change the Sunday trading hours. What does the Minister think? Does he recognise that if he implements legislation in the next year, before the commission has concluded its work, that could adversely affect the very basis of the inquiry? I suspect that the whole House would want to hear his reply.

The starting point in this debate is the consumer. People should be free to make their own choices. It is not the role of Government or politicians generally to dictate where people should spend their leisure time; I shall come to working time in a moment. For many people—I say this with some incredulity—shopping is their favourite leisure activity. As, perhaps, a typical middle-aged man, I find that prospect truly ghastly, but who am I—who are any of us—to tell people how they should spend their time?

The converse of being free to shop on a Sunday is the right not to be forced to work on that day. Although the current law works well in some respects, I have much sympathy for what the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers and many of its members have said on that issue. We have to recognise that there is informal pressure, but we also have to be clear that legislation often cannot deal with such pressure. The Government need to be careful to ensure that whatever they do, those who do not want to work on a Sunday can make that choice without it unfairly affecting their job or their prospects.

I shall now deal briefly with the question of family life. Of course, Sunday trading is a much broader question than just economics. I understand and have much sympathy with the position of groups such as Keep Sunday Special. To me, a practising Christian, Sunday is a special day, different from the rest of the week. It is also right to say that in a society in which often both parents work, the time that parents have for each other and for their children is under incredible pressure. As a society, we may be financially richer, but sadly the price is that we are time poor. Of course in a multicultural society, Sunday is not everyone's Sabbath; but the principle of a day of rest nevertheless can and should be recognised if we are to give our relationships the time that they need to grow.

Sadly, the time for my speech to grow is not with me. I look forward to the Minister's response to the questions that have been raised.

12.20 pm

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): I, too, start by congratulating my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) on introducing a good, well informed debate, including—against much heckling from my side—the contribution of the Liberal Democrat spokesperson.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): Who is on your side? [Laughter.]

Malcolm Wicks: There was some quite bad behaviour from my colleagues during a plucky speech.

As the Minister for Energy, I am here today talking about Sunday trading not because all the issues in energy policy have been so resolved that I have time on my hands—there still seems to be some political interest in one or two issues—

Shona McIsaac: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Malcolm Wicks: Perhaps later in my speech. I am talking about Sunday trading because my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade, who also deals with investment and foreign affairs, is unable to respond to the debate. He sends his apologies, but he cannot be here, sadly owing to personal and family circumstances.

I do not accept the caricature of the Department of Trade and Industry that the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) depicted. I know that it is now fashionable for the historic party of capital to attack big business, but to caricature us as a Department solely concerned with big business is unfair. We are concerned with employment relationships, work-life balance and consumer policy, as well as the needs of business. Before I came to the House I directed a body called the Family Policy Studies Centre, so I am aware of the need to take account of the impact of proposed legislation on the diversity of family life. Also, when I look at my red boxes on a Sunday and compare them with the grass uncut, the young cabbages unplanted and so on, I have some sympathy with the idea of keeping Sunday special.

The present position is that the Government are reviewing the Sunday trading laws in England and Wales. We welcome an open debate on the issue, and today's debate has been an important contribution to that. Since the review of Sunday trading was announced last November, we have asked for and received a range of evidence in response to our informal consultation. We also commissioned the cost-benefit analysis, which is now available on the DTI website. However, in case there is any misunderstanding, we also made it clear on our website that we would welcome further relevant evidence or views—from consumers, religious groups, employees and businesses—not only on the economic case, but on all aspects of further liberalisation. A cost-benefit analysis is a contribution to the process, but it can only be partial.

Two weeks ago we held a stakeholder conference to give people the chance to debate the cost-benefit analysis and have their say on all aspects of Sunday trading. We have made it clear that if we decide to proceed with the review, there will be a further period of formal consultation on any change. We want our consumer and labour policies to be well informed, although we recognise that there will never be an overall consensus on such a controversial issue.

The current Sunday trading laws were established 12 years ago. The Sunday Trading Act 1994 restricts large shops in England and Wales from opening for more than six hours between 10 and 6, and prevents them from opening at all on Easter Sunday. The fact that the legislation has been in place for 12 years does not necessarily mean that it is wrong, but it is sensible for us to look at it again.

We know from the responses to our informal consultation that there is a wide range of opinions on all sides of the debate and that some are very strongly held. Many of those views have been expressed today. This debate forms part of the ongoing consultation, and all views expressed will be taken into account. To illustrate the extent to which the Government have been listening, I will summarise the range of perspectives that has been put forward.

Some look at the question purely from a consumer perspective and argue that it should be business that decides when shops should open, not the Government, and that shops should be free to respond to the needs of their customers. The Government often get accused of over-regulating business, and there are those who feel that it is not the Government's place to regulate at all in this area.

Others feel strongly that there is more at stake than mere consumption and they would like to see Sunday protected as a day of rest: a quieter day when families can spend time together. We must also respect the position of those Christian groups who, because of their deeply held religious beliefs, feel that shops should not open at all on a Sunday, or should certainly not open for longer than they do under current law.

Others focus on the impact of extending Sunday opening on employees, and we have heard that argument today, not least from my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East. Some employees value the chance to work on Sundays, but others feel that Sunday opening has made their working life and family life more difficult. There are those who argue that the undertaking of work by parents on weekends can have an adverse impact on children and knock-on consequences for society.

I welcome the comments of those who reminded us that in a modern society with an ageing population, we are not just talking about the care of children, but the responsibility that many adults take on for the care of elderly relatives or grown-up children with disabilities. I had a private Member's Bill that dealt with this subject, which became the Carers (Recognition & Services) Act 1995. Another important perspective that we have heard much about is the impact of further liberalisation on small shops.

Where are we? Those, and all the other views that have been expressed, have to be given proper consideration. My right hon. Friends, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Minister for Trade are considering carefully all the views and evidence they have received so far.

Shona McIsaac: Will the Minister give way?

Malcolm Wicks: Perhaps a little later. In addition, my right hon. Friends are also considering the cost-benefit analysis, which examines the economic impact of extending Sunday shopping hours for large shops. We welcome this report as a key contribution to the debate, alongside the views and evidence we have received from others. After hearing those views, if the Government feel that any change to the status quo is to be considered, there will be a formal consultation.

Several hon. Members rose—

Malcolm Wicks: I give way to my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East.

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Minister answered his own rhetorical question, "Where are we?" I have listened carefully to what he said about the procedures the Department is going through. Will he tell us when he thinks our right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Minister of Trade will take a decision on whether they need to proceed to a formal review, or whether—in accordance with the overwhelming view expressed here and in the country—the matter should be left?

Malcolm Wicks: I am bound to say that we have not yet reached a conclusion about what should happen to Sunday shopping hours. No decision will be taken until we have assessed all the evidence, including the views expressed today. We want to make a decision based on all the information and informed by all perspectives on this topic. We want all interested parties to have a say about whether further or partial liberalisation—or no change—is the right way forward. In particular, we need to consider carefully whether large shops should be allowed to open on Easter Sunday. We have been told that shop workers either are not aware of their legal right to opt out of Sunday working, or do not feel that they can use it, and we want to understand that issue better.

We need to consider the evidence on the wider social issues that have been identified, which are as relevant as economic issues to decisions on Sunday trading. I am afraid that I cannot give my right hon. Friend a specific date, but I am able to give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Cleethorpes (Shona McIsaac), if she is still eager to intervene.

Shona McIsaac: The Minister mentioned the Ministers in his Department who will consider all the views expressed in the debate. As Minister for Energy, what impact does he think that deregulation will have on energy consumption in this country?

Malcolm Wicks: It probably depends how much energy people expend on devising ingenious questions when they are at home on a Sunday.

Let me make it clear that the special protection allowing shop workers to choose not to work on Sundays is here to stay. It is important to stress that. I cannot be more specific about time scales, but I would like to repeat that we have had a useful debate.

I am pleased to have been able to stand in for my ministerial colleague and to get into a controversial issue at long last. I thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East for giving me the opportunity to bring my mind to bear on the subject.

Cancer Care (Herefordshire)

12.30 pm

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I am delighted to have secured this important debate for my constituents and delighted that the Minister is here to answer some of the questions that I shall put to her.

It is evident that the questions surrounding the availability of cancer care and drugs are common to many primary care trusts in England. The lack of vital services, medical personnel and new technology make news headlines almost every day. However, it is the availability of new life-saving drugs, such as Velcade for multiple myeloma and Herceptin for breast cancer, and the provision of acute radiotherapy care, that concerns my Hereford constituents most.

Herefordshire PCT has an excellent reputation as a cancer service provider. It is one of only 4 per cent. of PCTs in the UK that have achieved a three-star rating for two years running in the Healthcare Commission's assessment of trust performances. However, the notion of a cancer drugs postcode lottery and the need to travel excessive distances to obtain vital care is fuelling a great deal of anxiety among my constituents.

Cancer is one of the biggest killers in the UK, and accounts for a quarter of all deaths. One in three people has the prospect of being diagnosed with cancer at some stage of their life, so it is understandable that people are concerned when they believe that they are being denied the right to critical care and life-saving drugs just because they do not live in the right area. Surely everyone should have an equal right to life and treatment.

Under the current guidance from the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, both Herceptin and Velcade are still waiting to be agreed as suitable for cancer sufferers in England. Yet in Wales and Scotland they were approved more than a year ago. Consequently, Welsh patients being treated in Hereford county hospital and, indeed, other English hospitals along the Welsh border, automatically receive those drugs. However, Herefordshire patients being treated at the same hospital do not always receive them. I am delighted that Welsh patients receive the drugs, but the essential thrust of my debate is to ask when the Government and NICE will stop the postcode lottery.

The county hospital in Hereford is one of the finest hospitals in the region and I was delighted when it opened. I pay tribute to the Labour Government for providing that hospital. We have some of the most dedicated doctors and nurses in the country—a plethora of talent—who cater for approximately 200,000 patients and provide acute care for those in Herefordshire, Powys and the bordering areas of Gwent, Shropshire and Worcestershire. The hospital provides essential health care—not only accident and emergency care but vital cancer care.

Between 2004 and 2005, there were more than 2,000 finished consultant episodes at the county hospital and 96.2 per cent. of cancer patients were treated within 31 days; that is a very good record. Only recently it was announced that my constituents will be blessed with a new £3.4 million cancer care unit, partly to be funded by the national charity Macmillan Cancer Support. The remainder of the funding will be provided by the hospital trust. Indeed, I shall shortly attend the launch of the Macmillan appeal to raise its £1.5 million towards the cost of the unit. The new facility will provide first-class chemotherapy care for the county, and I of course welcome that investment in cancer provision. However, much more still needs to be done.

The nearest hospitals to Herefordshire offering full oncology treatment are in Cheltenham and Birmingham. Many patients from the Herefordshire catchment area must travel to the Cheltenham general hospital for radiotherapy treatment. For some that is a 150-mile round trip in difficult circumstances. Many of the patients are old and frail and have little support at that most trying of times. On top of the mental anguish and distress to which the disease subjects them, they must undergo harrowing journeys because of the current unavailability of radiotherapy facilities in Herefordshire. My constituents have written to the Prime Minister on that very issue, and a local newspaper, the Hereford Times, has carried a campaign to cut the cancer miles misery which has attracted huge local support.

The 3 Counties cancer care network, which is responsible for providing acute services in Gloucester, Herefordshire and south Worcestershire, is looking to develop a radiotherapy service in the next few years, but many people in my county believe that that is too late. As anyone who has come into contact with cancer sufferers will confirm, it is a disease that can break hearts as well as bodies, and time is of the essence. It has come to my attention that cancer sufferers in Herefordshire are cutting their treatment short because they can no longer cope with the journeys. Frankly, that is a disgrace in a country whose health service was once the envy of the world.

Macmillan Cancer Support claims that many patients in outlying rural areas are facing "grossly unfair" journeys of up to 200 miles. I know that my neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams), is campaigning about that, as his constituents also suffer. He wanted to be present for this debate, but he is attending to other parliamentary business. When will the Government begin to address the shortage of cancer care provision before it is too late for many of my constituents?

Not only are many cancer sufferers in Herefordshire forced to travel hundreds of miles for vital treatment, they are denied life-saving cancer drugs. I have been contacted by constituents who are suffering from multiple myeloma and just cannot understand why NICE is still appraising Velcade, the cancer drug to treat myeloma. Velcade was granted a licence in spring 2004, so will the Minister explain why its appraisal is taking so long?

The All Wales Medicines Strategy Group, the Welsh version of NICE, appraised and approved Velcade in June 2005 and Welsh patients can now receive it on the NHS. You will be pleased to hear, Miss Begg, that the drug has also been approved by the Scottish Medicines Consortium and is available in Scotland. So why is it not yet available on the NHS to my constituents in Herefordshire?

It is expected that Velcade will not receive guidance from NICE until September 2006, despite the fact that the Government issued a statement in November 2005 saying that it and other life-saving cancer drugs would be part of a new rapid process for accessing drugs—the so-called fast-tracking. When I asked the then Health Minster, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), a parliamentary question about that, she replied that the "proposed changes to enable the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) to produce faster guidance on life-saving drugs would go ahead immediately."—[Official Report, 2 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 854W.]

The former Minister said that that system would benefit thousands of patients, especially those with life-threatening conditions, and would provide greater certainty about the provision of new treatments, yet we are now six months down the line and it is more than three years since the drug was licensed, but English patients are still waiting.

In that time, many thousands of people have been diagnosed with myeloma, yet their pleas have fallen on deaf ears. Sufferers cannot wait until the end of the year to start receiving the drug. Myeloma is a terminal disease and more than one third of patients die within a year of diagnosis. Between 1998 and 2001 the relative survival rate for patients diagnosed with multiple myeloma in England was 25.6 per cent. That is worrying and must be addressed now.

Of course the NHS is not obliged to fund the provision of a drug until NICE issues guidance, but cancer sufferers do not have time to wait. According to the Department of Health, PCTs are free to use treatments that have been licensed, even if they have not received NICE approval, and Ministers have repeatedly stated that whether funding is provided for treatment is a matter for local decision making. However, in practice, hospital bosses and local clinicians are reluctant to provide the drugs because of financial constraints.

Herceptin is another life-saving drug that is being denied to cancer sufferers, although in recent weeks one patient has successfully won a High Court appeal to be prescribed Herceptin by her local PCT. I am extremely pleased for the lady involved, who fought a very dignified campaign, but many thousands of breast cancer sufferers are still being denied Herceptin for early-stage breast cancer. No doubt that court ruling will have huge complications and we must wait to see what the result will be, but it highlights the fact that we are still witnessing postcode prescribing rather than local decision making.

In Herefordshire, that is a sensitive issue. We are witnessing breast cancer sufferers in Wales being prescribed Herceptin free of charge—as with Velcade—because the drug is funded by Welsh local heath boards, even if patients are treated in England at Hereford county hospital. However, women in the early stages of breast cancer who live in England and who are treated at the same hospital must pay between £20,000 and £30,000 a year because the local trust will not always foot the bill. Again, NICE has said that it will fast-track the appraisal when the licence has been granted—supposedly in July—but that does not alter the fact that many PCTs cannot afford the new drugs and are avoiding the issue.

The Government have said that PCTs need to ensure that they allocate sufficient resources to meet their local contribution to tackling cancer care, and we would all agree with that. However, given that one in four NHS trusts failed to balance their books in 2004-05, leaving the NHS with a deficit of £250 million, how on earth can the Government expect the trusts to fund the new cancer facilities and drugs? Many PCTs believe that the Government are passing the buck to them. The Government also expect PCTs and hospital trusts not only to keep within their budgets—again, I do not disagree—but to be able to dispense the drugs at higher cost from existing funds. The trusts simply cannot afford it.

In conclusion, when will the Minister's Department tackle this grossly unfair postcode lottery, so that everyone has an equal right to life and treatment? When will the new drugs be available to my constituents? When will the Government begin to address the problem of the harrowing journeys that my constituents have to make to receive radiotherapy and other vital cancer care? My constituents and I look forward to the Minister's reply.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch) on securing this debate. He has set out his and his constituents' concerns clearly. However, I hope he accepts that cancer has remained a key priority for the Government and that there has been real progress in recent years. For example, cancer mortality rates have fallen; more than 99 per cent. of patients with suspected cancer are now seen by a specialist within two weeks of being referred by their general practitioner, up from 63 per cent. in 1997; the number of cancer specialists has increased by 42 per cent.; and since 2000, more than 1,200 items of equipment have been delivered to diagnose and treat cancer. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that those improvements have been made.

However, cancer continues to remain a priority, because there is a long way to go before we have a perfect system. Whether, as medical technology changes, there can ever be a perfect system is debatable, but the Government have made a real commitment to investing in and improving cancer services.

Mr. Keetch: I should like to put on record my acknowledgement that, as I have said publicly in Herefordshire, under recent Labour Governments there has been a massive increase in investment for health care provision in the county. I welcome that; I am only sorry that the hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin)—the other MP with a Herefordshire constituency—is not here to hear me say that.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): Hear, hear.

Ms Winterton: Yes. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Hereford for his comments.

Quite rightly, the hon. Gentleman wanted to highlight the provision of cancer services for the residents of Herefordshire; he highlighted some of the difficulties that they experience. I join him in congratulating all the staff who work in local cancer care services in his constituency, because they have achieved a number of things at a local level—not least the fact that Hereford county hospital is one of the top-performing hospitals in England in respect of cancer treatment.

[Ms Rosie Winterton]

I turn to some of the hon. Gentleman's specific points. He referred at length to the drugs Herceptin and Velcade. I shall give a little background, of which I am sure he is aware. While NICE is developing guidance, there is no restriction on the prescribing of those drugs within their licensed indications. During that time, decisions remain for local determination, but the Department has made it clear that funding for newly licensed treatments should not be withheld because NICE guidance is unavailable. As the hon. Gentleman said, NICE is assessing Herceptin and Velcade under its new single-technology assessment, which has been specifically designed to meet some of the concerns about the time that it sometimes takes to carry out appraisals. Velcade is one of the first five drugs to be appraised using the new process, and we expect guidance shortly.

As regards the use of Herceptin and Velcade in Herefordshire, my officials have checked again with Herefordshire PCT. We have been assured that no patients from Herefordshire have been refused treatment with Herceptin or Velcade when it was recommended by an NHS clinician. The key, of course, is that the treatment must be recommended by an NHS clinician—that is absolutely right, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees. I hope that that addresses some of the particular issues about those two drugs.

More generally, we want treatment for cancer patients in Herefordshire to be delivered quickly. Obviously, that is a key condition for successful outcomes, and the information that we have shows that treatment is, by and large, delivered quickly. At the same time, I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern about the distance that some of his constituents must travel to receive treatment.

Let me return to the issue of cancer networks, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. We have set up cancer networks—the first were set up about 10 or 12 years ago—to bring together all the bodies in an area that are responsible for planning and developing cancer service strategies, and there were good reasons for doing that. We wanted to make sure that clinicians, the NHS, patients organisations and other stakeholders were looking at overall provision to ensure that it was planned carefully, particularly where specialist treatment might be needed. The sad truth, particularly as regards specialist treatment, was that a proper view was not taken of how to maximise the use of individuals' and clinicians' skills, so it was important to have a view from a wider area than just one PCT. Networks therefore play a crucial role in delivering cancer services and they have played a major part in delivering some of the improvements that we have seen.

Herefordshire, together with Gloucestershire and south Worcestershire, is part of the 3 Counties cancer network, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. He also mentioned the rural nature of the area that he represents and the fact that the geographical challenges can be quite significant when it comes to providing specialist health services. As he said, the 3 Counties cancer network specialist regional services are provided by the Gloucestershire Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust at the Cheltenham oncology centre. Currently, patients from Herefordshire who need radiotherapy and in-patient chemotherapy are treated in Cheltenham.

I accept that the distances for Herefordshire patients are large, and for those living on the Herefordshire-Wales border they are greater still. However, the hon. Gentleman will agree that it is important that issues of patient safety are paramount in providing specialist services such as those provided at Cheltenham. It is important that there are sufficient numbers of patients to make sure that staff can maintain and develop their specialist skills. As I said, in rural areas that brings significant challenges, but the 3 Counties cancer network is looking into how to make sure that it meets those challenges.

As I understand it, some patients at Cheltenham will require in-patient treatment, and it is important that there is an oncologist on hand to monitor those in-patients when they have their chemotherapy. That is one reason why it is important for the services to be in a specialist centre. There has been an increase in the levels of chemotherapy carried out, and the number of day-case sessions of chemotherapy at Hereford county hospital has increased from about 1,800 in 2003-04 to about 2,800 this year. The cancer network is looking at how that progress can be built on.

The Hereford Hospitals NHS Trust, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, has announced that it will work with Macmillan Cancer Support to build a new cancer unit at the county hospital to replace the Charles Renton unit. The hon. Gentleman is going to the launch of the appeal, which I am sure will be very welcome. I understand that it will be a state-of-the-art unit costing £3.4 million—£2.4 million of which will come from Macmillan, with the trust providing the balance. That will significantly increase the capacity for patients to receive chemotherapy in Hereford. I understand that when the centre is completed, it will have the capacity to provide some 4,500 sessions of day-case chemotherapy each year. That is sufficient capacity for all Herefordshire patients to be treated locally.

In-patient chemotherapy will continue to be provided in Cheltenham, as I said, because specialist staff are required—for example, to support a consultant oncologist—to monitor patients for up to 24 hours after receiving the treatment. The hon. Gentleman referred to radiotherapy. The network currently has four linear accelerators and two simulators at the Cheltenham oncology centre. That is the only radiotherapy service in the network at present, and all patients requiring radiotherapy are treated in Cheltenham.

The hon. Gentleman raised the sensitive issue of patients not travelling to receive radiotherapy because of the distances. I understand that there are some patients who had a terminal diagnosis and who have chosen not to travel, essentially as a quality-of-life decision. However, the PCT has assured us that there is no evidence of patients who are receiving curative radiotherapy choosing not to travel. Obviously, this is very difficult, and I will come on to what else is being done in terms of increasing the provision of radiotherapy locally.

Recommendations on these issues have come from the Royal College of Radiologists. As a result, the number of linear accelerators in the network will be increased to seven by 2010-11. The network is supporting plans to increase the linear accelerator complement at Cheltenham to five by 2007-08. Beyond that, it has asked interested trusts to put forward proposals for developing the next round of linear accelerator provision in 2009-10. All three trusts—those based in Cheltenham, Worcester and Hereford—have expressed an interest in developing these services. The network has produced draft criteria for assessing the options; access is included as a criterion alongside issues such as safety, staffing and cost.

Mr. Keetch: I hope that access is one of the key criteria, because if the 3 Counties cancer network were to develop yet more centralised operations at Cheltenham that would be very unfortunate, not only for my constituents but for those from Powys and Brecon who also come across. Access for people suffering from cancer is a key criterion, and I hope that the Minister will ensure that it is one of the unit's principal criteria.

Ms Winterton: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman looks at the draft criteria that the network has produced just to reassure himself. I have certainly been assured that those criteria include access, but he might like to check that, and I shall make sure his comments on this matter are passed back.

I am informed that the current clinical view is that a linked satellite of the Cheltenham service could be viable in either Hereford or Worcester, but I must stress that no decision has been made on the final location of the two additional linear accelerators, one of which will replace one of the older machines at Cheltenham. The three trusts have all been invited to submit their proposals to the network board and a decision, which will be based on the criteria, is likely to be made in spring 2007.

In conclusion, I reiterate that I am sure that the 3 Counties cancer network is aware of the points about which the hon. Gentleman and his constituents are concerned. It is planning future development of radiotherapy services across Herefordshire, Gloucestershire and south Worcestershire. It is aware of the difficulty that some of the hon. Gentleman's constituents are encountering in travelling to the service in Cheltenham, and access is one of the criteria being considered in the development of those services. There have been improvements in recent years, but we obviously always need to ensure that the services are of the highest quality. It is what the public want, and I am sure we would all agree that it is what our constituents deserve.

Welsh Language Act 1993

12.59 pm

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): I am pleased to have this opportunity to discuss the operation of the Welsh Language Act 1993.

I shall not be calling for a new Welsh Language Act, as hon. Members might have expected. People in Wales might be mystified by that, but the convention in these debates is that one does not call for new legislation—there are other opportunities to do that. However, this is a timely debate given the forthcoming national rally organised by Cymdeithas yr Iaith Gymraeg, the Welsh language society, which will be held in Aberystwyth on 10 June and will call for a new Welsh Language Act.

When discussing Welsh language provision there is a great temptation to list various outrageous cases where people have been denied a service by the public sector. There is a danger of an extended whinge—during the past 30 years many cases have led to people such as myself whingeing extensively—and of our losing sight of the principal fault with the 1993 Act as a permanent solution to the languages question in Wales. That principal fault is inequality, which is written into the Act.

Of course, the 1993 Act is concerned with treating Welsh and English on an equal basis. That equality is qualified in the Act by its being subject to being "reasonably practicable" and "appropriate in the circumstances". So, Welsh and English are not wholly equal; the equality is a qualified one. I have a difficulty with qualified equality as a concept; in my book, we are all equal or we are not. The Act seems to echo Orwell's point in "Animal Farm":

> "All animals are equal but some animals are more equal than others."

By now, it is abundantly clear that, even following the 1993 Act, Welsh and English are not even treated on the basis of that qualified equality. My argument runs contrary to that treatment: Welsh and English are equal, should be treated as such and Welsh speakers should have equal rights to use either language, or both, as they see fit. That is my basic argument; it is one of equality.

Cutting across the detail of individual cases, although I shall refer to such a case later, the crux of the argument is about equality. I would like to make it clear that the primary response that I am seeking from the Under-Secretary of State is an explanation of the Government's stance on the fundamental inequality that Welsh speakers face: the lack of a positive right to use Welsh equal to the right to use English, which is assumed without thought.

We are talking about a fundamental principle, and as such, however we organise and develop it in the future, it must be established and we must see it as a process to an end point. I accept that we will not achieve that overnight, in months or perhaps in years, but we must insist on the process towards equality. I want to hear the Government's response to my call for nothing less than the full emancipation of the Welsh language and of the individuals and communities that speak it.

[Hywel Williams]

We are not just considering my right and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) as Welsh speakers to use the language. We must also realise that communities in Wales use Welsh as the primary social mode of discussion; using Welsh is the way we talk to each other in some communities. There are not just individual rights, but community rights.

I said that I would not whinge about cases, not that they are scarce. Of course, there is a fine tradition of using cases to drive through progressive legislation. My illustrious predecessor as Member for Caernarfon, David Lloyd George, used the famous achos claddu Llanfrothen—the Llanfrothen burial case where nonconformists were not allowed to bury their departed in the graveyard in Llanfrothen—as a battering ram that eventually led to the disestablishment of the Church of England in Wales. I am not going to list a lot of cases, but I will base my arguments about equality on a case concerning British Gas Business that neatly encompasses some of the principles. I refer hon. Members to my early-day motion 2185 on this matter.

First, I would like to quote briefly from letters sent to me by British Gas Business. Hon. Members will note that I quote from the original and in English, for even though I usually correspond with the company in Welsh—not in this case, as it happens—it has replied to me in English. I will begin with a letter entitled in large letters "We won't be able to send your bills in Welsh anymore".

I would like the Chamber to note that British Gas, as a former public utility, has been providing a Welsh language service to both its private and business customers for a large number of years, as have other former public utilities. I have here some material sent to me the other day that includes a bill from Welsh Water, which is now a private company. It is entirely bilingual, although English is first and Welsh second. I can access the material in Welsh and English as I want. I also have some leaflets, which are also bilingual. That is an example of a former public utility, which is now a private company, that finds no difficulty in corresponding with me in Welsh, yet British Gas Business tells me that it will not be able to send me my bills in Welsh any more.

Irrespective of that case, British Gas assures me that it will continue to use Welsh in correspondence with its private domestic customers. However, it is a case of a service withdrawn, a service cut and a service lost. I wonder how you would respond, Miss Begg, if you were to receive a letter from such a utility saying that it was unable to send you your bills in English any more. I was surprised, shocked and dismayed at the cut.

In the first letter that I received, the customer manager at British Gas Business said that it wanted to "make sure we're investing our money in the right places".

That is the driver behind the change. I do not know what the savings from cutting the Welsh language service will be, but Centrica, the parent company, made a profit last year of £1.5 billion, so it is not short of a shilling or two to put in the meter. In 2005, British Gas Business made a profit of £77 million. It is clearly searching for cuts and to spend its money in the best way, but it has a little in its back pocket.

The customer service manager went on to say that British Gas Business is withdrawing the Welsh service

"so that we can provide all our customers with outstanding customer service".

Clearly, that is not "all our customers"—my constituents and I count as customers. I cannot see how British Gas can rationalise the step by saying that it is serving all its customers.

A further explanation was offered in a further letter, which stated that "the reason we have taken this decision is that British Gas Business customers are being migrated to a new billing platform."

I could say that British Gas Business should not only provide a service in Welsh, but that it would be good if it provided one in English as well. Perhaps it is unfair to tease British Gas any further. The point is that we have a former public utility that is now in the private sector and it is not subject to the principles of language planning. That is as envisaged in the 1993 Act, from which the private sector was excluded. The Act is concerned primarily with the public sector and, by voluntary agreements, with the voluntary and private sectors.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I remind my hon. Friend that in 1992, when we were discussing the 1993 Act in Standing Committee—the Under-Secretary was also a member of the Committee, and I am sure that he and I agreed on this—we said that the private sector needed to be included. However, it was not included, and we are still suffering from that mistake.

Hywel Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for that. I do not wish to labour the matter, because the First Minister in Cardiff said at the time that he would ensure in future that we had a proper Welsh language Act.

The private sector was excluded under the 1993 Act. That sector includes not only British Gas but the other former public utilities and large private sector businesses—unless they have entered into a voluntary agreement with the Welsh Language Board. I hardly need say that voluntary means just that. British Gas concludes its most recent letter with this statement:

"It may be the case that further legislation compelling energy suppliers to provide a fully bilingual service to business customers is necessary to reverse this decision."

That plainly says that British Gas will act if forced to. Let us be clear: it will provide a Welsh service only if the law compels it to do so. That is the stance of the self-proclaimed No. 1 supplier of energy to the commercial sector in Britain, so it will affect a large number of people.

I said that I would not tease British Gas any further, but its attitude is perfectly explicable given the current Act. The Welsh language may count for something to its private customers, but it has no place in the real world of business, as in the Act—or apparently so. However, many businesses in my constituency and throughout Wales now operate through the medium of Welsh. How could they access business services if every other company took the same view as British Gas?

Mr. Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this debate. Does he agree that that point may be a disincentive to people whose first language is Welsh who are considering starting a business—an obstacle in the way of some who wish to form a new small business, particularly in the communities to which he referred where Welsh is the primary medium of communication?

Hywel Williams: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. There are companies in my constituency that would not dream of operating through the medium of English. Welsh is their internal language and it is the language of their customers. Why should they operate in English? They should operate in English only if they have to, because of the attitude of other businesses. That is why the 1993 Act is deficient. It says nothing about the large parts of the world in which Welsh speakers live.

I am sure that the Under-Secretary will welcome the fact that many companies now operate through the medium of Welsh. However, he cannot welcome that end unless he wills the means, and in this case the means are being denied. I have no doubt that if British Gas, as a responsible employer, faced a case of discrimination on the basis of gender, disability race or even age, it would act, but the language rights of Welsh speakers and Welsh-speaking communities are somehow seen to be different in this case. As I said, that can be traced back to the deficiency of the 1993 Act.

There is a long history of legislation on the Welsh language, and that deficiency runs throughout. The Acts of Union barred anyone who chose to speak Welsh from holding public office; the aim was to expiate "sinister usages and practices", one of which was the speaking of Welsh. As a younger man, I was rather pleased to have the sinister usage and practice of speaking Welsh, but I am now slightly wiser.

Among 20th century legislation, we had the Welsh Courts Act 1942 and the Welsh Language Act 1967. The latter bought in the concept of equal validity, and states explicitly that where there is a discrepancy between English and Welsh texts, the "English shall prevail". If the Welsh text says that so and so is four and the English text says that it is five, it must be five. Such is the idiocy of that provision. We then come to the 1993 Act, with its qualification of equality.

Even the most determined radical would concede that there has been a good deal of progress—but at what a slow pace. Each change has been won from a grudging Government after much hardship, and I am afraid that each change has been deficient, but I believe that we are at the start of a new era for the Welsh language. I am sure that the Under-Secretary will agree that the demography is encouraging, with more and younger Welsh speakers. The bulge is at the young end of the population, not the old. The language is now heard on the streets of Cardiff and Newport as well as Caernarfon and Aberystwyth.

In those urban communities, however, Welsh is not the common language of social life. The Welsh speaker in Cardiff would have to be pretty assertive to demand a public service in Welsh—such as education, where recently the bungling local authority coupled a growth in Welsh language provision with the closing of English-medium schools, and effectively scuppered the plan. There are of course many enterprises that are private but which provide public services, most obviously in health and social services. The world has changed.

Furthermore, in the heartlands the Welsh language is not faring as well, because of migration from those areas that is driven by fewer opportunities, lower wages and the draw of the city. This is a time of potential hope and growth, but a time when we also need to be open to change. After all, why should John and Jane have an automatic right to public service in English, when Siôn and Siân have to fight every inch of the way—perhaps not successfully, in the end? As to the private sector, let us be clear that it is not a matter of forcing the corner shop owner to learn Welsh; it is a matter of large and profitable companies taking their responsibilities seriously—by law, if, as the British Gas case clearly suggests, that is necessary.

This year Rosa Parks died. As many hon. Members will know, she was one of the people who symbolised the fight for the rights of black people in the USA. She did so by the simple act of taking a seat on a bus—a seat that was reserved for white people. She dramatised the inequality of the treatment of black people. In Wales a more subtle and less dramatic form of inequality is present, and perhaps the steps that we take to deal with it are more subtle and less dramatic. However, change we must have. It must be based on full emancipation and full equality, and equal rights for Welsh and English speakers alike.

1.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I congratulate the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) on securing the debate. The hon. Gentleman has chosen an important issue for us to debate, and I have listened with interest. He claims that the current Welsh language legislation is no longer adequate. Perhaps it never was, in his view, in relation to private companies. He argues that the way forward is to establish genuine equality between the English and Welsh languages in Wales. I understand his desire to achieve a bilingual Wales and equality between the two languages, and for Wales to be at the forefront of the conduct of public and perhaps private life in Wales. However, I remain convinced that the way to achieve that is through greater co-operation and encouragement, not compulsion.

The Welsh Language Act 1993 has had a huge impact on the use of the Welsh language and I think that the hon. Gentleman accepts that. The language now plays a more prominent role in our national life than it has done at any time in living memory. The statistics from the 2001 census provide further evidence of that. It is important that fluent Welsh speakers feel that they have as many opportunities as possible to use the language in their everyday lives. There are now many more services available in Welsh than ever before, but one of our biggest problems is getting people to use the services that are currently available in Welsh. The Welsh Assembly Government have made great efforts positively to promote the use of Welsh, and I fully support them in that.

[Nick Ainger]

The long-term future of Welsh as a language rests in our ability to encourage more people to speak the language. A new Act would achieve some things, such as compelling even greater use of the language in business and services. Would it, however, really encourage more people on the streets of Wales to learn it? Legislation can be an effective tool for dealing with problems that society faces, but, as I have said previously, my colleagues in the Welsh Assembly Government and I feel that it is far more important to channel our efforts into ensuring that more Welsh is used every day in all aspects of life through promotion and co-operation. We need to ensure that there are services available in Welsh for those who want to use them, and, at the same time, to make sure that opportunities are available for people to learn the language or enhance their language skills. It is through a combination of those efforts that we will achieve our desired outcome of a bilingual Wales.

Although the UK and Welsh Assembly Governments are not minded to bring forward new specific Welsh language legislation, it does not automatically follow that we are not prepared to consider how we can strengthen our commitment to the language in other legislation. I should point out that the Welsh language has featured prominently in the debates on the Government of Wales Bill. Clause 61 gives Welsh Ministers the power to do anything that they consider appropriate to support the Welsh language. Together with the Assembly Ministers' functions under the Welsh Language Act 1993, it will provide a broad basis for promoting the Welsh language.

Welsh Assembly Ministers will inherit the Welsh Assembly's existing Welsh language scheme and the commitments in it to produce an annual compliance report. As required by section 21(3) of the 1993 Act, the scheme has been prepared having regard to the Welsh Language Board's guidelines. The Welsh Assembly Government's proposals to bring the board in-house have been well documented and debated, and consultation is taking place on them. When they come into effect, Welsh Assembly Ministers will inherit one of the primary functions of the board: promoting and facilitating use of the Welsh language. Having such a function will mean that the Welsh Assembly Government will have to take action to do so. A duty will be imposed on them. That, along with provisions in the Government of Wales Bill, is a reflection of the Welsh Assembly's commitment to the Welsh language.

The hon. Gentleman referred specifically and at some length to British Gas and its decision no longer to provide bills in the medium of Welsh to its business customers. We accept that private businesses have the right to make changes to their services on commercial grounds. However, it is disappointing when a prominent organisation such as British Gas takes such a decision. The company has informed my officials that it will continue to provide a bilingual service to all domestic customers who wish to communicate through the medium of Welsh. It has a voluntary Welsh language scheme, agreed by the Welsh Language Board, and a dedicated Welsh call centre based in Cardiff. However, this move is disappointing, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intends to raise the matter with the company. I understand that Alun Pugh, the Welsh Assembly Government Minister with responsibility for promoting use of the Welsh language, plans to do the same.

Hywel Williams: I welcome the Minister's words about the Government's stance on the issue. How does he respond to the point in the letter from British Gas that it is only through compulsion—through a change in legislation—that it would consider moving back to a Welsh language service for its customers?

Nick Ainger: That is one of the issues that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will discuss with British Gas. As the hon. Gentleman said in his contribution, a significant number of companies are in exactly the same position as British Gas but continue to provide that service, and I hope that British Gas will seriously reconsider its decision. It is not justified, and we shall make our view clear.

There are several other examples not raised by the hon. Gentleman; for example, the Football Association of Wales. It is worth putting it on record that Alun Pugh, the Minister who has responsibility in this area, has urged it seriously to reconsider its policy.

The decision of British Gas, which is extremely disappointing, is an example of the challenges that we face. However, such cases do not necessarily justify or demand sweeping new legislation that compels organisations to provide services in Welsh. They demand greater co-operation, understanding and determination on behalf of us all to promote the use of the language. The Welsh Assembly Government have set out clearly their desire to create a fully bilingual Wales in which use of the Welsh language sits comfortably with the day-to-day functions of life.

The Welsh Assembly Government have outlined their policies in "Iaith Pawb", their national action plan for a bilingual Wales. It sets out how the Welsh Assembly Government will set about raising awareness of the language and encouraging more and more people to speak, learn and use it. The scheme will also ensure that Welsh language considerations are mainstreamed into other Welsh Assembly Government policies. That is a welcome move that I am sure will bring considerable benefits to the language.

Iaith Pawb has set a target of increasing the number of people able to speak Welsh by five percentage points by 2011. That will be an increase on the 2001 census figures, from 20.8 to 25.8 per cent. That is ambitious, but underpins the determination of the Welsh Assembly Government to secure the future of the Welsh language. Fforwm Iaith, which is a programme of public meetings and consultations taking place throughout Wales, has demonstrated further the desire to create a language policy that has the buy-in of all the people of Wales. It is no good having the ideas but not backing them up with resources. The Welsh Assembly Government have put their money where their mouth is and invested more than £28 million extra in the Welsh language since 2003.

It is not just in large-scale programmes of work such as Iaith Pawb that the Welsh Assembly Government are making progress, however. The UK Government are determined to promote the language. Nine Departments now have Welsh language schemes: the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department for Transport, the Department for Education and Skills, the Department for Work and Pensions, the Home Office, the Office for National Statistics, the Ministry of Defence and the Wales Office. Another three Departments—the Department for Constitutional Affairs, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs—are in the process of preparing those schemes in consultation with the Welsh Language Board.

We have announced that Welsh will appear for the first time on UK passports from this year. The Home Office has also demonstrated its commitment by introducing Welsh into the swearing of oaths and affirmations in citizenship ceremonies. Some of those commitments vary in size, but they are all significant.

Again, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising such an important issue. He has raised genuine concerns and again demonstrated his commitment to the Welsh language. I hope that I have done that as well. Although we might not agree on the need for new legislation, it is clear that we have the best interests of the language as our primary objective.

Wales is a special place and our language is to be treasured. It is an old language, with a rich history. It has been used to write some of the most magical and compelling literature and songs. Both the UK and the Welsh Assembly Governments are committed to the preservation and promotion of the Welsh language. We will continue to strive towards that through the initiatives that I have described. I am sure that we will do so by working with the hon. Gentleman, other elected representatives and the people of Wales.

Medical Research (Animals)

1.27 pm

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I welcome you, Miss Begg. I think that this is the first Adjournment debate that I have had with you in the Chair, and I am pleased to see you. I also welcome the Minister, because this is the first time I have introduced an Adjournment debate with him in his new role at the Department of Health. He has long taken an interest in health, both before becoming an MP and in his early and brief days as a Government Back Bencher.

We debate the role of animal research in health care and medicines against a background of animal rights extremism, and there is no denying that. I do not want to talk too much about animal rights extremism, as I want to discuss the broader issues that we need to address to win the hearts and minds of the public over the value of, and therefore the need for, well-regulated animal research. However, it is worth saying a few things about what has happened recently in the context of Oxford, but not to concentrate on them too much.

I certainly recognise that animal rights activists have an ethical position that is coherent. That position is that we should not use animals as a means to benefit humans. That is not a position I agree with, but I recognise that one can hold it and that to do so is not wholly outlandish or irrational. However, if one argues on that basis, one must look first at the use of animals by the million—indeed, by a multiple of those used in medical research—for human consumption and other uses by humans. There is less value in using animals in that way, as it provides menu choice but is not essential for saving human life in the way that animal research in the biosciences is essential for finding insights into diseases and for safety-testing medicines that save life and significantly improve the human condition.

The part of the animal rights movement that I strongly disagree with is that which attacks science and has a pseudo-scientific justification for its position. However, those involved take that position because they know that it is hard to argue against the use of animals in medical research, particularly as it is so tightly regulated in this country and is used only in the context of the 3 Rs—the aim to reduce, refine and replace.

For reasons that I shall come to later, people in that part of the animal rights movement choose not to concentrate their fire on the farming, abattoir and butchery industries, but resort to anti-scientific methods. I feel very strongly that we need to expose that as wrong, irrational, unfair and anti-scientific.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this important subject and for giving way. Does he accept that the animal rights movement has not attacked the registration, evaluation and authorisation of chemicals regulations—the REACH regulations—in Europe, although those will mean about 3 million animals being bred for research, with very little defined benefit for mankind? Will he draw attention to that?

Dr. Harris: It is fair to say that the broader animal welfare movement is split, with the WWF supporting, and indeed instigating, the REACH regulations. However, to be fair to anti-vivisection organisations—I am always keen to be fair—have made representations to the Science and Technology Committee, on which the hon. Gentleman and I serve, opposing those regulations because of the number of animals used.

I want to concentrate on the false arguments used by the animal rights lobby on the validity and value of animal research for the production of medicines, and, before that, on getting insights into the development of disease, both veterinary and human.

It goes without saying that I condemn unreservedly the violence, intimidation and harassment used by animal rights activists. I urge the mainstream animal rights organisations to condemn unreservedly violence, intimidation and harassment, and not by saying, "We condemn violence against both people and animals," because there is a difference, even if some choose to define research using animals as violence. One is lawful and sanctioned by Parliament, and tightly regulated; the other is wholly unlawful criminal behaviour. The two should not be mixed. Therefore, condemning violence against people and animals, in the way that some organisations do, is not an acceptable way of claiming to condemn those techniques.

Mainstream organisations need to condemn that violence, because it will enhance them and their cause if they dissociate themselves from what they must recognise, and many do, as not representative of the vast bulk of people who care about animal welfare, nor even of those people who describe themselves as animal rights activists.

To turn to the general issues of which I have given the Minister notice, the Department of Health, the NHS and the pharmaceutical industry need to do far more to explain to, and educate, the British public—through the media, but also on occasion by educating the media—about the value and essential nature of research using animals. That is not done sufficiently.

Perhaps the Minister can help me with this, but I have not found a speech by a Secretary of State for Health in which the main issue was the value to our health service of the work done by beleaguered scientists, including those in Oxford, who work in basic science or do pre-clinical work to produce new insights into disease, new targets for drugs and new drugs.

People working in the NHS, who I accept are hard pressed, do not recognise that they, too, have a role to play in taking every opportunity, within reason, to make it clear what work has been done on animals to help to provide the health care that they deliver. Clinicians are busy people, so there is the following strong argument to be made about research, whether it is sponsored through NHS research and development funding, or worked on by the Department of Health or the Medical Research Council: somewhere in press releases about breakthroughs in human—that is, clinical—trials, there should be, perhaps in the notes to editors, a statement that the therapy was developed through animal models.

That statement should detail what those models were, and, when applicable, what animals had been used to test efficacy and safety before the relevant medication was put into man. It should also point out that the use of animals was an essential part of the process. The onus would then be on the media to report that part of the story.

We should make the provision of such information a general rule, so that individual scientists would not feel singled out when it was provided. When I volunteered for tests on a putative HIV vaccine, I made it clear, as best I could, in live interviews—otherwise it was edited out—that I had done so knowing, and being grateful for, the fact that the vaccine had been developed using animal models. It had been tested on animals for efficacy, at least in respect of immunogenic impact; primate models had developed the immune response that researchers were looking for.

I do not want to blow my own trumpet, but we need more people to seize every opportunity to make that point. If they do not, we shall not convince the public of the need to safeguard animal research. We can rejoice—if that is the right word—in the recent convictions and long sentences. We can welcome, as I certainly do, the actions of the young people in the Pro-Test movement in Oxford. They put the case positively for research using animals, rather than simply opposing the extremism. We can welcome all that, but those acute, short-term effects have to be sustained.

I worry about polls that reveal the high number of school leavers who have a negative view of animal research, think it cruel and unnecessary, and have read and accepted the propaganda of the animals rights movement. I speak generally; the counter-argument has been more successful among those who have been exposed to debates on the subject.

There is an overwhelming argument for using the opportunity of medicines labelling to make the case for animal research. It has two bases. First, the educative one: it is right that the key role that animals have played in the development of the therapeutic option, in identifying what the drug is targeting and in testing for the efficacy and safety of it—any and all of those, as they apply—should be explained to consumers at the point of use. That is important; it is not done, but it needs to be.

Secondly, informed consent means that people are entitled to know about the contentious issue of whether drugs have been tested on animals. People are entitled to know that, whether or not it would make a difference to whether they would choose to use a drug. We label as to whether food is GM-derived, even if there is no GM product left in it, on the basis that consumers have a right to know and should be able to choose whether they want to support GM technology.

I do not think that many people would refuse to use animal-tested medicines if such labelling were introduced—I hope that very few or no people would—but it is important that people should have that right. The argument that we should not label in that way because people might choose on ethical grounds not to have treatment only proves me right. That view is paternalistic; we must recognise that competent adults have a right to make such decisions for themselves. That paternalistic argument is the worst that could be used, because it sells the pass on the right of people to give informed consent for their treatment.

The Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry has said to me, and said on the radio this morning, that the issue is difficult. Well, labelling is difficult. It would involve legislation, and it might be difficult or inequitable for it to be introduced in this country and not others, but we have requirements for labelling in this country and in the European Union. I want the Government to say that they accept that a good case has been made and that they will explore what can be done to bring such labelling about.

I come back to the point I made at the beginning of the debate. One reason for animal rights activists not targeting the food industry is that they know it would be difficult to argue, as they have on animal research, that such testing is useless. Everyone who eats meat, and presumably enjoys doing so, recognises that there is a direct benefit from having the meat industry. However, what they do not see—unless and until, sadly, they are ill, and it might be explained to them—is the direct benefits of research using animals. They see it as testing things for other people, not for them.

In the same way, as the Minister will be aware, people do not necessarily correctly quantify the risks, if there are any, from mobile phones and mobile phone masts. They see the benefit of the mobile phone that they use, so they discount their fear of the risk, even though the dose from their phone might be greater than that from a mast. They do not see a direct benefit from mobile phone masts, even though they might use a mobile phone—one might consider that a little quirky, to say the least—so large numbers of them campaign against the masts.

Animal rights campaigners recognise that there is a similar issue here, which is why they do what they do, and we must counter that. I fear that the climate will not always be such that the vast majority of the public believes that animal research is essential. However, if we can conquer animal rights extremism and unlawful behaviour through the efforts of the police and the intelligence services, that will bolster public opinion in support of animal research. If we are successful, we can then go back to the battle, which I am happy to have, to secure public support for animal research that does not rely, in a strange way, on the animal rights extremists' counter-productive activities.

I hope that the Minister will offer me some comfort on the points that I have made, particularly on the lead that Health Ministers can take by backing the admirable work done by Lord Sainsbury, the science Minister, and, on occasion, by the Prime Minister. I also hope that there will be action on the design of press releases to ensure that the press have the option of reporting on animal research.

Finally, I hope that the Government will look seriously at allowing patients to give informed consent and at educating the public generally through medicines labelling.

Bob Spink: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on how he has presented his comments. I agree with everything that he has said, and he has said it very well, but would it help his case and help to win over the public if he confirmed that the UK has one of the strictest licensing regimes in the world for using animals in medical research? Research can be conducted in the UK only if no non-animal options are available. Only essential research takes place, and the animal's welfare is always at the forefront.

Dr. Harris: I certainly endorse the hon. Gentleman's comments. The key point is to recognise that work is being done on finding replacements, refining animal experiments and minimising the number of animals used. However, we must recognise—this is my only criticism on the issue—that as more animal models are created as a result of transgenic research, more breeding pairs will be produced. That is particularly true of mice. More mice will be used, so we need to lower expectations on whether there will be a reduction in the overall numbers.

That technique is powerful, and as more genes are identified, more animal models may be used. We will continue to see an increase there, but minimisation of the numbers is still possible within that, and I wholly endorse the strategy of the three R's. I look forward to the Minister's response.

1.43 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Andy Burnham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) on securing the debate and I am grateful to him for the measured and informed way in which he spoke. It is characteristic of his approach on these matters, about which he is well informed.

I am also pleased that the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) has made an effort to be here. During my remarks, I hope that those outside who pay attention to these proceedings will see that there is a consensus between the three of us and, more broadly, between our political parties. That shows that mainstream opinion is firmly on one side of the argument and sends an important message to the public.

I am pleased to be back at the Department of Health and I was grateful to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon for welcoming me back. During my time dealing with identity cards and other matters, I also had responsibility at the Home Office for the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, so, usefully, I saw the licensing side of this issue and I have acquired experience that I hope will inform how I do my current job.

I agree with almost all of the hon. Gentleman's points. He made some challenges to the Department, and I will want to address them. However, let me begin by saying that animal research and testing has played a part in almost every medical breakthrough of the last century and is vital to the functioning of our national health service. In recent times, research using animals has led to new treatments and therapies for many conditions including stroke, which is the third largest cause of death in the United Kingdom and the largest single cause of severe disability. Studies with mice and rats have shown the complicated cascade of events that takes place during and after a stroke and have led to successful treatments being developed. These include drugs that prevent or inhibit the harm caused by glutamate, which damages the brain cells and is released in huge quantities during a stroke. New treatments being tested on animals include stem cells and bone marrow injections, which appear to restore much of the brain's function.

[Andy Burnham]

In introducing my remarks, I want to take head-on the hon. Gentleman's challenge. If I interpreted correctly, there was a criticism that the case for animal research and testing was not made strongly enough across all arms of government. I refute that by saying that it is evident that the Government from the very top down—from the Prime Minister downwards—have been steadfast in supporting necessary animal research and testing. To be fair to the hon. Gentleman, he made reference to that. Support for that comes from the top, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that there are no differences of opinion between the Departments of Government.

It is also important to introduce a note of balance by saying that it is Government policy to support what is called the 3 Rs agenda—reduction, refinement and replacement. Where possible, we should work to reduce the number of animals used. The hon. Member for Castle Point made that point. We see the need for this balance; we support animal research and testing, and we robustly and resolutely defend that principle in many forums, but we also say clearly to the public that where necessary and where possible we will support the reduction of animal use.

Bob Spink: Will the Minister clarify that the refinement element of the 3 Rs addresses the welfare of the animal by making sure that that is as high as possible in all circumstances?

Andy Burnham: I gladly confirm that.

The hon. Gentleman made an important point in his intervention on the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon. Speaking from the Home Office perspective, as I used to do, it is right that the British regime for the conduct of research and testing in this area is, I would go so far as to say, perhaps the best and the strictest in the world. We set the standard for many other countries to follow; they look to us for standards of animal welfare in science and in research and development. One of the great ironies of the actions of so-called animal rights extremists is that if they achieve their goal and drive this work from our shores, they could drive it to countries that have a far less strict regime for the conduct of such research, and by implication they could therefore cause more suffering to animals in the long run. They would do well to think about that point.

That is not to say that, as the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon mentioned, there are not groups that legitimately apply pressure in respect of reduction, refinement and replacement. We should hear that pressure and respond to it wherever we can, but without losing sight of the central point that is being made in this debate: that we should strongly, clearly and, if possible, in unison defend the use of animal experiments to the wider public. That is certainly the position that I am here today unequivocally to support.

The hon. Gentleman will know that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister wrote an article published in The Sunday Telegraph on 14 May, setting out the Government's position on animal testing and our determination to stand up to animal rights extremism and to protect those targeted by it. The article sets out the importance of as many people as possible standing up to extremists; recognises that British scientists and companies are at the forefront of research that saves and improves the quality of countless lives; and affirms that we should be proud that the UK leads the way in the robustness of our licensing regime and in developing new testing techniques.

I wholeheartedly endorse those sentiments. The Government, police and courts are making increased efforts to stamp out illegal and intimidatory conduct by animal rights extremists. We have a comprehensive strategy, with the Prime Minister taking overall charge, and we have made excellent progress in better co-ordinating our efforts. The Government have injected significant new resources into that work. At national level, a specialist team has been set up to co-ordinate operations against extremists. At local level, awareness has been strengthened through workshops with local police, and the issue is being flagged as a key priority in the national policing plan.

More people, including health professionals, are now prepared to speak out on behalf of research using animals, as the hon. Gentleman said. In February 2006, the "Pro-Test" campaign attracted twice as many demonstrators on to the streets as the anti-testing demonstration on the same day. I believe that the former demonstration was attended by many of the hon. Gentleman's constituents, if it did not go through part of his constituency. I commend the courage of the demonstrators in defying the bullying and intimidatory tactics of the small number of extremists.

The centrepiece of the hon. Gentleman's comments related to Health Ministers and the Department itself being on the front foot and supporting the agenda that he has outlined. I strongly welcome the "People's Petition", registering support for the properly regulated animal testing that takes place in this country. It has attracted thousands of signatures and gives voice to the majority position in this country. The hon. Gentleman is doing a great deal to ensure that that position continues to command majority support from the public, and I commend his efforts in making the public argument, as he does whenever he has the opportunity.

The hon. Gentleman expressed a need for Health Ministers to defend, promote and support essential medical research. That is what we do. Wherever possible, the Department of Health—together with the pharmaceutical industry, the scientific community and funders of research using animals—makes the case strongly for the importance of such research. All those partners have a role to play in explaining its legitimate and responsible use.

Ministers from my Department, the Home Office and the Department of Trade and Industry have spoken many times on that subject. The hon. Gentleman said that he had not found such a speech. I can refer him to countless speeches and comments from Ministers not only in the Department of Health but across the spectrum. In those speeches and comments, he will find unanimous support for the position that I am outlining. We set out, and will carry on setting out, the benefits of medical research and the fact that the UK has the strictest regime in the world for animal testing, designed to minimise suffering and to ensure the highest welfare standards.

The Government are committed to developing alternatives to animal testing wherever possible, and fund work to reduce, refine and one day replace the use of animals in research. UK universities and companies have an excellent record of developing and using alternatives.

As a Health Minister in April 2002, Lord Hunt of Kings Heath set out in full for the first time the Government's policy on the use of animals in medical research. Two years later, at the first Coalition for Medical Progress parliamentary reception, my ministerial colleague Lord Warner of Brockley spoke about why research using animals is essential. That is a speech to which I can refer the hon. Gentleman. The Government welcome and support the work of the coalition, which presents data from scientists engaged in biomedical research in order to explain how animals help research on the causes of disease and enable new treatments to be developed. The coalition communicates with a range of audiences, including nurses.

I shall touch on some of the points raised by the hon. Gentleman. He said that he understands the position taken by some people who believe that it is defensible to say that animals should not be used to benefit humans. I believe that the vast majority of people would find that position difficult to sympathise with or agree with and it becomes completely unacceptable when combined with violence and intimidation against those who do not hold a similar view. He was right to say that it is important not to suggest that the groups that indulge in such extremism are in any way representative of the huge number of people in this country who care about animal welfare, and it is right that we make that distinction here today. There is a long and respectable tradition in this country of campaigning on such matters and many people take a strong personal interest in them, but there is a major difference between wanting a reduction in the unnecessary suffering by animals and those who understand the need for medical research for the benefit of humankind. It is important that the hon. Gentleman put that distinction on the record.

I take on board the hon. Gentleman's point about press releases. It is important to make the case whenever we have the opportunity. I will not flinch from doing so and I do not believe that a single ministerial colleague in the Department will flinch from doing so. The hon. Gentleman may have given us a useful jab and he was right to say that we should carry on making the case clearly and unequivocally.

The hon. Gentleman said that he was a volunteer for the HIV vaccine, which demonstrates a personal commitment, and I want to make a brief comment about the Northwick Park issue which is commanding so much attention at the moment. People have asked whether that demonstrates that animal testing is unnecessary because it did not prevent the incident. There will be further announcements in due course about the reasons for what happened—and some expert work is necessary—but it demonstrated the danger of putting people into early clinical trials when there has not been sufficient animal research. That makes the point that animal testing is important; it does not make the reverse case. It would be a dangerous world if people were not confident about going into such trials and it is very important, if we are to maintain public confidence in clinical trials, that we continue to use animal testing when necessary.

Dr. Harris: I back the Minister's support for the idea that press releases on clinical trials should refer to animal research and I hope that it is fair to say that there is now Government support for funders to ask for or even to insist that researchers do that.

Will the Minister use the last two minutes to refer to the labelling of medicine packs because I know that many people want to hear his views?

Andy Burnham: I will. I heard the hon. Gentleman's comments and have read the transcript of his interview on the "Today" programme. He is making an interesting proposal. I know that it has been discussed before and I have an open mind about it. I am prepared to consider the issues further, but I urge him to recognise that a cost-benefit analysis is required because there are risks—it has been suggested that some people may be deterred from taking medicines—and there is a financial cost to the NHS of doing so. There may be other risks in following such a course.

At the same time, the benefit that the hon. Gentleman wants is public confidence and acceptance of the need for animal testing so there is a benefit, but I hope that he recognises that there may be dangers also. The matter should be considered in the round before a firm commitment can be given one way or another. I do not have a closed mind on the issue and if he wants to do further work and to engage us in further debate, I am happy to do so. However, the matter is not as straightforward as it may seem initially, although I am not saying that I have a real desire or a closed mind.

In the short time remaining, I want to congratulate the hon. Gentleman again on the debate. He mentioned young people, who are an important audience for the issues that we have discussed today. We would do well to think more about how we can communicate some of the messages that we are sharing today with that audience. I believe that most young people would accept the position that we are outlining, but let us communicate with them.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 24 May 2006

[FRANK COOK in the Chair]

Nursing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Huw Irranca-Davies.]

9.30 am

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): Good morning, Mr. Cook. It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair today overseeing our proceedings.

I am delighted to have secured this debate on nursing. The NHS is made up of many people who have created the fantastic, modern NHS of today, but I want to concentrate on the role of nurses, their practice and nurse education. Nurses are to be found in all sorts of settings, but often they are stereotyped—certainly I was during my 25 years as a nurse in the health service—as someone who wears a nice blue dress, has an upside-down watch and struts up and down like Hattie Jacques. Of course that is not true—although, to be honest, I was quite bossy. In fact, nurses are to be found in all parts of today's NHS. We have acute nurses working in our hospitals, and community nurses doing an excellent job in the outside world. There are those who help people with severe learning disabilities and those who care for people with mental health problems, and then there is the fantastic work done by occupational health nurses.

It would be great to tell the House of all the hideous and despicable things that I had to do as a nurse—not intentionally but in the course of my duties. I sometimes hear nurses say, "Oh, things are not like they were in my day," but I hope to demonstrate that nursing has developed into a serious professional career, with opportunities for development that were never thought of even 20 or 30 years ago. It is important to set the scene and to lay to rest the belief that everything was wonderful 30 years ago and that life for nurses is now a piece of cake. I firmly believe that that is not true. Life can be extremely difficult and nurses are doing an excellent job in a very busy NHS.

Since the time of Florence Nightingale, nurses have been at the forefront of development and improvements in health care. We need only look out of the window to see—if the blinds were open, we could see it better—the first school of nursing, founded by Florence Nightingale at St. Thomas' hospital. It is appropriate to debate nursing today because nurses have responded well to change. On the whole, they have been at the cutting edge of innovation and development in patient care.

Nursing has never been a job that anyone could do only for money. It has always been called a vocation, and that is how many speak of it, but I often thought that that was an excuse for paying nurses badly and for not respecting and understanding the work that they do. I am glad to say that nurses today are given the right resources and the money that they deserve, and that they have become part of a profession.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend is right to point out the real increases in nurses' pay since 1997, but we also need to offer proper financial support to nurses and midwives during training. There is a high attrition rate in midwifery training and larger bursaries are needed, partly because entrants may be more mature and have caring responsibilities. It can be a financial struggle to get to the end of the course. Does my hon. Friend think that the new Under-Secretary of State for Health, our hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis) will announce something today that might improve that situation? We greatly admired the talents that he demonstrated in his previous post.

Laura Moffatt: I remember well being involved, with other hon. Members, in campaigning for a decent bursary for student nurses. I am well aware of the issues that affect nurses, certainly mature nurses. We want people of all ages to join the nursing profession, because that enhances the richness of the profession, which should not be a career choice only for those in their late teens. I understand that there are issues that particularly affect older people with families who are trying to develop their careers. I hope that the Minister will comment on that subject this morning.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Probably when my hon. Friend and I did our training, we not only received a salary but had employment protection. We had protection against unfair dismissal, for example, and women, who might have fallen pregnant during their training, also had the protection of maternity leave. Should we consider going back to those days instead of having a bursary? Students would still attend university, but would be associated with a local health board.

Laura Moffatt: I completely understand my hon. Friend's point of view. He has a long history of campaigning on behalf of nurses. Having a salary was attractive, but it was very small and I suspect that, if it were set at the same rate, it would be completely inadequate for nurses today. In addition, we immediately became part of the work force as nurses, but had enormous difficulties in getting the classroom education that we so desperately needed. I believe that there is a middle way: we can properly reimburse student nurses for the work that they do, even if they are supernumerary to the nursing team on the ward, because they play a huge role. We need to respect and understand that.

Returning to why people become nurses, it is important to understand that nursing is a career of positive choice, with pathways of opportunity and clinical development. Nurses are no longer the handmaidens of consultants, doing as they are told. Life is very different for nurses today.

As I mentioned, my experience is very much hospital-based; I served 25 years in my local hospital on both day and night duty. I am pleased to see the hon. Members here, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen), who has enormous experience in the community. I hope that she will be able to catch your eye, Mr. Cook, so that we can hear more about community nursing. Many other Members present also take a great interest in the issues.

We must accept that things have changed for the better for nurses in respect of their stature and how they are regarded. However, we must also accept that life for today's nurses can be very hard. Their work load is much greater because we are treating people more successfully: thousands of people walking around today would probably not have survived 35 years ago. People are living longer, thank goodness, and many more are being treated through a whole range of interventions and treatments that were never seen before.

I first started nursing on a 25-bed ward. In those days, I could probably rely on 10 of those patients being relatively well, up and about and able to help with the tea trolley. It was not unusual for a patient to spend 10 days in hospital after a hernia operation. Now such patients would leave hospital the next day. We can only imagine the pressure that that puts on nursing staff to ensure that the bed is clean and fresh for the next patient. We accept that nursing is a different kettle of fish now from what it was years ago. Hospitals are no longer places where people convalesce.

I strongly support the aims of the White Paper "Our health, our care, our say: a new direction for community services". Recovering at home or in a setting other than hospital is by far the better option, but it must be well supported by good nursing staff and systems. That is why I am such a keen supporter of the proposals to broaden the opportunities for people to recover in their own home, where we know they do much better psychologically than if they were left in hospital. However, it means that today's 25-bed unit will contain 25 people needing intensive nursing and treatment.

Many of the changes that have taken place in the health service have been led by nurses. They understood that when a patient is recovering, being at home and being more active is the best option. We no longer condone patients being left in bed in hospital, waiting for the visiting hour when people can come to see them for a short while. Nurses have developed models of care to define nursing care in this century, and tremendous efforts have been made to ensure that nurse education leaves student nurses fit for practice.

To return to the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine), 30 years ago a nurse would spend six weeks in the school of nursing and then go straight on to a ward. Obviously, other nurses would provide support, but that was a very scary situation to be in and we should never condone that practice again. In the days when 10 of the 25 patients were relatively well, we could support such a practice, but today it would be dangerous.

Medicine has transformed what happens in the NHS. We no longer have generalist surgeons or medics and there are no generalist nurses, either. Nurses soon specialise in a particular area and deliver specialised care. I remember well the days when, for example, over-65s who had had a heart attack would see a consultant physician, who would say, "Well, old chap, you've had a heart attack, so I'll ask you to go home and rest and we'll see how you are in a couple of weeks." Today's NHS would never treat anyone of that relatively young age in such a way; it ensures that all that can be offered is offered. I am glad to say that there has been a tremendous fall in the number of people dying of coronary heart disease, because of the specialist intervention. However, none of that can happen without nursing staff supporting innovations, ensuring that people have the intervention that they need and get the care and support that they need when they get home.

Today's nurse education is very different from what it was years ago. Nurses are empowered through education, and not only to deliver excellent care. They are also encouraged to challenge what is offered to patients, to think of new ways of delivering care, to respond to patients' needs and to act as an advocate on their behalf. The Council of Deans and Heads of UK University Faculties for Nursing and Health Professions has been doing tremendous work to ensure that nurse education is of the highest standard. A recent statement on nurse education from the council said:

> "Education programmes should seek to ensure that students have the knowledge, skills and expertise to practise in a culturally diverse environment and develop lifelong learning skills".

The statement refers to skills such as flexibility, scholarship, questioning, analysis, critique and the use of evidence. I was not taught to challenge or use critique—the very idea would have been frowned on when I did my nurse training.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend is in touch with the midwives at the Stroud maternity unit, which is threatened with closure. Yesterday, I received a letter from the university of the West of England saying that it was important to keep such facilities open so that they could provide training for midwives. Does my hon. Friend agree that nurses and midwives will not have proper training facilities for nurses and midwives if we contract NHS facilities?

Laura Moffatt: As chair of the all-party group on maternity, I am very aware of the issues facing the Stroud birthing unit. I also know that my hon. Friend is a keen supporter of the nurses there and that he is keen to ensure that that excellent unit survives. He is right about nurse education and continuing education, and when trusts face difficulties—I shall speak a little more about this—they should be wary of cutting budgets in ways that result in their not training as many of those entering the profession or continuing their education afterwards. That would be a false economy, and none of the innovations that I described would have happened without a well educated, empowered work force. I thank my hon. Friend for raising the subject.

I have talked about how different training has become. Today's nurse education includes increased practice-based learning, which we called for very strongly. We felt that in the Nursing 2000 initiative there was an overemphasis on classroom activity and not enough emphasis on practice-based activity, and the change has been warmly welcomed.

My hon. Friend mentioned training, and I want to put the issue to the Minister in the hope that we can have an ongoing dialogue to ensure that training budgets are secure and ring-fenced. That would give acute trusts and primary care trusts the ability to continue investing in their most precious commodity—their staff.

Nurses who are in practice now are having a very different time from their predecessors, and I look with envy at some of the activities and innovations that are taking place. I like to keep in touch with what is happening and I have assisted in the Royal College of Nursing leadership programmes for modern matrons, which has helped me to understand some of the issues that those people face.

Nurses continue to press for greater autonomy, and nurse organisations across the board, including trade unions, such as Unison, and the RCN, continue to ensure that nurses introduce new ways of practising. Talk of evidence-based practice is now typical in every nurse setting, as nurses ensure that they continue to deliver the best care to patients.

Nurses who have been through nurse education have a responsibility to other team members. I am delighted that more than 80,000 more nurses are working in the NHS, but there has also been a huge increase in health care assistants, and nurses have a responsibility to ensure that those assistants receive the best training so that they can assist in care giving. No one is better placed than nurses to ensure that health care assistants receive the training, education and continuing development that they desperately need.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I endorse what my hon. Friend says about the important role that health care assistants play. Does she agree that secondment, which offers health care assistants a route into qualified nursing, is enormously important? I read the accounts in the very helpful debate pack that the Library prepared for the debate, and it was alarming to find that getting a secondment place seems to be something of a lottery. Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be helpful if the Minister addressed those points?

Laura Moffatt: I am deeply grateful to my right hon. Friend for that intervention, because I wanted to go on to talk about securing finance to ensure that workplace development goes on. The secondment programmes are excellent, and as he says, places are hard fought for, but there are other ways to get into practice. I congratulate Unison on its work with the Open university in helping people, including mature people, in the workplace who cannot afford to give up their jobs and start training for a completely new career. It encourages them through high-quality training, in partnership with the Open university, to develop their skills. An excellent programme was recently launched for social workers working in a care setting who choose to go on and develop their skills. There are routes other than secondment, and we should use those methods to make sure that people have an opportunity to develop. After all, what is better than someone who understands the profession becoming a health care assistant and then deciding to go on to become a registered nurse? The only way that we can truly guarantee quality of care is to secure the budgets and, once again, I ask the Minister to say a little about that.

There have been fantastic innovations in nurse education, and I am particularly taken with the role of modern matrons. They have provided highly visible and accessible leaders for nurses and have given nurses the sense that there are tremendous career paths open to them, which will ensure that they stay in the profession. That has always been a problem—the health service used to lose many good nurses into management, because they felt that there was no reason to remain in practice as there was no sensible career path for them. It is different today.

Modern matrons are there to drive up clinical standards and to empower nurses to take on a greater range of clinical tasks to improve care. Recently, the matrons charter, which was designed as an action plan for cleaner hospitals, has been warmly welcomed. Such nurse-led initiatives are beginning to make our hospitals a much better, nicer environment. In fact, Beverley Malone of the Royal College of Nursing has said:

"we are pleased to see such a clear government understanding of how important it is to empower matrons."

Another fine initiative is the role of nurse consultant. It was first referred to in 1999 in the strategy document, "Making a Difference: strengthening the nursing, midwifery and health visiting contribution to health and healthcare". Those nurses came into being in January 2000.

I have examples of both a modern matron and a nurse consultant making a huge difference in their setting. Lynne Phair, a nurse consultant for older people in Crawley primary care trust, is doing tremendous work in ensuring that there is better care for older people when they leave hospital and go into the community. In addition, she is working in partnership with Crawley borough council to deliver education to groups including Age Concern, health care assistants or friends and family visiting older people at home, to ensure that older people do not become ill if there is a heat wave—although I am slightly worried that the weather will never warm up.

There were many headlines in 2003 about how many people in France died as a result of the prolonged hot weather; estimates range up to 15,000, I believe. We should not forget that 2,000 older people are estimated to have died in the UK from heatstroke and heat exhaustion because they were not given the right equipment or treated as they should have been to reduce the threat of heatstroke. Lynne Phair is working in partnership with the borough to ensure that everybody understands what to do and what advice to give; she is producing really good information and certificates to get that message across—and it is getting across to many people. That is just another example of how the role of nurses has changed.

Another fine example of a modern matron is Faye Butler, from the dermatology department of the Newcastle group of hospitals. People with dermatological problems face massive waiting times and it is extremely distressing if a patient suffering from a skin problem has to wait weeks to see someone. Thanks to Faye Butler's leadership and the work of the rest of the team, those waiting times have been hugely reduced. In fact, people are referred straight away to see the dermatologist and to get treatment that week. That is a huge change, which was made through nurses taking a lead.

There are other innovations, such as nurse prescribing. We were just talking about it when I was leaving the profession in 1997, but now there has been a huge expansion in how nurses can prescribe drugs. We would like to see more, but that was a difficult argument fought in the face of a medical profession that was uncomfortable with it. I think the profession now accepts that it was the right innovation and that we are able to treat more people more quickly and fulfil our pledge to ensure that people have the care that they need.

Many of us see the way in which cancer care has been transformed in our communities. The two-week waiting time is not achieved merely by a consultant, of course. The nursing staff are there to ensure that patients, mostly women in breast cancer cases, can attend the clinic and have a day there, get a diagnosis and either leave the department skipping and laughing or get the extra care that a breast care nurse can offer, and to provide that continuing care through treatment. Nurses are prepared to put that innovation into action and to ensure that we respond properly.

The same applies to efforts to tackle methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus. Every nurse knows that the problem is not just the result of high bed occupancy. Anybody who does any serious work into health care-acquired infections knows that they are very complex. I was pleased to see the trade unions and the Royal College of Nursing come together with the Department of Health to develop an action plan to reduce the incidence of MRSA, which is proving extremely successful. It is dishonest to say that MRSA is caused just because hospitals are over-busy. That is not the whole picture and I hope that the Minister will be able to say a few words on that.

As I have said, we have seen massive changes in the health service thanks to the nurses who have ensured that it can change. The number of qualified nurses working in the NHS has increased by 23.4 per cent. Recently, there have been concerns and many headlines about redundancies in the nursing profession. Distressing though it is to those affected by such redundancies, we should set that against the backdrop of more than 85,000 more nurses. None of us would support the loss of nurses just because of money issues, but we must accept that many more people are working in the NHS.

That is why I was completely bemused to see what looked like a staged event when the Secretary of State was greeted at the Royal College of Nursing conference. I was nursing at a time when the trust that I worked for suffered real-terms cuts: it did not merely have a standstill budget, but its allocation of money was cut. Yet whenever we saw on the news the Secretary of State at the time being greeted by the Royal College of Nursing, we never saw such events. I wonder whether we need to be a little more sensible about our campaigning.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): I apologise to my hon. Friend for being able to be here for only part of the debate, and I congratulate her on securing it.

As a former nurse and a former president of Unison, I wonder whether she shares my concern about the way in which the Royal College of Nursing treated the Secretary of State for Health. During the debate, I have heard about the innovations and good things that are happening in health and nursing as a result of mature dialogue between the unions and the Government. It was appalling of the RCN to treat the Secretary of State like that. I suffered similarly when I was president of Unison, but that came from a Trotty militant element—[Laughter.] Unison had problems along those lines. I attended a congress as president and the shouting and heckling was a distressing experience that I did not deserve. The Secretary of State certainly did not deserve to be treated like that, and the RCN should be ashamed of itself.

Laura Moffatt: I am deeply grateful to my hon. Friend and delighted that she is able to be with us for a short time. I know that she wanted to take part in the debate, but faced time pressures.

I agree that there is a time and a place for campaigning, and there is a role for nursing organisations, including Unison and the RCN. However, it is easy to lose the support of the House with negative campaigning. I have been reading in Hansard the criticism from hon. Members on both sides of the House about the way in which that campaigning was undertaken. It was damaging to nursing, particularly as the RCN in its evidence to the Health Committee seemed to say something different. We should bear that in mind.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): May I suggest that perhaps the frustration shown at the conference was about not just job losses but a range of other issues, such as vacancy freezes, graduate skills going to waste and a growing disillusionment in the profession following the RCN's survey, which suggested that many nurses are planning to leave the NHS? I do not think it was only about job losses; I think it was about wider issues also.

Laura Moffatt: I do not know the rationale for that staged event. I do not understand it and refuse to accept that it was beneficial. When I started my nursing training in 1972, I was told that nurses' morale was at the lowest ebb ever. In 1980, I was again told that their morale was at the lowest ebb ever. That has continued for many years. There has clearly been enormous investment, but we are still hearing that nurses' morale is at the lowest ebb ever. There is an issue and we must try to understand it because my understanding, certainly from Unison's work with nurse members, is that they are feeling much better about the profession, although recent events have made them feel more uncomfortable. We must get a grip on the budgets.

Mr. Devine: I was a senior trade union official when the Conservative party was in power and we had real-terms cuts. Frankly, I do not understand why, with the increased budgets, there are redundancies in any hospital. In Scotland, we wanted to keep national pay bargaining. Turnover in Scottish hospitals is about 7 per cent., but turnover in some hospitals south of the border is 34 per cent. a year. Perhaps the Minister will enlighten us on whether we should bring in chief executives, directors of human resources and finance directors before any announcements are made on redundancies and cuts. Questions should be asked about how the budgets are managed.

Laura Moffatt: I completely agree with my hon. Friend. The Surrey and Sussex Healthcare NHS Trust, which serves my constituency, has one of the highest deficits in the country. I expect it to work with the turnaround team, which has greatly benefited the work of the trust, to examine areas where there is overspending. We need to keep the front-line staff in place to make sure that they continue to provide the care that is so desperately needed. Other ways of managing need to be considered. The turnaround team is doing innovative work and examining back office work rather than staff, so I agree with my hon. Friend.

As an old nurse who has left the profession, I do not view the nursing of the past through rose-coloured spectacles. I firmly believe that nurses today are better qualified and much better able to respond to today's NHS. They work extremely hard. I salute every single one of them and hope that they continue to work in this fantastic NHS.

Several hon. Members rose—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. It is advisable for me to draw to the attention of all right hon. and hon. Members a three-minute discrepancy between the electronic time display and the time on the annunciator. We must go by the annunciator, which shows the time throughout the House.

Also, I remind right hon. and hon. Members that I am required to call the first of the three Front-Bench speakers at 10.30, so we have only 24 minutes left. Only two hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye in that time. I ask them to bear what I have said in mind when making their speeches and when accepting or responding to interventions.

10.7 am

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) on securing this important debate, and on the eloquence, personal experience and knowledge that informed her excellent opening contribution. I am very proud to have in my constituency Oxford Brookes university, where there is a vibrant school of health and social care, which I had a hand in initiating many years ago when I chaired the university board. That school trains 2,000 students and its training facilities have been consolidated into a new centre with state-of-the-art teaching facilities including a professional and clinical skills centre, which does excellent work.

My hon. Friend eloquently described the crucial roles that are involved in modern nursing skills, and which contribute to the work of a health team. She described from personal experience the difference between the present arrangements and those of many years ago. Hon. Members and the public are full of praise for the contribution of nurses and other health professionals. The progress and tangible difference that they make can be seen every day. I am sure that other hon. Members receive, as I do, positive feedback about people's personal experience of the national health service, based on the care that they are given.

As my hon. Friend said, nurses are at the cutting edge of innovation in health care and have been driving many of the improvements in hospitals and other health facilities. She also pointed out that people do not go into nursing for the money; but it is a good thing—and I am very proud that the Labour Government are responsible—that nurses' pay has been significantly increased and that the number of nurses has been increased by 87,000. Opposition Members who fasten on difficulties in the health service would do well to remember that if they had had their way in voting against the extra money going to the NHS, we should not have had those extra nurses, and the pressures and difficulties would be greater.

Mr. Baron: As a point of fact, Conservatives agree with the Government's Budget, which has been set to 2008, so peddling the line that we continually vote for cuts does not take account of the context. Neither the Government nor the Opposition parties have been able to predict beyond 2008, as it is simply not possible to do so.

Mr. Smith: I do not want to get into partisan fights on the matter. I simply made a passing reference to the fact—it is a fact—that the principal Opposition party did not vote for the resources that were necessary to increase health funding in the way that the Government have increased it. Therefore, it is true that the position would have been worse, not better, if they had had their way. The change is to be welcomed.

As I said, I wish to raise three key issues in this contribution. The first was touched on earlier when my hon. Friend discussed pathways into nursing and the importance of professional development. I wish to stress the point and invite my hon. Friend the Minister to respond on the question of health care assistants and opportunities to qualify, whether through secondment or the other routes to which my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley referred.

The point is worth stressing because health care assistants are an enormously important part of the modern health care team. They bring experience and a set of life skills that can be invaluable in nursing. For many of them, especially those with family responsibilities, the secondment route is financially the most viable way into nursing. It is a great loss to the profession if people have that potential and want to qualify as nurses but are held back because they are unable to get a secondment place. That is why I invite my hon. Friend the Minister to set out the Government's thinking on how we can maintain and, where possible, expand that important route. Such opportunities are crucial to making the most of those individuals' potential.

Those opportunities are also important in confronting nursing shortages, as we have done on many occasions in the past. Especially in areas of high-cost accommodation such as Oxford, the challenge for the future must be not simply to fill gaps by recruiting nurses from overseas, although they have made an invaluable contribution, or by increasing training for the future, although that is important, but to do more to retain the staff whom we have and to ensure that people who already live in an area and who have the potential to become qualified nurses have a route into nursing. Such people already have accommodation in the area, so they do not face the burden of high prices and rents. That is particularly important in constituencies such as mine.

The second key area is the impact of current financial deficits. It is a coincidence that as we meet here today, staff at the John Radcliffe hospital in Oxford will be briefed on the likely implications for them of correcting the local deficit. Last week, headline leaked reports stated that as many as 600 posts might go, so staff are understandably apprehensive. I have met RCN representatives, Unison and others to discuss that difficult situation.

The crucial thing is that patient care must be safeguarded. The nurses whom I met have undertaken to alert me if there is any threat to patient care so that I can raise it at the highest level, but it is unfortunate indeed that people are being subjected to anxiety. The situation is terrible for people who face losing their job. I believe that that apprehension informed some of the anger voiced at the RCN conference. Certainly the nurses who came to see me in the recent lobby said that that was the reason for it, although I echo what others have said about the impact that it had and how it came across.

The other dimension to the deficits, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley referred, was covered in the excellent briefings from the Council of Deans, which warn that the biggest cuts in commissioning of nurses going into training appear to be in those strategic health authority areas where the deficits are largest. In some areas, cuts of up to 30 or 40 per cent. in the current financial year are being spoken about. After all that has been done to improve nurse training and recruitment, it would be an utter tragedy if we returned to the bad old pattern of feast and famine by allowing those short-term financial pressures to cut recruitment for the future.

Ann Keen (Brentford and Isleworth) (Lab): In fact, the Council of Deans has made it clear that the problem that we faced in the '90s, when the reduction was made in student numbers, was what we inherited as a Government in 1997 and beyond. We must not make those mistakes again. The Department must take the Council of Deans's remarks seriously, and I hope that the Minister will address that.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The problems that we faced in the past were the product of sharp cuts in nurse training intakes in earlier years. We must not go back to that situation, because it would mean that we would not have sufficient nurses in 2009, 2010 and 2011, which will be necessary both to staff the expanded services and to meet the important demographic challenge, as a substantial proportion of the existing nursing staff approaches retirement.

I invite the Minister to acknowledge the important point that reductions in nurse training to meet short-term financial pressures do not necessarily bear any relationship to longer-term staffing needs. I would be grateful for an assurance that the Government will review overall nurse commissioning numbers to ensure that proper weight is attached to the medium and long-term requirement for nurses, taking account not only of the expansion in services, but of the demographics, as nurses come up for retirement. It is not clear to me that a strategic health authority basis for commissioning will necessarily achieve the total aggregate number of nurses that we need for the future.

As we have all been saying, the health service has been improving enormously, thanks to the extra resources that have gone in, the extra staff who have been recruited, the professional development that has been undertaken, and the hard work and dedication of teams of health care professionals. Just as it is a tragedy wherever that progress is damaged by financial deficits, which we must deal with, so it would be tragic indeed if we faced future nurse shortages because of short-term considerations.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Does the right hon. Gentleman favour a fairly rigid form of ring-fencing of training budgets to SHAs in order to address the problems that he has outlined?

Mr. Smith: As I said, the evidence from the Council of Deans is that the reductions in commissioning appear to be most severe in the areas where the deficits are highest. That rather suggests that the financial pressures are being allowed to distort the pattern of recruitment. Ring-fencing is therefore an option that the Government ought to explore seriously; otherwise, they should assure us that the total number of nurses going into training will be adequate to meet future need.

I started my speech by referring to the education and training in my constituency. It is also crucial to have stability in our important training institutions, so that they do not face very sharp shifts in numbers, because that would destabilise an important part of the infrastructure that, at the end of the day, supports the national health service. I look forward to the Minister's response.

10.19 am

Ann Keen (Brentford and Isleworth) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to contribute to this debate on nursing.

May 1997 saw an historic event: the election of the first two nurses to join the House of Commons—my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) and myself. We were followed in 2001 by my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Anne Moffat), and more recently by my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine). Why did it take so long? I think that we had an image problem. People asked what nurses did and knew, and how they could become Members of Parliament when all they did was take temperatures and make beds. They said, "Nurses are not very knowledgeable, so how can they possibly become MPs?" Jane Salvage, who used to edit Nursing Times, wrote the book "The Politics of Nursing", in which she expanded on many theories in relation to outbreaks of feminism in the nurse's home; there was certainly one in my nurse's home. I am proud and pleased that the electorate of Brentford and Isleworth put their trust in me. "Trust me, I'm a nurse," was my slogan, and, of course, they did—and they still do.

With regard to moving nurse education into higher education, my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley mentioned her training. The training used to be like preparing for war most of the time, because nurses never knew what they were going to face on the ward. On night duty, first-year student nurses were left on their own with patients coming back from theatre. That was unsafe and dangerous practice, but such practice did not happen under a Labour Government. Opposition Members should reflect on some aspects of the past.

Academic snobbery about what a nurse's qualifications were worth was conveyed to me when we moved into higher education. I was told by one academic, who was in charge of the geography department, that my registered nurse qualification was not really worth one A-level. I suggested that if he was going to have a heart attack he should have it while I was around, because he would then probably welcome the fact that I was a cardiac nurse and would be unlikely to send for the professor of history to assist him. That measure of academic snobbery is still in existence. There are people who still say, "Why do nurses need diplomas or degrees?", and ask what was wrong with the old-fashioned type of preparation—preparation for duty, vocation, obedience and tolerating aspects of health care that should never have been accepted. I am proud of today's nurses and their nurse educators, who prepare them for practice in a totally different way. Midwifery has always had a different tradition; midwives have been accepted as practitioners in their own right. We might secure a debate on midwifery for another time.

The issues I am discussing are probably to do with the fact that nursing is a predominantly female profession, although I acknowledge that my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston bucked that trend and has made an impressive contribution to nursing. However, nurses are ideal MPs because we are good listeners and communicators, and problem solvers. We are all the things that an honourable Member of Parliament should be. I should say again in this context that we are trusted.

Nurses are also crucial for the future of health in our country. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor commissioned the first report—the Derek Wanless report—on the future trends and needs of health care in our country. Much of that is to do with chronic conditions and a growing population of frail older people who are experiencing such conditions. It is the nursing work force who are taking on that challenge in respect of cancer, chronic diseases, cardiovascular conditions, trauma and paediatrics.

We want to acknowledge the clinical excellence demonstrated by nurses. West Middlesex university hospital is in my constituency; I worked in it for many years, and I would like to thank Yvonne Franks, the director of nursing and midwifery, for helping me to prepare for this debate. Unfortunately, I cannot use all the material that she offered me. I could have taken up the whole morning in explaining the work that many of the leading nurse specialists in my trust are participating in, but I feel that I ought to mention a couple of examples.

We are all familiar with the changing clinical work in relation to heart disease, and rightly so. My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley mentioned the differences of some years ago, such as being told to go home and rest. That is certainly not the case now. I pay tribute to Phillip Eardley, acute coronary syndrome charge nurse, who works in association with Cas Shotter, a cardiology nurse specialist, in the accident and emergency department, leading the management of patients with chest pain. Those nurses prescribe diagnostic tests, implement treatments and deal with the transfer of patients. They decide whether patients are transferred to the Hammersmith hospital for primary angioplasty, and they also teach junior medical staff. That is the job of the advanced practitioner. I pay tribute to them, and apologise that, because of time restraints, I am unable to give examples of other nurses.

The advanced practitioner in the UK is well advanced. We are a model for other countries. Other nursing schools and universities come to the UK to look at how we are practising in that advanced way. However, the advanced practitioner needs continuing education and training. We need to evaluate the real contribution that nurses make. We have made an investment in them which must be looked after. They now have the opportunity for child care provision that they never had in the past, and flexible working and proper rota systems have been put in place. In West Middlesex university hospital, Yvonne Franks is doing pioneering work into matching the appropriate skill of nurses to particular patient need. That seems obvious, but sadly, it is not taking place in all areas of health care.

We have evidence of a better educated work force. The challenge is evaluating the payback from the investment. Professor Anne Marie Rafferty whom I know as a nurse, heads the Florence Nightingale school of nursing and midwifery at King's college, London. I cannot end on a better note than quoting her words:

"Educated and well trained health workers save lives."

That is what the nursing profession in our health service is doing. They are on duty 365 days a year, 24 hours a day, giving care. I know that the House supports them, and I hope that we always demonstrate that with all-party support, and that we continue to recognise the work of people in the nursing profession and the quality of care that they give.

10.27 am

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) on her opening speech in this important debate, to which she contributed a good deal of expertise. I marvel at her commitment—there is hardly a health meeting that I go to in this building to which she does not show up and make a valuable contribution.

I am not an expert, like the hon. Lady, but I have something in my CV that is vaguely relevant. In a gap year, when I was a student, I worked as a nursing assistant in an old-fashioned mental hospital in Maidstone, Kent called Oakwood hospital. I started there with not a day's training and no secondment. I was simply given a white coat and set off, and I ended up on refractory and block wards. There must be few other MPs who have shown people into padded cells, administered electroconvulsive therapy and seen a straitjacket used.

In those days, I was familiar with the division between state-enrolled nurses and state registered nurses—one could tell them apart by their varying epaulettes and colour-coding—and the further division between them and the lower grade of nursing assistant, which I was. As such, I was completely unqualified and untrained, and I muddled through as best I could. We were aware that SRNs were the crème de la crème, who were going somewhere. They would become the charge nurses and, for those who were very fortunate, the matrons. However, my impression was that the training then was not anything like as intensive as it now is and that monitoring of performance was somewhat weak. I was aware at only one stage in my work of being inspected, and that was when the boards of hospital visitors, or whoever they were, trooped through from time to time and took more interest in the state of the floors than in the condition and happiness of the patients. That seemed to be their major and fundamental preoccupation.

In those days, one was aware of the clear demarcation between the nurses, who saw the patients very often, knew a great deal about them and could do much for them, and the doctors, who were of course the experts without whom nobody could move, who none the less saw patients relatively infrequently.

My brief experience of nursing before going off to study philosophy at university was intensely interesting and enjoyable. It was also a good preparation for other career moves. I say that because someone recently described this place as the last Victorian asylum. That may be a little unfair, but this place is full of people talking out loud to no one in particular.

Things have changed radically in nursing. I start on a good note by saying that the Government and the profession are to be congratulated. We have an increased supply of nurses—more than ever before—and we depend less on foreign staff, who ought to be working and providing health services in their own countries. We have increased salaries and improved career paths for nurses and others in the nursing profession. We also have improvements in the quality and variety of nursing education, and the link with higher education is an important boost in status, which the hon. Lady said was much needed and which is firmly to be welcomed. Nursing training also encourages career development and builds on nurses' skills.

I warm to the concepts of nurse practitioners and of nurses being able to prescribe. Those long overdue and necessary reforms will break down the strict divisions that hitherto existed between nurses and doctors and their relevant areas of expertise. If we are to have decent medical care in the community, we need greater qualifications among the nursing profession. If we are to take pressure off the accident and emergency departments by having more minor injury units, we shall need nurses who can deal with a variety of unexpected conditions. If we are to advance the healthy living agenda and have flexible and effective care we will need expert and skilled nurses, and we are getting them stage by stage.

The Government's strategy is essentially correct. I doubt whether anyone would speak against it. The strategy is correct and the profession is to be congratulated on endorsing it. However, it is a long-term strategy, as evidenced by the comments that we remember hearing when we remember our own experiences, and my concern is that it will be blown off course by short-term financial needs, or that it will be cross-grained with other initiatives. I think specifically of payment by results, and the drive to turn every NHS unit, whatever it be, into a financially autonomous, solvent, trading and entrepreneurial unit almost overnight.

The system cannot bear that sort of stress, because it effectively asks organisations to wipe out in one year deficits that have been built up over many years. That is what led to the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) talking about feast and famine in nursing training in relation to recent resource cuts. It was also referred to as stop-go in a briefing that we all received. They are all phrases that will be familiar to the Minister after his Treasury experience. Boom and bust is another. I assume that he is agin it.

It is clear that SHA training budgets are often raided, that they are sometimes underspent, and that they are only notionally ring-fenced. They can therefore become a source of brokerage, top-slicing or centre-saving. Whatever one calls it, the money just goes—especially in those areas that have the biggest problems. It is in those areas with larger deficits that existing staff are most fearful, job security is declining and additional training prospects are worsening. To cite a personal example, the acute trust in my constituency has a substantial deficit. It has announced 200 redundancies, but it has said that nurses will not be made redundant, which is welcome. I should declare an interest. My son's partner, who has trained as a children's nurse, cannot gain employment and is looking for a job outside nursing that will use her considerable talents.

Setting that against the general complaint of the royal colleges and the strategic liaison group about the lack of clinical academic pathways, one can begin to see a problem emerging. They complain about the difficulty of combining the service and the education roles. That can only bring about a reduction in effective mentoring. People's experiences cannot easily be traded in both areas as effectively as they might. They also complained—this point, too, was made by the right hon. Gentleman—about a lack of work force planning and the fact that we have not linked training places to needs, as has happened for the medical profession.

What is happening is not something that could be dressed up in tabloid headlines as a meltdown, collapse or crisis in nursing; however, it is a genuine and serious problem, which can and should be tackled, and which calls into question the coherence of what the Government are doing and the haste with which they are acting. Hon. Members have spoken warmly about the Government's support of the nursing profession and nurse training, but they are in danger, on this issue in particular, of snatching defeat from the jaws of victory.

What is required is a broad view, consistency and sensible pragmatism—all of which I associate with the Minister and elements of the ministerial team. The strategy can be right, and we agree that it is, but if the tactics are wrong we end up with a bit of a mess.

10.36 am

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) on securing this important debate, and I welcome the Minister to his new post.

As we all know—we have all mentioned it—nurses perform an invaluable role. The NHS could not run without the hard work and dedication of its work force. Nurses more than anyone else are on the front line of patient care. However, I suggest to the Minister that there is growing frustration in the nursing profession. That was particularly brought home at the recent rally and lobby of Parliament. Many nurses are questioning what is happening. We all accept that extra money has been put into the NHS and welcome it, but not enough has reached front-line services and nurses increasingly point to the administrative burdens that they must undertake and the fact that the number of managers in trusts has grown faster than nurses' numbers.

One cannot dispute that the number of nurses has increased, and we welcome it, but nurses make the point that not enough of the new money reaches front-line services. They feel they labour under an increasing burden of bureaucracy and political interference from a Government who insist on micro-managing the NHS through targets and red tape. I suggest that a fair number of the current frustrations and concerns are inevitably linked to NHS deficits. I ask the Minister not just to dismiss that point as party political, but to take on board those concerns expressed by nurses, and deal with them in the debate.

Nursing training has been mentioned a few times in the debate so far. The concern is that places on courses are being cut and that clinical placements are being cancelled.

Ann Keen: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in the 1990s nurse training was dramatically reduced, which caused the shortage that we inherited in the late 1990s? Will he at least acknowledge that that is what happened?

Mr. Baron: Yes, there were cutbacks at times. There is no doubt about it. Yet what seems not to be accepted is that over the entirety of that period there were real-terms inflation-beating increases in the budget of the NHS.

By way of illustration of that, and to deal with one of the points that the hon. Member for Crawley made about improvements in cancer provision, the improvements that have been made since 1997 have not, despite all the extra money that has been put into the NHS, broken the trend of decreasing mortality rates that goes back to the early 1980s. Yes, improvement has continued, but despite all the money, there has been no marked improvement on decreasing cancer mortality rates. That is one example of how the money has indeed been provided, but not enough has reached front-line services, because much has been soaked up by the bureaucracy that has been created in the NHS.

Ann Keen rose—

Mr. Baron: May I make some progress? The hon. Lady may want to intervene again later, although I want to leave the Minister some time to respond.

Let me give an example. According to Nursing Standard magazine, half of all the SHAs in England that responded to the survey admitted to cutting training posts, and the average reduction in England as a whole was 10 per cent. That must cause concern, because it means that fewer student nurses will get the practical experience that they need to qualify and the NHS will be poorer for not having fresh talent to replenish an increasingly ageing work force. That is a particular concern given that the RCN's own study has shown that about 100,000 nurses are due to retire in the next five to 10 years. Meanwhile, the Council of Deans and Heads has suggested that the reduction in the number of students who are being commissioned is greater in areas where SHAs report large deficits, so there can be no dispute that deficits are having an impact on training places.

In addition to the cuts imposed by SHAs, there is already a high drop-out rate among trainee nurses, and about one in four students are thought not to be completing their courses. Perhaps the Minister will be kind enough to outline what studies, if any, have been done of nurses' reasons for walking away from training opportunities. I expect that inadequate access to bursaries has something to do with it, but the flexibility and family-friendliness of training hours are also important, because the average age of nursing students is about 29, and many of them have young children. Those problems must be addressed, although difficulties at the NHS student grants unit last year did not help matters.

However, the problems in nursing are not confined to students. Even when nurses do qualify, many find it difficult to get jobs, because NHS trusts are riddled with deficits, as we have heard. The Royal College of Nursing regional director recently claimed that, in the west midlands alone, about 4,000 student nurses who were due to graduate in the next two months will not have jobs to go to. That is symptomatic of the growing problem of graduate unemployment in the NHS as a whole, of which physiotherapists are another example. Indeed, the problem of vacancy freezes seems to be getting much worse. Given that it costs about £100,000 to train a nurse, it is a great waste of public money and a missed opportunity to enhance patient care if nurses do not find work in the NHS soon after graduating.

Vacancy freezes and graduate skills going to waste are one concern, but to return to a point made by the hon. Member for Crawley, it cannot be denied that the nurses who heckled the Secretary of State last month were also worried by the prospect of redundancies. The RCN has estimated that at least 13,000 posts are due to be lost as a result of the financial pressures on the NHS.

Mr. Devine: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the language used is important? If someone is given compulsory redundancy, they know that they have been told that they are going, but I have looked at the figures and I do not see 13,000 redundancies—I see a freeze on vacancies, a reduction in the number of agency nurses and management of the financial problems.

Mr. Baron: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. The problem is that we do not know for sure what the number is. Locally, we are seeing job cuts and people being made redundant, but I agree with him about the validity of the 13,000 figure. I have not checked that figure, but have the Government come up with figures that reflect the true state of affairs? At the moment, nobody knows, and all we hear are headline figures for job cuts. Broadly speaking, therefore, I agree with the hon. Gentleman and I ask the Minister to give us a better estimate, rather than just relying on the RCN figure.

When the scale of the deficits crisis did become known—this is where I will take the Government to task—the Government argued that job losses in NHS trusts and acute hospital settings were broadly justified by the shift in emphasis towards care in the community. However, perhaps the Minister would care to explain how—taking the RCN figure—13,000 job losses can be made up when there 4,000 fewer full-time equivalent district nurses in the NHS than there were in 1997, with a 3 per cent. fall last year alone? Those weaknesses in primary care must be addressed before acute nursing posts are cut.

The Government White Paper "Our health, our care, our say" argues for transferring NHS activity from acute to primary care. There is much in the White Paper to be commended, but the Government will not be able to make good their pledge unless they develop capacity in the community, and at the moment that is not happening. Instead, the number of district nurses is decreasing; there is a shortage of school nurses; and birth centres and community hospitals are closing. Capacity is being shut down without any proper assessment of whether it is required. I suggest to the Minister that that could be storing up problems for the future and I would appreciate his response on that point.

Those problems illustrate nurses' concerns about the security and status of their profession within the NHS. The bottom line seems to be that many nurses are still leaving the profession because their expertise and hard work are not being respected. An RCN survey published last year showed that more than a quarter of nurses' time was spent on clerical or administrative duties. Half of all nurses who left the NHS in the previous year cited stress and the work load as reasons for changing job, and those problems are likely to become more acute as the work force contracts. Is it any wonder that 30 per cent. of all respondents to a recent RCN survey—up from 27 per cent. in 2003—said that they would leave their employer within the next two years? That is the RCN's own survey.

Conservative Members have long called for a different approach—one that would reverse the recent rapid growth in the number of managers and administrators and force politicians to withdraw from the day-to-day running of the health service. We would reduce the need for central control and leave hard-working nurses to get on with the job. In short, we would seek the re-emergence of nursing as a respected and largely autonomous health care profession.

Nurses deserve our support, but the crisis in NHS finances has placed burdens on staff. We can do a great deal to promote nursing in the medium and long term, but the immediate task is to assess the damage caused by the consequences of deficits and to address the concerns of nurses themselves.

10.47 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Ivan Lewis): It is always a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Cook. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) on securing this Adjournment debate and on the passionate and knowledgeable way in which she described the development of nursing over a relatively short period. She described experiences that she had when she was a front-line nurse in the national health service and some of the challenges and difficulties that nurses faced. She also described the sense of reward that she got from being a nurse and recognised how significantly things have changed in recent times.

It was good to hear it highlighted that it is the Labour party that, since 1997, has welcomed the election of not only my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley, but my hon. Friends the Members for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen), for East Lothian (Anne Moffat) and for Livingston (Mr. Devine)—all serving nurses who have been elected to the House of Commons. That is a step forward for democracy. When my hon. Friends the Members for Crawley and for Brentford and Isleworth were elected, it was the first time in history that nurses had been elected to Parliament. I am very proud that all of them are Labour Members of Parliament. They are some of the best colleagues in the parliamentary Labour party, as I am sure everyone agrees.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) always turns up to make a contribution. However much he goes on about my talents as a Minister, I am not in a position to make announcements today on additional resources for midwifery bursaries, but I take on board the general concern that he expressed about retention of midwives, particularly on some courses. What are the obstacles getting in people's way and what issues do I need to address in my new role to deal with that?

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) made a very important contribution to the debate. I think that the last time we both participated in a debate in Westminster Hall, we were discussing cash machines and access to cash. This is a slightly different subject—such is the nature of government. He referred to health care assistants and secondment programmes. As I understand it, that is very much left to local discretion, depending on the market and on supply and demand. However, I am willing to look into secondment programmes for health care assistants—that specific opportunity to get into nursing—and into what is happening and what we want to happen.

My right hon. Friend also drew attention to the important role that Oxford Brookes university plays. It is a centre of excellence for social and health care and has been for some time, offering significant training opportunities. He also referred to the sad news that some of his constituents will receive today at John Radcliffe hospital. Although I cannot comment on the specific circumstances, I am sure that he will be making very strong representations about the decisions made by the hospital management, particularly in the context of any impact on patient care, and that he will maintain a dialogue with members of the ministerial team on those issues.

My right hon. Friend and others talked about cuts in training in certain areas and asked what the pattern was. We should begin by saying that there has been a massive increase in the number of training places made available since the Labour Government came to power. As a consequence, there is a massive number of new entrants into nursing. The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) was good enough to acknowledge that. However, in every public service there is a tendency to regard the training budget as the first to go—the soft target—and as former Minister with responsibility for skills, I am highly aware of that. We need to monitor the impact of decisions on training budgets, and we will do that, but it would be wrong to use words such as crisis and decline; we have to adopt a measured approach and should always look at the issues in context.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth talked from personal experience about the realities of nursing in the past. What she said about academic snobbery is absolutely true of the way that this country treats vocational education and training generally. Frankly, if we are to be successful in our public service ambitions and in the economic challenges that we face, we have to change that almost uniquely English snobbish approach to vocational education and training—I can feel myself making one of my speeches as a former Minister with responsibility for young people and adult skills. That is a real problem that is endemic in the culture of this country, and we have to attack it in every way that we can.

My hon. Friend also referred to the Chancellor's role in ensuring unprecedented levels of investment in the national health service, year on year. Frankly, it was an act of political leadership for him to tell people not long ago that increasing national insurance by 1 per cent. was merited and morally right if we wanted the kind of national health service that this country deserves. What was interesting about that decision and that leadership is that—if we remember the political climate at the time and the electoral consequences of that decision—people actually endorsed it. It was right to be honest and to say that to achieve the growth in NHS investment required, difficult decisions would be necessary. People in this country cherish and value the national health service and believe that there is nothing more important than investing in it and ensuring that it continues to be something that we can be proud of in any international context.

Dr. Pugh: The Minister is multi-talented. He referred to his time at the Department for Education and Skills, so he will be aware of the need to ensure that training places fit the needs of industry and commerce. In nursing, there is a question whether the commissioning of places actually reflects hospital needs. That has not been touched on so far; will the Minister do so?

Mr. Lewis: It is common sense to look into that and make sure that the content of training reflects the needs of the health service, not just now but in future. That links to the point that the hon. Gentleman made about primary and community care, which I shall address in a moment.

My hon. Friends the Members for Brentford and Isleworth and for Crawley talked about the heroes and heroines who work on the front line of our national health service every day, making a difference to the quality of people's lives, and indeed saving lives, and it is important to mention them in an abstract, general debate such as this. We cannot possibly mention them all today. However, for family reasons, I have recently experienced what they do, so I know that not only their expertise and specialist knowledge, but their sensitivity and compassion make a tremendous difference when a person has health difficulties. We are very fortunate with the quality and calibre of the people who nurse on the front line in this country.

The hon. Member for Southport described this place as the last Victorian asylum, and most of us would agree, although inmates—at least some of them—are allowed home at weekends. The hon. Gentleman was good enough to acknowledge the Government's and the profession's success in work force development in the context of nursing. He said that it would be disingenuous not to welcome the long-term strategy, but expressed concerns about what is happening now and how that might undermine it. I certainly regard one of my responsibilities as keeping a close eye on ensuring that the challenges that we face do not end up undermining that long-term strategy, which, as the hon. Gentleman said, enjoys a tremendous amount of consensus.

I thank the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) for welcoming me to my new position. That is probably where we part company; I do not think that we shall agree on much else. It is difficult for Labour Members to hear Conservative spokespeople talking about financial and resourcing difficulties in the national health service. It sticks in the throat a little, not because of naked, tribal party politics, but because of the real-life history of the national health service between 1979 and 1997.

There were real-terms cuts, a dramatic decline in morale and a belief that people who worked in public services were leaching the public purse rather than making a massive contribution to the well-being of this country. The criticisms and challenges from the Conservative party do not have the same credibility and legitimacy as genuine concerns expressed by trade unions, members of the professional bodies and Labour Members of Parliament. As a Government, we have been willing to match rhetoric, passion and a belief in the health service with hard, real additional resources—and reform and modernisation—to recognise the needs of patient care in the 21st century.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the Government's micro-managing the NHS and so on. Actually, under the NHS reforms, we have been devolving more and more responsibility and power to the front line. Equally, I do not believe that we should take politics entirely out of the national health service; in my view, it is one of the great dividing lines of British politics. No wonder the Conservative party wants to take politics out of the national health service.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lewis: I cannot give way, as I do not have enough time. The hon. Gentleman mentioned micro-managing the national health service. When we say to trusts and managers, "You have deficits, and it is about time you brought them under control. You have to make difficult decisions. We cannot allow the situation to go on because it destabilises the national health service," we get criticised. We leave people to make some of those difficult choices at a local level in local circumstances.

We shall take no lessons on the national health service from the Conservative party. I shall listen to constructive suggestions, comments and even criticisms. However, to pretend that the NHS is in some kind of meltdown or crisis is disingenuous and dishonest from a party that starved the service of resources and demoralised it.

The hon. Gentleman says that there has been a decrease in the number of primary care and community care nurses. I shall correct that for the record. The number of nurses in primary and community care in this country has increased by 37 per cent. since 1997.

The health service is in a good position. There are daily challenges; demography itself means that we face an ever-growing elderly population with acute health needs. However, we can be proud—

Frank Cook (in the Chair): Order. We must turn our attention to the next debate.

Animal Welfare

11 am

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): It is a pleasure to lead this debate under your chairmanship, Mr. Cook. I am on the Opposition side of the Chamber because of the defects of this room: only from here can one look straight into the eyes of the Minister to assess the reaction to the comments that one has made. The possibility of my having defected is roughly equivalent to that of Lord Adonis making warm and complimentary comments about community comprehensives.

I am glad to have secured this debate. Animal welfare is perhaps my highest personal political priority, and indeed this Government have a good track record on it in the legislation, regulation and changes that they have introduced since 1997. Nevertheless, there is more to be done in respect of laboratory animals and especially animal husbandry, which is at the core of today's debate.

The Government's position on the common agricultural policy is rightly to move away from direct payments to farmers, which reward them for production, towards setting incentives for the delivery of public goods. England is to be congratulated as the only one of the four devolved regions to have moved immediately to a system of decoupled payments to farmers under pillar one of the common agricultural policy, but it is difficult to reconcile that position with the proposals in the draft England rural development programme, which aims to deliver public goods, but in which the ability to make payments for better animal welfare has not been utilised.

The Government say repeatedly that the United Kingdom is the leading country in Europe on animal welfare, and I go along with that view to a considerable extent. If that is the case, however, the ERDP ought to present an opportunity to demonstrate that leading position in Government policy, and to provide further incentives to continue to improve welfare standards.

Let me review the background to opportunities for RDPs. New rural assistance measures were agreed by the European Union in June last year under regulation 1698. There are six elements in axis 1—membership of food quality schemes, food quality promotion, training, farm advisory services, investment in agricultural holdings and meeting Community animal welfare standards—and one in axis 2: payment for higher animal welfare standards. Under the European regulation, member state Governments can include those seven measures in their RDPs.

The first ever European animal welfare strategy was agreed by Farming Ministers as recently as January this year. It set down, for the first time, how the EU believes animal welfare should develop in the 2007-13 period, and the goals for the Commission and Farming Ministers. The strategy sets five areas of action, including updating minimum standards for animal welfare, introducing animal welfare indicators so we can measure progress and better informing animal keepers and handlers of current standards.

At the UK level, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs set itself two public service agreement targets on animal welfare: PSA 5, to deliver a more competitive and sustainable farming industry, and PSA 9, to improve the health and welfare of kept animals. I strongly support both those targets. Additionally, strategic indicators relating to animal welfare are being developed in the DEFRA animal health and welfare plan and in the Curry commission plans. In other words, there is an overarching commitment at the European and domestic levels to drive forward improved animal welfare standards, and of course I welcome that.

So what features in the draft ERDP, which is currently out to consultation? It includes only one reference to improving animal welfare, and that one, which deals with training, has existed under pillar two opportunities since 1999. I am sad to say that DEFRA has apparently ignored measures central to the theme of making agriculture more competitive, which would provide crucial links with other opportunities while being measurable and providing value for money, which are both important characteristics.

There appears to be a manifest misunderstanding of animal welfare and what seeking improved standards can achieve, as there is no joined-up thinking between the animal welfare part of DEFRA and the team responsible for drawing up the ERDP, whose expertise appears to be in environmental measures only. Animal welfare has been ignored, even in areas where it could be easily incorporated. For instance, paragraph 47 of the draft lists

"innovation for marketing of high value products"

as a priority, but it does not list any scheme or incentive to achieve that priority for animal welfare. That could simply be rectified by including the words "and those promoting higher welfare standards". I hope that the Minister will undertake to consider that point with a view to rectification or explain why DEFRA has decided to ignore almost all the measures available to improve animal welfare standards in that regard, in a misunderstanding of what improved animal welfare can deliver and a failure to match up with its own public service agreement targets.

Of course, we need to measure animal welfare objectively and assess outcomes before they can feature effectively in the ERDP. Measurable indicators and outcomes for animal welfare do exist. The EU is funding a €5 million academic project involving centres from the member states, including those in Scotland, Wales and England, to establish single indicators to measure good welfare, which will report in 2009 and form the basis of future EU legislation. It is an integral part of the Commission's action plan.

Indicators have been drawn up by Bristol university for pigs, cattle and laying hens and they are already used on Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals freedom food farms to assess welfare. I contend that objective measures exist that could be used to measure animal welfare improvements, ensure value for money and provide a goal-oriented approach. We are told that England is a continental leader for animal welfare, so let us see how the draft ERDP measures up against the RDPs of other countries.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend give way?

David Taylor: I am happy to give way to a fellow member of the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

Mr. Drew: It is a pleasure to intervene on my hon. Friend. Does he agree that part of the problem is that at the time of the last European budget round, every country, including the UK, made some of the cuts from rural payments and at the expense of some of the changes that we need to see in the rural economy? Is it not right that the Government should reconsider those cuts and lead the charge to say that if the CAP means anything, it should mean a different CAP that will invest in the rural economy rather than on production subsidies?

David Taylor: I agree. When DEFRA is seeking cuts and reallocating resources, it tends to concentrate too heavily on rural payments—a point that I shall refer to later.

I was considering how the ERDP measures up against other RDPs. With devolution, probably more than 50 RDPs will be drawn up in the EU. Most are still in consultation, but some have been announced and show how innovation can help. The Scottish RDP has three budget lines for encouraging animal welfare, including membership of an assurance scheme, completing a veterinary health plan and training. The response to those measures has been extremely positive, and they form the second most popular of all incentives given under the development plan.

The existing Welsh RDP has animal welfare measures such as payments to reduce stocking levels, membership of an assurance scheme, improving knowledge of animal welfare through training and investing through the farm improvement grant to improve welfare standards in holdings. Finally, it has measures to improve the marketing of farm products that adhere to minimum animal welfare standards. The consultation on the Welsh RDP highlights the animal welfare pyramid scheme and the intention to give incentives to farmers who enter into agreements committing to higher welfare standards than the baseline ones under agri-environmental schemes.

Finally, to deal with our third fellow country, the Northern Ireland draft plan has three measures for animal welfare, including marketing and processing grants and grants to change over to higher standards of animal welfare. In Germany, the RDP provides intensive grants for investment costs in nine sectors: laying hens, turkeys, pigs, beef and dairy cattle, broilers, suckler cows, goats and sheep—this sounds like a farming report—providing that higher welfare standards are met. Those standards include not exceeding stocking densities of 25 kg per square metre for broiler chickens, as opposed to the proposed 38 kg per square metre under the draft directive.

Another example is Austria, which recently submitted its RDP for agreement with the Commission and highlighted a number of ways to promote innovation and the marketing of higher welfare products. As a final exemplar, the RDP budget in France has rewarded farmers who have produced a higher welfare standard. The animal welfare measures that have been used have again included reducing stocking density, enlarging pig stalls, reducing live transport times and giving access to green pastures. Incidentally, all those measures have proved successful and—this is an important characteristic—cross over into promoting French produce.

I feel that the ERDP as drafted is unimaginative in comparison with many others in Europe and the UK, and that it risks putting English farmers at a competitive disadvantage. We would expect the draft ERDP to align closely with DEFRA strategy, would we not? So let us just see whether it does. One of the measures in the DEFRA animal welfare strategy is higher animal welfare incentives. The strategic policy driver is the sustainable food strategy PSA 9. What action is mentioned in the ERDP? None. The second of the four measures is a more competitive farming sector, as set out in the sustainable food strategy PSA 5. How much reference is there in the ERDP? None. The third of the four measures is sustainable farming, including animal health and welfare, which is again a DEFRA strategic priority, addressed in PSA 5. What reference is made in the ERDP? None. Fourthly, encouraging innovative approaches to farming, such as knowledge transfer, skills training and so on is part of the UK sustainable development strategy, in article 201. What ERDP action is there? Not none, but it is unclear whether any will be animal welfare specific. The ERDP as drafted is a poor match with the strategic drivers for animal welfare policy.

What other drivers are there? The ERDP has no measures for supporting animal welfare, yet there are many other drivers for improved standards that have economic implications for farmers. Many directives have started to phase out certain intensive methods of farming, such as 1999/74 and 2001/88, which phase out the battery cage system and sow stall respectively, and directive 1997/2, whose prohibition of the veal crate system is finally fully operational in member states. It is important that we measure and ensure cost-effectiveness. All those changes have economic implications for farmers. They have all been costed, but the legislative drivers are currently missing from the consultation.

I conclude with the tightness of the budget, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) referred. For the ERDP, the provisional figures show that £1.48 billion of payments are committed for 2007-13, and that £1.8 billion is available. There is therefore still some scope, despite a cut of 22 per cent. for the pillar 2 budget, as announced and agreed in December 2005, which means that some €19 billion will not be available. There is a tight budget, but there are still some incentives that have win-win consequences for more than one issue, and which deliver measurable goals against the national agricultural strategy.

There is no section in the ERDP that shows how the measures will have more than one positive consequence. I fear that no imaginative thinking has gone into establishing how that could occur. Naturally, any policy suggestions must be carefully costed if they are to be proposed as effective measures. The RSPCA has provided costed figures for four measures that have been proposed as indices for inclusion in the ERDP. I will only list those indices, and not indicate the nature of the costings. They are as follows: first, the animal health plan; secondly, training for stockmanship; thirdly, conversion of slatted floors to solid; and fourthly, improved forage for pigs. So there are clear economic data on which to base policy.

Do the public care? EU citizens regard animal welfare as an important part of rural development responsibilities. A recent survey showed that 88 per cent. of the public regard animal welfare as a priority issue of funding for RDPs. In the UK, protecting animal welfare was seen as the most important issue for the public under the RDP. Farmers also want the measures. They are not being dragged into this unwillingly. The review of the Welsh RDP scheme, Tir Mynydd, found that schemes concerning two of the three animal welfare objectives—stocking density and assurance—had the highest numbers of uptake of the seven options available. That is a small example to show that farmers are seeking such measures, and will warmly sign up to them.

What will the Minister say in a moment or two? Of course, he might now be tempted to say, "Well sit down and let me say it." He will probably argue that England already has excellent standards of animal welfare—I have not seen his civil service brief lying on a photocopier on an upper floor—and that further improvements will be delivered by the market. He may claim that English farmers already exceed EU baseline standards. In anticipation of those remarks, I ask him to address three key points. First, I ask the Minister, who has a highly urban seat—I know that he will get out a lot from now on—what is the evidence that farmers exceed baseline standards? Secondly, does he agree that there is a significant risk that the ERDP as drafted will disadvantage English farmers? Finally, does he agree that it is important that policy should continue to develop under his stewardship, with his talents, perception and energy, to demonstrate a commitment to higher welfare standards to join the pantheon of successes that we have proudly witnessed under this Government in the past nine years?

11.16 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Barry Gardiner): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) on securing this debate, which is timely given the end of the consultation and the importance of animal welfare to the Government and all hon. Members present.

I am encouraged that our consultation on the priorities for the next rural development programme in England, which closed on Monday, has provoked a debate about the best way to use the funding available to tackle the challenges facing rural communities in England. In addition to the feedback that we have received from regional events during the consultation, I understand that at the last count we had received about 150 written submissions. Of course, we will carefully analyse those responses, and we will make our decision on the priorities for the next programme in the light of the comments received and my hon. Friend's remarks today.

In the consultation, we set out a number of key principles for the use of rural development funding.

What I want to get across today is that one of the most important of those principles is that programme funding should demonstrably add value. I am sure that the budget available for the next programme will be limited, as budgets always are, so we must be aware of the need to spend money where it will have maximum impact.

We are still not clear exactly how much will be allocated to the UK, and we have yet to take decisions on what use to make of voluntary modulation and associated match funding. My hon. Friends the Members for North-West Leicestershire and for Stroud (Mr. Drew) both asked about the December budget. I have received the RSPCA briefing on that issue, which I know other hon. Members have also received, but it does not take into account the fact that the budget is to be supplemented by compulsory modulation and the EU budget for rural development in the EU15. Because of that supplement, which must be co-financed by member states, we expect that the amount of EU funding available for the next RDP in England will be slightly higher than for current programmes. I want to correct any misunderstanding on that situation, because the briefing was perhaps misleading in that respect, although not intentionally, I am sure.

The key point to stress is that we acknowledge that December was the occasion for cutting a deal and, as my hon. Friends suggested, whenever a deal is cut there are compromises to be made, but we must not lose sight of the great victory that we won then: the review of the common agricultural policy in 2008 and all that that will mean for the pattern of spending in rural communities that we have piloted. We are establishing the approach and we are at the forefront in Europe in trying to pull money away from pillar 1 and into pillar 2 precisely on the areas of spending that we have all said are so important.

As my hon. Friends have highlighted, the framework for the next programme—the rural development regulation—is broadly drawn, allowing for a wide range of activities. That flexibility recognises that rural development needs vary across the EU. New member states may need to focus the available funding on achieving basic community standards, including those on animal welfare, but that may not represent the best value for money in other member states.

I take up the challenge that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire laid down in his three final points. I am happy to write to him on the first point: what evidence there is that farmers exceed baseline compulsory legal minimum standards of animal welfare in England. In my discussions with ministerial colleagues in the Department who have responsibility specifically for animal welfare, I was assured that they are confident that many farmers in England achieve higher—in some cases substantially higher—standards of animal welfare.

David Taylor: I do not want to condense the Minister's reply, but may I ask whether he acknowledges that in our fellow countries of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland those higher-than-baseline standards exist, but those countries have also found it possible within their own draft suggestions to incorporate animal welfare, which is incredibly difficult to value as a public good? I acknowledge that that is the case.

Barry Gardiner: My hon. Friend leads me on to my next point. I recognise another point that was made clearly in the RSPCA briefing: in the programmes put forward in Scotland and Wales there are variations in emphasis. I stress that I believe that they are variations in emphasis and, in some cases, variations in decision. That is what I would seek to explain.

One should not be surprised—certainly not in this Chamber—that the outcome of devolution is that each part of the United Kingdom determines its own priorities and takes account of the evidence of need, farming practices and environmental circumstances that is specific to them. Our countries are different and our rural development programmes will be different. Exactly how we use the new programmes to support animal health and welfare objectives is, of course, one of the areas where there may be a divergence, not because we have a different view of the importance of the objective, but because we may have different ways of reaching it.

As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud in the House last week, we recognise the importance of good animal health and welfare standards in the farming industry, but we are confident that farmers in England achieve animal welfare standards that meet and sometimes exceed the minimum legal requirements. We therefore want to target the resources that we have not towards existing good practice, but on new ways of making agriculture more competitive and sustainable, through a focus on skills and innovation. In line with that approach, we proposed that we could use funding—

David Taylor: Will the Minister give way?

Barry Gardiner: I shall do so in a minute. If my hon. Friend allows me to finish the point, he may find that it pre-empts him.

We proposed that we could use funding available under the next programme to provide increased opportunities for training and knowledge transfer aimed specifically at improving animal health and welfare standards. This is one area where we are clear that we want to use the funding that we have under the programme to improve good practice.

Mr. Drew: After foot and mouth, specific moneys were put in to do the very things that the Minister is speaking about. Will he give a guarantee that there will be moneys in the new budgets that will do the sort of things that that foot and mouth money was supposedly there to do?

Barry Gardiner: It would be difficult to do that within the parameters of this debate, but I shall certainly write to my hon. Friend and elaborate on his point.

I think we all agree that we face major environmental challenges, such as protecting and enhancing biodiversity, protecting the quality of our waterways and mitigating the effects of climate change. The agri-environment schemes have a proven track record, but they must cover a greater proportion of farmland if we are to meet those future challenges. Aside from rural development programme funding, there are no alternative sources of funds available in sufficient quantity to meet those major challenges. Our focus for the next programme is therefore to sustain our commitment to environmental stewardship as a scheme that is open to all farmers.

My hon. Friends will recognise that the environmental stewardship programme and the funding that it will make available will have an impact on stocking levels—a point that my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire said was specifically mentioned in other countries' programmes. The fact that that may not be specifically mentioned here does not imply that it will not be achieved.

We decided to focus on those key environmental challenges. An independent report conducted for DEFRA in 2004 found that the cost of a national animal welfare scheme was likely to be high due to various factors, such as diversity among livestock farmers, variability of welfare incidents and the need for assessment and monitoring. We decided not to divert our rural development funding away from that core environmental priority. However, we recognise that there are potential links between particular agri-environment measures such as stocking densities and animal welfare outcomes. Indeed, colleagues referred to the proposal made by the Welsh Assembly in its consultation to consider animal welfare issues in its forthcoming review of agri-environment schemes.

In England in 2007-08, we will review progress under environmental stewardship. The RSPCA has considered how incentives for animal welfare could be provided under the rural development programme. It has done so in its report, "Into the fold", and that work will provide valuable input to our thinking, but to return to where I began, we must be able to demonstrate the added value of what we are spending. I am sure that colleagues will recognise that not only we, but the EU as a whole, have a significant amount of work to do on animal welfare and we must work together to take that forward.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire referred to the support provided under farm assurance schemes. Farmers who participate in food quality schemes generally do so either with a view to obtaining a price premium, when their participation is rewarded through the market, or because they need to do so to sell to a specific market, as is often the case with baseline assurance schemes and which is also rewarded through the market. The RSPCA's freedom food scheme is an assurance scheme that promotes high animal welfare standards and is a good example of what can be achieved without Government intervention. Given that fact and the high proportion of farmers who already belong to assurance schemes, we believe that relatively little additional public benefit would be gained from supporting such schemes financially through the programme for England. That has been our thinking. It is not that we think the schemes are not valuable ways of achieving animal welfare outcomes, but that we think we should put our money where it will achieve added value and where there is a market failure. In this case, we do not believe that to be so.

Encouraging innovation aimed at developing new markets and new value-added products is one way of helping to make our farming industry more competitive. That could include support for marketing on the basis of higher animal welfare standards, either alone or in combination with other innovative ways of improving farm competitiveness. We have proposed that support for such innovation could be an area of focus for the next programme.

I have been speaking about animal welfare in the context of the rural development programme, but I want to remind colleagues of the wider picture in England on animal health and welfare issues, which we feel is important, and our approach to addressing those issues. We are working in partnership with industry to promote wider use of a proactive approach to health planning on farms, including management of livestock diseases that have welfare implications. We are doing that by supporting a culture change in the industry with consistent messaging and better communication about the benefits of a risk management-based approach at farm level. Our approach supports greater use of the farm health and welfare plans, to which the codes of recommendations for the welfare of livestock refer.

My hon. Friend said that the proposals for the next programme are a missed opportunity as they focus on limited traditional areas and do not look widely enough at Government objectives—

Community Hospitals

2.30 pm

John Bercow (in the Chair): I shall judge the debate by the Annunciator, the clock on which is accurate, unlike the one ahead of me.

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Bercow, for this opportunity to raise the issue of community hospitals. First, I would like to pay tribute to workers in the national health service, especially those who are involved in patient care. I am sure that anyone who has been directly involved personally or through a family member will wish to join in that tribute to NHS workers.

A local journalist asked me on the telephone, "Will this be your usual Haslar speech, Peter?" I said that it would not be my usual Haslar speech, but I would of course be referring to Haslar, specifically the Royal hospital Haslar, which I would claim has become one of the best known hospitals in Parliament.

The background is that the Royal Naval hospital Haslar, which had become the only hospital within the armed forces, became the Royal hospital Haslar. It was, in effect, operating as a second district general hospital in the Gosport area when in 1998, to everyone's astonishment, it was announced that it would close not earlier than 2000. That caused serious problems in the armed forces. They studied various sites where they might locate a hospital and eventually settled, not with great enthusiasm, on the Selly Oak site in Birmingham. They were cheered by the fact that £200 million would be spent on an all new, all-singing and dancing centre that would provide them with messing, sports and other facilities in Birmingham. Unfortunately, however, that project was cancelled. Within the armed forces now, there are serious shortages in most of the important faculties. I shall return to the issue of armed services medicine later in my speech.

The reaction in the south Hampshire area to the closure was one of anger and disbelief. I shall not recount all the facts, as they are very much on the parliamentary record, but there was an unprecedented march of some 22,000 people demonstrating against the closure of the hospital. We demonstrated in every way we could think of to catch the public eye. We had "Save Haslar" in lights photographed from a helicopter, we had a relay taking a petition to Downing street, we had demonstrations outside Downing street, and we had many debates in Parliament. After much pressure was applied, a deal was cobbled together with the health authorities whereby Haslar would indeed be saved and would continue to be used for local medical facilities and for the armed forces as well.

Unfortunately, in what I regard as a shameful chapter in the history of health care in south Hampshire, the primary care trust went back on the agreement. It "consulted". Whenever one uses that word in connection with the NHS, one has to put it in inverted commas, because the result of a consultation is usually well known before the consultation takes place. There was local discussion, aided by the consultation, of whether Haslar or Gosport War Memorial hospital should continue as the local community hospital. The votes for Haslar were overwhelming, but at a meeting in a church in Fareham, the PCT unanimously voted against popular wishes and decided to close Haslar and continue the Gosport War Memorial hospital, on the basis of what I have to say was some very unreliable information on matters such as costings, car parking and so on.

Later, I chaired a packed meeting in St. Mary's church, Alverstoke, in Gosport. I believe that 800 people were present, with many standing at the back of the church. We took a vote on whether we wished Haslar or Gosport War Memorial hospital to continue. To my disbelief, every single hand went up in favour of Haslar. I remember asking, "Is there no one here who wishes to say anything in favour of the primary care trust's proposals?" but not a single soul supported the PCT.

We went through the statutory procedure. Hampshire county council's overview and scrutiny committee referred the matter to the Minister for reference to the Independent Reconfiguration Panel. I went to see the Minister, who turned down reference to the IRP. The Minister's veto means that Gosport is the only place in the whole of the United Kingdom that the IRP cannot investigate. It has widened its brief, but the only place in which it cannot take an interest is Gosport.

So there we stand. The Royal hospital Haslar is to have its Ministry of Defence support withdrawn with effect from 31 March 2007. Arrangements are in hand for the local hospitals trust to take over responsibility for the hospital until summer 2009, when the private finance initiative bid at Queen Alexandra hospital will be completed, and the plan is that Haslar will close thereafter. However, the plan was that Haslar would close in 2000; it is now 2006 and Haslar is still there.

I turn now to the general picture in the national health service as it relates to hospitals. Spending has increased—it has almost doubled—from £40 billion to £76 billion, but most of that increase has gone on salaries, drugs and compensation, and there has been a 66 per cent. increase in the number of managers. There have been various problems: we all know, for example, that it is much easier to admit someone to a district general hospital than to transfer them out of one, particularly because the Government, in their wisdom, have changed the standards for nursing homes and required them to widen their doors, raise their ceilings, put in en-suite bathrooms and so on. As a result many nursing homes have closed, and the loss of nursing home places has made it difficult to get people out of district general hospitals and into nursing homes. The Government have therefore resorted to the rather shabby process of fining councils that do not have enough nursing home places. Hampshire county council, to give one example, has had to build places in nursing homes.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Although I do not agree with all the hon. Gentleman's preliminary comments, does he agree that one of the problems is that the market has, in a sense, been created the wrong way round? It does not give PCTs sufficient powers or resources and does not allow them to be big enough to be comparable in power to acute hospitals. Where acute hospital trusts have had problems, they have, in their enfeebled position, transferred financial pressures into areas over which they have more control, such as community hospitals. Perhaps the Government have now addressed that by allowing larger PCTs to emerge, similar to the one that has always been present in North-West Leicestershire, which is more comparable to the acute hospitals in the area. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

[David Taylor]

Peter Viggers: I do agree. PCTs have been required to pay so much of their budget to hospital trusts that it has been difficult for them to develop the community facilities that are needed.

I would describe some of the difficulties in the national health service as tactical problems, which derive from the Government's obsession with micro-management. Let me give three examples of that micro-management in the setting of targets. A cancer specialist was sitting in her consultation room, when a manager burst in and said, "You must see the woman in the waiting room immediately." The cancer specialist said, "I cannot possibly see her. She hasn't been referred to me by a GP. I haven't got her notes. She has not been given any tests. It would be absolutely pointless for me to see her." The manager said, "You must see her immediately. She's been booked in. Every minute that she sits there runs against our averages. You must see her now." I can vouch for the truth of that story because I am married to the doctor in question.

I can also vouch for the truth of my second example, although I will spare the blushes of the person involved. I went to see a hospital manager, who told me, "I know, Mr. Viggers, that you have not received the service that you need from this hospital group, but I can assure you that the situation will change. We have doubled the size of our complaints department and put three new people in the public relations department, so I am sure that you will get a much better service in future." People simply do not understand.

I can vouch for the truth of the third example, as well. An accident and emergency unit had to meet its targets and set a period in which to do so. For weeks in advance and for weeks afterwards, there was distortion and difficulty and the unit was all over the place, but it met its targets during the relevant period. The important thing, however, is not meeting the target, but giving a good service.

Let me also give an example of the manner in which the Government have messed around with primary care trusts. In my area, we had Gosport primary care trust, Fareham primary care trust and East Hampshire primary care trust. Then Fareham and Gosport were merged. Then, in an incredible move, it was decided that the two primary care trusts should share management facilities with another primary care trust. Then both were merged with East Hampshire. Now there is to be a merger for the whole of Hampshire. That is very bad management.

I also have serious reservations about the PFI process. I was in the Treasury as a Parliamentary Private Secretary many years ago when the PFI process was first thought up. The point then was to bring private sector skills into the public sector. Now, however, the Government use the PFI process to get borrowing off balance sheet. It is a notable fact that about £2 of borrowing is off balance sheet compared with every £1 on balance sheet. That is very worrying.

Another point is that the contractor who takes the risk under a PFI scheme is in the private sector—he is there to make money, not to lose money. Therefore, in assessing the risk over the 30 years or whatever the period is, he has to assume the worst from his point of view. Almost by definition, that means that the price will be at the higher rather than the lower end of the range. It would take a great deal of skill to make up for that higher price.

David Taylor: Hearing "PFI" triggers in me a sort of Pavlovian response. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, despite all the wonderful things that the present Government have done in the NHS in the last nine years—I mean that seriously—the PFI is a blemish on that record? It is prohibitive in cost, flawed in concept and intolerable in consequence for taxpayers and the patients and staff in the NHS. More traditional and conventional forms of financing would have avoided some of the difficulties that the hon. Gentleman is illustrating so effectively.

Peter Viggers: Although I am spiritually in tune with some of the criticism made by the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that the PFI inevitably has some disadvantages. I remember attending a meeting addressed by Sir John Bourn, the head of the National Audit Office. He pointed out that contractors who had undertaken PFI arrangements over the past 30 years had done so before the invention and use of the MRI scanner, which blew all the estimates sideways. None of us knows how medical technology will evolve in the next 30 years, so it is impossible to take a clear and firm view about the next 30 years. There is much to be said for PFI schemes if they are properly administered, but they need to be reviewed every five years or so.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that if cottage hospitals such as Swaffham and Thetford in my constituency are to continue their excellent work, Government funding must take into account their position in relation to county hospitals? In Norfolk, the Queen Elizabeth hospital in King's Lynn, the Norfolk and Norwich hospital and others used by constituents in my area face a shortfall in funding. That has a profound effect on the services that they deliver and in turn puts more pressure on the cottage hospitals that serve the same community.

Peter Viggers: My hon. Friend is an assiduous campaigner on behalf of his local hospitals and he makes a fair point on behalf of his constituents, for which I thank him.

On a strategic basis, because there will always be unlimited demand for medical care, a mechanism is needed to govern its use. The present Government will never be able to get that right: their commitment is to central control, including central control of spending, which will always hamper them. The Government ranks are notably short of business skills and experience and notably full of those who have only spent rather than ever earned money. Conservative principles will be to seek harmonious arrangements with the national health service and an integration of the private sector. We need to choose good managers and then to trust them.

As it is, we have a cash crisis. The health services in Hampshire overspent by £80 million in the year before the election, and we are told by Sir Ian Carruthers that after adjustments they will need to recover some £160 million, preferably during the current year. That leads to intolerable pressures and the closure of hospitals. At present, there are about 350 community hospitals and 80 or 90 are under threat.

That brings me to January 2006 and the document "Our health, our care, our say: a new direction for community services". I am sure that I and my hon. Friends would support many of the principles that are articulated in it. To quote a statement from that document:

"Some community hospitals are currently under threat of closure... we are clear that community facilities should not be lost in response to short-term budgetary pressures".

It goes on:

"We will...invite interested PCTs...to bid for capital support"—

Peter Viggers: To continue my quotation from "Our health, our care, our say":

"We will further invite interested PCTs...to bid for capital support... This will provide the opportunity to create many new community hospitals".

I very much welcome that, and I would like to fold in another reference to the armed forces, which I mentioned earlier.

In 1998, the Government decided to sever the link between armed forces personnel and the armed forces medical services, so that instead of persons in the Army, Navy and Air force automatically being treated by Army, Navy and Air Force doctors, nurses and paramedicals, they are now given initial primary care at the front by their own personnel and then shipped back, after which they are reliant on the national health service. There is therefore no necessary link between armed forces personnel and those who are injured, which can have some extremely disadvantageous effects.

To cite an example from a newspaper on Sunday, a reservist who had severe spinal injuries was given a walking stick and told to find his way to his own general practitioner. He has had nine operations on his back, which is still causing him extreme difficulty. That has happened because although personnel in the regular armed forces have priority in the national health service, reservists do not.

3.16 pm

On resuming—

Peter Viggers: I was pointing out that armed service personnel are no longer treated within the armed forces but are treated within the national health service, where they are supposed to receive priority. There are two problems with that. First, reservists, when they are dismissed from active service, do not get priority. Secondly, there is no point in having priority if there is no service to have priority within. I specifically cite mental health services. A significant number of service personnel, particularly reservists who have served in Iraq, are suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder but there are no facilities within the national health service to treat them and the only residential unit has closed. Within the Hampshire Partnerships NHS Trust, which treats mental health patients in the south of Hampshire, there were no new consultations at all for many months last year. For both those reasons, I maintain that the present arrangement is not satisfactory. I know that service chiefs are seriously worried about the medical provision for armed services personnel.

There is such a difference between the Americans' attitude and ours. In America, the attitude is, "If we put our boys and girls in harm's way, we will do anything to put them right if they are injured." The attitude in the British armed forces is that if someone is injured, facilities are available in the national health service and one must go and seek them. It is not satisfactory and service chiefs are worried.

There is a model that we could develop. The Aldershot centre for health is a partnership between the Army and Blackwater Valley and Hart primary care trust. It provides excellent facilities, including GP practices and nursing teams, health promotion, diagnostics, counselling services, and drug and alcohol teams. It also has an Army medical reception ward, general practice and psychiatric services, and a standing medical ward. That is the kind of facility that I believe should be used as a model for the constituency hospital of Haslar in Gosport.

I tabled a question last week asking the Secretary of State

"whether his Department has assessed the Aldershot Centre for Health as a model which could be followed at The Royal Hospital Haslar."

Rather encouragingly, the Ministry of Defence states that it "will be assessing options for innovative partnerships...particularly in the light of NHS developments and future military basing. However, it would be premature"— not wrong, but premature—

"to model another facility on the Aldershot Centre for Health until the functional success of the project has been evaluated and any lessons have been identified."—[Official Report, 17 May 2006; Vol. 446, c. 958W.]

I hope that the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Health will work together and, even now, find a way ahead for the Royal hospital Haslar.

Several hon. Members rose—

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. If there are no further Divisions, the debate will conclude at 4.30 pm. It might help hon. Members if I explain that I intend to call the first of the Front-Bench speakers at or close to 4 o'clock. Right hon. and hon. Members will be able to do the arithmetic for themselves, and if they tailor their contributions accordingly it will be possible to maximise the number of Back-Bench contributors.

3.19 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I take careful note of what you say, Mr. Bercow. I will keep my remarks as brief as possible.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers). I, like him, want to talk about local problems. That is the best way to approach the difficult debate on how we can save our community hospitals and enhance our community services. I have a series of questions for my hon. Friend the Minister that relates largely to how "Our health, our care, our say" is to be implemented, about which the hon. Gentleman spoke.

I am the fortunate possessor of a document that was sent to all strategic health authority chief executives and directors of performance. It is a public document, so I am in no way leaking information, and it is entitled "Moving care closer to home". It takes up two sides of paper, which is wonderful, because the issue does not need to be spelled out any more clearly, and it highlights community hospitals. I shall read two paragraphs from it:

"In many parts of the country, community hospitals are an important part of the strategy of moving care closer to home. This vision for the future of community hospitals was set out in chapter 6 of the White Paper and the new generation of community hospitals could be either new or refurbished existing facilities. Further guidance will be available in the summer."

It would be nice to hear from the Minister when that further guidance will come. The letter goes on:

"Where reconfiguration proposals of existing community hospitals relate to facilities that are clinically not viable, or which local people do not want to use, or which cannot economically be raised to modern standards, then local reconfiguration is right but we need to ensure that all such proposals are consistent with the long term strategy of the White Paper to move care closer to patients' homes. This is why the White Paper makes a commitment that"— this is the important bit—

"'PCTs taking current decisions about the future of community hospitals will be required to demonstrate to their SHA that they have consulted locally and have considered options such as developing new pathways, new partnerships and new ownership possibilities. SHAs will then test PCT community hospital proposals against the principles of this White Paper.' (para 6.43)"

That is an important mechanism for primary care trusts, and in Gloucestershire all the trusts are facing cuts as a result of problems that I would argue are not of our making. [Interruption.] Well, that is not entirely true of my own primary care trust; I shall be very careful. However, I have always argued that it was wrong to create three primary care trusts in Gloucestershire; there should have been two, and we are now moving to one. Cotswold and Vale primary care trust—my local PCT, which I share with the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown)—was created with a deficit. That deficit has not got any worse; the problem is that we are in the strategic health authority from hell, and I look at the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) as I say that. It is continually overspent, and I could share some of my problems with the hon. Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) as well.

It is because of those problems that Gloucestershire, which has largely kept in balance, is being penalised. It is being asked to make good some of the problems of the strategic health authority and to come into balance very quickly. There is an argument going on—and I shall advance it with the Secretary of State—about how quickly we are expected to get into balance. That is a key debate, but I shall not say much more about that now. In my area, there is a proposal to shut Berkeley hospital. That proposal has been round the circuit before, but it is being eagerly progressed now.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): I have been following the story closely in the Stroud News and Journal and read the hon. Gentleman's remarks assiduously. I am sure that he is as confused as I am about whether his trust is required to balance the books in-year or over three years, because there appears to be conflicting advice coming from his hon. Friends on the Front Bench. Has he considered that, particularly in the context of Stroud maternity hospital?

Mr. Drew: Absolutely; I shall come to Stroud maternity hospital in a minute, because I want that clarified. I have certainly made it clear to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that there is confusion about the difference between being brought into balance this year, and being brought into balance while dealing with historical problems, of which there are some in Gloucestershire, although they are nothing compared with those elsewhere in the strategic health authority. That is part of the debate.

Shutting Berkeley in the south of my constituency and trying to relocate those facilities would be a highly dangerous path to take. I can see Berkeley being shut but there still being no money available to create new facilities in the Cam and Dursley area. I want to maintain Berkeley hospital. I am willing to look at the argument for a community hospital with a changed series of objectives. Berkeley hospital has done that well over the past decade and more but, for a population of 50,000 people, we cannot shut a facility until we open something else. I accept that Berkeley serves a smaller proportion of the population in the southern part of my constituency, but it can still fulfil a number of key objectives. If Berkeley were to close tomorrow, that would cause dramatic pressure elsewhere, on Stroud general hospital and, again, the acute facilities.

The cuts are being driven forward at a relentless rate—we are talking signed, sealed and delivered in five weeks, which is abhorrent. People cannot consult and come up with alternatives in that time. I intend to bring forward alternatives and we will test the model.

It is good that the hon. Member for Westbury has gone to Stroud maternity hospital. I am glad he reads my local paper regularly—it usually quotes me correctly, so that is all well and good. The maternity unit is also being sacrificed, so my simple question for my hon. Friend the Minister is this: do the same criteria—which basically say that a better way forward has to be proven—apply to maternity units or are they purely to do with community hospitals? I am trying to elicit a reply because I have tabled a parliamentary question to that effect. I hope that the same criteria do apply and that we go through the same process, because there is a huge amount to do in Stroud already.

We must know by which criteria we are to judge whether it is right to close and what the alternatives are. I state categorically that the proposals are wrong. We have defeated them before and I think that we will defeat them this time. Now things are more difficult, because of the backcloth of huge cuts, but I want clarification on whether those cuts are real and necessary, and have to be met within the time scale that some are suggesting. That is the basis of the case.

"Moving care closer to home" is a useful document. It expresses in very precise terms what I think the Government want to happen. They want more facilities devolved to more local areas. However, the problem is that if facilities do not exist in a local area, it is difficult for services to be devolved to them. That is why I want some clarification about what we are doing and why. I want clarification about the funding streams and the alternatives if we lose the facilities. I would argue that funding and provision in Stroud are imbalanced, yet we are still being asked to lose vital facilities. Consideration is even being actively given—although this is not part of the formal cuts—to hiving off Stroud hospital to a private enterprise.

As someone who has worked through a health mutual, which I did for the Standish hospital site, I know a bit about the issue. I am not against looking at alternative models; what I am against is salami-slicing the NHS and saying, "That's all well and good", when in fact we are losing facilities and nothing is being put in their place. I would want to test out the model and the notion that the surgical work at Stroud hospital can be removed and replaced with medical beds. They might be needed, because people have to go somewhere, but that would have a huge knock-on effect on what the Gloucestershire royal hospital and Cheltenham general hospital can cope with. More particularly, if we are talking about choice, there is not much of it when the choice is between the acute hospital and nothing, because that is what most people face.

Those are my questions. I have written to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but have not had an answer, although I have managed to talk to her privately about some of the issues. I shall continue to do so. We are lucky; the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) has secured an Adjournment debate for Thursday on health services. If business works as it might, some of us will say more about this issue then.

Community hospitals really matter. Stroud in particular has a wonderful league of friends, which is offering hundreds of thousands of pounds to rebuild the maternity unit, or parts thereof, and to work on other parts of the Stroud hospital estate. It seems contradictory—on the one hand, we say that we want partnership with the community; on the other, when the community brings forward such a partnership, the facilities in which it is prepared to invest are cut.

The Government have to get a grip. They must be clear that such cuts are not necessary. There has to be some balancing of the books, but I want the Government's case to be proved to me. We should not be losing community hospitals, because they are the very things that we should enhance. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister has good things to say, at least about how the arguments on the health service in my area and the area around it should be taken forward. People should not just relentlessly drive the cuts forward over a short period. That is unacceptable.

3.31 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers) on securing this debate; it is the second in which I have participated that emphasises the importance of our community hospitals.

In January, I joined the trustee group of community hospitals acting nationally together, which is chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart); a number of other hon. Members have also joined. The group identified that of 322 hospitals in England, 80 were at risk of service cuts or closure at the point when it did that work. Three of those hospitals were in my constituency, and I want to draw the Minister's attention to what has happened in them so that he gets a picture of what is going on in some of the more remote parts of the country, where the issues are particularly relevant.

As we have heard, the Government published their White Paper in February. It gave considerable comfort to those of us who are concerned about our community hospitals, as it suggested that the Government were listening to the concerns of the people who used those hospitals. Many of the arguments that we had put forward in the months leading up to the White Paper's publication coincided with those of the Government, so we had some sense that our message was getting through. It was disappointing, to say the least, that very little of the Government's message seemed to filter down to the bureaucrats who run strategic health authorities and primary care trusts that are responsible for running our community hospitals.

David Taylor: I endorse the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the initiative taken by the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart), on which I congratulate him, to ensure that fragmented voices were turned into an organised chant.

Some months ago, we were reassured about the apparent new direction for community hospitals; effectively, 5 per cent. of general hospital expenditure was to be transferred over 10 years. However, there is, was and will be a risk that the finances of those acute hospitals will be destabilised by the proposal. Perhaps the funds should not be top-sliced from their expenditure. Does the hon. Gentleman agree?

Mr. Dunne: Actually, the experience in Shropshire has been the reverse: the primary care trusts are helping to fund the acute hospital deficits. In Shropshire, the deficits have been created in the acute trusts. To repair their budgets, they are looking to extract money from the primary care trusts.

[Mr. Dunne]

In March, the primary care trust in my area eventually announced that it would not close any of the three hospitals in my constituency. That was a great relief to the community. The primary care trust then produced a document at the beginning of May. As I said directly to the trust when it presented the document to the overview and scrutiny committee, the service plan for Shropshire County primary care trust is a thin, weak document. It fails both to give the context in which the savings are supposed to be made and to provide any clear guidance about whether the proposed savings will be sufficient to meet the deficits that it seeks to identify.

Bridgnorth community hospital has had a great deal of investment by the NHS over the previous 12 months and is currently in the process of being rebuilt, which is welcome. The document said that it would be saved and that it would face no job or bed cuts. That is a great tribute to the people of Bridgnorth, who campaigned actively to save it. The leader of Bridgnorth district council is listening to this debate, and I pay tribute to Councillor Elizabeth Yeomans for the work that she and many others did to save their hospital. That is the good news.

The bad news relates to the other two hospitals. Ludlow community hospital is threatened with the closure of two of its wards, with the loss of more than 30 beds and many jobs—as yet, the detail has not been enunciated by the PCT. The hospital is faced with the closure of the final mental health ward in the Shropshire community, with the exception of a small number of beds in Whitchurch in north Shropshire. Bishop's Castle community hospital—the third hospital—will close; at least, there are plans for that to happen. The site will be handed over to a nursing home operator who currently operates on part of the site. The number of NHS-funded beds will be reduced from 24 this time last year to 12.

The mental health aspect particularly worries me and many of my constituents in Ludlow. The primary argument is that this is a value-for-money exercise, as the mental health ward has not been operated in Ludlow at full capacity and should therefore be closed. The director of mental health in Shropshire County PCT has admitted in public meetings that it is not his preference to have to close the ward and that the decision is entirely driven by efficiency savings required by the PCT to help shore up the financial deficits in the remainder of the Shropshire health economy.

One of the reasons why the mental health division in the PCT has operated so successfully within budget in recent years is that its primary provision is at the Shelton hospital. I understand that it is the second to last Victorian mental health asylum still operating in the UK; and it will be the last remaining one, because there are no plans to redevelop it for some time. While its staff do the best that they can, the provision is acknowledged to be substandard. The impact on patients who require acute care of going to that facility is likely to be significant and the impact on the carers who look after them is likely to be even more so, because the geography involved in travelling from the Ludlow catchment area to Shrewsbury is significant.

I shall briefly illustrate that point. Yesterday, a group of concerned residents led by John Nash undertook a journey from Ludlow to Shelton for a theoretical one-hour visit by public transport. The six of them caught the 435 bus from Ludlow to Shrewsbury at 11.50 am. They had to change in Shrewsbury to catch the bus to take them to the hospital at Shelton. One of the group is a frail lady in her 80s who is a former physiotherapist, and she got home to Ludlow at 5.40 pm, which represents a journey of almost six hours for a one-hour visit. She would currently be able to walk around the corner to her local community hospital. The ability for the carers of our most vulnerable mental health patients to continue to provide such family contact, as it were, will be severely reduced.

I should like to dwell briefly on the impact of the closure of the other rehabilitation wards. The NHS has argued that it should justify the closures on the basis of an equity audit. The equity profile of primary care and community services for Shropshire County PCT, published in May 2005, argues that "NHS improvement, expansion and reform should narrow the health gap by ensuring that service planning is performed by an equity audit."

The equity audit that has supposedly been carried out to justify the reduction of rehabilitation beds has not been made public. It has been argued that attempts are being made to provide a fairer allocation of beds across the county, which is why beds are being cut in Ludlow and Bishop's Castle. Yet the document also covers the question of need, which was not addressed in the PCT's latest analysis, among the 18 catchment areas in Shropshire. Four of them serve the Ludlow community hospital area, and they all have a higher need for the 65 to 74-year-olds, as identified in the summary, and all bar one are in the higher category for the 75-plus group. Three of the four catchment areas have the highest dependency ratio per catchment area in Shropshire. Three of the four have the lowest ratio of GPs per head of population in Shropshire, and two of the four have the lowest number of patients per practice nurse.

There is a clear need for beds to be available in Ludlow, and for long-term beds in Bishop's Castle. I have been pressing the PCT to commit itself to a 10-year contract for NHS-funded beds. Experience elsewhere in Shropshire shows that it will commit to much shorter contracts, but that once they end, the number of beds is cut. That salami slicing cannot continue, or our community hospitals will all be closed within a short time.

Several hon. Members rose—

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. Time is running out, and I appeal for short contributions.

3.42 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Bercow. I will try to be brief.

The NHS in Oxfordshire is in freefall. Today, the Oxford Radcliffe NHS Trust is telling its staff that between 650 and 700 posts will be lost—the exact number will be known tomorrow. By my calculation, that is equivalent to about 8 per cent. of the work force. The loss is occurring as a consequence of £33 million of savings imposed on the trust, in addition to the £17 million of savings that Oxfordshire PCTs have been obliged to make. As a result, the new and enlarged Bicester community hospital promised by the right hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) when he was at the Department of Health has now become a complete fantasy.

The White Paper was another fantasy. "Our health, our care, our say" repeated the promise made at the previous general election about having a new generation of community hospitals. Can the Minister tell the House where that new generation of community hospitals is? It is figment of the Minister's and the Department's imagination. There are no community hospitals. Then we are told that community hospitals no longer need beds and that the Government's new concept of primary care centres—better, larger GP practice centres—are somehow new community hospitals. It will not wash.

Last week, I met the acting chief executive of the PCT, who said that because of the enormous squeeze on its budget it is concerned only about acute care. Anything that can be moved off into social care—anything that can be means-tested by the county council—will be moved. An article in one of the Sunday newspapers referred to a new kind of nursing home in Hampshire, in which people are moved from NHS beds simply to die under the responsibility of social care.

We will see an increasing number of people who would have expected in the past to be treated at community hospitals shunted off to somewhere else in means-tested social care, because the NHS no longer has the funds to manage such cases. The PCTs say that they no longer wish to look after such patients. Somehow, they will become lost in the community. It is a disgrace. We are not going to see a new community hospital in Bicester. If we were to have a new generation of community hospitals of the sort that was promised at the Dispatch Box by the Secretary of State in the mid-1990s, one would have expected it to have been delivered. It is a fantasy.

I want to know this from the Minister: what from this White Paper has ever been delivered? It is a public policy disgrace that Ministers come along and waste taxpayers' money with a fake consultation. No public meetings were ever organised in Oxfordshire on "Our health, our care, our say"; what the Government had was a fake meeting in Birmingham with a hand-picked audience. People are becoming increasingly cynical about what the Government are delivering, and I say to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) that the part of the Stroud newspaper that he ought to start reading is the appointments page, because given the way the Government are cutting—he used terms such as cuts and sacrifices—come the next election I fear he will be looking for another job. Clearly, as is evidenced in our debate, across the country, county by county, this Government are waging war on community hospitals and community medical services.

3.46 pm

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers) on securing the debate. Many useful points have already been made. The hon. Gentleman said that the Royal hospital Haslar is one of the best known in Parliament. That is true; it comes a close second after West Cornwall hospital.

I wish to raise a single issue, which I hope the Minister will respond to. It is to do with the thesis—or, as I would argue, mantra—that has been coming from the NHS Confederation, which is, as I understand it, the provisional wing of the NHS; it certainly puts out a lot of the arguments that Ministers might not be prepared to argue. Its argument is that the acute sector requires fewer hospital beds. It is a thesis that has become a mantra in the style of the management consultant culture that seems to have pervaded the NHS.

What worries me is the way in which that approach relates to the future of community hospitals, which is a very pertinent question. When I have debated this matter with GPs nationally and locally and with the trusts that argue that we should push for such an approach, I can understand the frustration of those running the acute sector about large numbers of patients going into acute hospitals who, they argue, should not even be going through their front doors. In other words, they are saying that there are unnecessary admissions to acute hospitals. That may well be the case, and there is also another argument that has been made today and which is repeated regularly with regard to the difficulty of discharging patients once they have come into acute hospitals.

The approach taken by the NHS Confederation—and supported by Ministers, I would argue—is causing a great deal of difficulty for acute hospitals and nursing staff, who have to cope with other Government targets on communicable diseases. In many acute hospitals, bed pressures mean that there is a lot of hot-bedding. Severely and acutely ill patients are being moved around hospitals or discharged from them, and other patients are moved in. One of the best ways of getting on top of infection control issues is to manage beds so there are surplus beds in acute hospitals, not too few.

In order to achieve the outcome of fewer acute hospitals, which may be desirable in the longer run, the Government need to address such issues, many of which they have in fact contributed to. The way in which the primary care GP out-of-hours service is currently managed means that many patients are not seen by their GPs out of hours. Given an environment in which there is an increasingly litigious public, ambulance-chasing lawyers and so forth, on the precautionary principle many patients are admitted to acute hospitals when they do not need to be. That trend will inevitably continue, and it may get worse.

Mr. Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): As my hon. Friend will be aware, the out-of-hours service in our county of Cornwall has recently changed from a locally based service to a service provided by a much larger company. Does he agree that there are concerns in communities that the provisions under the new contract perhaps do not deliver as local people expect them to?

Andrew George: I agree with my hon. Friend, although in view of the time available I shall not elaborate. There is a scenario in which clinicians appear to be overruled by bed managers, while chronic conditions are still not well managed in the community and many patients who could be managed in the community therefore go into acute hospitals. Crucially, in the light of social services and primary care funding, it is not possible to discharge patients from acute hospitals to social services care or community hospitals, because beds have been cut. In my constituency and in many parts of the country it is becoming impossible to discharge such patients.

To achieve the desired outcome I urge the Minister to recognise those factors and reflect on the need to front-load the argument by ensuring that investment is made in primary care and community hospitals and that there are sufficient social services resources to enable patients to be discharged safely to community hospitals or the community, away from acute hospitals.

3.51 pm

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate and to my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers) for ensuring that it was called. As my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) has said, the survival of community hospitals in Oxfordshire is a huge issue—probably the most important in my constituency.

There are three community hospitals in my constituency: one in Wallingford, one in Didcot and one in Wantage. My constituents are also served by a fourth, in Abingdon. As the people of Oxfordshire are now well aware, we are suffering an acute financial crisis. Oxfordshire is part of the Thames Valley strategic health authority, which has the lowest funding per head in the country. By contrast, I understand that the strategic health authority that covers the Prime Minister's constituency is among those with the highest funding per head. I wonder whether that is a coincidence.

The Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust is the most efficient large hospital trust in the country, yet it is being asked to make £33 million-worth of cuts. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury alluded to job losses. I understand that it may tomorrow also announce up to 150 bed closures. What will the result be? The answer is obvious: more pressure on our community hospitals.

The reason why those hospitals are called community hospitals is that they were built by the people who used them. They were built 70 or 80 years ago, by their communities, to serve their communities. Now they serve as an overspill for the John Radcliffe hospital, and just as they are under threat they are being asked to take on yet greater burdens.

Every hon. Member who has spoken in the debate and has alluded to a sham consultation process is right. People who have made their feelings known and want community provision and a community hospital are completely fed up with the fact that every year a consultation is held to try to persuade them to want something that they do not want. The debate that goes on between the high-ups—the professionals who claim to know what they are talking about—and the people is about whether community care should be closer to home or in the home. It is put about that care in the home will be superior and better. I do not buy that. Most people in community hospitals are grateful for ready access to medical care and grateful to be with other patients.

The vital thing, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) alluded, is that those hospitals remain in their communities. Particularly in predominantly rural counties, the idea that elderly relatives can easily visit relatives in a hospital that is 10, 12 or 15 miles away is ludicrous. The mayors in Wantage, Wallingford and Didcot did the same exercise as that in Shropshire, and they spent six hours getting from A to B and back again. Such easy visits are simply not possible. Two weeks ago, the A34, the main trunk road in my constituency, was closed after an accident. The scene was like something from a disaster movie. People took four hours to travel from Wantage to Didcot. We need community hospitals in our communities.

It all comes down to money, I am afraid, and nothing angers people more than when the Government put out a White Paper saying that they will not close hospitals for financial reasons and that the money is there if the clinical case can be made. It is quite clear that these hospitals are being closed for financial reasons—there is no other reason. What particularly sticks in the craw of the people of Wantage is that they have just bought the land from the PCT to build a nursing home for £800,000. It is being built and paid for by the community. The money has gone to the PCT, which is now going to use it for what? The PCT will try to close down their community hospital.

The idea that a county such as Oxfordshire can be served by one huge hospital and nothing else is laughable, and I have told my PCT again and again that it could have a far more reasonable debate with the people of Wantage, Wallingford and Didcot if it accepted the principle that people want a community service. Instead of saying, "We are closing your hospital—let's consult about it", it should give some clear, credible, alternative proposals that people can sign up to.

3.56 pm

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): There have been a number of interesting contributions to the debate and I hope that the new Minister will take on board the strength of feeling of Members from all parties. As Members have mentioned, I am the chairman of CHANT—Community Hospitals Acting Nationally Together—which is an umbrella group for Members of all parties in the House of Commons, and those in the House of Lords, who are concerned about the future of community hospitals. They are concerned because they share precisely the aspirations of Government policy.

Many hon. Members have already referred to "Our health, our care, our say", but we do not just need to consider that document. The new Minister may have seen the previous primary policy instrument for this Government on health, the 2003 document, which was called—believe it or not—"Keeping the NHS local".

Before that, in 2000, we had the NHS plan, in which there was a commitment to bringing care closer to home. For six years, the Government have espoused views that Labour Back Benchers, Liberal Democrats, independents and Conservatives all agree make up precisely the vision that we need.

However, when we look around the country, we find that the very community facilities needed to make the change from acute hospital-centred care to care given much closer to home—either in the home, where appropriate, or in the community close to home—are being closed down. Hundreds and hundreds of beds have been closed in community hospitals during the past six years, while the Government are espousing a need for care closer to home.

The NHS Confederation has been mentioned. A few days ago, bizarrely, it issued a slim document called "Why the NHS Needs Fewer Beds". In Hornsea community hospital in my constituency, the number of beds has been cut from 22 to 12 and there have been regular waiting lists. An elderly lady who could see the community hospital from her front room in Hornsea could not be admitted because there was a waiting list. Meanwhile, the chief executive and chairman of the acute trust in Hull told me that the hospital is often running at more than 100 per cent. capacity.

We have a bizarre conflict between stated Government policy and the reality on the ground. The Government should make good their position on health; all hon. Members recognise the near doubling of expenditure on the NHS. I hope that the new Minister might be like the new Home Secretary, coming to the Department with fresh eyes and able to see that it needs serious change. Members throughout the House want the Minister and the Department to defend our community hospitals and support them, because they will deliver the Government's policy for them. Until now, we have questions that have not been answered.

John Bercow (in the Chair): To make a very, very short contribution, I call Dr. Julian Lewis.

4 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): It is a privilege to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart), who has done an outstanding job in setting up the national co-ordinating campaign. All those of us who were fighting our individual campaigns knew that that needed to be done, and I take my hat off to him—he has done an excellent job and a service to us all.

Earlier today, Mr. Bercow, you renewed your efforts to save the Nuffield speech and language unit in Ealing. A couple of days ago, I received a delegation of mental health users from the emergency clinic at the Maudsley hospital in south London who were desperate that their specialist centre should not be closed down. Every so often a collective, pseudo-ideological mania seems to take over some of our public services, and it can be seen in the way in which children are taught to read or taught through play; in the wholesale closure of mental hospitals and the decanting into the community of far too many people who are unable to cope; in the closure of special schools, which has been gathering pace; and in the current determination to say that the NHS needs fewer beds.

I have time to make only one point to the Minister, and it is this: when he winds up the debate, will he please not tell us that it is for local decision takers to take responsibility? The Government are at the top of the tree, the community is at the bottom, and the so-called local decision takers, who staff the PCTs' bureaucracies, are in between. Which group is the odd one out? It is the one in the middle—the one that is not elected. It is the Government's responsibility to ensure that the systems that they set up are responsive to the communities that they are supposed to serve.

Finally, the Minister should not tell us how much money he has been putting in. That is like saying that we are pouring more and more water into the bath when there is a great hole in the bottom of it. The bath will never be full, because the water will drain away faster than we can pour it in. We are interested not in the resources that are going in, but in the outcomes that are not coming out.

4.2 pm

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): It is appropriate that the final contribution before the winding-up speeches should highlight the issue that underlay many of the other contributions, but which was not made explicit: accountability. What has run throughout the debate is the notion that local people are clearly expressing their preferences—the term "sham consultation" keeps coming up in these Westminster Hall debates—but that we can do nothing about it when nobody listens.

That causes me to ask the fundamental question of whether we need to look at accountability in the national health service and decide whether we are satisfied with the present arrangement, whereby just one person—obviously, she is not present today—is accountable for the 1.3 million people who work in the NHS, or whether there needs to be closer, more local accountability. We have that in embryo form in local authorities' overview and scrutiny committees, but they are weak, and one of the few things that they can do—this links to the introductory remark made by the hon. Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers)—is to refer a decision to the Secretary of State and ask her, in turn, to refer it to the independent reconfiguration panel.

I was interested in the hon. Gentleman's remarks, because his experiences are identical to mine. I had a hospital closure in my area, and the local authority asked the Secretary of State to have it looked at independently, but she refused. There is history in that respect. Although there is an independent panel, it does not, on average, get asked to look at the things that local authorities want it to consider, because the Secretary of State stands in the way. We therefore have no serious local accountability, and the one bit of local accountability that we do have gets overridden by the Secretary of State, who refuses to let someone independent look at things.

We therefore need to look at serious local, democratic accountability in the NHS, and it will be interesting to find out in the Conservative winding-up speech whether there is anything in the Conservatives' plans, to the extent that they exist, to deal with local democratic accountability and to determine whether the people who make the decisions—it is rude to call them faceless, but they are the people whom we cannot get rid of—should be replaced or answerable to elected representatives, because, at the moment, they are not. That is the frustration.

We have heard some important points. The hon. Member for Gosport, who secured the debate—I congratulate him on that—gave some powerful examples of micro-management and of targets distorting the NHS. I met a woman only this morning who had a specific need to see a particular consultant. She said that she was happy to wait to see the right person, but was told that she could not wait because she would go past the target. She was told that she would be sent to someone else and said that that specialist would not know about her. She was told that which did not matter and that she had to see a consultant so that she would be off the list. She went to see the other consultant, who asked, "What are you doing here? I cannot help you." She said that she knew that but that she had been sent so that the box could be ticked. That is the sort of absurdity that arises.

I was interested to hear from my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), about the situation in his area. He came up with a criterion with which many of us have sympathy. None of us is emotionally wedded to bricks and mortar. Buildings that were once fit for purpose may no longer be so or may be in the wrong place. No one is saying that nothing must ever change, but we want proper public engagement without a preconceived agenda.

It was good to hear the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor)—the Statler and Waldorf of the Labour Back Benches—pointing out that Government health policy rhetoric is fine, but the disjunction between the rhetoric and reality shows that the Department of Health is out of touch with what is really happening. The classic example is the White Paper on community hospitals. The disjunction is that when something goes wrong locally, the decision was made locally, but when 500 new or upgraded community hospitals are planned, they are the Government's responsibility. How can both be true simultaneously? The Government are responsible for good news and new hospitals, but bad news and closed hospitals are due to local decision making and nothing to do with the Government. Both cannot be true, so which is?

In this very Chamber the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) properly raised the issue of his local community hospitals and the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) raised another critical point about the absurd division between health and social care. While we have different budgets and something can be shunted into someone else's budget, the welfare of the individual will come second to the financial pressures. Again, the logic of the argument that we have heard today is that budgets should be merged and pooled with a single stream of health and social care funding and democratic, local accountability. Those are two big steps, but that is what I want and it would deal with many of the points raised. We would then have responsive public consultation and effective social and health care.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) properly raised the issue of capacity and the extraordinary situation that when beds are cut, occupancy rates rise well beyond the level at which even experts in infection control believe they can do a good job. There will then be another Government target, initiative and action plan to tackle MRSA or whatever the bug of the day happens to be. There is no joined-up thinking in the whole process.

The hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) made an important and incisive point about the difference between care closer to home and care in the home. People often slide between the two. It is assumed that we all want care closer to home, but many of us need specialist and local NHS facilities close to where we live which we can get to even when the A34 is blocked. The Government increasingly do not mean beds close to home; they mean people going from their homes to a super-GP clinic or something like that. There is no intermediate step.

What is it about community hospitals that we favour? It is localness. Being treated close to home has a medical benefit, because loved ones can pop in and friends and family are nearby. It is the human scale of such hospitals. People do not want one dirty great hospital for the whole county. They want local hospitals where they know the names of the staff and can build a relationship. Caring for people locally is evidence-based medicine on a human scale and takes pressure off the large acute trusts.

We must not allow the myth to continue that community hospitals are inefficient and bad value for money. Putting someone in a small community hospital instead of tying up an expensive acute hospital bed is good value for money and good for the individual.

We need a merger of health and social care budgets to avoid cost shunting and we need serious local accountability. We also need funding—funding is not irrelevant—and I have supported that, but we need more than funding and the Government should listen to what local people are saying because, at the moment, local people have no voice.

4.9 pm

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): We need to be clear about what we are dealing with. We are dealing with closures that have been prompted by deficits, which is the responsibility of Ministers. The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) asked what the Conservatives would do to improve accountability. Accountability rests squarely with the Secretary of State for Health who, ultimately, is responsible for the closures that we have seen. Most Conservative Members would, for reasons to which my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers) alluded, attribute the deficits to the actions of the present Government, and I would like the Minister to answer for the 80 or so closures that are threatened up and down the country.

I admit a constituency interest. On Friday, I visited the four community hospitals in my constituency, all of which are threatened with the axe. There was a fifth—Bradford-on-Avon—but it has already closed. I also visited an EMI—elderly mentally infirm—unit for 26 in-patients in Trowbridge, which caters for a large part of Wiltshire. That, too, is threatened with closure, together with the maternity unit, so I have some sympathy for the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). All those facilities will go.

The hon. Member for Northavon talked about evidence-based medicine. I do not think he really understands what evidence-based medicine is. There is no evidence that the plans that the primary care trust has produced would do anything other than destroy what we have traditionally enjoyed in my part of Wiltshire—good local health care. All the evidence suggests that we would lose a great deal and pick up very little in return. The PCT, in the spirit of the age, will talk about taking health care closer to patients, and of course we would all wish to be treated in our home if that were possible.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I apologise for not being present for the whole debate—it is not possible to do everything in this place. My hon. Friend is aware of the announcement made in Gloucestershire on black Wednesday, as I call it, that 12 institutions would be closed or have their services severely curtailed. That was to involve a loss of 250 beds and more than 200 staff. In Gloucestershire, we will not have many health facilities left other than the two acute hospitals. That is what the present Government have reduced the health service to in Gloucestershire. Does he agree that what needs to be considered is people's welfare, not just bottom-line budgets to rake back last year's and this year's deficits?

Dr. Murrison: I agree. What my hon. Friend describes is what Ministers have told us should happen. It is clear from the White Paper that short-term budgetary fixes should not result in the closure of community hospitals, so he is right. I have visited a couple of his local community hospitals and I am as distraught as he is to hear of their closure. We are told that intermediate care teams will sally forth and look after people in their own homes. Come on, we live in the real world. We all know that people will not receive proper hospital care at home. The best that people can hope for is health care in homely settings in the community. That is what people have at the moment in areas that are blessed with community hospitals. I understood from the White Paper that the community hospital model would be expanded across the rest of the country, but it appears that that will not happen. We hear about new-generation community hospitals, but the reality is that well before they appear, we see hospitals such as Bradford-on-Avon and those in my hon. Friend's area closing. At the very least, we are putting the cart before the horse.

We have to accept that when those institutions close, a whole generation of health care workers will be lost. People who work in community hospitals are very special. They are often seen to be on the margins of health care, and often they are. They usually work in community hospitals for particular reasons. They choose to work in those hospitals, yet there seems to be an assumption that when the hospitals close, the workers will all march off and rebadge themselves as community nurses or district nurses, or perhaps work in acute centres. Clearly, many of them will not do so and many of the particular skills that they have will be lost. I do not think that the Minister has thought that through adequately.

I shall not dwell at length on sham consultations. Suffice it to say that I am as incensed as most other hon. Members who have spoken that a culture of cynicism should be built up around what should be a perfectly reasonable thing for us to do—ask people what they want in terms of health care delivery in their locality. I now have to say to my constituents, "Please respond to the primary care trust's consultation because it will take your silence as assent to the plans." However, most people are reluctant to take part, because they see themselves putting a great deal of time and effort into consultation in good faith and then finding the PCT simply proceeding with an agenda that it created beforehand.

The White Paper makes a number of references to community hospitals, and it actually refers to Trowbridge community hospital, which is interesting, because under the primary care trust proposals, that is one of the community hospitals that will close. It says, in bold, that

> "PCTs taking current decisions about the future of community hospitals will be required to demonstrate to their SHA that they have consulted locally and have considered options such as developing new pathways, new partnerships and new ownership possibilities."

There is very little room for weasel words there.

There is a delicious irony, because many of the hospitals had what I suppose, in retrospect, were new partnerships, which were created by the communities that they served. They were often the gift of a local benefactor and they have been supported royally over the years through local effort. I am intrigued and, in all candour, I am interested to hear the Minister's take on exactly what those words mean, and to hear how he will encourage new partnerships and new ownership possibilities. What does he have in mind, and how will he make sure that those partnerships happen? I actually think that partnerships are quite an imaginative solution for the future, but they will not happen if the Government do not support them, and they will certainly not happen if PCTs do not support them. His comments on that point would be most welcome.

On Monday, the NHS Confederation produced what is best described as a leaflet. It was much trumpeted but it contains very little apart from anecdote, and it does not mention community hospitals at all, really. The issue of what on earth will be done as the number of acute hospital beds continues to be reduced is left hanging in the air, but people will have to go somewhere.

Interestingly, a couple of months ago, Dr. Foster, a body that is in some level of partnership with the Department of Health, published a paper in the British Medical Journal that compared health care in America with health care in this country. Of course there are differences between the two countries, but it is instructive to note how much more reliance America puts on intermediate care, and how little time people spend in acute hospitals in America compared with people in this country. America also has greater reliance on intermediate care beds, which of course are cheaper.

Health maintenance organisations that manage health care in America are, of course, run by accountants, and they are very exercised by how much health care costs. Primary care trusts are getting it all wrong in trying to save costs by disestablishing the intermediate care level. The Minister looks surprised, but I am surprised that he has not been given the paper by members of Dr. Foster—they came to see the Opposition Front Bench team earlier this week—because it has a partnership arrangement with the Department of Health, and it seems that the research is crucial to what we are discussing today. I can send it to him, but I point out that it is in the BMJ of March this year, so he can look it up for himself. It seems that we have been given a false prospectus by primary care trusts, which hold that we will save money, as we will, of course, in the very short term, in terms of balancing the books in-year, but in the longer term the result will simply be more cost.

We are rusticating cost from one part of the public purse to another. We heard earlier about how social services will bear much of the burden for all this. Likewise, voluntary organisations will pick up the bill for things such as palliative care, and of course carers will pick up a lot of the burden, as well. So when we talk about cost, we must ask: the cost to whom? That is extremely important.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Stroud for intervening on him, but we take a particular interest in what is going on in Stroud. I am pleased that his contribution was so powerful, because it is all very well for my hon. Friends to debate the issue, but the fact that someone on the Labour Benches is doing so will, I hope, have more impact on the Minister than we have had hitherto. In connection with Stroud maternity hospital, it will be particularly interesting to hear which of the following holds: the January 2006 operating framework for 2006-07, which said:

"All NHS organisations should plan to recover deficits for previous years and balance their books for 2006-07 or the Secretary of State's letter dated 12 April to my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley), who was here earlier. That letter says that "organisations which are overspending will be required to show improvement and by the end of 2006-7 be in monthly balance."

That is, monthly expenditure should cancel out or equal monthly income. It will be interesting to know which one of those propositions holds true, because clearly both of them cannot be true. There appears to have been something of a difference, and clearly Gloucestershire is working to the former proposition, not to the latter. That is important in the context of Stroud maternity hospital.

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will bring his remarks to a close very soon, as the Minister must have an opportunity to reply.

Dr. Murrison: Thank you, Mr. Bercow. I am indeed bringing my remarks to a conclusion. I hope that the Minister will address those points. In particular, I make no apology for underscoring my constituency interest, which informs my more general concern that stems back 25 years.

4.20 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Andy Burnham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Gosport (Peter Viggers) on securing the debate. He raised a number of interesting and important issues that deserve a proper response. We have heard good contributions to the debate, particularly from the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne). The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb), as always, made a good contribution and some important points. The good turnout this afternoon shows the depth of feeling about community hospitals in communities across the country.

I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. Member for Gosport, but I doubt the quality of some of the analysis he gave us about what is happening in the national health service today and since 1992. I have doubts about some of the statements that have been made in the course of the debate, such as the suggestion that the Government are doing nothing to support community hospitals.

The hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) made something of a rant, which was uncharacteristic—if that helps, as I do not think he is normally associated with such speeches. He talked about the Government "waging war" on community hospitals. That is simply not borne out at all by the facts on the ground. I have a quote for him from the Community Hospitals Association, an organisation with which he will be familiar. On its website, it states:

"Despite common belief there are still, in Great Britain, over 470 Community Hospitals. And for every closure in recent years there has been a new hospital opened."

The hon. Gentleman's views are simply not borne out by the facts.

A number of hon. Members have mentioned the NHS Confederation's analysis that was put before us this week. I refer the Chamber to a table in that report that shows the number of hospital beds lost in the 20 years from 1984 to 2004-05. If we consider the figures for 1997-98, we see that there were 148,828 beds in the national health service. In 2004-05, there were 145,218. That is broadly the same figure, with a small reduction. If we look further down the table, we see in the period from 1984 to 1997-98 a reduction of 63,000 beds during those years of Conservative Government. A little more humility tempering the strident comments of Conservative Members might not have gone amiss.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Andy Burnham: I do not have a great deal of time, so I will press on.

Our manifesto made absolutely clear our commitment to a new generation of community hospitals, rebuilt or refurbished, with state-of-the-art NHS facilities. Our commitment to the future of community hospitals was further highlighted by the recent White Paper, to which many hon. Members have referred. "Our health, our care, our say" firmly placed community hospitals, old and new, at the heart of achieving the shift in care and resources that the White Paper signalled. I say to Conservative Members that during the period when they were in government it was very much the trend that the acute sites began to draw in more and more services. That is what we saw in communities up and down the country, not least in my own, where the accident and emergency department at Leigh infirmary was closed. That was the direction of travel in the '80s and '90s.

Mr. Vaizey: Will the Minister give way?

Andy Burnham: I will not. The reduction of 63,000 in the number of beds in our national health service is the evidence of that process. The direction that the White Paper has laid out—

Dr. Murrison: On a point of order, Mr. Bercow. Is it in order for the Minister not to have read the NHS Confederation's pamphlet, produced on Monday, to which I referred? He has completely misled us.

John Bercow (in the Chair): That is a point either of debate or of frustration.

Andy Burnham: I reject the suggestion that I have misled Members. I was giving figures from the NHS Confederation, issued this week, which show the true state of our national health service. Raising a frivolous point of order when I have been left with little time does not help our debate.

We made our commitment to community hospitals because that was what the public told us strongly in the consultation, "Your health, your care, your say". People want services to be available closer to where they live, and they want health and social care to become more seamless with more personalised and integrated care. That point was fairly made by the hon. Member for Northavon. It is true that people want to be treated in familiar, comfortable surroundings.

England is unusual among developed countries in that a high proportion of care is accessed through large, acute hospitals on-site, particularly for out-patients. That is why the White Paper laid out clearly our intention to move toward more local and community provision. We want the NHS to challenge the status quo that has seen care increasingly centralised in large institutions. If we are serious about shifting care, we need to make sure that the facilities out in the community are fit for purpose, and that they are not simply bricks and mortar that have been there for a long time, but modern, good quality facilities in which the kind of care for our constituents that we all aspire to can be provided.

Picking up on the NHS Confederation theme, there is a challenge for all elected politicians, in this place and locally, to get beyond some of the emotion. That is what it is challenging us to do. The NHS Confederation called for a well informed debate on these matters. It is incumbent on every one of us, as leaders within our communities, to lead that debate rather than follow it. We, too, should put informed positions into the public domain about hospital reconfiguration. Let us make no bones about it: from time to time there will need to be reconfiguration of services to reflect modern standards and aspirations. The duty to lead that debate is incumbent on us all.

I will now pick up on a point made by the hon. Member for Gosport. There is an onus on the NHS to listen to local opinion when it is expressed in a moderate and reasonable way, where local representatives have gone out to listen to their communities and taken the trouble to work through the detail of proposals. The NHS needs to be good at hearing that debate and the argument coming back the other way. I accept that it might not have done that well in the past, and that we need to make sure that our consultation within the NHS is true consultation, but that is a two-way street. All hon. Members should reflect on that.

A new generation of facilities is already being put in place. The hon. Member for Banbury asked where they are. Examples include Colchester and Tendring PCTs, which have recently seen a primary care centre and a community hospital open under the NHS LIFT—local improvement finance trust—initiative. There are other examples with a number of other services: Colchester primary care centre is providing a renal dialysis unit that will provide local facilities for patients who currently travel to London or Cambridge three times a week for treatment. Harwich hospital is a new facility constructed on the grounds of an outdated community hospital. It will provide numerous specialist primary care and diagnostic services, as well as an operating theatre, in-patient beds and a maternity unit. They are the evidence of the new generation of facilities that the hon. Gentleman asked for. It is there, on the ground, and it is benefiting patients across the country.

I was asked for evidence of the manifesto commitment. There is capital: a significant sum of money has been set aside to enable communities around the country to come forward with plans for new community provision. More information will be made available and a statement will be made soon as to how that capital can be accessed. It is not possible to build new hospitals within a year of our manifesto commitment, but the commitment will be honoured.

I shall pick up on some of the specific points raised by the hon. Member for Gosport, because he deserves a detailed response to them. I understand the concerns in his communities about the transition in service provision; we all acknowledge that that can be difficult to understand. The hub-and-spoke model that is proposed for his area—given the geography of his constituency—must respect all the communities in it. To be viable, the hub-and-spoke system needs to consider all the communities, not just one in isolation. A new facility is being constructed at Fareham. Seeing the health economy in the round is important, and it is crucial to ensure that one community's aspirations do not cut across the legitimate aspirations of another for modern health care facilities in their area.

I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) that we will make an announcement on the White Paper in due course, which will apply to all kinds of services, including maternity units; it will cover the breadth of services. We want PCTs to look carefully at the White Paper; it is not just words, and we want them to see clearly the direction of travel and provide the kind of services that his constituents and mine want on the ground.

The hon. Gentleman—

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the Minister, but we must now move on the next debate.

Home Information Packs

4.30 pm

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): I am pleased to have this short debate on home information packs, better known as HIPs. This is not the first time that they have been debated in this place and it will probably not be the last. Given the number of hon. Members who wish to speak, I shall try to be brief and not cover all the objections that I and others have to HIPs. Suffice it to say, they are included in early-day motion 2240, which is entitled "Introduction of home information packs" and was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove). I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) for his recent excellent ten-minute Bill on the subject.

Having spoken to a variety of groups from all sides of the HIPs debate in recent days, I have picked up a common theme, which is perhaps best described by an individual whose role it is to promote and sell HIPs but who unsurprisingly does not wish to be named this afternoon. He told me that doing something to help house buyers was long overdue but that with HIPs, like other new Labour policies, the execution was fundamentally flawed.

HIPs are a new stealth tax, dressed up as a proposal to help hard-pressed buyers in the housing market. However, rather like the huge stamp duty hikes seen in recent years, which were introduced in the name of cooling down the housing market, while netting the Chancellor huge amounts of additional funds, HIPs will create a whole new tax scheme for the Treasury. Assuming annual home sales of around 1.3 million, it will take an average HIP price of only £770 to create a new billion-pound industry in this country. That would result in an additional £175 million going to the Chancellor each year in VAT. Moreover, the tax is regressive, as it seems quite possible that the cost of putting together a HIP for a studio flat might be the same as for a mansion.

My first objection to HIPs is therefore that they add another part to the complex process of buying and selling a property and will probably not remove any of the other hurdles. Currently, some 80 per cent. of buyers do not have a formal or second-level survey. Those who are borrowing to fund the purchase—that is, the home buyers—consider the lender's valuation survey, which is, after all, designed solely to protect the lender's interest, to be sufficient. However, lenders are not compelled to accept the new home condition report as a basis for valuation, and many lenders have signalled that it will be no substitute for a full valuation.

The Government say that the pack will have "very little impact" on the number of completed sales taking place each year, yet research has suggested that up to 30 per cent. fewer properties would come to the market if the seller had to pay for a pack. Even if only 10 per cent. of properties were taken out of the supply side of the market, the likely result would be inflationary to house prices. In turn, the decline in the volume of homes coming to the market would doubtless exacerbate many of the problems in the housing market, such as having too many empty homes, and increase the pressure for more new homes to be built, because of supply shortfalls of existing homes in the market.

It is tempting to think of the housing market as constantly rising, as it has been over the past decade, but even more alarmingly, HIPs will have a deeply negative impact in the event of a falling housing market. Liquidity will dry up. Those facing negative equity who might be forced by their financial circumstances to sell—thanks to a job loss during a recession, for example—will be hit with a charge of up to £1,000 to create the HIP, on top of all the other miseries involved in a distress sale of one's own home. Others affected could include those needing to downsize in the event of changed personal circumstances, such as job relocation or disability.

The potential cost of the HIP is made worse because the pack has no shelf life. As some of the information to be contained in it is date-sensitive, such as local authority searches, the pack will need to be updated, at further expense to the seller, especially in a slow market. No responsible estate agent, surveyor or lawyer would recommend that a purchaser should rely on a potentially outdated report. I foresee that when the market is slow, a lot of money will be spent on updating the pack.

As to enforcement, as we know, the duty to provide a HIP lies with the estate agent. However, the penalty for not doing so is only £200. If the transaction fee for the estate agent is a few thousand pounds, the temptation to skim the HIP or not provide it at all may be too great. That links to enforcement, which presents a further problem. According to my information, enforcement will be down to council trading standards officers, who are thin on the ground these days.

In my experience in Hammersmith and Fulham under the outgoing and very incompetent Labour council, it is tough to get such officers to investigate things such as prima facie examples of dodgy builders who, having given promises about loft extensions, make off with tens of thousands of pounds from old ladies. Generally, the trading standards officers are not interested in knowing. The fine for not providing a HIP is only £200, and my expectation—it is only that—is that many in trading standards will simply not bother to pursue the matter.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): I thank my hon. Friend for his help in preparing my ten-minute Bill, which, as he is aware, comes back in October. I am sure that the Minister will be interested in one of the problems that we both faced—the number of HIPs providers there in the first place. There are so few. Does my hon. Friend agree that not only can we not enforce HIPs, but they cannot be provided in the first place? The people to provide them are not there, and such people cannot be trained before HIPs come into operation.

Mr. Hands: I agree absolutely. I was alarmed to see reports in The Times on Saturday about how few trained HIPs officers there are.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Given that situation, does my hon. Friend not think that it would be eminently sensible for the Minister to delay the onset of HIPs by holding a meaningful pilot so that we can see their impact on the housing market and consider how we can develop more HIPs consultants?

Mr. Hands: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. It would be helpful to have a real pilot, although I was not going to go down that route, given the limited time available. My personal view is that HIPs should be abolished entirely rather than reformed.

I come back to trading standards. I have also not heard of any additional funding for local authority trading standards to finance effective policing. I bring another interesting consequence of the HIP to the attention of the Chamber. Statistically, the majority of properties in Britain will have changed hands in 20 to 25 years' time, and the Government will then have an extensive and detailed database of all those properties. It would be cynical to suggest that that could form the basis of a tax, but the temptation would be there; in the hands of the current Chancellor of the Exchequer, there would certainly be the potential for a new Domesday Book in this country, although I doubt whether he would have that job by then. On a similar issue, anybody—not only those genuinely interested in buying the property—will be able to access the information given in a HIP. I see a field day for snoopers intrigued by the homes of their outgoing or incoming neighbours.

Finally, I turn to the likely impact on my constituency of Hammersmith and Fulham. It has a huge number of flats, which make up 71 per cent. of its homes. That compares with a national average of 19 per cent. Even without HIPs, the young professional flat owner gets a very raw deal under new Labour; that is part of the reason why Hammersmith and Fulham turned a dark shade of blue earlier this month. In marginal wards, the number of flat owners is even more stark. In North End ward, 88 per cent. of homes are flats; in Avonmore and Brook Green ward, the figure is 86 per cent.; in Addison ward, it is 79 per cent.; and so on.

Such areas are characterised by people who have bought a one or two-bedroomed flat. They already pay hugely more in taxes generally, but when it comes to a home sale under HIPs, the buyer in my constituency will already be whacked by stamp duty of 3 per cent. or occasionally 4 per cent. on the price—cash that they need to find up front. The seller will now also be hit by an up-front tax of up to £1,000 to buy a HIP.

I spoke to one prospective HIP provider yesterday, who thought that for the larger firms, the turnaround time to build the HIP might be as short as four to five days. However, it would take weeks or even longer if the property were leasehold, as there is currently no provision to force a managing agent to supply the information. Yet that is crucial in my constituency and across London, where there are tens of thousands of leasehold properties.

The problems really begin when it comes to getting information out of a managing agent. I spoke to a London estate agent yesterday who told me that HIPs are particularly feared in London because of the large number of leasehold properties. Managing agents are often notoriously unresponsive unless their financial interests are directly threatened; they have no real incentive to provide the relevant information for a HIP. Rightly, the big fear is that they simply will not deliver it on time, the market will get slowed up and the reputation of HIPs in general will start to suffer in London, which could have a disastrous impact on the reputation of the whole scheme.

There are well-rehearsed arguments against HIPs, and I have not detailed all of them, as I am sure my colleagues would agree. I am yet to see, other than directly from the new billion-pound-a-year HIP industry, any real answers from the Government to those concerns. I and my constituents want to see not more promises but, if hon. Members will excuse the pun, a complete HIPs replacement.

4.41 pm

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship today, Mr. Bercow. May I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) and the Minister, who is in her place, for giving me permission to speak in this debate?

As my hon. Friend said, home information packs mark a significant state intervention in the property market, with potentially disruptive consequences for consumer confidence. That is why I would like to give the Minister the opportunity today to try to reassure consumers. Her work is formidable; if one examines the scale of opposition to HIPs, one will see that nearly every interested group in the property market has deep worries about the implementation of the scheme. Independent estate agents, and indeed the National Association of Estate Agents, have outlined deep opposition to the scheme. Only this week, 80 per cent. of building society chief executive officers have said that they believe that HIPs will have a negative impact on the housing market.

Why does the Minister believe that that is so? Building society chief executive officers say that HIPs will add costs to the home-buying process, not reassure prospective buyers or speed up the process, and reduce the number of properties in the market. If those with a direct stake in the effective functioning of the market are so worried, what can the Minister say to reassure them? It is not just building societies; the Law Society has also signalled its concern, as has the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors.

The Council of Mortgage Lenders has also tried its best to ensure that the scheme will work, but only this week it spelled out its concerns again. The majority of lenders have made it clear that in a significant number of cases the home condition report, to which my hon. Friend referred, will simply not be enough to guarantee a loan; an evaluation or survey will be required. There will be additional costs for both seller and buyer, additional taxation for the Chancellor and additional pain in the market.

The Minister is fond of saying that consumer groups favour the home information pack. Will she tell us which groups—in the plural—actually favour the pack? As far as we can see, only one organisation representing consumers has made representations in favour of the pack. Will she tell us on what statistical basis she can say with confidence that consumers welcome it?

Talking of a statistical basis, the evidence basis for the introduction of the HIP is, as I am sure we all know, the "Key research on easier home buying and selling" document produced by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions in 1998. However, that evidence was based on fewer than 30 transactions. Will the Minister tell us what evidence base she has for her belief that HIPs will bring the benefits of which her Department has boasted?

Talking of rigorous evidence, my hon. Friend referred to the need for a dry run. In an answer that the Minister was kind enough to give me, she said that a dry run would operate on an entirely voluntary basis. Indeed, we understand that it will be overseen by the HIPs providers themselves. How can the providers sit as judge and jury in their own case?

In November 2004, the Lord Rooker indicated that a compulsory dry run would take place in a local area. Has that promise now been abandoned? Will clear benchmarks and criteria be published by which we can judge the success of the dry run or will providers of the packs simply be encouraged to give them to buyers, say they have been a tremendous success and allow the Department to proceed willy-nilly without the firm guarantee of consumer confidence that we need? If we are to have a successful dry run we need home inspectors. How many home inspectors are qualified? We know that there are only 200, because of the extensive investigative work of Valerie Elliott, the consumer affairs correspondent of The Times.

The Minister says that 4,000 home inspectors are in training. It takes only five days for someone who knows something about property to qualify. However, before Christmas 1,750 people were in training, and five months—not five days—later, only 200 have qualified. What guarantees do we have that there will be enough home inspectors and that those people will have any real background in the construction industry, surveying or any of the skills required to provide consumer confidence? Those matters go to the heart of ensuring that the housing market functions effectively.

The Minister will be aware that there is a new consensus, led by my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) and my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), on the need to increase housing supply and help first-time buyers. It would be a tragedy if that new consensus were disrupted by the introduction of an ill-thought-through intervention in the market. I invite the Minister to join me and the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who have signed my early-day motion, and to forge a new cross-party consensus to find a voluntary way forward.

Several hon. Members rose—

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Gentleman's elastic interpretation of two minutes must not be replicated by the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown).

4.46 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I take your stricture absolutely, Mr. Bercow, and I am looking carefully at the clock. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) and declare to the House an interest in the matter as a chartered surveyor.

I want to raise one or two points that have not yet been raised in the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) referred to Valerie Elliott's article quoting the figures obtained from the Minister's Department, showing that there are currently only 196 trained inspectors, and that 4,000 are in training and 7,000 are needed for the 1.5 million sales that take place each year. The problem is obtaining inspectors of the right quality.

That brings me to my next point. Many of the inspectors will be of low quality, and have low-quality training. It takes five years to train a chartered surveyor. The people involved will be trained in a year and will be required to carry out at least four home surveys a day, whereas I as a chartered surveyor would probably deal with only two a day, because I would be much more thorough.

The next question to arise is how the inspectors will obtain professional indemnity insurance, especially given that that is likely to be expensive because of their low quality and because purchasers will be able to sue them if their inspections are deficient. Also, how does the Minister think that the energy efficiency reports system will be ready to come into full operation for 1.5 million houses next year?

I end with a quote from Valerie Elliott, who says in her article that there could be "a year of panic selling to avoid the extra costs that will be incurred with the pack" which is "likely to be followed by a stagnant market".

I recommend to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath that when he is in the Minister's place in four years' time he should drop sellers packs and instead concentrate on speeding up the efficiency of electronic searches and conveyancing. That will do more to help the market than the home sellers packs will ever do.

4.48 pm

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Yvette Cooper): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) on securing today's debate and choosing such an interesting and important subject.

Opposition Members are opposed to home information packs. That is obviously not news; I know that many of them have been opposed to them for a long time. It is perhaps a shame, however, that they have not taken advantage of their change of leader and change of direction to the compassionate conservatism that the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) is very proud to proclaim at every opportunity to have a rethink about this policy issue. They may claim to be compassionate Conservatives, but they are still clearly not consumers' Conservatives. They are still, on this issue, the party of the vested interest.

The hon. Member for Surrey Heath said that there was concern on the part of interested groups. That is certainly right; there is concern from groups with vested interests. There is concern among groups that make money from the current process and do not want to innovate and to change the way in which they operate. We recognise that those concerns exist. However, it is also right for us to take consumers' interests seriously. The biggest consumer group in the country, Which?, has been campaigning for home information packs for a long time. Frankly, Opposition Members are unwise to set themselves against such a major consumer interest group, because that independent voice has been calling for the change for a long time.

Michael Gove: I asked the Minister directly if she could name more than one consumer group that supported the introduction of home information packs, and what the evidence base was. Apart from the Consumers Association, can she name any other groups?

Yvette Cooper: Let me give the hon. Gentleman the evidence base to which we refer. The Consumers Association conducted a survey in which it asked 1,000 people who had bought or sold their homes at the end of 2003 how useful they thought it would be to receive a HIP, including details about the condition of their property, and 82 per cent. said that they thought it would be very useful. A year later, in a follow-up survey, 1,824 people were asked for their views on HIPs, but on the assumption that they would have to pay for them. They were specifically asked whether they would be in favour of HIPs if they had to pay for them as sellers, and 78 per cent. said that they would be a good idea. Not only has Which? done its consumer research; it has considered the process in some detail.

I shall respond to some of the points made in the debate. We have to start from the perspective that the current system is not working. It is madness, as we waste £350 million a year on failed transactions. That is the case partly because people make an offer based on limited information. They then start paying for more information through searches and a survey, and the legal fees start ratcheting up—and then the sale falls through. Along comes another potential buyer who has to pay again for all that information. That can happen again and again. Such duplication is hugely inefficient.

Mr. Hands: Will the Minister give way?

Michael Gove: Will the Minister give way?

Yvette Cooper: I shall give way once more, but I have ensured that all hon. Members have had time to speak in the debate, and I want to respond to the points that have been made. I shall give way once now, but I shall not give way again until I have made some progress.

Mr. Hands: Does the Minister accept that her figure of £350 million is nevertheless massively less than the figure of anything between £700 million and £1 billion—the cost of the HIPs industry—and that the net loss to the consumer will be more than double?

Yvette Cooper: That is complete nonsense. The fact is that the information provided by HIPs is largely provided in the current process. However, it is now provided at the end of the process and only after a huge amount of money and time has been spent trying to get hold of information that may not be needed because the sale has fallen through.

That is a waste. It is a market inefficiency and a classic example of a market failure, with a lack of proper transparency and proper information. Let us try to imagine making an offer for a car without knowing whether it had passed its MOT. People would not do it. Why should we have a system in which someone makes an offer, the seller accepts it, but the deal is done on the basis of very limited information? With such a huge asset and when so much information is required before the deal can be completed, why should we use a system that causes inefficiency and protracted delays and that has such huge costs?

Those who seek to defend the existing system are trying to defend the indefensible. The question is how to improve it. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) has started to list those who want to defend the current system, all of whom currently make money from it. It is important to consider the consumer's perspective. The approach is about preventing duplication, providing information up front and dealing with the lack of transparency. At the moment, when somebody is waiting for information, they do not know whether it is the fault of their solicitor or the other party's solicitor, or even whether it is the estate agent's fault. People can spend much of the time in a fog, but if the information is provided up front in a home information pack, they will know exactly what the information is, and also who will be responsible if it is not available.

The pack also makes it much quicker to get a mortgage valuation. I know that people are complaining that mortgage lenders will not use home condition reports, but those reports will be far more robust and comprehensive than the valuations and surveys on which mortgage lenders now base their valuations. In practice, mortgage lenders will take home condition reports seriously because they will be based on the work of home inspectors, who will be properly certified.

Hon. Members have made important points about the number of home inspectors, and it is clear that home inspectors need to be in place in time for the commencement of the home information pack system on 1 June 2007. The time that it takes surveyors to complete the courses is relatively limited. Hon. Members are right to say that we must ensure that home inspectors are in place, but it is now May 2006, and there are still 12 months to go before the new system is in place.

Another benefit is that home information packs will be free to first-time buyers. Opposition Members have expressed a sudden interest in the fortunes of first-time buyers. They are suddenly concerned and claim to want to represent and improve the lot of first-time buyers. First-time buyers will get for free the information that they currently have to pay for. Most of us are buyers and sellers, so there will not be that much difference for us, but the new system will make a difference to first-time buyers, because they will get the same information for free.

We will also prevent first-time buyers facing huge bills after the process, as many currently do, because of problems with the property of which they were not aware. That affects many first-time buyers. People may be prevented from taking on debts that they cannot sustain or afford because they did not know something about the property in advance.

Energy performance certificates will also be provided. The hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) referred to energy efficiency information. That is extremely important. The new system is a great opportunity to provide people with information about the energy efficiency of a home at the beginning of the process. Opposition Members are supposedly interested in the environment now, too. Is it their official policy to support energy performance certificates? If they do not, many of their warm words on energy—

Michael Gove: Is it not the case that those certificates are required under European law anyway and that there is no requirement to have home information packs in order to make them available?

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Gentleman is right. There is no requirement to have a home information pack in the European system, but under the European system we have to bring in energy performance certificates by 2009. Home information packs allow us to introduce them in 2007 and in a cost-effective way. Rather than expecting people to pay separately and additionally for energy performance certificates, we can incorporate them into the home condition report at a much cheaper cost for consumers. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is saying that he is still in favour of energy performance certificates, although I notice that he did not take the opportunity to say whether his party is in favour of them. Perhaps he needs to clarify his position and tell us whether he believes that the certificates should be paid for separately and additionally, rather than incorporated cost-effectively into a home condition report, as we have advocated.

Opposition Members are right: this is about a transformation in the home buying and selling market. The new system is an important aspect alongside e-conveyancing and provides us with a way of making e-conveyancing more effective. Significantly, it is also about encouraging new entrants into the market and making it more transparent. Hon. Members may be aware that Asda has said that it wants to enter the estate agency market and will provide home information packs for consumers for free. The reason why Asda is saying that it can do so is that estate agents' fees have, in many cases, remained the same. The proportion has remained the same at a time when house prices have doubled, so estate agents have had big increases in the fee that they receive per transaction. Because of the lack of transparency in that area, it is right to encourage new entrants and to promote home information packs as an important part of creating greater transparency.

Hon. Members expressed concern about whether the new system will have an impact on the market. The hon. Member for Bridgwater has quoted the Danish estate agents association as saying that the packs would have a big impact on the market. The man who was chief executive of Denmark's estate agents association until the end of February this year has written to the hon. Gentleman and has copied me into his correspondence. He says:

"I notice that you are quoting me" as saying that

"'there are 25 per cent. fewer houses now on the market as a direct result of HIPs.'"

He continues:

"May I ask you from where you have got this rubbish?...The number of houses sold in Denmark has gone up all the time since the beginning of the 90s...I can inform you that IBM and Public Affairs Group published a huge report about the Danish HCR-system in January 2006...90 per cent. of the consumers were...pleased with the system and they came up with suggestions on how to make the system even better...I would only be pleased to send the report to you—it's only a couple of hundred pages...in Danish."

I concede that I have not read the report myself, because it is in Danish—

John Bercow (in the Chair): Order. I apologise for interrupting the Minister, but we must move on to the next debate.

Solvent Abuse

5 pm

Mr. John MacDougall (Glenrothes) (Lab): I am pleased to have secured this debate and to have this opportunity to raise the subject of solvent abuse, particularly abuse of cigarette lighter fuel.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on his new responsibilities. I wish him well and every success.

I welcome the document from the Home Office and the Department of Health, in partnership with the Department for Education and Skills, entitled "Out of Sight?...not out of mind" on children, young people and volatile substance abuse. It is difficult to work out the reason for trends, but I note from page 6 of the document that they seem to exist. In 1993, there was a tremendous amount of substance abuse, particularly in males, which increased slightly in 1994, but generally fell in 1997. I cannot say that that was because of the change in Government, because there seems to have been a dramatic increase from 1997—with the exception of 1998 when no male deaths were evident—when the trend increased again, as opposed to that from 1993 to 1997 when it fell. There must be a reason for that trend and that reason is important in trying to assess how we can deal with this serious matter more effectively.

I bring this Adjournment debate before the Chamber because of the tragic death of my constituent, Lee O'Brien, who died in January 2003 after inhaling lighter fluid. Lee was only 16. I pay tribute to Lee's father, John O'Brien, and his family who set up the Lee O'Brien Solvent Trust—LOST is, sadly, an appropriate name. I believe, as do Lee's family, that highlighting such tragic cases is educational for young people. The message—not just legislation—must go out to young people that solvent abuse, even the first time, can cost them their life, because it is a life-threatening practice.

Lee's family immediately started a campaign calling for a change in the legislation on the sale of solvents so that the terrible tragedy that happened to Lee would be less likely to happen to other young people. The family have campaigned tirelessly and have achieved a great deal. The Queen gave her seal of approval at a gala dinner not long ago to honour pioneers of the nation.

I was pleased to receive John O'Brien and the LOST campaign here in Westminster when we presented a massive petition with more than 15,000 signatures to the Prime Minister at No. 10 Downing street. I tabled an early-day motion, which, with no effort, instantly gained the support and backing of more than 70 MPs who wanted to show that we are dealing with a serious issue.

Lee's death was not an isolated incident. According to Re-Solv, a national organisation that was set up in 1994 to prevent solvent abuse, volatile substances kill more young people than any controlled drug. I would like to thank Re-Solv for all its work on this matter. It works hard with the all-party group on solvent abuse and was established because of the scale of the problem.

Figures from the European Monitoring Centre for Drugs and Drug Addiction reveal that one in seven 15 to 16-year-olds in Britain abuse solvents. Thousands of teenagers are putting their lives at risk by sniffing glue, lighter fluid and other substances. I have heard of some remarkable and inventive cases of youngsters setting fire to plastic bins because the make-up of the bins and the toxic fumes from them can give them a kind of high. Sadly, that inventiveness is all going to the wrong purposes—purposes that can bring about tragedies.

Some 1,700 deaths related to such substances were recorded among young people in the UK between 1983 and 2000. On average, more than one young person dies in the UK every week because of solvent abuse. More worryingly, great concern remains about the level of deaths among under-18s from the abuse of cigarette lighter fluid. Statistics gathered before 1999, prior to the introduction of regulations on cigarette lighter refills, show that the figures almost doubled in 2000. Butane cigarette lighter refills now account for 64 per cent. of all substance abuse deaths. The statistics go on and on. St. George's hospital medical school's current report provides figures for 2001 on deaths from solvent and volatile substance abuse. For the first time, there was strong evidence that disposable cigarette lighters were involved in substance abuse deaths.

For under-18s, there has been no sustained decrease in deaths since 1999. It is therefore clear that we face a nationwide problem. It is not confined to one area of the UK. Young people remain the group most associated with solvent abuse. Between 1971 and 2000, most deaths from substance abuse occurred in the 14 to 18-year-old range. There are even recorded cases of children under the age of 10 dying from the effects of solvent abuse.

The statistics in the graph show that solvent abusers can be male or female. There seems to be no connection, other than a general trend up and down over the years. However, the graph indicates higher numbers of solvent-related deaths among boys. There is no stereotypical solvent abuser. People who abuse solvents can come from any social, cultural or ethnic background, and we have to take that into account in addressing the problem. We cannot tackle the issue by targeting one problem area. It covers a range of areas and does confine itself to one location or type of person. We must therefore combat the problem nationally.

One of the most distinctive factors about solvent abuse is that the products involved have a legitimate everyday use. The age at which young people experiment with such substance abuse is generally much younger than for controlled substances. We all know that there have been many debates, questions and early-day motions in the House on solvent abuse, and it is time to ask the Government to strengthen the regulations even further, particularly on the sale of cigarette lighter fuel.

Re-Solv was started 10 years ago to combat the problem, and young people are still dying despite its best efforts. There are great antisocial behaviour problems, as well as crime-associated problems, with substance abuse. There are many reports of serious crimes being committed while people are high on lighter fuel. That is not to mention the impact that solvent abuse has on the people around those involved, such as their family, and the wider community.

In Scotland, the LOST campaign has already prompted the introduction of a test-purchasing scheme, which was piloted in my local region of Fife. It was aimed at stamping out the illegal sale of lighter fluid to young people. Test purchasing should be increased. One crucial method of preventing deaths by inhalation is to investigate vigorously the prospects of making the habit abhorrent. Reducing the cans' capacity would result in there not being enough lighter fuel to achieve a temporary high.

On the preventive side of the problem, a retail campaign working with the British Retail Consortium, the Government and schools is essential to make clear through educational programmes the dramatic and immediate threat that exists, even when someone is inhaling for the first time. It does not take a number of occasions to cause death, as Lee O'Brien showed, tragically.

Encouraging vigilance among shopkeepers not to sell several canisters of lighter fuel at once should be paramount in any campaign by the British Retail Consortium. We have to increase awareness of the tragedy behind the fact that a shopkeeper may make a profit from selling six tins of lighter fuel but the youngster who has purchased them has no intention of using the fuel for lighting cigarettes—although that in itself would kill them, never mind the inhalation of the fuel. It is quite clear why that purchase is being made, and through the British Retail Consortium we must seek co-operation with shopkeepers to ensure that they are vigilant and wise about discouraging such purchases.

The way forward is much tighter and stricter enforcement of the law. In Staffordshire, the council has three trading standards officers to police the sale of cigarette lighter fuel. Perhaps, therefore, consideration should be given to the nomination of an enforcement agency, which could well be trading standards. It would achieve a great deal if consideration were given to such a measure.

I am sure that the measures that I have outlined, taken together as a package, will make less likely unnecessary deaths such as that of Lee O'Brien. I re-emphasise that there are no safe levels with solvent abuse; as I said, it can kill the first time or the 100th time. As I mentioned, education is vital on the preventive side. With that in mind, I gave evidence to the Scottish Parliament's Public Petitions Committee, recognising, of course, the role of the devolved structures and the differences in terms of the educational role. However, solvent abuse is a UK issue, and consumer legislation is UK-wide. My efforts in Scotland and in Glenrothes have included working with the voluntary sector, and I congratulate all of those bodies on their important, unselfish and caring work.

I congratulate the Home Office and the Department of Health on their findings in the document "Out of Sight?...not out of mind", which recommends better education, and that we should deal with volatile substances locally and reduce their availability and accessibility. They are commendable areas to emphasise and concentrate on for the future. If we do so collectively, that will make a profound difference in reducing the number of deaths from this appalling practice; young people do not realise the life-threatening nature of the experience that they are about to encounter.

I call on Government agencies and Departments to implement the recommendations as soon as possible. All too often, we reach an awareness stage, we collate and note the information and the drive is there to amass the information—I hope that that drive does not end and that the Minister, in his new position, will take the matter forward with great vigour. It is our task to make children and young people aware and to protect them from such dangers.

5.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Vernon Coaker): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glenrothes (Mr. MacDougall) on securing this important debate, and on the way in which he presented his points. Before I forget, may I also thank him for welcoming me to my position? It is kind of him to give me his good wishes.

I acknowledge the work that my hon. Friend has done to highlight this important issue on behalf of his constituents and other families who have the experienced tragic consequences of volatile substance abuse, or VSA, as I shall call it. On behalf of the Government, I pay tribute to the O'Brien family for the way in which they have tried to do something following Lee's awful and tragic death.

Tackling the use of drugs and other substances by young people, including VSA, is a key element of the Government's national drug strategy. As my hon. Friend will know, some responsibilities for tackling VSA are devolved to the Scottish Executive and others are UK-wide. Broadly, the regulations under the Consumer Protection Act 1987 regarding offences of selling butane lighter refills are UK-wide, although there are some differences in Scottish law. Shopkeepers in Scotland can be prosecuted under common law if it can be proved that they knew that the product would be abused by the purchaser irrespective of age.

My hon. Friend made the point well that it is important that laws are enforced. I hope that, through this debate, the message will go out loud and clear that the law is there to protect people. Let us see that law enforced to prevent the tragedies that he talked about.

Education and health make important contributions to the comprehensive approach required to tackle this issue. Those areas are also devolved, but we work closely with the devolved Administrations, sharing experience and good practice, and where appropriate, achieving economies of scale with joint work. My hon. Friend will be aware that his work to secure the piloting and introduction of test purchasing in Scotland, which is a technique used successfully in England by trading standards officers to control the supply of volatile substances to under-18s, alongside other age-restricted products, has been quite successful. The Lord Advocate has announced that test purchasing can now be used in Scotland following a successful pilot involving under-age sales of tobacco. Alongside other action, the Scottish Executive are funding a training programme for trading standards officers on test purchasing. I hope that that training will make that action much more effective.

I shall outline the action that we have taken in England under the wider drugs strategy, as well as specific action on VSA in both parts of the UK. Helping young people avoid the harms and risks associated with drugs and other substances requires a comprehensive approach. I know from my work before I came to the House that that approach is important: I was a teacher with specific responsibilities for drug education, which involved trying to encourage young people to avoid the lure of substance abuse. A comprehensive approach was needed not only in what the school was doing, but more widely across all the agencies and including the family from which the young person whom one felt was at risk came.

We need tough action to crack down on dealers, particularly where young people are at risk. We need to provide effective substance misuse education and credible information to young people and their parents. We also need to ensure that those most at risk are identified and targeted early, and that specialist support and treatment are available for those already using drugs and other substances. Sometimes the joined-upness of the system could be improved.

We have made good progress in England through our young people and drugs programme, in which the Home Office is working hard with the Department for Education and Skills and the Department of Health to deliver evidence-based interventions designed to reduce the impact of drug and substance misuse on individuals and the community.

The use of class A drugs by young people is stable, with encouraging reductions in the use of some other drugs. For example, as compared with 1988, the proportion of 16 to 24-year-olds reporting the use of cannabis in the past year has fallen by 16 per cent. Acquisitive crime, to which drug related crime makes a significant contribution, fell by 12 per cent. in the year to April 2005. Therefore, within our overall approach to drugs, we are taking specific action on volatile substance misuse.

We introduced the Cigarette Lighter Refill (Safety) Regulations 1999, which banned the supply or sale of butane cigarette lighter refills to people under the age of 18. It is incumbent on us to ensure that people are aware of those laws and, as my hon. Friend pointed out, that the law is enforced and action is taken against offenders. Where we have training for trading standards officers, it is to be hoped that they will use the law to full effect.

Although VSA is not an offence in itself, the supply or sale of any product to a person under the age of 18 with the knowledge that they are going to inhale it for the purposes of abuse is an offence. We need to ensure that people are aware of the law as it stands and that that law is enforced.

We have also introduced a system of voluntary warning labels for aerosols and other abusable products. We published the first ever national framework for VSA in July 2005, which sets out an action plan aimed specifically at reducing deaths and harms associated with VSA. The action plan identifies new interventions and drives forward those for whose effectiveness we already have good evidence. There is not much point in having a strategy, for all its fine words, unless we think that it is going to work. That is the point. My stay in the Home Office will be related to trying to ensure that what we have written down in paper translates into action in communities.

The key priority areas identified in the framework include providing better information about VSA. The Frank campaign has become a credible source of information and advice for young people and their parents. More than 1.3 million calls have been made to the Frank helpline, and there have been 11.3 million visits to the talktofrank.com website and more than 82,000 e-mails sent to and replied to by Frank.

In 2005-06, about 4 per cent. of calls to the Frank helpline were about solvents. In response, the Frank website has increased the information that it provides on VSA. Frank leaflets are in the process of being revamped, with a greater emphasis on VSA. In addition, Frank helpline operators have received extra training on VSA better to equip themselves with calls from young people, parents and people working with those at risk.

The Scottish Executive also have a comprehensive programme of action under way. That includes providing advice on solvents through the "Know the score" information line, the distribution of materials to retailers in 2005 to raise awareness of the law governing sales of the items in question and the provision of drug education, including about solvents, in nearly all schools. The Scottish Executive have also supported the development of the Young Scot card, accredited under the British Retail Consortium's proof-of-age standards scheme. To date, 160,000 PASS-accredited cards have been issued. My hon. Friend will be interested to know that there will be a full roll-out of the scheme to all 32 Scottish local authorities in the next few months. As part of the package, the Scottish Executive have funded the production by the Scottish Retail Consortium of a leaflet that reminds retailers of the age restrictions applicable to the purchase of various goods, which covers the point we made earlier about people knowing about the law. The Scottish Executive have also provided Re-Solv with a three-year training grant with effect from 2005-06.

Schools have a key role to play. More young people need drug education in schools, including on VSA. Nearly 10,000 schools have achieved the national healthy schools standard, which includes substance misuse education. We need to ensure that drugs education is fully effective. The Home Office is funding the blueprint programme, which is the UK's biggest drug education research project. A key element of the blueprint programme is a health policy component designed to reduce the availability of age-restricted products, including volatile substances, where the programme was delivered. That included proof-of-age schemes, training for retailers and, where necessary, test purchasing activity. Final results from the research will be available by the end of 2007, and they will help to inform the future development of effective drug education.

We are ensuring that those whose work brings them into contact with VSA in the health, education, social care, community and youth justice sectors have the confidence and skills to identify and respond to VSA. We are also ensuring that those who need help with drugs and other substances can receive specialist support.

More young people are accessing targeted interventions through children's services and the youth justice system. More than 110,000 young people have engaged in "Positive Futures", a social inclusion programme that uses sport and leisure activities to engage with disadvantaged and socially marginalised young people. There are 116 "Positive Futures" projects running in high-crime and deprived areas. "Positive Futures" provides training for project staff on substance misuse, including VSA. It is important for us not only to have the enforcement, but to work to tackle some of the deprivation and other causes that may lead disaffected young people to abuse substances.

In England, 80 per cent. of local authorities have identified tackling substance misuse as a key priority in their plans for children and young people as part of the local delivery of "Every Child Matters". The VSA framework has identified butane as a priority. It is imperative that we make butane cigarette lighter refills as far as possible impracticable for abuse by inhaling, especially by children and young people, as that is still the biggest cause of VSA deaths among under-18s. Action in that area could have a dramatic effect, and I am pleased that the VSA framework has targeted it as a key priority.

It is important that all those working with vulnerable children and young people play their part in addressing the VSA needs of those in their care, and that all children and young people receive effective education about VSA. As my hon. Friend has pointed out, statistics from the St. George's hospital medical school show that deaths from VSA are at an all-time low.

However—this is the important point—51 deaths in 2003 are still far too many. That means that in our country, approximately one young person every week dies from VSA. Six of those deaths were in Scotland, which is the lowest number for several years—but it is still far too many. As my hon. Friend pointed out, VSA is responsible for more deaths in young people under 15 than illegal drugs.

To conclude, the Government take very seriously the points that my hon. Friend made. We will consider reducing the capacity of the fuel cans, as he mentioned. We are reviewing that. It is about enforcing the law and ensuring that we make our young people aware, and the message that has to go out from here today is that one death a week among our young people from VSA shows that this is an important debate. My hon. Friend was right to raise this subject and the Government are trying to give it the priority that it needs. Far too often, other illegal drugs are mentioned and VSA gets forgotten. That is something that we must ensure does not happen, and my hon. Friend's debate has given us the opportunity to put forward what we are doing. Working together, we can ensure that we reduce the number of deaths still further.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Five o'clock.

West Coast Route Modernisation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watts.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Lady Winterton. The debate is timely given that this week we published the west coast main line progress report, which I commend to all hon. Members as good holiday reading. I am sure that most will find it fascinating. I am grateful for the opportunity to give details of the latest progress to be made on the west coast route modernisation project, and plans for action in the next few years.

I remind hon. Members that Britain has the fastest growing railway in Europe, and that over 1 billion passengers were carried last year—the highest number for more than 40 years. More than 40 per cent. of the trains and carriages have been replaced in the past 10 years, and Britain now has one of the youngest train fleets in Europe. The west coast main line, running between London Euston, the west midlands, the north-west, north Wales and Scotland is probably the busiest mixed-traffic railway in Europe. It carries 40 per cent. of the country's rail freight and handles both long distance and regional passenger services, as well as shorter distance commuter movements. It is certainly one of the oldest railways, with origins going back 168 years to June 1838, when passenger services commenced.

Since then, it has had mixed fortunes. It was once known as the premier line, partly because of the high volumes of traffic that it conveyed, but it was only partly modernised and electrified over core sections in the 1960s and 1970s. During the 1980s the then British Railways recognised that further renewal work was needed, and contemplated such action, but nothing was done at that time. The present west coast strategy on which the modernisation work is based was published in June 2003 after a period of extensive consultation and involvement with stakeholders, together with a considerable team effort within the railway industry. I congratulate Network Rail in particular on its role in turning round the project delivery and cost control.

The strategy emerged out of an urgent need to complete work that had started some years earlier, under a joint plan between the Virgin Rail Group and the defunct Railtrack company. That was developed during the period immediately after railway privatisation, when there was perhaps a great deal of naivety about how to achieve success in such an environment. The proposals at that time recognised the need to address the backlog in maintenance and renewals, as well as to increase capacity, but they were very reliant on new and unproven technology, such as moving block or in-cab signalling, which was found to be undeliverable. The plans were based on providing lots of express trains, but took little account of freight and local passenger train requirements. Costs were increasing at an alarming rate and delivery was slipping. Estimates of £13 billion or more were being quoted at that time.

An urgent review was necessary, as it was clear that the project was going nowhere. Railtrack entered into railway administration and shortly afterwards the Strategic Rail Authority was asked by the Government to review the whole project and to secure a clear way forward. That task is now led by the Department for Transport. The Government have been clear about exactly what is required—in particular, value for money. Through the strategy, the Government have defined the outputs, particularly in terms of train services, while Network Rail has the task of efficient delivery of the agreed specification and network operations. The passenger and freight train operators are responsible for service delivery and customer service.

The cornerstones of the 2003 strategy were quite simple and straightforward: first, to make up the backlog in maintenance and renewals while achieving value for money and addressing the decades of under-investment; secondly, to establish a sustainable maintenance regime that minimises disruption to passengers and freight traffic—once that work is over I expect the railway to be open seven days a week; and, thirdly, to provide extra capacity for anticipated growth in passenger and freight business. We are planning for 80 per cent. more passenger trains and capacity for up to 70 per cent. more freight business. Of course, all that is to be done on a busy working railway. Much has been done and there is more to come. I will speak about that in a moment.

A turnaround compared with the previous attempts to upgrade the line has been a reliance on proven technology, including, in one case, old block signalling. However, the new trains in particular have required new skills on the part of those looking after them day and night. At this stage I want to put on the record my thanks to all those involved in the rail industry for the way in which they have delivered and worked together.

What has been delivered? There have been line speed improvements throughout the route, including the ability to operate at 125 mph in tilt mode. Track renewals, overhead line overhaul and power supply upgrades have been carried out to handle the new business and resignalling schemes have included a new signalling centre at Rugby. There are also new platforms at Birmingham New Street, Wolverhampton and Stockport, with improved turn-back facilities at Tring, Birmingham International and Wigan, as well as platform extensions for the new Pendolino trains and the commuter services into London, and a flyover at Nuneaton and a new island platform.

Those developments have enabled new timetables to be introduced in accordance with the requirements of the strategy. To deliver the timetables two new fleets of trains have been successfully commissioned and are now in service. The core of operations is based on 53 nine-car Pendolino trains, operated by Virgin West Coast, but in close partnership with Alstom Trains. They are capable of working at 125 mph and of course have the tilt mechanism to negotiate at high speeds the many curves on the line—I think that we have to thank our forefathers for designing the railway with so many curves. They are now working with considerable reliability and I am pleased that the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) has managed to get back in time from his previous engagement using the west coast line. Forty-six of the trains are required for service each day and that is what is provided. There has been a step change in technical demands on both depot and train staff; it can be said that they have moved successfully from the hammer to the lap top. There are also 30 100-mph Desiro trains for the regional and more local services. However, they are equally capable of providing some longer distance services. A new maintenance depot is shortly to open for such trains at Northampton.

To return to the subject of timetables and services, all main line west coast services are operated by the Pendolino fleet. On the Manchester-London route, prior to September 2004, there was only an hourly service, with a journey time of almost two and three quarter hours. It now gets a half hourly service with a journey time of two hours and 15 minutes, and there are some fast services with a journey time of two hours and five minutes. By early 2009 there will be three trains an hour—effectively a turn up and go service—with average journey times of about two hours. Similar improvements apply on the London-Birmingham route, where journey times have decreased from one hour and 43 minutes to one hour and 30 minutes; that improvement will continue during 2008 to achieve journey times of just over one hour and 20 minutes in 2009. Importantly, at that time, service levels will also increase so that there will be a train every 20 minutes.

Turning to the north and Scotland, 125-mph running has also reached Scotland. My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) who chairs the all-party west coast main line group would have liked to be here today. He has been particularly active in bringing about better journey times to Carlisle and Scotland. Journey times on Anglo-Scottish services have already been reduced from more than five and a half hours to five hours, and on fast journeys four hours and 24 minutes; and in 2008 that will be reduced to four hours and 15 minutes.

The railway is regaining lost markets. Air travel previously dominated the London-Manchester corridor, but it no longer does. Before the 2004 timetable change, air had 60 per cent. of the total rail-air business between those points. Today, that position has been reversed and rail has 60 per cent. of the business and air the minority share. Rail travel is growing on the west coast route in terms of revenue as well as passenger numbers. In 2005-06 the figures were some 30 per cent. higher than in the year prior to the timetable change in September 2004. Performance is also much better. The strategy required 88 per cent. of trains to arrive within 10 minutes of their scheduled time. That has been more than achieved, with about 90 per cent. meeting the target. On the Silverlink County services, which provide commuter services from Northampton, Milton Keynes and London, the figure is over 95 per cent.

What is there to be completed? The bottleneck at Rugby is being removed and a much enlarged station is to be provided, which will also avoid the present conflicting movements at that busy junction. Maximum speeds will be raised from the present range of 60 to 75 mph to, in places, 125 mph. The station itself will get some improved services—for example, there will be increased frequencies to the west midlands and a new semi-fast Desiro service, giving new links along the Trent valley.

Four-tracking 14 miles of the Trent Valley line will remove another bottleneck and Milton Keynes station is to be enlarged. At this point, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey), who has been assiduous and redoubtable in her campaign for additional services, improvements and funding at Milton Keynes. I was pleased to visit her constituency the other day. Work at Weaver Junction and Wigan North Western will provide extra capacity. More car parking and passenger facilities are to be provided at the key west coast stations.

Costs are being kept firmly under control and well within the 2003 estimate of £9.9 billion. Once we get the work that I have outlined done, there will be more to be considered, such as removing the other bottleneck at Stafford and providing more train capacity. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) takes a significant interest in what happens on the rail network as a whole, but particularly in Stafford, and he is committed to getting improvements there.

The project is about investing in the country as a whole, but the north in particular. It is helping to rejuvenate many town and city centres, such as Liverpool and Manchester. There are opportunities elsewhere—the Potteries is now linked by a half-hourly service to London and Birmingham, and there are four trains an hour to Manchester. At around two hours' travelling time from London, Liverpool and Runcorn, which is in my constituency, are now closer to the capital as a result of the work. The project is firmly on course to be completed on time and within spending limits, and I commend it to the House.

2.40 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Allow me to liken this debate to a journey by train, Lady Winterton. Let us imagine the journey from Euston to Stafford on a new Virgin Pendolino. Just like this debate, it will start on time, it is a comfortable ride and it has an unplanned stop at Milton Keynes. I am hoping that, like the Pendolino train to Stafford, this debate will end early.

That is today's railway on the west coast main line, after the upgrade that we are debating, but like my hon. Friend the Minister, I want to take a few minutes to go back to the situation that existed before. Let me start in 1997, when I was a new Member of Parliament who travelled to Parliament by train. One day, after one of the terrible disasters that we had in the south, I could not get to London by train until 9 o'clock in the evening, having set off for the station at 7 o'clock in the morning. On other occasions, trains were cancelled at short notice and journeys took an hour longer than timetabled to arrive into London. That was the kind of railway system that was inherited in 1997.

Before I was a Member of Parliament, I took an interest as a local councillor in our railway service from Stafford to London. At the beginning of the 1990s, British Rail told the world that the west coast main line was worn out and that a major upgrade was urgently needed. Major investment was called for, but we did not get it. Instead, we got a rail privatisation that delayed any decisions about investment for most of the 1990s. We then had Railtrack making the decisions, but its strategic and financial failings were arguably uncovered as a result of the west coast main line project. It was beyond Railtrack's ability to come up with a scheme that it could cost and deliver before it went the way that it did.

Then came Network Rail, and I am pleased to say that it was like a breath of fresh air. I welcomed the early commitment to bring maintenance work back in-house, which was a sign of things to come. Indeed, sure enough, the report before us today tells us that Network Rail got to grips with the need to upgrade the west coast main line and came up with a proper planned project. So far, it has delivered on all the targets that it was set and it has done so within budget. That is a commendable achievement, for which I, like many of my constituents, thank Network Rail. It is fair to say that Network Rail is not simply throwing money at the problem because it is urgent and that it is planning expenditure and getting good value for money.

The west coast main line is a constituency interest of mine, and I should like to concentrate on three points from the report that affect my constituency. The first, which my hon. Friend mentioned, is the Trent Valley four-tracking. It is amazing to think how long we have waited for Trent Valley to have four lines instead of two, given that it is the major artery for the entire west coast as far north as Scotland. Until now, we have had a blockage at Trent Valley every year that I have been an MP, because four lines reduce to two, which clearly affects train speeds and line capacity.

If we are to meet our ambitious plan of seeing present growth continue into the future, as my hon. Friend said, the Trent Valley line cannot stay at two lines. It is therefore a delight to read in the report—the relevant section starts at page 31—of the progress that is being made in delivering four tracks through Trent Valley. It is also interesting to read in the report of the innovations that have been necessary to deliver the project, and I see some of them from the carriage window as I pass by. One is the haul road, which gives all-weather access along the entire length of the track. It is a temporary road that has been put in especially so that earthmoving and engineering equipment can get to the site, whatever the weather, at any time, night or day. That is an impressive development.

I also read with interest about the soil nailing of the embankment. That is an important part of the development, which is intended to satisfy neighbouring landowners. Some people do not appreciate that the entire Trent Valley four-tracking development is contained in the width of the existing train corridor, and soil nailing is part of the process of enabling an embankment to be built between the rail land and neighbouring land, without the need to take more land from the neighbours.

Although I have not seen this, because my constituency is slightly north of the location, I was also impressed to read about the so-called 4D modelling that has been used to simulate the work that will need to be done, and which has helped the project team to plan it. I read from the report that the technique has also helped communities along the route where the work is being done. At consultation meetings, they have been able to see what will happen in all three dimensions, as they would want to. All that work has been very innovative, and it explains to me how the whole upgrade, which is such a magnificent and major project, has been kept within budget.

One last innovation that I notice from the report involves significant investment by the rail industry and relates to the use of a parallel widening form to widen bridges. An extra railway bridge is put in, the railway is moved across on to it and the first bridge is then taken away. That is an impressive way of proceeding.

The place where the four-tracking project joins the existing four tracks is Colwich in my constituency. Unfortunately for those of my constituents who live in that beautiful village, which is on the edge of Cannock Chase and Shugborough lands, just outside the town of Stafford, the line divides between the route to Stafford and the route to Stoke-on-Trent, which makes Colwich a very busy place. Being a very busy place, it had a little railway station once upon a time, but that station was closed many decades ago. Ever since, residents who remember the station have said that it would be helpful to have one again. Unfortunately, given the speed of modern trains and the demands on the track, there is no way of having another station. I mention that, however, because there is still a great love of the idea of having a station in Colwich and because I would like the people who plan these things to read the report of this debate and say, "We did reject Colwich, but do we have to reject it for ever? Is there anything we can do about it in the future?" I would be glad if they went away and thought about that.

The second of the three points that I want to raise relates to Stafford railway station. This is perhaps where the Minister will think of me as persistent or assiduous—or whichever adjective he cares to use—because we have had a long-running correspondence on this issue. For a long time, I have been asking for work to be done at Stafford station to make it modern, efficient and consumer friendly. I have campaigned for lifts to be installed there and I have been helped in that by a public consultation. I am pleased to say that we finally got new passenger lifts last year, and it was a pleasure to see them installed. They now work perfectly.

There are two things that we do not have, however, and I have been arguing for them for a long time in public meetings in my constituency, correspondence with the Minister and meetings with Network Rail and Virgin Trains. The first is a modern foyer, with all the modern services, in the station. I simply have no news about when the issue will be dealt with, but it has been on the cards for a long time. The other development is a car park.

For a very long time, it has been part of Virgin's business plan that with the new Pendolino train should come a doubling of passenger traffic at Stafford railway station, but there has not been a single extra car parking space to accommodate all the customers who will be drawn from a wide area around Stafford, not just the town. The plans have been drawn up—as far as I know, they have even been submitted to the local council that decides planning permissions—but there is still no news of the investment to make a car park possible at Stafford station. The Department's progress report has a section on stations and car parks at page 39. There is a list of the next stations that will have some attention, and Stafford is not in that list. I would like the Minister to examine why. Will he remind himself of our correspondence over the past 18 months on this subject, and tell me when Stafford station will get those improvements?

Before I leave the subject of stations, I want to comment on another related aspect of the report. I am a strong supporter of the huge regeneration project at Birmingham New Street station. England's second city has a station that is well known to be inadequate in its design, in relation to its access at either end of the station for railway traffic, and inadequate for the passengers and other consumers who use the station premises. There are magnificent and ambitious plans to make it the kind of station that the second city of England deserves, and I support those plans wholeheartedly.

My third and last point regarding my constituency interest is that the report tells us of problems in and around the Stafford area on the network. Clearly, the biggest problem is just south of the railway station, where the lines from London and from Birmingham and Wolverhampton cross each other, causing congestion. They cross on a bit of a bend, which means that trains have to slow down twice as much—for the bend and the crossing of the lines. They have to slow down even if they are not stopping at Stafford station. I well understand the problem that that causes to the entire network, and I had meetings with the now defunct Strategic Rail Authority about a plan that was devised to solve that problem, which is discussed in the report at page 59. I read in the report that the plan for a "dive-under", which obviously means a bit of a tunnel on the approach to Stafford station to enable one side of the track to get under another without them crossing each other, has been dismissed.

The report discusses alternative works that are under consideration and being planned, but there is no detail in it; everything is vague. I ask the Minister—from the conversation that we had before the debate, I think that the answer will be yes—whether I can have meetings with those who are considering what should be done so that I can be involved in the discussions and learn what is planned for the area around Stafford station.

There are some points that I would like to be taken into account when the considerations are under way. First, not so long ago, an additional platform was built on the west side of Stafford station so that Royal Mail trains could load and unload mail at its immediate west-side neighbour, a Royal Mail sorting office, for sorting and delivery. I thought that that was a good, sustainable, green development. It is still quite a model development, but the rail mail journeys have stopped because of cost decisions taken by Royal Mail. I still have a fond desire for a resumption, one day, of rail mail at Stafford.

My second point about the development might conflict with my first. The land to the west of Stafford station is under serious consideration by landowners, developers and local councils for major redevelopment works in the not-too-distant future. It occurs to me that there might be opportunities for additional development involving railway land, and that that might be relevant to the funding and extent of the planned scheme. I would like Network Rail and other planners of the railway development to have regard to that.

Thirdly, I want to voice my support for the Institution of Civil Engineers and its campaign for a new, high-speed rail link from the north to the south of this country. I mention that point because it is likely that any route drawn on a map for such a high-speed link would probably include a line that passed through Stafford. Far from saying, "Draw the line somewhere else," I would welcome such a development. If we are talking about works that will need to be done in the not-too-distant future at Stafford for one purpose, perhaps we should have a weather eye to a possible future additional purpose and ensure that the plans are drawn up in such a way as to accommodate any such future additional development, which I would welcome and support. Those are my points about Stafford station.

I move to a general issue that is mentioned only briefly in the report: freight rail. I am a strong supporter of moving as much of our freight as possible around the country by train. I have always been disappointed that we never developed a system in which whole lorries could drive on to trains, be moved 300 miles across the country and then complete their journeys at the other end. We do not have much piggyback facility of that sort in this country, and many of the bridges and tunnels on our railway network would not allow it. As far as possible, when we carry out new works, we should plan for extra freight capacity, whether that means more lines—the report discusses a possible new line between Leicester and Birmingham—or making more of the existing network capable of carrying high-gauge traffic. The report also mentions the Felixstowe to Nuneaton line in that respect.

I urge the people responsible for the west coast upgrade to continue to think of ways to support and promote freight on our railway system as part of a package. Important though we the passengers might think our journeys are, freight journeys are also important to the future environment of our country and the world as a whole. We should therefore be determined to try to improve things.

The report rightly has a section that looks to the future and talks about how, after having made a huge investment, the wonderful improvement to the network will be sustained. That is a good section, and I hope that we will be able to hold future railways Ministers to account in delivering on it. My experience of using the railway system today is much better in terms of reliability, speed and comfort than it was in 1997. Much of that is thanks to the Pendolino stock of trains on the London to Stafford line, but of course, we now also have the Voyagers from Virgin and the new electric trains used by Central Trains between Birmingham, Liverpool and Manchester.

If there is one fault that I find in today's system—this was again the subject of a report last week—it is the pricing of rail travel. There is a confusing array of prices, and staff sometimes appear to be unwilling to share with customers the price options for journeys. Those in the business community, with whom I often rub shoulders on a Monday morning when travelling to London on my very satisfactory Pendolino train, are a captive audience for paying high prices for their tickets. The current situation rather crowds out many people's ability to use trains as much as they would like.

On the whole, however, my message to the writers of this report, and to the people who are delivering the work about which the report tells us, is, "You are doing a good job; keep up the good work."

2.59 pm

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I start by endorsing the comments that my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) made about the enormous improvements on the west coast main line, particularly his point that all of this work should have been done about 20 years ago—certainly before privatisation. However, I am extremely pleased that it has now been done, and that it has been done by a Labour Government.

I congratulate the Minister and all his predecessors on bringing the project to such a satisfactory point—not a conclusion, because the project is ongoing—at which real improvements have been delivered in a cost-effective way. I hope to console him for the absence of crowds of Back Benchers wanting to harass him during the debate by saying that he should take it as a sign of success. I feel confident in saying that had the debate been held at almost any time during the preceding 15 years, regardless of the party of the Minister who would have been speaking, the room would have been crowded with Back Benchers who would not have been wanting to say complimentary things about the west coast main line. They would have been falling over themselves to explain its deficiencies and their constituents' need for progress to be made. It has now been made and the Minister should take the lack of speakers as a sign of his success. In that sense, I look forward to a debate that nobody attends because everything is so hunky dory that people cannot be bothered to turn up and say so.

The Minister can be reassured that, given the Government's successful response to my past harassment of them—that is an accurate way of describing it—I do not intend to repeat in mind-numbing detail all the reasons why Milton Keynes is so extremely important. I have clearly convinced him of the fact. I simply say that for my constituency, the issues have always been twofold.

First, we have wanted to ensure that we have good, reliable and fast inter-city services, because Milton Keynes is an extremely dynamic local and business community. The chamber of commerce in Milton Keynes has, rightly, always insisted that we need a good inter-city service and good inter-city links both north and south throughout the day, including at peak hours, to ensure that our businesses can get the business visitors that they require at all times of the day from both north and south. In that respect, I am extremely pleased that the progress report details improvements in peak time services as well as those during the rest of the day, including services from the north to Milton Keynes in the morning and in the opposite direction in the evening.

As well as business visitors, a significant and growing number of people work in Milton Keynes but live elsewhere, although a larger number live in Milton Keynes and commute to London and, of course, an even larger number both live and work in Milton Keynes. It is therefore important to us that the focus is not only on commuter services between Milton Keynes and London, but on commuter services to Milton Keynes from both London and from the north. The expansion of capacity mentioned in the progress report and the new timetables that are planned meet that need.

I pay tribute to the Milton Keynes chamber of commerce, which has been extremely constructive in working with me and the Government on the improvements to the service to Milton Keynes that we need to meet business needs. I also give credit to the Milton Keynes and Bletchley rail users group, which has effectively co-ordinated the views and needs of rail commuters and fed them into the debate on improvements to the west coast main line in Milton Keynes.

The improvements set out in the progress report are extremely welcome, particularly the planned extra platform for Milton Keynes Central station. That will greatly increase track capacity and enable the new timetable from 2008 to incorporate an increased number of trains at peak commuting times. It will also provide, through the turn-back facility, the ability for trains to turn round at Milton Keynes, which will increase the ability to fit in at peak times train services between Milton Keynes and London. That will be of enormous advantage to my constituents.

The extra capacity is particularly required because Milton Keynes is a growth area and we expect its population to have grown by 80 per cent. by 2030. I am hoping that most of those new people will live and work in Milton Keynes, but clearly a proportion of them will commute to London, so one can expect the number of commuters to increase, although perhaps not by as much as 80 per cent. The increased capacity is therefore extremely important.

I am also pleased that mention is made of the improvements in journey time and comfort that are being made to the Silverlink County rail services, which carry the bulk of commuters in the new Desiro rolling stock, which is far more comfortable than the older rolling stock that it replaced. The comfort level is important to regular commuters, who—however fast the journey is—spend a considerable proportion of their lives on trains. They appreciate the improved quality of the trains, not to mention the air conditioning, which is particularly important in the summer. The improved track reliability is also immensely important to everyone on both the Virgin and the Silverlink County services, in that the trains run on time and arrive as expected.

[Dr. Phyllis Starkey]

An issue raised in the west coast main line progress report relates to Milton Keynes Central station. It is an excellent station on the whole, but it has one defect: it does not have proper passenger lifts. Its lifts are essentially goods lifts and they have extremely heavy doors that are difficult for passengers to use, especially elderly passengers, who are exactly the people who are most likely to want to use the lifts. I hope that the passenger lifts are upgraded so that they are more suitable for the 21st century and the many more people who will wish to use the station.

The second issue involves both Bletchley station and Milton Keynes Central station. There is a welcome mention in the progress report of the fact that the planned improvements will not only be of benefit to the west coast main line, but be significant to the sought-after reopening of the Oxford to Bletchley rail link with the Aylesbury to Bletchley spur. At both Bletchley and Milton Keynes Central, the works have been carried out so that they will facilitate the future reopening of the east-west rail link and enable the east-west service to go up to Milton Keynes Central from Bletchley. That would enormously increase potential usage and hugely strengthen the business case for the reopening of the railway link. I am pleased that the Government have taken note of that.

However, I ask that in the remodelling of Bletchley station, which is also important for the regeneration of Bletchley, and the construction of the new high-level platform, enormous care is taken to ensure that the remodelling is passenger friendly. It should take particular account of the need to make the transfer of passengers from the east-west line—the Bedford to Bletchley line—to the west coast main line as easy as possible to encourage passengers to use it. It should also take account of some of the concerns that are being raised by the rail users group about whether the placing of that high-level platform is quite as convenient as it might otherwise have been for pedestrians, and in particular for disabled customers. Will the Minister keep a watching brief on those planned works and ensure that they are as friendly as possible to rail users?

I thank the Minister for listening so carefully to all the representations that I have made in the past and for delivering so effectively for the people of Milton Keynes. I also thank all those people in the various parts of the rail industry who have participated in those discussions and contributed to the scheme that will now be advanced. It will enormously improve life for my constituents.

3.10 pm

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): It is a pleasure to take part in this debate under your chairmanship, Lady Winterton.

Like others in the Chamber, I welcome the publication this week of the progress report on the west coast main line. Typically, the Minister understated some of the past problems and the progress that we have made since the publication of the west coast main line strategy in 2003. I am a former member of the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority and now a regular user of the service between Manchester and Euston. During the 12 months that I have been a Member of Parliament, I have seen a vast improvement in the quality and reliability of the service, so much so that it is easy to forget how poor it was prior to modernisation.

During the 1990s, I visited Kenya and travelled on the line from Nairobi to Mombasa. I told friends that the rolling stock on that line was newer than the rolling stock on the west coast main line at that time. Sadly for Kenya, that would not be true now. That is an example of the fact that one must continue to upgrade and improve not only the rolling stock, but the condition of the line. The modernisation of the west coast main line has been a long-held wish. The Minister referred to the upgrade in the 1960s and 1970s, which did not deal with many of the structural problems on the line that would have allowed the sort of speeds that people wanted.

When preparing for this debate I read a Westminster Hall debate of 23 October 2002 before the strategy that we are discussing was agreed. As the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) said, the Chamber then was full of Members wanting to talk about the problems being experienced by their constituents. The debate was initiated by my former colleague, Patsy Calton, who said:

> "Where is the industry going? Where is the strategy to produce the railway industry that the north-west, the industry, the public and business want? Do the Government have a plan? Will they act to reduce the uncertainty crippling business? The north-west needs the upgrade, as do the midlands, Cumbria and Scotland, for local, national and, ultimately, international traffic. The country needs to hear from the Minister that the Government have at last got a grip on this out-of-control project."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 23 October 2002; Vol. 391, c. 97WH.]

She accurately underlined the problems at the time—for example, the cost overruns—and the fact that it looked as though we would never have the railway that the west coast main line deserved.

Savings were made by reducing the speed on the track from the 140 mph originally planned to 125 mph. At Stockport station, the signal box, instead of being replaced with modern electronic signals, was refurbished by Chinese engineers because no one in Britain could master the mechanical devices. Despite all that, this week, improvements to the service have been announced. Birmingham will have two to three trains an hour with a journey time of one hour 23 minutes instead of one hour 43 minutes, and Manchester will have a train every 20 minutes and a service that peaks at less than two hours. Those are remarkable achievements and, as a regular user, I understand why those services are popular. The Minister rightly said that the train is now beating the aeroplane in terms of passenger usage from Manchester to London. During the past 12 months, reliability and frequency on that line have improved considerably.

I am pleased that we have made good progress, and done so within the original cost estimate. In the past, we have criticised the Government for cost overruns, but I pay tribute to them for keeping the west coast main line project on budget and on time. That is a tribute to all who work in the rail industry.

I want to raise a couple of issues with the Minister about how we can further improve the service. The hon.

Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) mentioned Birmingham New Street station, where there are capacity issues. Plans are being drawn up to deal with that problem, but it is important to have some news soon about what will happen, not necessarily in respect of the long-distance fast trains, but to ensure that there is continued growth of commuter trains feeding into the fast trains. The same applies at Manchester Piccadilly station. As I have said, we need to know when platforms 12 and 13 will be upgraded because they are limiting capacity to improve services into and out of Manchester Piccadilly.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned fares, which spoil the progress that has been made. It is now more expensive to travel first class from Manchester to London by rail than by air. As the Transport Committee said last week, the pricing system is complex and unintelligible to even the most intelligent person. It needs simplifying and sorting out.

On future issues, the hon. Gentlemen mentioned the bottleneck at Stafford, to which the report refers. That is a complex problem. The Trent Valley line has been sorted out and I understand that, given the original milestones and deadlines, everything cannot be done at once. However, I hope that by the time of the next debate that issue will have been resolved. It is important for people in Stafford and for regular rail users to develop the network line.

On freight, the report does not contain a resolution that achieves the original plans, which referred to 60 to 70 per cent. more freight on the line. The report refers to some of the fast mail services, but we have not been told how those will be provided. If we are to be green and environmentally friendly, it is important not only that we have more passengers, but that more freight is moved around by rail.

There are future issues. I hope that a plan will be introduced so that renewals of the line are built into the system and are not neglected, as happened in the past, and that speeds increase from the current maximum of 125 mph. I hope that we can have a proper dialogue on the development of the high-speed line between London and Scotland. The Northwest Development Agency rightly said that the west coast main line is the economic lifeline of the north-west. The next phase should be a high-speed line between London, the north-west and Scotland, which will be a further motor to the economic progress that we are seeing in the north-west and beyond.

I thank the Minister for initiating this positive debate. At last, we are seeing some of the long-sought-after benefits that we were promised back in 2003.

3.19 pm

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Lady Winterton. I do not intend to delay Members for long, but there are a few issues I wish to raise with the Minister, and I have a couple of introductory points.

Those of us who use the west coast main line recognise that it is much better and that the project has transformed what was a pretty shaky part of our transport infrastructure into something that works well and appropriately. I congratulate the Government on their work on the project. It is one of two promises they made in their 10-year plan that they have kept—the other being the channel tunnel rail link. All the rest have gone by the board, such as Crossrail, the suburban improvements in London and Birmingham, Thameslink 2000, platform extensions on the South West Trains route and the upgrade to the east coast main line. It is good that at least some of the promises—commitments—of projects that would be finished by 2010 that were set out in the document of five years ago have come to fruition.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) is right that the project has made a significant difference to people in Milton Keynes, as well as in Stafford and Manchester, but that has come at a price. I would be pretty worried—as I am sure would the Government—if after having spent £10 billion there had not been a transformation of the service. Bearing in mind the estimates that Iain Coucher of Network Rail made a couple of weeks ago of the potential cost of a high-speed line to the north, the truth is that the upgrade has not cost an awful lot less than building an entirely new line from scratch. It has been a big, significant and complicated project, and the Minister is right that the route is probably the busiest and has the biggest mix of traffic in Europe, but I would be worried if it had not made a big difference, because it is of a scale almost comparable to building an entirely new route.

I wish to raise a number of issues with the Minister about the west coast route and related matters. The first is the length of the trains. One of the absurdities over the past few years—it was quickly discovered to be such—has been that the original Pendolinos had eight coaches. They now have nine, although traditionally express trains on the route would have had 10, 11 or 12. Therefore, we have had shorter trains over the past few years, which has inevitably meant less capacity.

There is talk—it is mentioned in the document—of adding an additional coach to the Pendolino trains. Is that the case? If it is, will that be funded by the Government or from the additional passenger revenues that Virgin Trains will secure from such an expansion? Is it true that Network Rail is considering procuring those trains? If it is, that would represent a significant change in the procurement practices of the industry. I would be grateful if the Minister answered those questions.

There are still some big unanswered questions to do with the route—major bottlenecks and major issues that have not been addressed. The most obvious of them concerns Birmingham New Street station. After the Birmingham, Hodge Hill by-election, the Prime Minister promised that the station would be dealt with quickly. That has not happened. There is no sign as yet of confirmed funding. I would be grateful if the Minister told us what is happening about New Street station.

Also, given that the Government are open about their consideration of high-speed rail, what consideration has been made in thinking about station provision in central Birmingham of the potential capacity needs of a high-speed line? In the discussions that the Minister and his Department are having about Birmingham New Street, has any thought been given to where high-speed trains to central Birmingham could be fitted in if bringing high-speed rail beyond London to the north of England is a part of the next stage of development on which this Government—or a future Government—decide?

Mr. Kidney: I wish to intervene because that is the second slightly negative comment about the Birmingham New Street project. It is true that we are waiting for decisions about the rail industry's contribution to the scheme, but I would like to put the positive side of the matter. The whole region has come together, with money, to back the plan. There is strong support for it, including from Advantage West Midlands, the regional development agency; Birmingham city council; the chambers of commerce; and the rest of us in the wider region, and a lot of money has already been identified.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman talks about slightly negative comments, but two weeks ago I met the West Midlands chamber of commerce to discuss the project, and I met the leader of Birmingham city council to discuss it yesterday, and the practical truth is that there is no money from central Government to make it a reality. There is no timetable, and there is no confirmed project; nothing is happening at present. Whatever good will for it there may be in the west midlands and whatever money that region may make available for it, this is a project in a siding. Given that Birmingham is Britain's second city, it is beholden on the Minister to make it clear what the Government are going to do. We are discussing a central part of the west coast main line.

My point about high-speed trains is that the Government would not be doing their duty in considering high-speed rail for the future if they were not to demonstrate a bit of joined-up thinking by asking this question: if we are going to rebuild the major station in the centre of Birmingham and we might build a high-speed rail line a bit further down the track, where would the trains actually go? Is there a part of the plan that shows where they could be added in?

The second big flaw is Manchester Piccadilly station. The suburban rail improvements around Manchester Piccadilly promised in the 10-year plan have not come to fruition. It is a bottleneck in the network. I would like to understand the Government's thinking on Manchester Piccadilly, and how they plan to take forward the various ideas for improving the situation there.

The issue of Stafford is explained in some detail in the document. It basically says, "Oh dear, big problem for the future, and not quite sure what to do about it." What are the Government planning to do about it, and when?

There is another significant capacity issue in the west midlands: four-tracking the stretch from Birmingham to Coventry. The lack of four-tracking is a major constraint on the ability of the rail network to take additional passengers in that part of the country. What work have the Government done on assessing the options for turning that stretch into four tracks? What estimates have they made of the cost? Do they have any plans to do so?

The document mentions a third platform at Manchester airport. Manchester airport is growing; it has a second runway and aims to increase significantly the number of passengers who arrive there by public transport, but it has a very small railway station and increasing demand. The document seems to be slightly equivocal about whether the third platform will be built. I would be grateful if the Minister set out whether it has been approved, whether the funding is in place, and whether he is committed to ensuring that it is in place by the time of the 2009 timetable.

I have looked carefully at the sections on freight-loading gauges. It is desirable that higher-gauge freight vehicles can make it through to Trafford Park, and it now appears that that is the case. I also note with interest that reference is made to the Felixstowe route:

> "Should the Felixstowe-Peterborough-Leicester-Nuneaton line be developed for high gauge traffic, this additional line would enable a conflict-free link with the West Coast route to be provided."

The improvement of the Felixstowe route to take high-gauge freight traffic is of course another commitment in the 10-year plan that has not happened.

The Minister and his Department have made quite a play over the past couple of months about double-decker trains. What steps has his Department taken as part of the project to provide for future introduction of double-decker trains on the west coast route? Is it practical to do so? Has that work been done, or was the west coast route shut off to the Government's plans for double-decker trains—as are many other parts of the network?

Will the Minister address the question of the future franchising arrangements on the west coast route? He will be well aware of the GNER experience, which has become doubly complicated with the Grand Central debate, and which is in the courts. Owing to the nature of the franchise renewal process—because the Government have taken such close control over the day-to-day operation of the rail network—the railways are in effect run by the Government, not by independent companies. The rail companies are subcontractors to Government who work to very tight specifications set out by the Department. The Minister has a team of civil servants working for him, who write train timetables to which the would-be bidders must conform in their bids. To meet the Government's aspirations to extract as much value from the franchise agreements as possible, the bidders then bid as high as they dare. It is a popular received view in the rail industry that GNER bid quite high for its franchise. We saw one of the consequences of that on 1 January, when unregulated fares on the east coast route went up by about 10 per cent. If one looks at GNER's future financing structure—the premium it has to meet over its franchise—it is difficult to see how the process of big increases in unregulated fares will stop.

I have a question for the Minister about the west coast route, which has been hugely costly for the Government. The route has built up a substantial debt burden for Network Rail to service over the next few years. Today, Network Rail's debts are about £18 billion, and it will take well over £1 billion a year of public money to service that debt. Certainly half that sum has gone into the west coast project. What is the Government's policy on fares for the west coast route? When the franchise is renewed, do they expect to end up with an agreement comparable to the one for the east coast, under which it is clear that passengers who fall outside the scope of the regulated fares structure will pay ever higher fares to travel on the line? I would be grateful if the Minister addressed that.

Let us be clear: anyone who looks at the west coast route will say that there has been significant improvement, although it has cost a lot of money and taken a huge amount of engineering. We need a strong, good, effective rail network for the future, and we will need improvements in other parts of the country. We will need to work to address capacity problems; one of the big challenges that the Minister faces in the next few years is how on earth the Government will do that—and when they will do it, because it needs to happen now, not at some distant time.

The west coast story is a good-news story that has made a difference to the constituents of the Members here today and others on both sides of the House. Those who worked so hard on the project should take credit for transforming a decaying and declining route into one with a clear, strong and promising future.

Derek Twigg: This has been an interesting debate, but I accept that a lot more people were present when the subject was debated three or four years ago—the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) referred to that occasion. I wondered for a minute whether that was just because I am speaking today, but that would be another issue.

The west coast route certainly is a good-news story. I might have understated the previous problems. I assure the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) that I have stood at Crewe station at 2 o'clock in the morning, having set out at half-past 6 from London Euston, so I am well aware of the tremendous difficulties that have occurred. I have travelled on the line for 26 or 27 years, and have seen the ups and the downs—there have been a lot of downs during that time—so it is pretty pleasing to see the significant improvements that have taken place in the past few years. I put on record my thanks to officials in the Department for Transport, who have been very much involved in taking the project forward, and who have worked tremendously hard on it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) has been an absolute champion for Stafford and has been in regular contact with me. Of course I am more than happy to meet him to discuss the details of the report, and particularly to discuss how we can take forward the issues for Stafford. He made a point about the importance of work on the Trent Valley double-tracking; that line is a major artery. He mentioned lifts and improving Stafford station; he has been pursuing that point clearly. There is work under way on car parking, and we are hoping for improvement in 2008. We will provide some 5,000 extra spaces at main stations along the west coast, so there will be improved capacity.

Hon. Members mentioned freight. There has been significant growth, and more growth is taking place. By 2008, there will be 70 per cent. more capacity for freight. Improvements to the west coast route have meant improvements for freight, and we welcome opportunities and ideas for developing that further. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford also referred to ticket prices, which I shall come to shortly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) has done tremendous work in lobbying me—and previous rail Ministers—about Milton Keynes Central. It has become a particularly important station because of the growth taking place in the area. That is partly why we are investing the amount that we are in Milton Keynes. I went there on Tuesday to see for myself the improvements that have been made and that will be progressed there. As my hon. Friend says, she would still like further improvements, and I recognise that she is not one to rest on her laurels. She will continue to pursue the issues. I take account of the issue of passenger lifts; she will be aware of our announcement a few months ago of the "Access for All" fund for improving access for disabled and other people. That is part of a longer-term programme.

My hon. Friend mentioned the important issue of Bletchley station. In relation to both Bletchley and Milton Keynes, we have done work on how we can take forward the east-west link to which she referred. There is the Bletchley platform issue, too, which I am happy to speak to her about further. As I said, I concur very much with what the hon. Member for Rochdale said about the problems that we all encountered when travelling on the west coast line.

On the future of Birmingham New Street, which the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell mentioned, we have only recently received the business case. We are working on that and assessing it, but of course we will consider how it might, or might not, link into any high-speed line. The hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to hear that that is part of Eddington's work, which is taking place. Clearly, there would be a substantial cost, and we need to make sure that we look into the matter in some detail. Birmingham is important, as the hon. Gentleman says, and we recognise the need to do something; the issue is how we go about doing it.

The hon. Members for Rochdale and for Epsom and Ewell mentioned Manchester Piccadilly. Network Rail is undertaking work on the route utilisation strategy for the north-west, and that will be taken into account. Similarly, discussions about Manchester airport are ongoing, and we are trying to facilitate them and bring about the improvements to which hon. Members have referred.

The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell made a number of important points about the longer-term strategy and where we are going. He made points about double-decker trains, Coventry, Manchester airport and Birmingham New Street. As I have always made clear, there have been significant improvements in the railway overall, in terms of increased reliability, record numbers of passengers and improved rolling stock. I agree with him that, given the money that we have spent, there should have been improvements, not least on the west coast line. However, clearly, the biggest challenge for the future is that of capacity, as we continue to want to grow the railways, and as there is further growth. Indeed, growth on the west coast line could double in 10 years.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the increased length of trains. We want nine-car trains, possibly going up to 10 or 11 cars. Owing to increased passenger numbers and increased usage of the line, there will be significant extra income that can help to pay for those increases. In particular, he mentioned our negotiations with Virgin about the franchise. Those discussions are ongoing, and I would not want to prejudice them by talking in detail about what is happening, but clearly they are important, and we have to get that right for the future of the service on the west coast.

To come back to capacity, the hon. Gentleman referred to the high-level output specification. The Secretary of State—sorry, the previous Secretary of State—made a point about the long-term look a few weeks ago. For the first time in decades, there is a real long-term look at what the railway will need, what the capacity issues will be and how we might afford the changes and improvements to the railway that are needed, and get best value for money. That is important in terms of longer-term planning and high-level output specification. We are consulting widely on that, and on improvements such as double-decker trains and longer platforms.

Chris Grayling: I have not got used to the change of Secretary of State yet, either; I keep referring to the Secretary of State's predecessor.

Surely the point about double-decker trains is that if the west coast route cannot take them, the Minister can consult all he wants on them, but they will not work there. The previous Secretary of State made it absolutely clear that the Department sees double-decker trains as an important part of future strategy for the west coast route. Despite the most recent modernisation programme, that route is forecast to be one of the most congested on the network in the next few years. Have the Government ensured that the modernisation process has left gauge clearances of a scale sufficient to take double-decker trains in future?

Derek Twigg: The hon. Gentleman will not be surprised if I make the point that double-decker trains represent one of several solutions that the Department is considering; it is important to take a generic view of solutions for the railway. There is no one solution for the whole railway, and as he makes clear there are certain options. As I have said, perhaps following some minor infrastructure or route improvements, we believe that the west coast line has capacity for trains of 10 to 12 cars. There is the ability to build up the length of the trains and, of course, have longer platforms. In the longer term, we have to decide which high-level output specification we can afford and which the Secretary of State wants to take forward. I ask the hon. Gentleman to be a little patient at this stage.

Chris Grayling: The Minister knows that virtually all our rail network cannot take double-decker trains because of gauge constraints. Network Rail is implementing a major modernisation programme on one of our routes, which the Government are funding. If double-decker trains are being considered, the construction work taking place as we speak should surely make provision for such trains—if they are what the Government want. Is that provision being made?

Derek Twigg: I can see where the hon. Gentleman is trying to go. The announcement about what we want to look at was made last year, but that is part of the overall process of considering future capacity constraints.

Chris Grayling: So that is a no, then.

Derek Twigg: No. Much route modernisation has already taken place, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. I am just explaining some ways of considering capacity on the west coast route. He will have to be patient and wait a little longer until we finally decide on the high-level output specification—our future planning for the railway.

The hon. Gentleman also dealt with fares, as did the hon. Member for Rochdale and my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford. The west coast line is an interesting case to study. Let me make it clear: I agree that the ticketing is too complex. It should be simplified and information given to passengers should be improved. That is in the gift of the train operating companies. I know that some of them are already working on that, and we can bring about improvements and remove a lot of the complexity. If someone turns up wanting to know what the cheapest ticket is, they should be able to get that information.

Having said that, the debate has gone astray quite a bit. On the west coast line, there is clear competition for trains from aircraft, buses and cars. Despite that, the majority of people travel on the west coast line on lower price tickets, rather than the top prices for rail travel often quoted by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell and others. There are many excellent deals and good value tickets: I think the cheapest ticket from Manchester or Liverpool is £24. The competition is there, but since the issue of the 2004 timetable, there has been a 30 per cent. increase in usage of the route. I understand some of the concerns raised, but regulated fares are 3 per cent. cheaper in real terms than they were in the mid-1990s.

We need better transparency and we must improve ticketing information and access to the cheapest tickets, but there are already many good-value deals. We have a competitive service, and the west coast line is a good example of how rail travel can compete and provide a very good service.

In conclusion, there is still work to be done. I assure hon. Members that the Government will continue to focus strongly on the project to ensure that we achieve the improvements at the right cost and at the right time. There are still challenges, which my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford mentioned, such as how we can continue to bring about further improvements, not just for passengers but for freight.

It is clear that rail is becoming a much more attractive form of travel that continues to attract many more people. The Government want to continue investment in the railway to ensure that we improve capacity and grow the number of passengers, make further improvements in rolling stock and reliability, and focus strongly on improving performance. As I said earlier, the target for the reliability of trains was 88 per cent. and we are already running at about 90 per cent. However, the Government want to improve that figure further, and it is important that we keep focused on it to ensure further improvements.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes to Four o'clock.
